opinion, ought not to have been met otherwise than by a direct negative. As that Address, however, had been agreed to both by their Lordships and by the other House of Parliament, he thought it his duty now to propose an Address to Her Majesty, requesting that she would command that there should be substituted for the services in question, if they should be removed from the Prayer-book, some memorial of those great deliverances for which this nation ought to be so constantly grateful. The noble Earl who moved the Address on a former evening (Earl Stanhope) stated that these services rested solely on the authority of a Royal Proclamation, and with singular inconsistency he asked their Lordships to pray Her Majesty to invalidate her own authority. Another argument urged against them was that they had not been sanctioned by Convocation. This was very delicate ground to touch upon. No one could be more disposed to pay all due respect to Convocation than he was; but he could not admit that a service which had the authority of a Royal Proclamation, ought to be disregarded, simply because it had not the sanction of Convocation. A further argument urged was, that expressions were used in these services entirely unsuited to the present time; and in the justice of that argument he was inclined to some extent to agree. But the great difference between the times in which these services were instituted and our own ought to be borne in mind. The most objectionable parts of these services depended on the florid, high-flown personal references contained in them. Though the feeling of loyalty and attachment to the Throne was no less warm now than in those times, yet it was not our habit to use such high-flown expressions of adulation in respect to the person of the Sovereign as were common then, and it would be found on examination that it was in that particular that these services were most objectionable to the public taste of the day. He did not desire that these objectionable parts should be retained, but simply that the recollection of the great events in our national history and the great deliverances which God had vouchsafed to this country should be kept alive. Even if the services themselves were expunged, some memorial ought to be retained in the liturgy of the Church of the events therein commemorated. The Acts of Parliament on which these services rested had not yet been repealed, and so long as that was the case there was an inconsistency in sending up Addresses to the Crown, requesting it to do an act which would be in direct contradiction of those Acts. The events of those days were intimately associated with the national prosperity, and he could not conceive that, in asking their Lordships to agree to an Address to have them commemorated, he was asking their assent to anything which was not acceptable to them. It was perfectly true that a long period had elapsed since that great wickedness of the 5th of November was about to be perpetrated, but he was sure there were thousands of hearts which, when the memory of those events returned, swelled with thankfulness at the deliverance of the country from ruin and desolation. It might be true that some of the phrases in the services which now appeared in the Book of Common Prayer were not in accordance with the feelings of the present day. Let those phrases be expunged, but let them not be ashamed of confessing the national dependence on the Providence of God. He proposed that in the only service which his noble Friend (Earl Stanhope) had spared—relating to the Accession of Her Majesty—some allusion should be made to those events which, by a wonderful co-operation had led to the present occupancy of a Protestant and constitutional Throne. The noble Duke concluded by moving—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty, if it should be Her pleasure that the Services of the 5th November, the 30th January, and the 29th May should no longer be annexed to the Book of Common Prayer, in accordance with the Address of the House of Lords, to direct that there be hereafter inserted in the Form of Prayer and Thanksgiving appointed for the 20th day of June, being the day on which Her Majesty began Her happy Reign, such Form of Thanksgiving, as Her Majesty may see fit, for the great Deliverances which by the mercy of God have been vouchsafed to this Nation—namely:

"The Rescue of the Estates of Parliament from the Conspiracy of the 5th November, 1605; and,

"The Restoration of the Church and Monarchy in 1660; and

"The Deliverance from Papal Subjection and arbitrary Power through the Landing of King William III. in 1688:

"Of which several events the Nation is still enjoying the blessings in the security of Her Majesty's Throne."

EARL STANHOPE said, he had hoped that this question had been disposed of three weeks ago, and he questioned whether, in making this Motion the noble Duke was recommending a course consonant with that sincere desire for the welfare of the Church by which he was known to be animated. He was charged with inconsistency, because he had not upon a recent occasion proposed to repeal the Acts of Parliament upon which the Royal Proclamation issued for these special services. But the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishop of Oxford thought the notion of an Address to the Crown preferable, and if the Royal Proclamation were withdrawn the object would be accomplished, because the Act would then be a dead letter. It was true that the noble Earl representing the Government (the Earl of Malmesbury) said he should have preferred a repeal of the Act, but he assigned as the reason because the other House would then have concurred; and since that time the other House had concurred by unanimously adopting an Address to the Crown identical with that which, at his instance, had been adopted by their Lordships. He entirely dissented from the Motion of the noble Duke, which he looked upon as a retrograde movement, and he should feel it his duty to divide the House against it if it was not withdrawn.

Viscount DUNGANNON said, he felt deeply indebted to the noble Duke for proposing his Motion. No lapse of time ought to prevent this nation from cherishing gratitude to God for the signal blessings which He had conferred upon this country at various periods of its history, and the gracious interpositions by which he had saved it from impending ruin; and no time could be more appropriate for their commemoration than the time when we were commemorating the Accession of our most gracious Sovereign to the throne. A total oblivion of the signal mercies of Divine Providence would fill his mind with alarm. Such things ought to be kept fresh in the recollection of the people, and nothing would tend more to the overthrow of this nation than forgetfulness of the mercies which it had received at the hands of Providence. Let them once forget such events as were referred to in the noble Duke's Motion, and from that moment their sun would set.

Lord EBURY said, he hoped that if this Motion were carried the Government would do something more than advise Her Majesty to recall the Proclamation in virtue of which these services were read—namely, bring in a Bill to repeal the Act of Parliament on which that Proclamation was based. So long as these Acts remained unrepealed a court of law might enforce their performance. He had no objection to a short collect being added to the service for the Accession of the Queen, with a view to commemorate the events now celebrated in these services.

The Earl of DERBY said, that although his noble Friend (Viscount Dungannon) had stated that these services were enjoined by Act of Parliament, it would have been more correct to say that the observance of the days was ordered by Act of Parliament, and that during several reigns the use of these forms was enjoined by Royal proclamation; for the Acts said nothing about these services, which were prepared afterwards. The more advisable course in regard to these forms of prayer would have been, not to address the Crown to direct that they should be omitted from the Liturgy, but to bring in a Bill to repeal the Act of Parliament enjoining the observance of these days. Parliament, however, had adopted a different view; and the opinion of both Houses of Parliament having been made known to Her Majesty, She would, no doubt, see fit to direct that a course should be taken in accordance with the wishes of Parliament. The Motion of the noble Duke appeared to him to rescind the previous Resolution for an Address to the Crown; and for the same reason that he had voted for the Resolution, he should vote against the present Motion, if it were pressed to a division. The events commemorated in these services were undoubtedly very important occurrences in the history of this country, and afforded great cause for thankfulness; yet it was not pretended that every great blessing and every signal deliverance in our history either was or ought to be commemorated by a special service. He did not remember a greater peril or a more signal deliverance than that from the Spanish Armada; and if special services were to be kept up, he did not see why we should not return thanks for the discomfiture of the Spanish Armada. Then, again, the Reformation exercised a most important influence upon the character and constitution of this country, yet it was not thought necessary to celebrate it by a special thanksgiving. He thought the time had come for the discontinuance of these services, and he did not think it would be advisable to incorporate a portion of them into another service to which no objection was taken.

The Bishop of LONDON said, that it was, no doubt, a mistake to suppose that these particular services were enjoined by Act of Parliament. The days were commanded to be observed by Act of Parliament, but the services themselves rested upon a Royal Proclamation; and that being withdrawn, the services would be also withdrawn. With regard to the service of the Fifth of November, he entertained a strong conviction that thanksgivings for Her Majesty's accession ought not to be mixed up with anything calculated to embitter our feelings towards our Roman Catholic fellow-subjects. His great objection to the service for the Fifth of November was, that it involved the whole Roman Catholic body in an act which was not theirs, but the act of certain conspirators. He need not remind their Lordships that the battle of Inkerman was fought on the 5th of November; and it would be most undesirable, while thanking God for Her Majesty's auspicious reign, to revive feelings of bitterness towards Her Roman Catholic subjects.

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH said, that he regretted the opposition of the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby) to his Motion, but he would not divide the House.

Motion, by leave of the House, withdrawn.

SCHOOL TRUSTEES BILL.
SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY moved the second reading of this Bill, which was, he said, required by the present unsatisfactory state of the law. Some measure was necessary in order to terminate the discussions to which recent conflicting decisions of the Courts had given rise. He added that such a measure had become absolutely necessary, in order to place the trusts of many scholastic foundations in the country in conformity with the decisions of the Courts of law at the present time, as to the admissibility of Dissenters to such trusts where they had not been expressly excluded by the terms of the deed of foundation; and he trusted their Lordships would give it a second reading, as otherwise an element of discord would be introduced into a great number of the public schools in the kingdom.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2ª.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said, this Bill, though very unpretending in appearance, for it consisted of only one clause, seemed to him likely to be fraught with important consequences. The noble Lord said it would prevent an element of discord being introduced into the different towns where foundations of this kind existed. The measure was founded on the decision in the case of the Ilminster School, where the Master of the Rolls and the Lords Justices came to different conclusions as to the admissibility of Dissenters to be trustees of the school. The noble Lord had proposed a general measure, applicable to all schools and foundations, and providing that no person should be prevented from being nominated or acting as a trustee on account of his religious opinions unless there was an express provision for such exclusion in the deed of foundation. Of course, where there was an express provision excluding Dissenters, they must be excluded; but there were many instruments of foundation by which Dissenters were excluded by necessary implication as strong as any expressed provision, from acting as trustees, though they were not so excluded by express terms; and yet the noble Lord would include all such schools in his Bill. The effect of the measure would be to interfere with Church schools and Church foundations, and in all such cases Dissenters would be admitted as trustees where they had not been expressly excluded by the deed of foundation. He thought such a Bill would be fraught with mischievous consequences, and he therefore moved that it be read a second time that day three months.

Amendment moved, to leave out ("now,") for the purpose of inserting ("this day three months").

LORD CRANWORTH said, he was persuaded that the Bill in its principle was a most useful measure, and that with one modification it ought to receive the assent of their Lordships. The only Amendment required in the Bill was one which would meet the objection put forward by his noble and learned Friend on the woolsack, and which would provide that Dissenters should not serve as trustees of schools in any case in which, by necessary implication, they were excluded from the office under the will of the founders. It was only because the school at Ilminster had been founded in the time of Henry VIII., when it was presumed there were no Dissenters, that members of that body had been declared by the Lords Justices disqualified from serving as trustees. The law upon that subject was at present in a very unsatisfactory condition, and it was very desirable that it should be amended.

THE EARL OF DERBY altogether dissented from the principle embodied in the Bill, which was, that whatever might have been the presumed or the real intentions of the founder, and though it might be manifest from the object of the school that none but Churchmen should hold the office of trustees, yet, if there were no express terms in the deed prohibiting Dissenters from becoming trustees, the courts of law should be bound to declare that Dissenters were eligible for such functions.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, that Dissenters had filled the office of trustee for such an institution for 150 years past; but by a recent decision the usage of a century and a half had been reversed. This fact showed that the law was in an unsatisfactory state, and ought to be reconsidered. Although he admitted that this measure went too far, it might easily be modified in Committee.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE suggested the postponement of the Bill for a few days, with a view to secure the presence at its discussion of several noble and learned Lords now absent, and also to afford an opportunity of consulting the Charity Commissioners as to its provisions. In consequence of the recent decisions, he feared that by the suspension of all action in this matter till next Session there was a danger that parties would be involved in costly litigation. A short Bill might be introduced to prevent this; and next Session the whole subject might be dealt with.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR was afraid that if the discussion were deferred for a few days they would lose the assistance of some noble and learned Lords now present.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY, in reply, said, that he would not call on their Lordships to divide.

On Question, That ("now") stand part of the Motion? Resolved in the negative; and Bill to be read 2ª on this Day Three Months.

UNIVERSITY (SCOTLAND) BILL.
COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to Order).

Clause 1.

THE EARL OF AIRLIE, in pursuance of notice, rose to move the omission of words in the 14th line of the clause, which would have the effect of preventing the union of Marischal and King's Colleges, Aberdeen.

Lord Cranworth

The noble Earl said, that when asked to undertake to move the Amendment he very naturally referred to the noble Earl the Lord Rector (Earl Stanhope); but he was told that the noble Earl felt some delicacy on account of his being named one of the Commissioners to carry out the provisions of the Bill when it became law. He need hardly say that the thanks of all who had the welfare of Scotland at heart were due to Her Majesty's Government for having introduced and carried forward this Bill, and that he was not actuated by any considerations of a party character in seeking to remedy what was thought very generally to be a deficiency in the measure. Their Lordships were aware that the clause as it now stood would effect the consolidation of the two Universities and the two Colleges of Aberdeen into one University and one College. If the Amendment which he was about to propose were adopted, there would be only one University, but the Colleges would remain separate. In Scotland the Universities were conducted upon the Professorial system—that was to say, there were large classes presided over by Professors; and in the Universities of Edinburgh, St. Andrews, and Glasgow, it was impossible that the Professors could exercise any very close superintendence over the studies of such large numbers. But in Aberdeen, in consequence of there being two Colleges with separate staffs of Professors, the Professors could exercise that most desirable supervision. The Lord Rector had, on a former occasion, described how the poorer classes, and even labourers, underwent great privations in order to obtain the advantage of a University education. In the Report which was laid on their Lordships' table some years ago of an inquiry into the University of Oxford, it was stated that one of the great causes of expense in that University was the necessity under which every one was placed, who wished to compete for honours, of employing at considerable expense the services of a private tutor, and it was suggested as a remedy that the staff of the Colleges should be increased. But it was proposed by this clause to take a step in a direction entirely contrary to that suggestion. It was proposed to fuse two Colleges into one, and to reduce the number of Professors at Aberdeen to something more than half—so that there would be a much smaller number of teachers, and consequently either a more superficial or a more expensive education. It was well known that the standard of education in Aberdeen was higher than in any other of the Universities of Scotland; and to keep up the standard with this alteration it would be necessary to engage the services of private tutors. The inhabitants of Aberdeen considered that they derived great benefits from the competition of the two Colleges. They were quite ready to confess that the competition between the Universities was of a very improper character—as tending injuriously to lower the fees—but they contended that, if the two Universities only were united, the improper competition would be extinguished, and the proper competition between the two Colleges retained. It was stated the other night in the course of the discussion, that the reports of all the Commissions which had reported on the state of Scotch Universities were unanimously in favour of the union of the Colleges. He ventured to say that it was a most unjustifiable assertion, and that there never had been more diversity of opinion upon any question than upon this very question of the Colleges of Aberdeen. The first Commission, which reported in 1830, was in favour of the union of the Colleges. The next, which reported in 1838, and again in 1839, recommended the union of the Universities, and said nothing about the Colleges. The last Commission, consisting of three gentlemen, did report in favour of a union of the Colleges; but one of the Commissioners—Mr. Stirling—had since changed his opinion. Mr. Stirling stated, in his place in the House of Commons, that certain circumstances had come to his knowledge which caused him to alter his opinion with respect to the union of the Colleges of Aberdeen; and he also stated that he had no doubt the same circumstances which influenced him would have influenced the opinion of another member of the Commission. But supposing that the union of the Colleges had not the disadvantage of enhancing the cost of education, or doing away with a competition which those who opposed their union believed to be wholesome, he thought the feeling expressed in the northern counties should lead their Lordships to pause and hesitate before they adopted this clause of the Bill. It was a great mistake to suppose that the feeling was confined to the town of Aberdeen. It prevailed throughout the counties of Aberdeen, Kincardine, Forfar, and Banff, including a population of nearly half a million, or one-fourth of the whole population of Scotland. They had heard something the other night about a petition from the Professors of one of the Colleges in favour of the union; but it should be remembered that it was a petition adopted by a majority of one in a body of thirteen, and that the Professors had a direct pecuniary interest in the union. But petitions against the union had been signed by 7,317 persons, as against less than 100 who signed in its favour. The other night, the noble Lord at the head of the Government spoke somewhat slightingly of the feelings expressed by the people of Aberdeen. The noble Earl was not the only person who had adopted that tone. It had been taken up by those who called themselves University reformers in Edinburgh, Glasgow, and St. Andrews. But he did not believe that the people of Aberdeen deserved those taunts; for, twenty-five years ago, when the Universities of St. Andrews, Glasgow, and Edinburgh were cold and still, Aberdeen took up the cause of University reform. It was rather hard now to turn upon them, and sweep away one of their Colleges and its endowment. The feeling of a people ought not to be entirely overlooked, unless it could be demonstrated beyond dispute that the course proposed was of great practical advantage. He would like to have heard the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby) defend Oxford against a proposition to amalgamate two of the great Colleges of that University, and sure he was that he might have thence borrowed abundant arguments for the sister University of Aberdeen. There was this argument, that the proposed consolidation was in direct contravention of the will of the founder and the charter of the College. He was not one of those who advocated a strict adherence to the letter of the wills of founders; he thought they would show more respect to those great men if they endeavoured to carry out their clear intentions, and in that spirit he supported the Bill for the reform of the University of Oxford. He was quite at a loss to know on what principles of justice, expediency, or public policy it was proposed to sweep away one of these Colleges. According to the doctrine so often laid down by the noble Earl at the head of the Government, when a great change was made it was not enough that the promoters of it should show that it was beneficial, but that it was so beneficial as to counterbalance all the injuries which it might inflict on certain interests. The advocates, therefore, of this union were bound to show that it was likely to confer such great advantages on Scotland and the empire at large as to compensate the people of Aberdeen for the great violence which it would do to their feelings and opinions. But the feeling against the union of these Colleges was not confined to Aberdeen nor to the people of the north of Scotland. There was a great difference of opinion among the most eminent public men who took an interest in this question. In the division in the other House, Mr. Gladstone, Sir Francis Baring, Mr. Ellice, Mr. Stirling, and others, voted against the provision. It might be possible that the persons who took this view of the question might be in the right, and should that turn out to be the case, the damage done by the Bill passing in its present condition would be irreparable. But no harm could be done by the Government simply leaving it to the Commissioners to inquire whether it was advisable that this union should take place. They would lay their Reports on the subject before the Government, and it would then be for them to decide what course they would pursue; and Parliament, after having their Reports before them, would have infinitely less trouble in deciding on the case. The worst that could happen by this course was postponement, which would allow public opinion time to consolidate itself upon the question. It was said that the Commissioners had power to maintain separate Professors in the Faculties of Arts if they should be so minded. That might be so, but he should be unwilling to leave the matter entirely in their hands. The effect of the Bill as it stood would be to do away with a great number of those small foundations or bursaries which were of so much use to the lower class of students, and would render it more difficult for such men to obtain a good education. He was sorry to have addressed their Lordships at such length, but he had no motive of hostility to the Bill; he simply desired to see those parts removed which would render it objectionable to the people of Scotland.

Amendment moved, in line 14, to leave out ("and College.")

EARL STANHOPE said, that as he was to be one of the Commissioners named in the Bill, he should not vote upon this question; but he did not think that he was precluded from expressing his present opinions, premising that he would hold himself disengaged as to any course which he might take hereafter when he had heard the matter further argued. He doubted very much, however, in any case whether he could have supported, to its full extent, the Amendment of the noble Earl, which he took to go to the complete separation of the Colleges. But he had always understood that the great feeling of the people of the north of Scotland was not against a union of the Colleges. There was a complete unanimity as to the union of the Colleges, and of the faculties of Law, Medicine, and Theology, but it was wished to keep up the two faculties of Arts separate. But this Amendment went to keep the two Colleges quite separate. To this extent he certainly could not go. It was said that the Commissioners would have full powers to consider this question, and no doubt that was the case; but he was not so sure that in deciding it they would be able to take into their consideration the popular feeling on the subject in the same manner that Parliament could. There was no doubt as to the unanimity of public feeling on this question. Noble Lords well acquainted with that part of the kingdom had borne testimony to it. A noble Earl (the Earl of Aberdeen) said he had never known the feeling so unanimous—and he would suggest therefore, without agreeing to the present Amendment, that words should be inserted in the 18th clause to keep the two faculties of Arts separate. He should be very sorry to see the Bill pass with any provision in it which would mar the popularity of the measure, and the adoption of his suggestion would prevent such a result.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, he had only voted against the noble Earl at the head of the Government twice or three times in his life, but he should be obliged to do so on the present occasion if the noble Earl did not amend this clause in the direction proposed. There was an agitation raised for an interested, but it was a genuine deep-rooted feeling in the heart of the great mass of the population. It was thought by the middle classes, who sent their children to these Universities, that if this Bill passed in its present shape, they would never again get so good an education at Aberdeen as before. In military language, the "squads" of students would be made too large for the Professors to manage. If the two Colleges were left separate, a feeling of emulation would be excited between them which should send out most University prizemen. If the question were left to the Commissioners, the moment the Bill passed they would be overwhelmed with applications from each of the two Colleges, and a source of discord would be created which would materially affect the success of their labours. With great respect to the Commissioners, he would rather have a clause in the Act than depend on their opinion afterwards; and if such a clause were introduced, the measure which had been for many years before the public would be carried to a successful issue. He did not think that he was asking too much when he said "For Heaven's sake leave well alone. Nobody says these two Professors have done any mischief. They can't do any mischief. Let them alone for a short time, and if in five or six years hence we and the people of Scotland find we are wrong, you can bring in a Bill of one clause in another Session of Parliament and put the thing right." He assured his noble Friend that the opinion of the whole of the north of Scotland was against the union; and although he was himself the last person in the world to bow to popular opinion, he had always felt that it was the bounden duty of every man in Parliament, and more particularly in the House of Lords, to give due weight and credit to public opinion, when it had been ascertained in the manner in which it had been ascertained upon this occasion.

EARL POWIS thought the noble Earl (Earl Stanhope) had exaggerated the effect of the Amendment proposed by the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Airlie.) The Bill gave the Commissioners power to establish another faculty of Arts, and that would involve a very trifling expense. The noble Earl (Earl Stanhope) spoke of the degrees which would be taken in the superior faculties of Law, Medicine, and Divinity. But the noble Earl (the Earl of Airlie) did not raise the question of having separate classes for those studies. All parties were agreed that the superior faculties should be merged in one united University. It was much to be regretted that the jealousy of the two Colleges and of the inhabitants of Aberdeen had caused them to miss opportunities which had several times occurred of settling the matter upon advantageous terms. But if it were supposed the Commissioners would exercise their discretion and establish another faculty of Arts with four or five Professors, was it not reasonable to ask that the Professor should be upon a separate foundation, and should have a resident head among themselves? What would their Lordships think, in the case of an English University, if it were proposed that two Colleges at opposite ends of the town should be under one head, and consequently that one of them should be without a principal? Would it not be said that that proposal was sure to produce anarchy in both? All that would be necessary would be to give a small allowance to one Professor, and place him at the head of the College. In case of any dispute among the Professors, or of discord among the students, was it not desirable that there should be on the spot a resident head who would have authority to compose differences, and make each establishment complete in itself? In the affiliating institutions of the University of Durham, and in the private halls authorized to be established at Oxford, each was under a responsible head, and under individual control; and surely it was unreasonable not to adopt the same plan in this case. It was not a question whether they should continue the two Universities—it was not a question whether they should continue separate classes in the superior faculties; it was whether, having decided practically that there should be a faculty of Arts in King's College, the Professors and pupils of that College should have an independent head. Surely their Lordships must confess that such an arrangement was for the advantage of the colleges and the benefit of education.

EARL STANHOPE repeated that he thought there ought to be a union of the colleges, but he doubted whether, as regarded the faculty of Arts, that ought to be left to the Commissioners under the Bill.

EARL POWIS said, the 15th section gave the Commissioners full control over the revenues of the colleges, and powers to re-establish or re-organize the Professors as they pleased.

LORD MONTEAGLE suggested that they should leave the Colleges as they now stood, and give the Commissioners power, if they came to that conclusion, to recommend their union. The adverse feeling of the parties now petitioning would be very different when the union was grounded upon the report of a Commission, and after inquiry had been made. It would show that their Lordships did not decide against the general opinion which from all quarters had reached them.

The EARL OF DERBY said, he thought that hardly one of their Lordships seemed disposed to support the Amendment of the noble Earl (the Earl of Airlie); for both his noble Friend who had just sat down and the noble Earl on the cross benches (Earl Stanhope), while they complained of the enactments of the Bill, repudiated altogether the idea of preventing the union of the colleges, and confined themselves simply to the point that there should be two faculties of Arts. Therefore, so far as the Amendment was concerned, the opinion of their Lordships was altogether unanimous. His noble Friend on the cross benches wished to provide for the exception of this single case, and to provide that there should be a continuance of the faculty of Arts. His answer to that proposal was this—if they declared that there should be a second faculty of Arts, they decided beforehand in opposition to the opinion of the Commissioners of Inquiry who had examined into the subject, and reported upon it in favour of complete union. He had always great respect for the opinion of the noble Duke near him (the Duke of Richmond), and it was very true that the occasions were very few when they had voted on different sides. But on the present occasion he apprehended the logical course to pursue was to follow up in their integrity, if they acted at all upon the recommendations of the Commissioners, and to leave the Commissioners under the Bill to make such amendments and modifications as they thought fit. His noble Friend said that if they passed the Bill they did not deal fairly by the parties petitioning, because they declared a foregone opinion on the part of Parliament, and allowed the Commissioners to modify it. But supposing they took the opposite course, and only gave the Commissioners power of restoring that recommendation. His noble Friend on the cross benches had not said a word as to the qualifications of the Commissioners, and with all deference to the opinion of the noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond), he preferred the opinion of Commissioners who were perfectly conversant with the question, to the opinion of those who were but imperfectly acquainted with it. The noble Earl on the cross benches (Earl Stanhope) doubted whether the Commissioners under the Bill could consider the question of public opinion upon the subject. All he could say to that was, that the words were couched in the strongest possible terms. The Commissioners were authorized, in their discretion, if they thought it either necessary or expedient so to do, to make provision for the maintenance of two separate faculties of Arts. The Bill gave the fullest powers to the Commissioners to exercise the utmost latitude, and provided all that good reason and good sense could demand. If public opinion were very strong, the Commissioners had the fullest power to meet it and make provision accordingly. He thought the Bill, as it stood, preferable to any of the Amendments suggested, and that the Amendment went further than even the opponents of the Bill desired.

On Question, whether the words proposed to be left out shall stand part of the clause?

Resolved in the affirmative.

Clause 2 agreed to, with an Amendment.

Clause 3.

LORD BELHAVEN moved the omission of the clause, which provides that the Principals of Glasgow, Aberdeen, and Edinburgh, are not to be deemed Professors of Theology.

The DUKE OF MONTROSE said, there was no doubt that the clause was a mistake, as it asserted that which was contrary to the fact, and he should have no objection to omit it.

Clause disagreed to.

Clauses 4 to 11 agreed to, with Amendments.

Clause 12, relating to the powers of University Courts.

EARL GRANVILLE adverted to the proposed transfer of the patronage of the University of Edinburgh from the Town Council to the University Court. The noble Earl said that, though he did not intend to move an Amendment on this matter, it certainly did seem very hard that this patronage should be taken away from the Town Council when they had possessed it so long, and when it was not pretended that they had exercised it unsatisfactorily. He hoped, too, that the noble Duke who had charge of the Bill (the Duke of Montrose) would consent to insert words in the Bill to make these Courts open to the public.

THE DUKE OF MONTROSE said, this matter had been very much discussed in the other House. There were there, of course, many persons who were anxious to leave the patronage in the hands of the Town Council, and others who urged very strongly the necessity of transferring it to some other body. The compromise which had been agreed on was, he believed, accepted by all parties as a fair settlement of the question, and he could not, therefore, consent to any proposition to disturb it. With regard to the noble Earl's second proposition, to make the University courts open courts, he really could not see any advantage in such a provision, and he hoped, therefore, that the noble Earl would not attempt to press it.

THE EARL OF HADDINGTON said, that though it was rather a strong measure to take away the patronage so long exercised by the Town Council of Edinburgh, he could not say but that it might turn out of great practical advantage. The Town Council had founded the University, and a charter was given to it by the King soon after. When a charter was forfeited, it was usual to show malfaisance of some sort or other; but none had been shown in this case. No doubt there might have been considerable inconvenience in the patronage being exercised by the Town Council—indeed, it was said that their appointments had generally been made with a view to sectarian considerations; but however strange it might be originally to repose patronage in such hands, certainly no malfaisance, sufficient absolutely to justify the transfer, had been proved. The Commission of 1826, of which he had been a member, did not propose to make any change in this respect. No doubt considerable alteration had taken place in the Town Council of Edinburgh since that time. The Municipal Reform Act had changed it from a self-elected to a popularly elected body. No doubt self-election was a bad principle; but the corporation of Edinburgh in those days was a very different kind of body from the present corporation. As a compromise had been arranged, and as he knew a great portion of the community in Edinburgh were exceedingly glad of the transfer, he did not think that it was for their Lordships to interfere with it. In respect to the four Curators who were to sit in the Court, he would suggest that it should be so arranged that certain members of the Town Council—such as the Lord Provost and the two senior members should be ex officio Curators.

EARL GRANVILLE said, that a large portion of the community also disapproved of the alteration. The noble Earl then moved to insert the following clause:—

"The Meetings of the Senatus Academicus, the General Council, and the University Court of each University, and of the Court of Curators in the University of Edinburgh, shall be open to the public."

THE DUKE OF BUCCLEUCH, in reference to a remark made by the noble Earl who had just spoken (the Earl of Haddington) in reference to ex officio members of the Court, said that he had lately presented a petition from Glasgow praying that the Lord Provost might be nominated an ex officio member of the Court of that University.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 13 and 14 agreed to, with Amendments.

Clause 15, giving power to the Commissioners to inquire into the expediency of founding a National University, and to make arrangements for its establishment.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON thought this scheme of founding a national University for Scotland was an exceedingly vain one. It was scarcely constitutional to give a Commission of this sort the power of suppressing ancient corporations—the only links almost which connected Scotland of bygone times with Scotland of the present. One of the greatest evils under which Scotland suffered was that she was so little connected with the historical past. It was not at all clear that the scheme would lead to benefit the cause of education in Scotland. Such a college as St. Andrews, without the power of conferring degrees, would in a very short time run the risk of becoming something very like a private school. Again, some of the Colleges might be taken into the University and some left out, so that there would be part of the old system working alongside of the new one. He did not suppose that it would ever be carried into effect, but it seemed a pity to unsettle the whole educational arrangements of the kingdom by proposing a scheme which would probably never come to anything.

THE DUKE OF MONTROSE said, he was very much inclined to agree with the right rev. Prelate. It was very improbable that the scheme would ever take effect, for the different Universities were not very likely to agree to it. But as the provision had been introduced in the other House, where there seemed a disposition to expect beneficial results, it would be better, on the whole, for their Lordships to allow it to remain in the Bill.

LORD BELHAVEN thought the best course would be to leave out all this part of the duties of the Commission, and, if any such inquiry were necessary, to introduce a separate Bill for the purpose.

THE DUKE OF BUCCLEUCH did not anticipate any great results from the provision, which, he remarked, had been introduced at a late stage of the progress of the Bill in the other House.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 16, 17, 18, 19, and 20, agreed to.

Clause 21.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR moved to insert the following Proviso :—

"6. For providing full compensation for the present holders of Professorships or other officers, for the loss of emoluments consequent on the abolition or conjunction of such Professorships or other offices in the present Universities and Colleges of Aberdeen."

Agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 21 to 25 agreed to. Clause 26 disagreed to.

Remaining clauses agreed to.

Report of Amendments to be received To-morrow.

GOVERNMENT OF INDIA BILL.
COMMITTEE.

Order of the day for the House to be again put into Committee read.

House in Committee accordingly.

Clause 34 (Competitive Examinations for the Indian Army).

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said, he must for a few minutes draw their Lordships' attention to this clause. It for the first time introduced what was called open competitive examination for admission to the Engineers and the Artillery of the Indian army. This provision was not contained in the first Bill brought in by Her Majesty's Government, nor was it contained in the Bill of the late Government, but was introduced for the first time now. He had at all times regarded the introduction of competitive examination as the most dangerous and democratic of all modern innovations. Its practical tendency was to substitute persons of inferior education and position for the men who had hitherto led our armies to victory and conducted the affairs of the State. It had always been the practice when great experiments were about to be made in Government to inquire whether there were any defects to be remedied and whether there was a reasonable hope of improvement. But in this case there was no defect to be remedied. On the contrary, the perfection of the existing system was admitted; and no attempt could be made to alter it without incurring the most serious dangers. Nothing could be more injurious than to tamper with the scientific corps of the Indian army, perfect as they now were. If a failure should occur in this arm it would affect the success of a siege through the incapacity of an Engineer, or the success of a battle through the inferior character of an Officer of Artillery. Such a failure would go to the fate of a campaign, perhaps to the fate of an empire. This change was proposed at a moment when both of these services had attained their highest pitch of reputation. The boldness of the operations of our Engineers in front of Delhi,—the extraordinary resource, the audacity, which had marked all their operations at Lucknow,—the courage, the resolution, and the novelty which had distinguished the operations of the Artillery in all those actions in which they were supported by the Rifles—had actually introduced a new era in the art of war, and established on the part of these scientific corps a claim to consideration which one really would have thought Her Majesty's Government would have been only too happy to recognize. As their Lordships were aware that at the present moment there was, in point of fact, a competitive examination for commissions in these services in the College of Addiscombe, through which institution alone the Officers of Artillery and Engineers were now recruited. The cadets there studied under men of the most honourable and conscientious character, thoroughly acquainted with all that they had to teach, and deeply impressed with the great moral responsibility attached to the duty which they undertook. They there had not only to pass an examination for which they might be crammed on a particular day, but their whole conduct while at school was watched, and their moral character ascertained, as well as their intellectual attainments; and there could be no doubt that the gentlemen thus selected at Addiscombe for these services were men on whom the country could entirely depend. On the other hand, there was no possibility of introducing into the plan of open competitive examination any security of that description. All they could find was that on a particular day the person chosen had obtained a certain degree of apparent superiority over a gentleman who in reality had probably a much higher claim to the appointment. There were other advantages in the present system which it was impossible to attain by means of open competition. From the manner in which these officers were now chosen they had a guarantee that they were gentlemen; and it was impossible for him to speak too strongly of the advantage of having, especially in India, gentlemen—men of all the gentlemanlike feelings which prevailed in English society—for the conduct of military as well as of civil affairs. We maintained our position in that country by our moral superiority. An Englishman holding an official situation there was practically a representative of his Government, and whatever he did ill, or so as to impair his own position, impaired at the same time the position of the Government with which he was connected. Whatever he did well, or in a manner to distinguish him from others, increased the influence of his Government, while it added materially to his own. He recollected many years ago having gone to the Duke of Wellington on the subject of a court-martial, which had suggested that an officer who had been guilty of drunkenness should be dismissed the service. When urged to restore the accused to his position on account of some extenuating circumstances which existed in his favour, the Duke said, "Never palliate drunkenness in an officer. Depend upon it the Natives of India are extremely clever in discovering the character of an Englishman living among them; and no offence which an Englishman can commit is in their eyes so revolting as drunkenness." But that was not all. The moral superiority of Englishmen enabled us to keep that country; and if in any case we overlooked an offence that was calculated to lower us in the opinion of the Natives, the consequences to our power might be most disastrous. He had always been most desirous that we should retain the highest gentlemen we could procure at the head of affairs in India, and therefore he was particularly anxious that in this case the son of a grocer or a tailor, of the John Gilpin class, should not, through being highly crammed for an open competitive examination, be preferred before the son of a country gentleman or retired officer, who might not be able to pay enough for an education of that kind, but who might, nevertheless, be the fittest candidate for the situation. The higher a man's natural position the greater, ordinarily speaking, was his consideration for all those under him. This was always a true characteristic of the gentleman; and there never had been an occasion on which it was more important than at this juncture, that the general demeanour of all Englishmen and English officers in India towards the Native population should be conciliatory, and calculated to restore us in their opinion to the position we formerly held. The alteration was proposed also at a time when none of the apprehensions as to our officers could be entertained, which might perhaps have been entertained formerly. The Directors were no longer elected by a constituent body who had claims upon their patronage which might in former times have led to the selection of persons not of the most proper kind; and the Members of the Council, by not having seats in Parliament, would be saved from similar claims. He could not but regard this proposition as an act of homage to democracy. It was totally uncalled for. No one in the House of Commons had asked for it. No one anywhere had expressed the smallest wish to have this change introduced into the Indian army. It was proposed when that army was covered with glory, and when there was every reason to suppose that it would maintain its high character for the future. It was a measure which would affect injuriously the future efficiency of the Artillery and Engineers, and it was impossible that the present officers of both those noble services could do otherwise than offer to it the greatest opposition. For these reasons he should certainly object to the proposition.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, that with the very greatest deference for the opinions of his noble Friend, and more especially on a subject on which he spoke with great weight and authority, he could not coincide with the arguments by which he had opposed the clause—some portions of which arguments were indeed inconsistent with other portions. His noble Friend said that the clause introduced for the first time into the scientific corps, the Artillery and Engineers of the Indian service, the principle of competition [The Earl of ELLENBOROUGH: Open competition]—of open competition; but with all respect to his noble Friend, it did not introduce the principle of competition, open or not open. As the clause at present stood it undoubtedly did introduce the principle of competition; but, as he (the Earl of Derby) proposed to amend it (of which Amendment he gave notice on the second reading)—namely, by omitting the last three lines, it would not introduce the principle of strict competition. What the clause did was this —it provided that persons should be admitted into the Artillery and Engineers upon an examination, the regulations for which examination should with all convenient speed be prepared and prescribed by the Secretary of State acting under the authority of his Council. He was not a very warm and ardent supporter of the principle of competition — at least he thought that competitive examination was a great experiment, of which he took took the liberty of saying, that in his opinion, they were not yet able to pronounce a decided opinion. But he must say this, that if there were one portion of the public service, civil or military, to which the principle of strict examination and of competition could be fairly and legitimately applied, it was the scientific branches of the military service. What was the case with regard to the British army? Why, with regard to the Royal Engineers and the Royal Artillery, they were subjected to the strictest possible examination, and not only that, but to the strictest competition. There was a competition for admission into Woolwich, there was a competition also for passing out of Woolwich, and, after that competition for passing out of Woolwich there was still a probation of the candidates, and they were liable to be rejected if their qualifications and their conduct did not prove to be equal to the promises they had held out upon their examination. Well, was there anything unreasonable, improper, or impracticable in such a course? Did not such a course give an answer to the objection which his noble Friend used — namely, that a person who might be very well up in his examination might prove to be no gentleman in his habits, dissipated in his conduct, and unqualified in other respects for the profession? But, provided proper regulations were laid down, first with regard to the character of the examination itself, and, next, with regard to the probation of the candidates after they had passed their examination, he could not see that such a risk would be incurred as his noble Friend appeared to anticipate. But was his noble Friend really an opponent of the system of competitive examination? Not at all, for he had told their Lordships that there was the strictest competitive examination at Addiscombe. But, said his noble Friend, "I wish the competition to be limited to the persons who have got into Addiscombe." And why? "Because," said he, "it gives you a security that the parties are gentlemen and the sons of gentlemen, and you will have no such security in any other public examination." Now, he (the Earl of Derby) hoped he was not insensible to the advantages of birth and station, but he confessed he could not join with his noble Friend in saying that because a person happened to be the son of a tailor, a grocer, or a cheesemonger, provided his mental qualifications were equal to those of his competitors, he was to be excluded from honourable competition for an appointment in the public service. He did not think that was a legitimate argument for his noble Friend or for any one to use. A man's origin was nothing; the question to be asked was, "What are his qualifications for a scientific appointment, and what is his moral character?" If they showed him (the Earl of Derby) a man who was superor in both of these respects to his competitors, he cared not what might be his birth—that man was the best entitled to the appointment to which he aspired. He did not deny that Addiscombe had those merits which his noble Friend had ascribed to it. Those who were trained at Addiscombe had an immense advantage in the direction of their studies, and more especially in the knowledge on the part of their Professors of the peculiar qualifications and attainments which were required in the services which they had afterwards to enter. But he could not understand upon what principle it was that his noble Friend contended that that which had been introduced into every part of the civil service at home, into every department of the army, and more especially and more rigidly with regard to the scientific departments of the Royal army was not fit to be introduced into the scientific departments of the Indian army, which was now about to be incorporated and associated with the Queen's army, and to act under the authority of the Crown. If the clause laid down the strict and rigid principle that a man who succeeded in his examination should of necessity take the place of all others, he thought it would be open to serious objection. But if it simply provided that regulations should be prepared with regard to the due examination of persons wishing to enter the scientific corps, he could not understand upon what principle, without in the slightest degree derogating from the present examination to which his noble Friend referred, the advocates of competition in the civil and military services of the Crown could object to a clause which was simply so worded as to give a security that candidates for the scientific corps possessed that fair amount of scientific knowledge which was requisite for the efficient discharge of the duties they might be called upon to perform.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, that the subject was a most important one. He fully agreed that the artillery of the Indian army had been, up to the present time, most efficient: indeed Sir Charles Napier said it was second to no artillery in the world. The question as to the admission of persons into the Artillery had been before him when a member of the Commission for investigating the effects of the system of purchase in the army, and Sir James Melvill had stated before that Commission the system which was pursued at Addiscombe. By that system there was a preliminary examination for entrance into the college; and, after passing through the college, on a subsequent examination, the best were appointed to the Engineers, the next best to the Artillery, and the third to the Infantry. That, he thought, was a good system of competition; and it was the same system which prevailed in France and in Austria. What he feared in the system of the Government was that there would be competition without any system of military discipline. He thought that it was most desirable to let men pass through a college, and so to pass through a system of military discipline. When they came out of that they came ready to take their part in the army. So far from doing away with the present system, he thought that Addiscombe ought to be enlarged; and he would remove Addiscombe to Haileybury, which was a much larger building. In his opinion there ought to be a competition for getting into the college, but no one ought to obtain admission into the service without passing through the college.

THE EARL OF DERBY explained that what he had said was, that he did not see any reason why persons superior to those who had been educated at a military college should be excluded from admission into the service. But this clause did not say anything as to this; and it was quite consistent with it that education at a military college should be made a condition.

EARL GRANVILLE thought that it was the duty of the Government to consider whether there should be unlimited competition, and to state distinctly what they recommended. He did not see any advantage of retaining the clause if they were to amend it as his noble Friend (the Earl of Derby) had said. His noble Friend did not say what the effect of the clause would be, or what were the intentions of the Government.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE said, that in the case of the Royal army it had been determined by general consent that the Royal Academy of Woolwich and the College of Sandhurst should be preserved, and, that being so, he saw no reason why the same course should not be adopted with respect to the Indian military services now that they were about to be handed over to the Crown.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE agreed with his noble Friend (the Duke of Somerset) that the clause as it was now proposed to amend it would be perfectly useless, and that it would be much better to omit it than to pass it in the amended form. The introduction of a similar principle on a former occasion had resulted in the destruction of Haileybury College, and he was afraid that the natural consequence of adopting the clause as amended would be to destroy the College of Addiscombe. He should be very much opposed to anything which could have so unfortunate a result, and he felt convinced that one of the best things that the new Secretary of State for India could do would be to re-establish the College of Haileybury with the utmost despatch. It was impossible for any one who had studied the question not to see that a special education, both for the military and civil service of India was essentially requisite; and he should deeply regret if they took any course which should lead to the same result with regard to Addiscombe as had already taken place with regard to Haileybury. He hoped that Haileybury would be re-established as a college for the civil service, and that the resources of Addiscombe would be developed and increased. He did not see what object the Government could have in view which could not be as well attained without the clause as with it, and therefore he thought it desirable that the clause should not be persisted in.

LORD CRANWORTH said, that the noble Earl at the head of the Government had met one great objection to the clause as it stood by removing its concluding provision; but the noble Earl had not told them what he would insert instead of the portion so omitted.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, that the constitutional objection which he felt to the last words of the clause which he proposed now to omit was, not that they introduced the competitive principle, but that they introduced it by Act of Parliament; whereas, the proper course was that it should be done by the authority and under the sanction of the Crown. The question ought properly to be left to the prerogative of the Crown, and it was for that reason that he had moved the omission of these words.

LORD MONTEAGLE strongly opposed any course which might lead to the abolition of Addiscombe. The clause, whether amended or not, did not give sufficient security for its preservation. Certainly, Parliament ought not to delegate its power over the framing of these regulations to any Executive Department, however able it might be.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said, that before the question was put he wished to state what was passing in his own mind. He proposed to establish an additional military college at Haileybury, with the same competitive examination, both for the new college and for Addiscombe. One great advantage which would arise from such a competition would be that there would be virtually a competition between the professors of the two colleges, as well as among the pupils. But when his noble Friend spoke of the lower classes of the community, competing with the higher upon the same terms, it must be remembered that officers and clergymen generally were not wealthy men, and that they could not afford that cramming examination which was necessary for competition. The sum paid at Haileybury when he first remembered it was only £20 a year. Then the idea was started of making the college self-supporting, and the amount to be paid was raised to some £100—a change which he thought was very injurious. There ought to be provided for the children, in some cases the orphans, of military men and clergymen, a cheaper and better education than they could get elsewhere. Then his noble Friend had made use of the word "assimilation" as to the English and Indian armies. He cautioned his noble Friend against the idea of "assimilation." It was the most dangerous word that could be used. They had seen the advantages arising from differences in the Bengal, Madras, and Bombay armies. Those differences had prevented the spread of the mutiny. Their Lordships might depend upon it their security rested upon difference and not upon assimilation.

LORD BROUGHTON considered it very undesirable that Addiscombe should be done away with.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, the clause did not hint at Addiscombe.

LORD BROUGHTON: No; but it gives the Government power with respect to Addiscombe.

THE EARL OF DERBY: It gives the Government no power with regard to Addiscombe which it has not possessed already. It does not interfere with Addiscombe.

LORD BROUGHTON: But it gives the Government power to substitute another education for that of Addiscombe.

THE EARL OF DERBY: It does not give any power, and it does not take away the power which the Government possesses at this moment.

LORD BROUGHTON: If it gives the Government no new powers, at least it offers to them a recommendation to employ the powers they already possessed. It was not anticipation of the future, but recollection of the past, that induced him to entreat the noble Earl to amend this as well as other infirmities of the Bill. There was hardly a considerable man in India who had arisen of late years who had not owed his education to Addiscombe. The result had been that officers had been elected to the conduct of high political offices; they were obliged to take away those superior persons from the army in order to put them in Residencies, and in great political posts for which they alone were fit. He pointed this out, and said to the authorities, "You are denuding the army of its best men;" but their answer was a good one, "What would you recommend us to do? Is there any one half so good?" The answer was, "No." The number of officers, sometimes merely lieutenants, who had risen to the highest posts, was such as to show that to Addiscombe the Indian army was indebted for its highest distinctions.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said, that if the words were taken out the young gentlemen who acquitted themselves at the examination with credit must either have what the words promised or nothing at all. He did not like the clause.

Words from "examinations" to end of clause, struck out.

Then Question was put, "Whether the said clause, as amended, shall stand part of the Bill?"

The Committee divided:—Contents 41; Not-Contents 34: Majority 7.

Resolved in the Affirmative.

CONTENTS.

Chelmsford, L. (L. Chancellor.)
Bath, M. [Teller.]
Salisbury, M.
Bathurst, E.
Beauchamp, E.
Carnarvon, E.
Derby, E.
Graham, E. (D. Montrose.)
Hardwick, E.
Harrington, E.
Leven and Melville, E.
Malmesbury, E.
Rosse, E.
Sandwich, E.
Stanhope, E.
Verulam, E.
Wilton, E.
Clancarty, V. (E. Clancarty.)
Dungannon, V.
Hardinge, V.
Hutchinson, V. (E. Donoughmore.) [Teller.]
Melville, V.
Strathallan, V.
Bagot, L.
Boston, L.
Braybrooke, L.
Calchester, L.
Crofton, L.
Denman, L.
De Ros, L.
Dinevor, L.
Dunsandle and Clanconal, L.
Farnham, L.
Raglan, L.
Rayleigh, L.
Redesdale, L.
Sondes, L.
Southampton, L.
Templemore, L.
Wrottesley, L.
Wynford, L.

NOT-CONTENTS.

Cleveland, D.
Marlborough, D.
Newcastle, D.
Somerset, D.
Ailesbury, M.
Albemarle, E.
Amherst, E.
Clarendon, E.
Cowper, E.
Ellenborough, E.
Granville, E.
Pomfret, E.
Powis, E.
Romney, E.
Saint Germans, E.
De Vesci, V.
Sydney, V.
Ashburton, L.
Broughton, L.
Calthorpe, L.
Churchill, L.
Congleton, L.
Cranworth, L.
De Tabley, L.
Ebury, L.
Foley, L. [Teller.]
Kingston, L. (E. Kingston.)
Minster, L. (M. Conyngham.)
Monteagle of Brandon, L. [Teller.]
Mostyn, L.
Stafford, L.
Stanley of Alderley, L.
Wodehouse, L.
Wycombe, L. (E. Shelburne.)

Clause 35

("Not less than one-tenth of the whole number of persons to be recommended in any year for Military Cadetships (other than Cadetships in the Engineers and Artillery) shall be selected, according to such regulations as the Secretary of State in Council may from time to time make in this behalf, from the sons of persons who have served in India in the military or civil services of Her Majesty, or of the East India Company.")

Agreed to.

Clause 36

("Except as aforesaid, all persons to be recommended for Military Cadetships shall be nominated by the Secretary of State and members of Council, so that out of seventeen nominations the Secretary of State shall have two, and each member of Council shall have one; but no person so nominated shall be recommended unless the nomination be approved of by the Secretary of State in Council.")

THE EARL OF ALBEMARLE said, he did not think the public would be prepared to hand over the whole of the patronage of India to the Minister for India and the Council. He should therefore, if no other course was open to him, propose to deprive the governing body of the patronage, and to place it in the hands of a Board, where it would not be used to the disadvantage of the public service. Under the Bill the great bulk of the patronage of India would be given to the Council of India; for out of 500 cadetships, 450 were bestowed upon them. The fact was, there had been a secret alliance between the old Court of Directors and Her Majesty's Ministers, the Directors having taken advantage of their power to act upon a Government with no very fixed principles of action. When the Government proposed to buy off the old Directors and to give £1,200 a year to the same men who had been content with £500, he thought they had done wisely in building a golden bridge, and he should have thought the bargain a good one if at double the sum, provided the patronage had not been included. The whole maladministration in the army of India might be traced to the system of patronage. The cavalry had especially been reserved for the patronage of the Directors. It had been proved before Committees of that House that the Irregular Cavalry were more trustworthy, economical, and efficient than the regulars, and that while the pay of an Irregular Cavalry soldier was only £35, the pay of the regular was £73. This difference had been mainly kept up for the sake of the patronage of the East India Company. On these grounds he should suggest a clause carrying out the proposition he had stated to the House, or he should be ready to support any other mode by which the patronage might be distributed with greater advantage to the army.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, the noble Earl spoke of proposing a particular clause, or some other mode of carrying out his object; but he need hardly say that that was not the usual way of proceeding. As the clause stood the Secretary of State was to have two nominations, and each member of the Council one. The noble Earl objected to the power given to the Council; but his Amendment was one of so singular a character that he could not help calling the special attention of the Committee to it. He proposed that the patronage should be given to a Board not consisting of less than three members of the Council, and these three members were to be selected by the Secretary of State. One-eighth of the patronage was to be exercised by the Secretary of State, and seven-eighths by the Board, which the Secretary of State was to select. Then these three Councillors were to receive their £1,200 a year; but while they were to have seven-eighths of the patronage they were strictly prohibited and forbidden from taking the slightest part in any of the business relating to India.

EARL GRANVILLE thought the clause of the Bill itself was not free from objection. There was, in his opinion, great objection to the mode in which the nominations were vested in the Council.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 37 to 40, agreed to.

Clause 41.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET made an objection to the wording of the clause, which appeared to him to give neither the Governor General nor the Secretary of State power over the expenditure of the money.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, the clause provided that the expenditure of the revenues of India, both in India and elsewhere, should be subject to the control of the Secretary of State in Council. The clause did not in the slightest degree interfere with the powers to be exercised by the Governor General of India, subject to the control of the Secretary of State in Council.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH thought that, by the clause, the Governor General might do very nearly just as he pleased; but the expenditure of the Governor General was to be subject to the approval or otherwise of the Secretary of State in Council.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 42 to 51 agreed to.

Clause 52 Audit of Accounts.

THE EARL of ELLENBOROUGH said, he wished to introduce an Amendment in this clause. It provided that the Auditor should, in the ordinary way, audit the accounts. That, so far, was very proper; but he thought it should go somewhat further. The expenditure of India should be chaged upon the revenues of India alone. It seemed to him to be but fair to India that there should be a reciprocal provision in order to guard the revenues of India from being applied to any purposes which were not strictly connected with the interests of India. He was not certain that the Council would guard the revenues of India with the same jealousy which had been always faithfully exercised by the Court of Directors. They had never sanctioned any charge on those revenues which was not directly connected with the purposes of India; and he wanted the Auditor to be appointed under this clause to have the power of stating where any expenditure had in his opinion been incurred out of the revenues of India for purposes that were not Indian. After the words:—

"And such Auditor shall report from time to time to the Secretary of State in Council his approval or disapproval of such accounts, with such remarks and observations in relation thereto as may think fit."

He would therefore propose the insertion of the following words:—

"Specially noting any case, if such there shall be, in which it shall appear that any moneys advanced from the revenues of India have been appropriated to purposes other than those of the government of India, to which alone they shall be applicable."

He thought it but common justice to India to insert words to that effect.

THE EARL OF DERBY suggested that the Amendment should be printed, in order that he might have an opportunity of considering it before the next stage of the Bill. In the meantime, he thought the words requiring the Auditor to specify

"In detail in his reports all sums of money, stores and property which ought to be accounted for, and are not brought into account, or have not been appropriated in conformity with the provisions of this Act, or have been expended or disposed of without due authority," might be sufficient to carry out the object which his noble Friend had in view.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said, possibly they might, but he thought distinct words to the effect suggested by him ought to be embodied in the clause. Their Lordships said that no Indian charge should be paid out of English revenue, and it was but common honesty to say that no English charge should be paid out of Indian revenue. With the understanding that the proposed Amendment should be considered on bringing up the Report,

Clause agreed to.

LORD MONTEAGLE supported the Amendment. The present system of public audit in this country was not satisfactory, and the last Report had recommended a return to the old system of the auditor reporting direct to Parliament. He would recommend the same system with regard to India.

On Clause 53, which directs an account to be annually laid before Parliament for the last financial year of the produce of the revenues of India at each of the several Presidencies, and of all the receipts and disbursements at home and abroad in respect of the government of India.

THE EARL OF DERBY proposed to insert at the end of clause—

"And such account shall be accompanied by a statement prepared from detailed Reports from each Presidency and district in India in such form as shall best exhibit the moral and material progress and condition of India in each such Presidency."

Amendment agreed to.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY, pursuant to notice, moved the addition at the end of the clause of the following Amendment, which he said would insure the production in this country of a complete picture of the moral and material condition of India from time to time:—

"And such account shall be accompanied by a statement in an abstract form, prepared from detailed Reports from each Presidency and district in India, showing the following particulars—namely, the additions made during the same year to means of communication by railways, roads, canals, and improved river navigation; the number of European settlers or commercial agents in each district in the several Presidencies, exclusive of the capital towns of Calcutta, Madras, and Bombay; the aggregate strength of European troops, with the aggregate mortality during the year, and the average rate of mortality, and the number of recruits born in India of European parentage enlisted in each military division; the number of all colleges, schools, and other places of instruction supported or assisted by the Government, with the average number of pupils, male and female, under instruction, and the number of teachers, and whether European or Native, in each school, specifying the nature of each school, and if Hindoo whether Hindoo class books, or if Mahomedan whether Mahomedan class books, or if Parsee whether Parsee class books, or if Christian whether Christian class books, or if Government whether selected class books, are employed in each school; the number and description of all hospitals, dispensaries, poor houses, and other charitable institutions, with the number of applicants for relief, and of all religious institutions supported or assisted by Government; the extent and value of land held in free tenures, and all money payments and other grants and privileges made to each class of the above institutions, and all pensions and endowments granted by Native Princes and other individuals of which the Government or its officers are trustees; and such statements shall be prepared in such form as shall best exhibit the moral and material progress of India in each Presidency."

After a few words from Lord MONTEAGLE,

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE said, the general words proposed by the noble Earl at the head of the Government were preferable to the minute particularity aimed at by the Amendment of the noble Earl near him. What they wanted was information in a concise and manageable form, and not those huge blue-books, through which nobody could ever wade, and which were an admirable device resorted to by Departments which wished to conceal everything.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH, as an illustration of the voluminous papers appended to the correspondence sent home from India, mentioned that attached to certain Reports on the subject of education, which he received while in office, was a mass of details extending over 5,000 pages.

Amendment negatived.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 54 (Providing that when an order to commence actual hostilities was sent to India, the fact should be communicated to Parliament, if then sitting, within one month, or if Parliament was then prorogued, within one month from its re-assembling).

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said, it was impossible that this provision could be acted upon. Before intelligence of any event in India reached this country five weeks must elapse, and it occupied five weeks more before any order thereupon could arrive there, and no Minister in his senses would give an order for the actual commencement of war when he knew that, before that order reached India, circumstances in that country might have entirely changed. Therefore, all that he would do would be to give a contingent order, and to such an order this clause did not apply. If a contingent order were given in August, it would probably not be made known to Parliament till February; but if it were given in January, and Parliament met in February, it must be made known in a month. In the latter case, the Government against which the hostilities were to be directed would receive notice of our intentions. If this clause had been brought into existence during the late war in Persia, the capture of Bushire and Mohammerah, which came upon the enemy as a surprise, could not have been conducted with success.

THE EARL OF DERBY thought there was nothing unreasonable or ill-advised in the provision, that on the commencement of actual hostilities Parliament, if sitting, should be apprized of the order within a month from its issue. How such a course could give notice of their plans to the enemy, when the event referred to was the commencement of "actual hostilities," he was at a loss to conceive. The instance cited by his noble Friend was not a very happy one; because, if ever there was an unconstitutional proceeding, it was the last war with Persia, which was begun, carried on, and ended without Parliament having the slightest intimation of the fact that the hostilities were going on, or of the motives and grounds on which they had been entered into, or what they were fighting about. And if this clause should only prevent the repetition of such a state of things at the commencement of another war, he thought it legitimate and necessary.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH did not mean to defend the conduct of the late Government in the matter referred to, but at all events the operations which they had ordered had been successful. If the intentions of the Government as to a war in the East were communicated to Parliament, the enemy would become apprized of them long before we were prepared to act.

LORD WODEHOUSE reminded the noble Earl that it was not that the order for the commencement of war should be communicated and discussed by Parliament, but that, after it was in progress a month, Parliament should be informed of the fact.

EARL GRANVILLE said, that although the object was a very good one, he did not think this was a very satisfactory clause. Considering the rapid means of communication, there were great doubts whether it would not be injurious to the interests of the country, in case of the outbreak of war in India with a Native State.

THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE said, he thought it was most desirable that on a great question of this sort a communication should be made to Parliament; but he was sure that neither their Lordships nor the other House of Parliament could wish for information which might prejudice the interests of the country. Provided the clause were so worded that the interests of the country should not be injured, he thought it ought to stand part of the Bill. He thought that the period within which communication was to be made to Parliament ought to be extended.

LORD CRANWORTH said that, having regard to the great distance of India, the enactment in its present form might be dangerous. It might happen that circumstances were so altered between the time of an order being sent out and the time when the Governor General was called upon to act upon it, that he would decline to do so.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, it was difficult to understand who supported and who objected to the clause. [A noble LORD: All support it.] Well, then, what was that state of mind which, after mature deliberation in the Cabinet, assented to a clause, but when the same clause was introduced verbatim by another Government into their Bill, and laid upon the table, objected to it? He had no objection to extend the period from one month to two, and to add the words "unless such order shall have been in the meantime revoked or suspended."

EARL GRANVILLE said, the noble Earl need not be so much surprised at the noble and learned Lord having changed his opinion, for of all the changes of opinion of the present Government—and they had changed their opinion on almost every subject—the most extraordinary were their changes of opinion on the subject of Indian government. He thought that it would be better to make it three months instead of two, because by that time an answer might be received from the Governor General to the communications sent out to him.

THE EARL OF DERBY was understood to say that he would agree to three months.

Words "one month" omitted, "three months" inserted: also inserted "unless such order shall have been in the meantime revoked or suspended."

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 55 disagreed to.

THE EARL OF DERBY moved to insert a new clause in the following words:—

"Except for preventing or repelling actual invasion of Her Majesty's Indian possessions, or under other sudden and urgent necessity, the revenues of India shall not, without the consent of Parliament, be applicable to defray the expenses of any military operation carried on beyond the external frontiers of such possession by Her Majesty's forces charged upon such revenues."

EARL GRANVILLE said, that the object of the clause was a good one. Mr. Fox suggested something of the kind formerly, and so did Mr. Pitt, but they failed, and was there the slightest chance, if the clause became law, of its being more successful? The Indian army was not to be employed outside the Indian frontiers except to repel an invasion or on some urgent and sudden necessity without the consent of Parliament. As he said before, no war was justifiable except the case was urgent, and some suddenness was always connected with a military operation. What was the meaning of the consent of Parliament? Was an Act of Parliament to be got? Was there any other mode of expressing its consent? If so, it ought to be embodied in the clause. By this clause the Governor General might be deterred from doing things which it would be his duty to do.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, the object of the clause was to impose a certain restriction upon the perogative of the Crown through the intervention of Parliament. It was erroneously thought that it would prevent the Crown from employing Indian forces upon any foreign expedition. The clause had no such object or effect, for after it passed, the Crown would be at full liberty to employ those forces in any quarter of the globe for which by the terms of their enlistment they were eligible. It being the undoubted perogative of the Crown to make war and peace, the constitutional check upon the exercise of that prerogative was the sanction of Parliament by the granting of the pecuniary resources. The Crown could not send out forces unless Parliament provided the funds to pay them, but it was necessary to introduce this clause for the protection of the revenues of India. The effect of the clause would be that Indian troops, except for the purpose of preventing anticipated invasion, or of repelling actual invasion, should not quit their own territory; or if they did, the expense should be defrayed out of the revenues of this country, and not out of the revenues of India. If the troops were employed out of India, it would be for Parliament to decide whether they were employed upon Indian or Imperial objects. The clause did not prevent the Crown from making use of the Indian troops, subject only to this—that as a general rule the expense of those troops must be defrayed by Parliament; and the same constitutional check, therefore, was imposed on the Crown with regard to troops serving in India which was imposed with respect to troops serving in every other part of the globe. If the clause were not agreed to it would be perfectly competent for any unconstitutional Sovereign to employ the whole of the revenues and troops of India for any purpose which the Crown might direct, without the necessity of going to Parliament for the advance of a single shilling.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH thought the Bill had taken the best security against that, for it gave the Council a power of vetoing any measure of that kind. The Directors refused to pay for the China expedition; and if they had not agreed to pay half the expenses of the Persian expedition, they could not be called upon for one shilling towards the expenses of that war. It was for that reason he considered the clause would be inoperative. He believed the only effect of the clause would be to tie up the sword of the Governor General, to paralyze his diplomacy, and to lead to the very wars which it was intended to prevent.

Question put, whether the said clause shall be there inserted?

The Committee divided:—Contents 52; Not-Contents 36; Majority 16.

CONTENTS.

Chelmsford, L. (L. Chancellor.)	De Vesci, V.
Beaufort, D.	Dungannon, V.
Cleveland, D.	Hardinge, V.
Bath, M.	Hutchinson, V. (E. Donoughmore.) [Teller]
Exeter, M.	Melville, V.
Salisbury, M.	Strathallan, V.
Amherst, E.	Bagot, L.
Bathurst, E.	Bateman, L.
Beauchamp, E.	Boston, L.
Carnarvon, E.	Braybrooke, L.
Derby, E.	Clifton, L. (E. Darnley.)
Graham, E. (D. of Montrose.)	Colchester, L.
Hardwicke, E.	Congleton, L.
Harrington, E.	Denman, L.
Leven and Melville, E.	De Ros, L.
Malmesbury, E.	Dinevor, L.
Pomfret, E.	Dunsandle and Clanconal, L.
Powis, E.	Farnham, L.
Sandwich, E.	Ker, L. (M. Lothian,)
Shrewsbury and Talbot, E.	Melros, L. (E. Haddington.)
Stanhope, E.	Raglan, L.
Strathmore, E.	Rayleigh, L.
Verulam, E.	Redesdale, L.
Wilton, E.	Sondes, L.
Clancarty, V. (E. Clancarty.)	Southampton, L.
	Templemore, L.
	Wynford, L.

NOT-CONTENTS.

Marlborough, D.	Cowper, E.
Newcastle, D.	Doncaster, E. (D. of Buccleuch & Queensberry.)
Somerset, D.	Ellenborough, E.
Ailesbury, M.	Granville, E.
Albemarle, E.	Portarlington, E.
Clarendon, E.

Romney, E.
Saint Germans, E.
Shaftesbury, E.
Vane, E.
Stratford de Redcliffe, V.
Sydney, V. [Teller.]
Ashburton, L.
Aveland, L.
Broughton, L.
Calthorpe, L.
Churchill, L.
Cranworth, L.
De Mauley, L.
De Tabley, L.
Ebury, L.
Foley, L. [Teller.]
Hamilton, L. (L. Belhaven and Stenton.)
Kingston, L. (E. Kingston.)
Minster, L. (M. Conyngham.)
Monteagle of Brandon, L.
Mostyn, L.
Stafford, L.
Stanley of Alderley, L.
Wodehouse, L.
Wrottesley, L.

Resolved in the Affirmative.

Remaining clauses agreed to.

THE EARL OF DERBY stated, in answer to a question from Earl Granville, that on the Bill coming into operation in India a Proclamation would be issued by the Crown stating the principles on which the Government of the country would be carried on.

Report of Amendment to be received To-morrow.

House adjourned at Twelve o'Clock till To-morrow half-past Ten o'Clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, July 19, 1858.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1° Militia Act Continuance; Militia (Service Abroad) Act Continuance; Militia Pay; Consolidated Fund (Appropriation); Gaols and Houses of Correction (No. 2).

2° Metropolis Local Management Act Amendment; Incumbered Estates (West Indies) Act Amendment; Marriages (Moscow, Tahiti, and Ningpo).

3° Railway Cheap Trains, &c.; Inclosure of Lands; Legitimacy Declaration; Sheep, &c., Contagious Diseases Prevention; Turnpike Acts Continuance; Public Health; Vaccination (Ireland); County &c., Property Conveyance.

THE TOWER HAMLETS MILITIA. QUESTION.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for War if he is aware that certain differences have arisen between Colonel the Earl of Wilton and Lieutenant Colonel Dickson, both of the 2nd Tower Hamlets Militia, with reference to the affairs and discipline of that Regiment; and if it is true that the Constable of the Tower has made an application to have Lieutenant Colonel Dickson's name, unless he would consent to resign, removed from the Army List, without giving that Officer, after thirty-three years' service at home and abroad, any opportunity of vindicating his conduct before a proper Military Tribunal?

GENERAL PEEL said, that he had been called upon by Lord Combermere, the Constable of the Tower, to obtain Her Majesty's approval to Colonel Dickson's dismissal from the service. This difficulty arose in dealing with the case: when a Regiment of Militia was disembodied there was no power to bring an Officer to a Court Martial. A Court of Inquiry was merely preparatory to a Court Martial; the Horse Guards were therefore unable to grant a Court Marshal, which Lord Combermere had also applied for. He had also received a letter from the Earl of Wilton containing charges against Colonel Dickson, and he (General Peel) had forwarded that letter to Lord Combermere, in order that he might inquire into them. Lord Combermere thought that all the charges were proved by documentary evidence; but he (General Peel), did not think that the more serious charges were proved, although there was certainly enough to show that Colonel Dickson's conduct in command of the Regiment during the period of its embodiment had not been consistent with the rules of the service and with military usage. He had, therefore, called upon Colonel Dickson to resign. Colonel Dickson refused to do so, and desired to have an inquiry; and it was, therefore, his (General Peel's) intention to appoint a certain number of Officers to make that inquiry.

THE OVERLAND ROUTE.—QUESTION.

MR. NICOLL said, he desired to ask the Secretary of State for War if the advantages of the Overland Route as a means of transport for Her Majesty's Troops, as described in the recent Report of the Select Committee, will induce the Government to forward Indian reinforcements by that route during the colder months of the year, and as would be consistent with the opinion given to that effect by the Military Authorities in Egypt?

GENERAL PEEL said, that it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government to adopt the Overland Route in cases of urgency or necessity; but he trusted that better arrangements would be made than on previous occasions, so as to obviate the necessity of sending the heavy baggage round by the Cape, although the regiment itself went across Egypt and down the Red Sea.

METROPOLIS LOCAL MANAGEMENT ACT AMENDMENT BILL.—SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he rose to express a hope that the Government, before proceeding further, would furnish some fuller and clearer explanation of the provisions of this Bill than they had yet afforded to the House. One of the main objects of the Bill, as he understood it, was to increase the already extensive powers of the Metropolitan Board of Works—a body which did not directly represent the property within the area of its operations, but merely emanated from vestries. He had been a party to the clause in the former Bill, which imposed the check of the Board of Works upon the expenditure of the Metropolitan Board, and he did so in order that important matters of expenditure might be brought before Parliament. But the right hon. Gentleman (Sir B. Hall) had taken a step beyond this, and had himself ordered a plan to be referred to referees, which was beyond his powers. The present Bill, however, did away with all the checks which existed in the existing Act, and gave to the Metropolitan Board the power of taxing the inhabitants of London to an enormous extent, without providing for the judicious and effective expenditure of the money so collected. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in his opening speech, had referred to certain documents, but not a single document or plan had yet been laid on the table, and the probability was that the £3,000,000 which the Bill empowered the Metropolitan Board to borrow would be wasted. He thought it ought to be explained whether the owner as well as the occupier of property was to pay any portion of the £140,000 a year. In his opinion, the sewer-rate was one which property was interested in and derived benefit from, and it appeared hard that the tax should exclusively fall on the accidental occupier for one year. Hon. Members should remember that they were giving a power of taxation, not over their own constituents, but over the metropolitan portion of the community, and as it appeared to him very difficult to understand how this taxation would work, he thought it was important that the intentions of the framers of the measure upon this point should be clearly understood.

MR. AKROYD said, it appeared to him that, though the Government was strongly impressed with the necessity of legislating on this subject before the end of the Session, they were somewhat afraid of the responsibility they might incur in propounding a distinct plan on this subject, and therefore had preferred to devolve the duty, with arbitrary powers, upon the Metropolitan Board of Works. When the Bill was introduced he listened with deep attention to the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who on that occasion praised the municipal spirit of the corporate towns throughout England; and from the remarks of the right hon. Member, he thought some provision would have been introduced into the Bill conferring on the inhabitants of London the powers and privileges of self-government; and it would have been easy to have divided the metropolis into districts for the purpose. What the nation, however, was more particularly concerned in, and what it more particularly behoved the representatives of the nation to consider, was the time at which they were asked to confer this guarantee of £3,000,000. The nation had only just recovered from the burden of the Russian war, and the burden of the Indian war was now looming in the distance, and yet they were called upon to guarantee £3,000,000 for some scheme which was not even before them. What was the nature of the security to be given for the repayment of the sums thus guaranteed? He did not think that £3,000,000 would accomplish the purification of the Thames. He did not think that it would even carry the sewage down to Barking Reach. But then there was, in addition, the embankment of the Thames, the execution of which must at some time be undertaken. A Select Committee had sat on this question, and valuable and important evidence, which was not yet in the hands of hon. Members, had been given before it. Was it not reasonable that an opportunity should be afforded to hon. Members to consider the evidence before the present Bill passed? The Committee received evidence showing that the deodorizing system at Leicester had been entirely successful, and a witness observed that the cost of the plant to apply that system in the metropolis would barely exceed the annual interest of the sum which was now required to be guaranteed. With respect to the plan which it was understood would be carried out by the Metropolitan Board of Works, the Government referees, who were engineers of eminence, reported that it would fail in effecting the objects sought to be attained. They stated that the proposition to throw the whole of the sewage of the metropolis in a concentrated mass into the Thames at Barking would not prevent it returning within the metropolitan districts, and injuring the eastern districts lying contiguous to the Thames. the population of which had increased. Another strong objection to the scheme was, that it would deprive the Thames of a large amount of liquid, and thereby affect the navigation in the upper part of the river. If 80,000,000 gallons of liquid sewage, or one-fifth of the whole volume of the Thames, were taken out of it daily by intercepting sewers, he would ask the House to reflect upon the effect which might be produced upon the navigation. The water, so far from being diminished, ought to be increased. Sewage matter, indeed, was not wanted, but the liquid might be purified and made to flow into the Thames. In the North of England, when waterwork companies took water out of streams, they were compelled to form compensation reservoirs for the purpose of maintaining the full volume of the stream during the summer. He thought that the London waterwork companies, which took daily 40,000,000 of gallons out of the Thames, ought to be compelled to construct similar reservoirs. He knew, indeed, that the House could not itself enter into the discussion of these questions. All he wished was that they might not rush into hasty legislation on the subject, and especially that they would not assent to granting the national guarantee for the repayment of this £3,000,000 without carefully considering the security. They already had a specimen of the manner in which their guarantee would be dealt with in the example of Chelsea Bridge. He thought, upon these grounds, that this Bill should not be passed in haste. The hot weather was passed, and hon. Members should be allowed an opportunity during the recess of reading the evidence given before the Committee up stairs. He should oppose the passing of the Bill at present.

MR. LOWE said, that before intrusting the Metropolitan Board of Works with the absolute power of levying £3,000,000 upon the inhabitants of the metropolis, and before pledging the public credit of this country as a guarantee for that amount, he thought the House ought to satisfy themselves, in the first place, that the Board of Works was a body worthy of being intrusted with so great a power, and, secondly, that the money was likely to be employed in the manner most beneficial to those from whose pockets it was taken. He left others to show what were the qualities which had recommended the Metropolitan Board of Works to the choice of the Government. For his own part, it appeared to him that that Board had yet to win its laurels. He thought it worthy of consideration whether they ought to intrust a Board constituted by double election, which rendered it almost irresponsible to the constituents from whom it derived its powers, with authority to expend so large an amount as £3,000,000. There were also questions relating to contracts and other matters, to which he would not now refer, but the subject was one of great importance, and should be approached in a farsighted spirit. They ought not to seek to apply a mere temporary palliative, but they ought to endeavour to adopt a system of permanent legislation, adapted to the probable extension of the metropolis and the increase of its population, or in a few years they might find that the money spent in palliating the evil had been thrown away, and that the whole work must be commenced anew. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Akroyd) had said that there was no scheme before them, but he (Mr. Lowe) complained that a very inadequate scheme had been submitted to that House. They had on the table the plan of the Metropolitan Board of Works. It was mere prudery to say that they did not know precisely what that Board intended to do, and the House should form a judgment upon the plan before they made up their minds to adopt it. Hon. Gentlemen were aware that the plan of the Metropolitan Board of Works was that the sewage of the metropolis should be collected at a place on the River Lea, about twenty feet below high-water level; that it should be pumped from thence by steam machinery; and that it should then be discharged into a reservoir at Barking Creek, a mile below Woolwich, whence, having undergone a process of deodorization by mixture with lime, it should be discharged into the Thames. Now, this plan was calculated to carry off the sewage of a population of 3,500,000; but when the population of London exceeded that number the sewage would gradually increase, and every shower of rain would carry sewage and pollution into the Thames. Supposing the future increase of the metropolitan population to proceed at the same rate as it had done since 1801, in 1871 the contrivance now proposed would be entirely exhausted, and the sewage would run into the Thames in consequence of the inability of the sewers to contain it. The scheme could not be brought into operation in less than five or six years, and in six or seven years afterwards it would be utterly inadequate, and after having spent £3,000,000 to remedy the complaints now made, they would have to begin their work over again. This subject had been submitted by the late Chief Commissioner of the Board of Works to certain Government referees, whose plan was to form a canal which would carry off the sewage by gravitation to Sea Reach, far below Gravesend, where it would be discharged into the river. He asked the House to contrast that plan and the scheme they were now called upon to sanction with regard to effects and expense. The plan now proposed would carry the sewage into the Thames at Barking, where the river was only three-quarters of a mile wide, and where the current was exceedingly slack. The plan of the Government referees would carry the sewage into the river at Sea Reach, where there was an exceedingly strong current down the river, which was at that point a mile and a quarter in width, and whence the sewage would be carried by the ebb tide to a point from which it could not by any possibility return above the point at which it was discharged. The plan of the Board of Works proposed the deodorization of the sewage, not when it was fresh, but after fermentation had begun, when the process of deodorization would be much less complete, and the whole mass, whether deodorized or not, was to be discharged into the river. There were 118 miles of metropolitan area, and the plan of the Board of Works proposed only to drain twenty-seven miles by gravitation, while the plan of the Government referees proposed to drain eighty-one miles by gravitation. He would now ask the House to compare the expense of the two plans. It was said that in this respect the argument was in favour of the Board of Works, because, although their plan was not so complete as that of the Government referees, it was much cheaper. The plan of the Government referees, if it were adopted, would be sufficient to carry off the sewage of a population of 6,000,000, whereas that of the Board of Works would only carry off the sewage of 3,500,000. The estimate of the Board of Works was £3,000,000, while the estimate of the Government referees commenced with a charge of £6,000,000. The charge to be borne by the ratepayers must not, however, be estimated merely by the amount of capital sunk at the commencement of either plan, but by the permanent annuities which must be paid for the continuance of the schemes. What would be the annual expense of carrying out the plan of the Board of Works after the estimated £3,000,000 had been spent? In eight or ten years from this time, according to the best authority to which he had access, the expense under this plan of pumping up sewage from the low level of the River Lea to the high level of Barking Creek would be £45,000; the expense of deodorizing upon Messrs. Bidder, Hawksley, and Bazalgette's system would be £76,000; and the expense of removing useless deodorized matter in barges would be £30,000. There would thus be a permanent annual charge of £151,000 upon the ratepayers of London. If the whole cost of the annuity with which the ratepayers would be saddled were capitalized, it would, with the £3,000,000 actually spent, amount to no less than £7,000,000, and for this sum they would obtain, not a complete scheme of drainage, but one the efficiency of which would be exhausted in 1871, when new works would become necessary. Now, what would be the expense of the scheme of the Government referees, under which the sewage would be carried into the Thames at Sea Reach, at a point to which the eddies setting down the river would prevent its return? The first cost of this plan would be £6,000,000 for the construction of the canal to Sea Reach, and the annual expense for pumping sewage would be £40,000. That would be about £1,000,000 more, and the whole cost would be exactly the same as that of the other system—namely, £7,000,000. Look, however, at the difference between the results achieved by the two plans. In the one case the whole effect of the expenditure would cease in 1871, while in the other a comparatively permanent remedy would be provided, at least until the population of London reached 6,000,000, which was looking forward quite as far as it was necessary to do. Now, suppose the discharge of the sewage into Barking Creek was found to be an intolerable nuisance; some compensation ought in justice to be given to the owners of property there; and this was a point deserving of consideration. But it might be found necessary, after all, to send the sewage down to Sea Reach. Of course, £3,000,000 would already have been spent, in addition to which it was the opinion of the Board of Works themselves that it would cost £3,000,000 more to extend the drainage to Sea Reach. All the pumping, which at the River Lea cost £45,000, would be required, besides similar pumping at Barking Creek, the cost of which was estimated at £55,000—in all £100,000, or (capitalizing it) £3,000,000. The result would thus be that, if the plan should be found inadequate, as he had suggested, it would be necessary to spend £9,000,000 or thereabouts upon it; and even then the drainage powers of the metropolis would still be limited to meet the wants of 3,500,000 of inhabitants. If the Government referees should contract their scheme so as to provide only for 3,500,000 of people, he was informed that this could be done for £4,500,000; so that (supposing the information he had received were correct) to perform the work in this way would require about half the sum required to carry out the plan of the Board of Works. The scheme which the House was virtually asked to sanction in this Bill was really one for spending £7,000,000 upon a system of drainage which would become too small for the wants of the metropolis when the population reached 3,500,000, and the extension of which would cost £9,000,000, though it would even then still be open to the same objection. On the other hand, the plan of the Government referees would provide complete drainage for the wants of the metropolis until the population reached 6,000,000; it would get rid of all complicated machinery, all schemes of deodorization, the success of which was quite uncertain, and would employ the natural deodorizer which Providence had provided—water. He might, perhaps, be considered presumptuous in having offered an opinion on this subject, but, having devoted some little time to its consideration, he had arrived at such strong conclusions with reference to it that he could not resist the feeling of duty which led him to state them to the House.

MR. HEADLAM regretted that the House was compelled to discuss this question on July 19, in a thin House consisting of hon. Members wearied by a protracted Session, and under a pressure from without which led many to make use of that dangerous phrase—"Well, at any rate we must do something." He believed that the House by no means appreciated the magnitude and the ultimate importance of the work before it. A constitutional principle was involved in the scheme for carrying the work into execution. The evil from which the metropolis was now suffering affected in some degree all the streams throughout the country, which were more or less polluted by town sewage, and the scheme adopted in the case of the Thames would, therefore, probably be looked to all over England as an example in legislation of this kind. Parliament were now asked to impose, for forty years, a tax of 3*d.* a pound upon the inhabitants of London, after doing which they were to discharge themselves from all reponsibility in regard to the execution of the works. They were asked to hand over the money to another body which owed them no responsibility, and over which they had no control, and without taking any care that the scheme should be properly expended. Now, if the Board of Works were truly the representative body of the metropolis, which, to his mind, it was not, it was singularly ill-calculated to carry out works of mechanical, chemical, and engineering science. It was probably a body well calculated to tax its constituents, but it it was, in his opinion, ill-calculated to execute works of that description. The House of Commons was the first deliberative assembly in the world; but it was not an executive body, and very wisely did not attempt executive functions. There was an exception to this general rule in the case of the building of the Houses of Parliament, which Parliament took into its own hands. Had the result of that step proved so encouraging that they ought to extend the principle by giving a taxing body like the Board of Works the charge of a great engineering work like that at present under discussion? But it was said that by handing over the duty to the Board they were merely carrying out the municipal principle. He denied that it was so, unless the opinion of the inhabitants of the metropolis could be fairly taken as to which plan they preferred, and how far they concurred in the proposal to impose a tax upon them for forty years. Again, was it right to hand over this sum to the Board of Works without taking some guarantee for its proper application? The Metropolitan Board of Works was not responsible to a human creature. Neither the House nor the ratepayers of the metropolis could control them, and it was left to chance whether they would administer these funds properly or not. The noble Lord the First Commissioner of Works, used a singularly happy phrase when he said, "If the inhabitants of the metropolis pay the piper, they ought to choose the tune;" but the misfortune was that they had no power whatever of selecting the tune. His own individual opinion was that they would give infinitely more satisfaction to the metropolis if they required the works to be carried into effect by and under the responsibility of the Government. If they did that, the House would be placed in a truer and more constitutional position. The people of the metropolis did not want any such thing as the mere fiction of a representation. What they wanted was that the work should be well done; and the inhabitants of London were of opinion that it would be much better done under the direct control of the Government than by the Board of Works. As to the scheme itself, by means of which the purification of the Thames was sought to be accomplished, he would only say that even if it were successfully carried out to the extent which was proposed, the object which its authors professed to have in view would be but half attained. The evil was not confined to the odour arising at a certain portion of the year. The banks of the river were as unsightly to the eye as the odour was disagreeable to the nose, but there was this difference, that the unsightliness lasted the whole year, while the odour continued fortunately only for a short period. He thought the Thames would never be put in proper order until it was embanked, and he would suggest that the two great works of embankment and drainage should be commenced contemporaneously and carried on together. In support of that opinion he might adduce the testimony of the most eminent engineers, who maintained that unless the mud banks to which he referred were removed, the evil of which the inhabitants of the metropolis had so much reason to complain would not be obviated. The action of the sun upon those mud banks was, in their opinion, one of the main causes of the existing nuisance, and that cause, he should contend, instead of having its force diminished, would rather be further developed by the scheme under consideration, whose operation would be to decrease the quantity of water in the river. To show how beneficial was the addition of a supply of fresh water to the river, and how prejudicial in its influence would be the effect of any diminution in that supply, he might mention that he had, upon the previous day, been unable to find any offensive odour from the Thames between Chelsea and Westminster Bridges, notwithstanding that the temperature of the atmosphere was but very little lower than had been the case about three weeks before, when the stench had been almost intolerable. That improved state of things he held to be the result of the addition of the fresh water which within that period the river had received, and it was, he thought, therefore perfectly obvious that if the Metropolitan Board of Works were—as it would seem they proposed to do—to diminish the fresh water in the Thames to the extent of the quantity falling over a space of 100 square miles, they would be doing much to increase the evil which they professed themselves anxious to remove. For his own part, he could not help thinking that it was most unsatisfactory to the House to be called upon to sanction a scheme the prosecution of which would cost so large a sum as £3,000,000, and the operation of which could not at the best be regarded as otherwise than uncertain. He, for one, entirely deprecated the policy of sanctioning that scheme until others, which presented a greater probability of being attended with success, had been tried and had failed; while he was strongly of opinion that it would be much more satisfactory to the ratepayers of the metropolis if Her Majesty's Ministers were to carry into effect the work of purifying the Thames under their own authority and upon their own responsibility, instead of intrusting it to a Board which had, to say the least of it, not been sufficiently long in existence to be able to win for itself the confidence of the country.

MR. STUART WORTLEY said, that while he was disposed to give the Government every credit for having introduced the Bill before the House with the best intentions, he yet was afraid that they had been induced, by a desire to allay th anxiety which prevailed among the inhabitants of the metropolis, to deal with the subject of the purification of the Thames in a somewhat hasty manner, and consequently in a manner which was but too likely to lead to imperfect and unsatisfactory results. The discussion, however, which the Bill then before the House was sure to give rise to, would, perhaps, lead to the introduction of a satisfactory measure,—although he did not believe there could be any measure that would prove satisfactory which was unconnected with the general question of the government of the metropolis. The present Bill was open to the objection of pledging Parliament to a particular scheme, for in the first clause the Metropolitan Board of Works was directed to intercept the main drainage. Now, the House had heard from the hon. Member for Andover (Mr. Cubitt), himself a member of the Metropolitan Board, that he not only doubted the efficacy of, but apprehended great danger from, any such measure; and any one who had gone above Richmond must be aware of the effect which the withdrawal of so much water by the various companies had upon the river. Again, he found no security in the Bill for carrying out its object; true, powers were given, and money was granted, but there was nothing to prevent the Board from doing what they had already done in several instances—voting for one scheme on one day and another on another. What was still more objectionable, any scheme that they might agree upon would be subject to the approval of no other authority; in fact, the Board might carry out any scheme they pleased. Now, was the House quite sure that that Board was one in which the universal public had entire confidence? For his part he did not know the names of many of the gentlemen who had seats at the Board. No doubt they were respectable persons, distinguished in the vestries of the metropolis, used to deal with parochial questions, and possessed of ability and integrity. But did they command the entire confidence of the metropolis? He confessed that wherever he had been he had always heard a very different opinion expressed upon that head. Were they the representatives of any class of the community? Why, they were not the representatives even of the ratepayers. They were the representatives of the vestries; and in too many instances the majority in a vestry was a mere party. Again, by the Bill a Committee was to be chosen out of the whole body to carry out this plan, so that in fact responsibility would be twice diluted. Could anything be more unsatisfactory? Though the House was obliged to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Kidderminster (Mr. Lowe) for the knowledge and ability he had displayed with regard to the details of the plans for the main drainage of London, yet the present was not the proper opportunity for discussing rival schemes. It occurred to him (Mr. S. Wortley), however, that it would be dealing with the question in a most unsatisfactory manner if they dealt with it on a narrow ground, dissociated from the question of the general government of the metropolis. In his opinion the present government of the metropolis was disgraceful to the country; and he would take the liberty of reminding the House of the recommendations which had been made by the Commissioners appointed to inquire into the Corporation of London, and who had particularly directed their attention to the question of the drainage of the metropolis. After giving it as their opinion that the Corporation should be reformed, and that their jurisdiction should be confined to the present limits of the City, the Commissioners recommended that the rest of the metropolis should be divided into districts for municipal purposes; that in the event of such division being made, a metropolitan board of works should be created, composed of members deputed from each metropolitan municipal body, including the common council of the City; that the coal duties now collected by the Corporation of London, so long as they remained in force, should be placed at the disposition of the new Board, and that in case the coal duties expiring in 1862 should not be renewed, the fourpence levied in behalf of the City should cease at the same time. They also recommended that the Board should have power to levy a rate, limited to a fixed poundage, for public works over the metropolitan district, and that no works should be executed by them unless the plans should have been approved by the Committee of the Privy Council. Now, that some such check as this ought to be imposed on the present Board was, in his judgment, extremely desirable, though he by no means pledged himself to the support of that particular scheme. But, seeing how the question affected a vast amount of property in the metropolis, could any man say that the Metropolitan Board represented the proprietary of the metropolis? It was doubtful even if they represented the ratepayers; if they represented anything, they represented the democracy and the ratepaying interests of the metropolis—certainly not the proprietors. It was also most desirable that upon such a Board there should be some man or men of science; and that House well knew what help they derived from the aid of such gentlemen as the hon. Gentleman the Member for Honiton (Mr. Locke) and the hon. Gentleman the Member for Whitby (Mr. Stephenson). He agreed with the Commissioners, too, that the rights and property of the Crown ought to be protected; and with these views he could not help saying—though without wishing to cast any blame upon the Government—that, in his opinion, the House was proceeding with great haste and hurry in endeavouring to legislate upon the subject at the end of a Session, when it was utterly impossible that a question of such magnitude and importance could be dealt with satisfactorily.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he had often heard it said that the House of Commons was subject to periodical fits of heat and cold; and he must say that he had never witnessed a more striking proof of the accuracy of the assertion than during the debates on the question of the drainage of the metropolis and the purification of the Thames in the course of the last six weeks. Only a fortnight ago Her Majesty's Government were absolutely threatened with impeachment by the front rows of the Opposition benches, unless they settled the question within twenty-four hours. At that time he had put in a dilatory plea and stated that the Government had the matter under their consideration, and now that they had had time to examine it, and had framed a scheme which they deliberately recommended the House to sanction and adopt, they were met with the statement that they were rashly, and with undue haste, attempting to settle a question which, after all, might be well postponed to another year; and, if he understood his right hon. Friend (Mr. Wortley), until the coal duties lapsed, in 1862. Now, what reason was there for throwing over this important question to another year? Some hon. Gentlemen had treated it as if it were an entirely new question; but, for his part, he considered the question not a new one; scientific opinions without number had been taken, and every man's mind was made up. He was bound to say that he knew no question that had been so canvassed, so thoroughly threshed and sifted, as the question of the drainage of the metropolis. During the last few years Commissions and Committees had sat and reported upon the subject; and when the House remembered the number of schemes which had been proposed, and the vast amount of evidence which had been taken respecting it, he was sure they could not come to the conclusion that the Government were now proposing inopportunely, and with undue haste, to settle the question. If it were the deliberate opinion of the House of Commons that no decision ought to be come to this year, upon the House of Commons be the responsibility of continuing and perhaps perpetuating the present state of things. On behalf of the Government he distinctly repudiated all such responsibility. The responsibility of action Her Majesty's Government were willing to take upon themselves; the responsibility of inaction they refused. His hon. Friend said, "that is just what we want." He (Lord J. Manners) begged to tell his hon. Friend that, having duly considered this question, the Government were of opinion that the only way in which their action could be beneficially, or even constitutionally brought to bear, was that contained in the four corners of this Bill. An hon. and learned Member (Mr. Headlam) had told them that this was a question which, in its length and breadth, ought to be taken up as a whole and carried out on the responsibility of Her Majesty's Government, who should themselves execute not only the drainage, but the purification and embankment of the Thames. His hon. Friend had spoken at some length and with great ability, and he (Lord J. Manners) had listened to him with the greatest attention; but he had failed to discover any inkling whatever from what quarter the Government were to obtain the funds to pay for these great works. Out of what funds, he should like to know, were the Government to do this? Would the hon. Gentleman give the ways and means? Did the hon. Gentleman mean that they were to set themselves up as a pure and naked despotism, and take the money required to execute these works out of the pockets of the ratepayers of the metropolis against their will, if not without their knowledge? Or did he mean that it should be made a great national undertaking, and that the whole expense should be borne out of the Consolidated Fund? If that were his hon. and learned Friend's view, then all he could say was, that he respectfully declined making any such appeal to Parliament; and, if the opinion of the majority of that House was in harmony with his own, what alternative could be adopted except that of intrusting to the municipality which represented, if any one did, the pockets of the ratepayers of the metropolis the power and responsibility of carrying out these works? He had listened with surprise to the arguments which had been brought to bear against the constitution of the Board; but he would remind the House that that Board was constituted on the appeal of a liberal Ministry, which numbered amongst its members the right hon. Member for Kidderminster (Mr. R. Lowe) who had spoken this evening in such strong terms of denunciation of this "quasi representative body." Now he supposed the intention of the Government and the Legislature would be found in the preamble of the Act which set up that body, and what did it say?—

"That it is expedient that provision should be made for the better local management of the metropolis in respect of the sewerage, the drainage, and the paving, cleansing, lighting, and improving thereof;"—

And clauses were contained in the Act which compelled the Board to undertake the very work which was now proposed to be entrusted to them—the main drainage of the metropolis and the purification of the Thames. The right hon. Member for Kidderminster was a consenting party to the introduction of that Act, and he would ask him whether, when the whole bench opposite were setting up this new Board, they did or they did not believe in their hearts that they were setting up a pure sham, and that they were deluding the metropolitan constituencies with the idea that they would have an effective municipality, which at the end of five or six years would thoroughly drain the metropolis and purify the Thames? He was bound to come to the latter conclusion, and he confessed, therefore, that he had listened with surprise to the statements which had been made to-night in denunciation of the original constitution of this body, and with still more surprise to the description of the manner in which it was composed. His right hon. Friend (Mr. Wortley) urged as a reason why it was impossible to entrust the Board with the powers conferred by this Bill, that he did not know the names of some of them. That was very possible. Could his right hon. Friend tell him the names of half the corporations of Liverpool or Manchester? And was the House to assume that these corporations were worthless, unless the right hon. Gentleman, or some other hon. Member, could give them the birth, parentage, and history of all their members. He (Lord John manners) protested against this line of argument. Here was a great municipality which had been created three years ago by the solemn decision of the Legislature for a definite and specified purpose, and without now entering minutely into the quarrel between the right hon. Gentleman opposite (the late Chief Commissioner of Works) and the members of that body, he thought every impartial man would admit that if the Metropolitan Board of Works had not yet carried out any plan for the main drainage of the metropolis, it was not fair to lay the blame exclusively at their door. The justification for the introduction of the present Bill was, that the powers with which it was assumed the Metropolitan Board of Works was clothed were not sufficient for the purposes contemplated; and, that being admitted on all hands, Her Majesty's Government now came to Parliament and asked it to give that Board those further powers which were necessary for the satisfactory settlement of the question. On the previous occasion he had declined to enter into the engineering and chemical questions involved in the various plans which had been proposed for the main drainage of the metropolis, and everything which had passed that evening showed how unwise and injudicious it was in hon. Members plunging into endless and useless discussions on such topics. The hon. Member for Huddersfied (Mr. Akroyd), who was a member of a Committee which had that day concluded its labours, had given his views as to how these questions might be settled, and he had been followed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Kidderminster, who in a most ingenious and elaborate speech endeavoured to set up the plan of the referees of the Commissioners of Works against that of the engineers of the Metropolitan Board. No doubt, many hard things were said by the referees against the plan proposed by the engineers of the Board; but having read all the papers he could state that equally hard, if not harder, things were said by the engineers of the Metropolitan Board of Words against the plan recommended by the referees of the Chief Commissioner. He entreated the House, therefore, not to be led into discussions of that nature; for they might rely upon it, that if they once undertook to settle in their minds what was the best plan, in an engineering or chemical point of view, of draining the metropolis and purifying the Thames, they must constitute themselves into a perpetual Committee. The Committee which was appointed to inquire into the subject had that day closed its labours, more from a feeling of the perfect hopelessness of going through all the plans which were about to be submitted to it than on any other account. If, then, the House agreed with him that it was vain and futile to hope that they could embody in a Bill what the two Houses of Parliament might think to be the best plan for the main drainage of the metropolis and the purification of the Thames; that the powers vested in the Metropolitan Board of Works were insufficient for these great purposes; that the national resources should not be called on to pay for local objects; and that the inhabitants of the metropolis, who would have to provide the funds, should have a voice in the matter, what better plan could be devised than that which was contained in the Bill which he now asked them to read a second time? As yet he had heard no answer to that. No one who had spoken to-night had suggested a better plan, so far as legislation was concerned. And until hon. Gentlemen pointed out a plan which gave the Legislature and the inhabitants of the metropolis a greater certainty that the works they were so intent upon carrying into effect could be accomplished, he entreated the House not to lose that, perhaps the last opportunity they would have, of investing with sufficient powers that Board which they found ready to their hands, and which was set up three years ago as a real effective and popular representation of every portion of this vast metropolis. Before resuming his seat he would endeavour to answer the question which had been put to him by the hon. Member for Evesham (Sir Henry Willoughby), who had asked what were the powers conferred by the Bill, and what the nature of the rate to be levied under it. The rate was what might be termed a sewers rate; and no alteration was made in the nature of it by the Bill. The power which was given to the Board to raise that rate would be retained. He believed that it was what was known in common parlance as a landlord's rate, and that when paid by the tenant would be recoverable from the landlord unless his lease contained a special provision to the contrary.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he thought the noble Lord laboured under some misapprehension as to the temper and intention of the remarks made by previous speakers. The noble Lord seemed to think that they partook of the nature of complaint or crimination against the Government for a proceeding precipitate on their part. Having listened to the debate, however, with great attention, it appeared to him that the speeches in question were not speeches of accusation against the noble Lord or his colleagues, but were, on the contrary, honest and ingenuous confessions of the difficulty in which the House found itself placed when called upon to assent to the principle of a Bill containing provisions so sweeping as to be out of all proportion to the amount of knowledge and information possessed by hon. Members. He himself was much impressed with that sentiment. He felt distrust of all great measures which derived their immediate impulse from momentary causes, and especially did that feeling prevail with him when the momentary cause out of which any measure took its birth, was of a nature that appealed to the senses in a manner so direct as that with which they were now unhappily so familiar. It was obvious that an atmosphere such as that which had recently prevailed was not favourable to the deliberative character of the House, and that it was hardly compatible, indeed, with the exercise of that circumspection and that careful consideration which a question of this kind on general principles would demand. He agreed with the noble Lord in some most important principles which he had laid down, and which appeared to be placed almost beyond dispute, even in a matter in which much remained that was uncertain. For example, his noble Friend had declined to accept the suggestion of the hon. and learned Member for Newcastle (Mr. Headlam), that the Government should take this matter into its own hands. He agreed with his noble Friend that the time had not come for such a step, because if the Government were to undertake the main drainage of the metropolis that would amount to a proclamation of the absolute incapacity of London for the management of its own affairs, and he confessed that, notwithstanding the difficulties in which the question was now involved—difficulties so serious as not to be without some scandal and discredit to the country—he did not abandon the hope that we might see a larger and much more effective application of the valuable principle of municipal self-government to the metropolis than any that had hitherto been made. He agreed with the noble Lord, too, that the charges of this work and of such other works as might be necessary for the metropolis ought to be borne, generally speaking, by the property and inhabitants of the metropolis itself. Again, it was impossible to doubt that the principle of popular representation ought to be the basis of the constitution of any body which, on the part of the inhabitants of the metropolis, was to be intrusted with the execution of this work. So far it was not difficult to see their way, but the moment they attempted to go further, they were surrounded by such impediments, and doubts, and obscurity, that he, for one, was disposed to plead guilty to a general uncertainty upon the point, whether the House was at this moment ripe for a final decision on the important question raised by the Bill. He would refer to one or two of these points. In the first place, it was undoubtedly true, that if the money of the inhabitants of the metropolis was to be expended upon the purification of the Thames, it ought to be expended by a body elected upon popular principles; but the application of popular principles to the Metropolitan Board of Works, under the joint operation of the existing Act and the present Bill, was so watered, filtered, and strained, through so many media, that he was afraid they had lost all that was valuable in those principles in the complicated process they had established. They wanted to have a real responsibility on the part of those who were to expend the money to the persons out of whose pockets the money was obtained; but that responsibility, under the existing Act, was much less direct and stringent than one could desire. For the purposes of responsibility—above all, for the purposes of responsibility in the expending of money—there was all the difference in the world between direct and indirect representation. The members of the Metropolitan Board of Works were not chosen by the ratepayers of the metropolis, but by the vestries of the different parishes, bodies not appointed to discharge municipal functions at all, but simply and solely for the performance of parochial business. Hence the relations between the Metropolitan Board of Works and those who were to pay the proposed tax were, after all, indirect and circuitous, and now the House was asked to weaken the principle of responsibility still further, because the Bill proposed to empower the Board of Works to appoint from among its own members a small Committee of six, and to leave to that body the exercise of all its powers and functions with respect to the execution of this great scheme. Therefore, without casting any discredit upon the Metropolitan Board of Works, or imputing to them anything either for what they had done, or for what they had left undone, he was disposed to think that, although the principle of popular representation was recognized in the theory of their constitution, yet the application of it was not so direct and palpable as to give them the weight, influence, and vitality which they ought to possess. There was another difficulty which he might notice. In the Metropolitan Board of Works as it stood there was no representation of the property of the metropolis, and in correspondence with that circumstance was the correlative one that it was not proposed that any portion of the rate should be borne by the landed proprietors of the metropolis. The whole charge was to be laid upon the ratepayers or lessees, and no part of it upon the ground landlords. That arrangement, they were told, was conformable to the principle upon which leases had been given in London for building purposes, because they contained express provisions that the ground rents should be free of all local rates and burdens. The difficulty, however, was not got rid of altogether by that consideration, because leases containing such provisions generally dated from a time when there was no idea entertained of burdens of a character such as those the House was now asked to impose, and it was evident that the covenants in leases, which were fixed by long usage and tradition, referred to the ordinary charges with which they were all familiar. But now they were going to make great retribution for the past, and great and costly provision for the future—to meet in fact a great crisis in the history of the metropolis. They had discovered a great neglect; they had found a great blank and void in their arrangements; they were called upon to repair the fault of former generations, and to supply the wants of generations yet to come. It appeared to him, therefore, that a proposition like the one before the House raised questions with regard to the liability of parties that were entirely different from those which were connected with the ordinary local charges of the metropolis. Then came the question whose was the permanent interest in the property of the metropolis? It was not the interest of the occupier nor that of the lessee; and it seemed to him that what they ought to desire, if practicable, should be that, on the one hand, the proprietors of London should be represented in the body that was to make this great expenditure, and that, on the other, their proprietary interest should be made to bear a fair proportion of the charge. It might be urged that the matter was one not easy to settle at a moment's notice. The tenures in London were different from those in the country in general, and it might not be easy at once to suggest the right provisions. Still they should endeavour to throw upon the right parties the burdens of the scheme. Looking at the framework of the Bill, he confessed that it raised a good deal of doubt and difficulty in his mind. He wanted to know who was to be ultimately responsible for the payment of this money. There was no doubt that the Bill provided, or appeared to provide, that the charge should be borne by the metropolis; but at the same time the public, through the medium of the House of Commons, often became involved unawares in pecuniary obligations. He wished, therefore, to look at the framework of the Bill, to see how far it was calculated to secure the ultimate avoidance of such responsibility, or whether it might not have certain latent tendencies, in possible contingencies, to bring responsibility upon the public. There were cases in which the House of Commons had not thought fit to assume minute and particular responsibility for the details of a measure. There had been reports of Ecclesiastical Commissions, and statutes of importance had passed at different periods, wherein the House of Commons had confined itself to the functions of assenting to plans recited in the preamble of the Acts. Now, he did not object abstractedly to the principle of a public guarantee in a matter so important as the present; but he thought it fair that the application of that principle should be watched and scrutinized with the utmost jealousy, for he knew no single class of measures which ought to be watched with greater care, except, indeed, propositions for grants of money, than measures for giving a public guarantee. He wanted to see the responsibility of the body to which it was proposed to give the guarantee, and he wanted to avoid possibly slipping into a position in which it might be said that all was really done on the authority of Parliament, and it was vain for Parliament to think of avoiding to pay for it. He concurred with the right hon. Member for Kidderminster (Mr. Lowe) in not thinking that this was a case in which they were dealing with a popularly elected representative body, which, possessing the confidence of its constituents, and being a competent judge of the subject, had come forward and represented that it simply desired pecuniary aid in the shape of a guarantee for the economical execution of the work. He did not find that set forth in the Bill; but, on the contrary, he found that Parliament seemed to be made in the main the absolute author and projector of the scheme. It was perfectly true that, it was hopeless for hon. Members to arrive at any satisfactory conclusion on engineering and technical questions by the force of discussion in that House; but, though they could not arrive at conclusions themselves on those points, they might reasonably wish to have the best assurance that those points had been adequately considered and authoritatively and competently decided on by those with whom they were dealing. He must confess that the state of the discussion, the pamphlets and publications which had appeared, did not carry conviction to his mind that the question had arrived at such a state of ripeness and maturity as would give the House a hope of satisfactorily dealing with it. There was the great question with respect to the restoration of a large bulk of water to the Thames, at or near the metropolis, which by no means, within his knowledge, had been brought to a settlement. They were not called upon to stand either on their own convictions or on the convictions of those with whom they had to deal. The noble Lord told them it was hopeless to expect to arrive at any conviction of their own. Well, then, let them arrive at the conviction of somebody else. But that was not so. The Bill did not even state that the Metropolitan Board of Works had approved the scheme which the Bill was to sanction. In the first few clauses the Bill contained a recognition and sanction of a plan which was understood to be the plan of the Metropolitan Board, but the Bill promulgated that plan on the authority of Parliament. That was a fact of the utmost importance with respect to the question of ultimate liability. It was all very well to have an estimate of £3,000,000; but human nature was fallible generally, and in no respect more so than in the concoction of estimates. It was quite within the limits of probability that these estimates might fail; and suppose they did, and suppose that this plan proved not to have been the best plan, and that the £3,000,000 proved insufficient, what would be the position of that House in respect to the inhabitants of the metropolis? Would the inhabitants be able to point to the present Bill and say that it was not by their wish, by direct petition or representation that that House assumed to deal with the matter; that the time was not chosen by them, but by the Members of that House, when annoyed by the stench of the Thames; and that the provisions of the Bill were not dictated by a regard for popular principles or by matured convictions, but were the result of a restless haste on the part of Members of Parliament to escape from personal inconvenience? Still, taking all matters into consideration he did not complain of the Government—on the contrary, if his noble Friend understood the question, and felt the ground secure under his feet, he congratulated him on his lofty position; but, for himself, he felt he was not in that position, and from the discussion he felt there were others like him. He, hoped, therefore, his noble Friend would excuse him, and not consider that it was any imputation upon him if he (Mr. Gladstone) confessed it would be a comfort and satisfaction to him if some further time were allowed before the Bill was sanctioned.

Mr. Alderman CUBITT said, he could not but admit that the House was in a difficulty, as there was such a short time allowed for deliberation on this important measure; but still the circumstances were so urgent, that if the House were to separate without sanctioning some plan they would merit the censure of the country. He had no doubt that if the powers contained in this Bill were conferred on the Metropolitan Board of Works they would be able to satisfy all the requirements of public opinion. The only objection he had to the Bill was one which could be amended in Committee. It related to the proviso that if the sewage was readmitted into the Thames above Barking Creek it must be deodorised; but he would ask if the sewage could be deodorised below London, what was to prevent it from being deodorised in London itself? He had no doubt that the work of deodorisation could be accomplished in London. What he should like would be, that the Board of Works should carry out any scheme they pleased, taking care that the river should be made free from all pollutions. A good deal had been said about the composition of the Metropolitan Board of Works, but he could tell hon. Gentlemen that there were members of that Board who would do credit to those benches. It was said that that Board contained no scientific or engineering skill. He maintained that there was both; but at the same time he reminded the House that what was wanted was, not a board of engineers, but a body of men of general intelligence, competent to make a wise selection of their officers—men independent in position and of general business habits. His authority had been quoted for having said on a former occasion that 80,000,000 of gallons were pumped up out of the Thames for the use of the water companies. He ought to have said that half of that water came from the east and half from the west. But still the general fact remained that the condition of the Thames between Westminster Bridge and Richmond was one from which great inconvenience had been felt, and therefore they must be careful how they further diminished the volume of the stream. He hoped in conclusion, that the House would permit the Bill to go into Committee, where such alterations as might be necessary could be made.

Mr. CONINGHAM said, he confessed that he felt considerable alarm at the prospect that the drainage of the metropolis might be handed over to the Metropolitan Board of Works, whose scheme ignored, he believed, the two great principles of the modern system of drainage—the utilization of the sewage by applying it to the soil, and the separation of the sewage from rainwater by a double system of tubular drainage. The Government referees, in a letter addressed by them to the First Commissioner of Works, had shown that with regard to many points the scheme proposed by the Metropolitan Board must fail to effect its object of purifying the sewage, so that the surplus water might be carried into the Thames. It was also an extraordinary circumstance that while the Board proposed to deodorize the western portion of the sewage they proposed to carry away the eastern portion by tunnel. Now, if deodorization would suffice for the west, why should it not suffice for the east also? A friend of his, Mr. F. O. Ward, in a very able letter he had addressed to him on this subject, made the following observations:—

"Now, consider the effect of a sudden rainstorm falling on London, and pouring through these overcharged subterranean receptacles. Suppose it only to sweep into the river nine or ten days' accumulation of filth, to what do you imagine that is equivalent? It is equivalent to the simultaneous discharge into the river Thames of the mass of excrement produced in one day by the entire population of Great Britain, numbering 21,000,000. And to such eruptions of filth we should still be frequently liable, even if the great tunnels for mixed rainfall and sewage were built. The money loss on every such occasion would be in ammonia only, without reckoning phosphorus, nearly £16,000. Besides, after every such discharge the tidal river would remain discoloured, and in hot weather putrescent for several days. Such would be the operation of the colossal tunnels on which we are invited to lay out millions; such are the evils consequent on the mingling of rainfall with sewage. The obvious conclusion is, that the tunnel scheme propounded by the Metropolitan Board of Works, with the sanction of Mr. Stephenson and his party, not merely ignores, one-half of the problem in hand—namely, the agricultural utilization of the sewage, but is inadequate to accomplish the moiety which alone it contemplates — namely, the purification of the river. Indeed, by their last vote on this subject the Metropolitan Board resolved to pour the sewage of the western district of London, more or less deodorized, into the Thames above Westminster Bridge, and to reserve the proposed great tunnels for the conveyance of the remaining sewage only. Of deodorization, the mainstay of this scheme, I will only here remark, that while at best it is a costly and imperfect palliative, it becomes quite impracticable precisely when most needed—i.e., when heavy showers are sweeping from the sewers the largest masses of putrescent filth. Independently, however, of this objection, the two parts of the scheme are manifestly inconsistent. For, if deodorization suffices for the west, why is interception necessary for the east? And, contrariwise, if miles of tunnel are required to convey far off the eastern sewage, how can it be right to pour the western sewage into the river above bridge? Surely, the principle must be false that leads to such illogical conclusions. The principle to which, by these and other considerations, my friends and I have been gradually led is shortly this—that the whole of the rainfall is due to the river, the whole of the sewage to the soil. The adoption of this principle is, we believe, as essential for the perfect purification of the Thames as it is for the economical utilization of the sewage. That this may be obvious to you, pray keep in view that when sewage and rainfall are once mixed, whether in the Thames itself or in the minutest of the filaments that feed it (in a street-sewer or in a house drain, for example), those mingled waters can never again be separated. In polluting the smallest of its tributaries you virtually pollute the Thames; and, as it has been said, 'Take care of the pence and the pounds will take care of themselves,' so I venture to say, 'Purify the tributaries, and the main stream will run pure of itself.' If, now, we trace in each house the course of the rain from roof and area, and the course of the sewage from closet and sink, till we come to the point at which the separate pipes conveying these two distinct streams meet in a single drain, we arrive at the precise boundary line between possible and impossible in this matter of Thames purification and sewage utilization. For, up to this point, and before this meeting of two waters, we are free to apply each streamlet to its proper use. We can send the unpolluted rainfall to scour the river, and the undiluted sewage to fertilize the land. But directly this junction point is passed, directly the daily runlet of cistern-water, rich with its freight of ammonia and phosphorus, meets and mingles with the casual rainfall, the two waters become, as we have seen, a worthless, unmanageable mixture, equally unfit for agricultural and urban use. Not only do they cease to be our property, and pass beyond the control of art, but they revert to the domain of nature, spoiled even for her simple service. For this error we are punished by pestilence. I say, therefore, that the battle of interception is to be fought, not on the banks of the river, but in the basements of the houses; not with monstrous tunnels, but with modest tubes; not by the diversion of variable rainbrooks, alternately dry and torrential, but by the diversion of uniform cistern supplies, always moderate and manageable; not at a profitless cost of many millions, yielding no return, but at a profitable outlay of a few millions, producing an ample return —probably half a million per annum. This tubular purification of rivers and fertilization of lands is, indeed, but the logical extension of the tubular drainage of houses and streets which my friends and I have succeeded in establishing after a ten years' struggle with the engineers. And, as our tubular sewers, notwithstanding the strenuous opposition of Mr. Stephenson and his friends, are now working successfully by hundreds of miles, not only in provincial towns, but in the metropolis itself, so also, I am confident, will the tubular purification of the Thames ultimately supersede the monstrous tunnel project, which, if adopted, would cost us many millions, and turn out a gigantic failure after all. . . . . I have only to add, in conclusion, that the purification of rivers and the utilization of sewage are, in my judgment, but two aspects or incidents of a sanitary organization comprising several other elements, each indispensable to the perfect working of the whole. This complete organization cannot, however, be suddenly accomplished; nor can even its several parts be simultaneously prepared. But in the development of such portions as we may be able presently to undertake the others may be kept in view; and this is in the highest degree desirable, in order that the sanitary works of our day may serve, not as a bar, but as a transition to the more perfect institutions of our successors. Should the monstrous rain and sewage tunnels proposed by the Metropolitan Board be built, they would indeed oppose a serious obstacle to such ulterior progress. But of this I have little fear. Those subterranean rivers are already beginning to be regarded by the ratepayers as a costly and colossal blunder, and, unless I am much mistaken, they will be obsolete before they are begun."

He (Mr. Coningham) warned the House against plunging into a scheme which would prove a colossal failure, and which involved a direct attack upon the pockets of the metropolitan ratepayers.

SIR BENJAMIN HALL said, the noble Lord the First Commissioner of Works had observed that hon. Gentlemen on that (the Opposition) side of the House, who had formerly loudly called upon the Government to take some steps for the purification of the Thames, were now prepared to throw over the whole question. He (Sir B. Hall) begged to assure the noble Lord that he was not one of those who desired to throw over the question, but that, on the contrary, he intended to vote for the second reading of the Bill if a division took place. He thought it right, however, to state the one reason, and the one reason only, which induced him to take that course. He would not enter into the details of the various plans which had been proposed for the drainage of the Metropolis, for nearly all the hon. Gentlemen, who had addressed the House were disposed to adopt different plans if the matter were left to their decision. He thought, however, it was essential that, with a view to the purification of the Thames, the Metropolitan Board of Works should be entrusted with those powers of raising money which were proposed to be vested in them generally by the Bill of 1855, and which the present Bill proposed to confer upon them in a more detailed form. There were, however, some clauses in this Bill which required careful consideration, and to which he hoped strong opposition would be offered. Reference had been made to the recommendations contained in the Report of the Commissions appointed to inquire into the Corporation of London, presented in 1854, and a right hon. Friend of his had stated that the Act of 1855 was not strictly carried out in accordance with the recommendations of those Commissioners. This was quite true; but the general views of the Commissioners had been embodied in the Bill when first introduced; the details could only be determined when it became necessary to enter upon the subject of metropolitan legislation, with a view to the introduction of a measure which was to effect that great and long-desired object. The recommendations to which his right hon. Friend had particularly alluded were these:—

"We suggest the creation of a Metropolitan Board of Works, to be composed of a limited number of Members deputed to it from the Council of each metropolitan municipal body, including the Corporation of the City. We propose that the management of public works, in which the metropolis has a common interest, should be conducted by this body. At present, works of this sort can only be undertaken either by the Corporation of London, from its own peculiar funds, or under powers created for the purpose by special legislation, or by the executive Government out of Parliamentary grants. It is manifest that a power of executing public works of general metropolitan importance, such as the contruction of bridges over the Thames, or the opening or widening of main lines of streets, accompanied by a power of metropolitan taxation, would, though founded on a basis of popular election, require efficient safeguards for its prudent and useful exercise. We, therefore, think that the plans of the works to be executed should be submitted to a committee of the Privy Council, and its consent obtained before they are carried into effect. We may add, that cases may arise where public works may be executed in the metropolis partly out of the metropolitan fund and partly from Parliamentary grants, and that in these cases a control of the executive Government such as we have proposed would be indispensable. The Commissioners recommended in their 29th suggestion, that in the event of a division of the metropolis into municipal districts being made, a Metropolitan Board of Works be created, composed of members deputed to it from the Council of each metropolitan municipal body, including the Common Council of the City."

He had endeavoured to frame the measure he had introduced for the local management of the metropolis as closely as possible in accordance with the recommendations of the Commissioners, but he did not mean to say that it was perfect in its details. It would be almost impossible to frame any measure embracing such important objects, and containing no less than 250 clauses, so as to ensure perfection. He had, however, the satisfaction of knowing that, notwithstanding some questions had necessarily arisen, no legal decision, or at all events scarcely a legal decision, had been given contrary to the spirit and intention with which the Legislature adopted that measure, and he thought that circumstance showed that it had been framed with great care. He might be allowed to state what had been his intention and that of the Government when they proposed the measure to which he had referred with respect to the constitution of the Metropolitan Board of Works, and more especially the person who might preside over that body. They were of opinion that he should be a person well acquainted with engineering works, and qualified from his antecedents to supervise their construction, and this was considered essential on introducing the Bill in 1855. He (Sir B. Hall) made use of these words according to the Report—

"With respect to the chairman, he proposed that the Metropolitan Board of Works should select three names not necessarily from their own body, or from any district board, but that they should have power to select from the whole length and breadth of the kingdom three persons, any one of whom would be fit and proper to occupy the high office he would be called upon to fill and thoroughly qualified to discharge the important functions attendant upon it. These names should be sent to the Secretary of State, and the latter should erase two, the remaining one to be the president of the Metropolitan Board of Works. He proposed that the chairman should be paid a salary of not less than £1,500, and not more than £2,000 a year, and that he should hold office during good behaviour. This body would have power to levy rates for improvements, and also, when necessary, to take land out of their district for the purpose of outfall works, as at present it was not possible to carry out the drainage of the metropolis, because there was no power to make the arterial drains beyond a certain limit. This Board would have power to make intercepting sewers for the purification of the Thames, and would be empowered to borrow money from the Treasury, to be paid within fifty years."

Such was the scheme which he proposed, and he wished it had been fully carried out, but it was the pleasure of the House to alter those provisions so far as to empower the Board to elect their own chairman, without any such reference as that proposed which they did by selecting one of their own body, and the House refused permission to obtain money through the Treasury; and it now became necessary to re-insert the latter provision. With respect to the measure before the House it was desirable that the discussion of details should be reserved for Committee; but there was one point to which he was extremely anxious to call attention. In the second clause the points of outfall were defined, and it was provided that, if they discharged the sewage at Barking Creek and a point opposite, they were to deodorize the sewage for six months of the year. He should not now discuss the propriety of fixing these points of outfall so near to the metropolis, but he strongly objected to the proviso added to the clause, which enabled the Board, if they thought fit, to discharge the sewage in any part of the metropolis. It was very true that, if they did this, they were bound to deodorize the sewage throughout the whole year; but the evidence adduced before the Committee, which concluded its sittings that very day, showed that it would be extremely difficult, if not impossible, to establish deodorizing works within the metropolitan area at the outfalls of the various sewers. He hoped, therefore, that if they went into Committee the Government would consider this question, and, before giving the Board power to erect deodorizing and manure works in the densely populated parts of the metropolis, would first ascertain whether the system of deodorization was so perfect as to be capable of application to such a place as London. The works at Leicester had been quoted, but the case of Leicester did not bear any analogy to the metropolis. The works at Leicester were in the open country, not in the town; but this could not be in London, and he thought such a power would be a very dangerous one to entrust to the Board, unless it was strictly guarded so as to prevent the possibility of a nuisance being created in the densely populated portion of the metropolis.

MR. KENDALL said, Government were blowing hot and cold. He could not understand how the Government could lay claim to activity, when, at the moment the House were willing to give full powers to the Government, they sought to get out of the difficulty by throwing the responsibility on to other shoulders. A Bill had been introduced the effect of which was to grant £3,000,000 for an object respecting which Parliament would have no sort of control or responsibility. But would £3,000,000 be sufficient? The best report ever written on any subject of this kind was that of the referees employed by the late Commissioner of Works, which was characterized by great accuracy and by consummate ability. That report showed that instead of £3,000,000, they might with the greatest safety read £6,000,000, and probably £9,000,000 or £12,000,000 would be much nearer the mark than £3,000,000. With respect to Barking Creek, the evidence adduced before the Committee went to show that they would merely send the sewage there to have it returned to London, and the nuisance would be as bad as ever. As to the Leicester plan, Mr. Cook, who had given his evidence with great clearness and precision, declared that he could erect works which would completely deodorize the sewage in a place of 100,000 inhabitants at a cost of £6,000, and could carry them on for £1,200 a year; and he added, that he was quite sure the plan was applicable to the metropolis, and that he would undertake to establish works for deodorizing the sewage of London at a cost of £100,000, and carry them on for £38,000 a year. He (Mr. Kendall), of course, did not know whether these plans could be carried out, but Mr. Cook was backed up by Mr. Stodart (who was, he believed, known to the noble Member for Tiverton) and by another eminently practical man. He did not wish the House should be under the impression that the Committee had been able to hear one-half of the evidence which might with advantage have been adduced, and he was of opinion that the question under discussion might with advantage be still further considered before any legislation with respect to it should take place.

MR. JOSEPH LOCKE said, whatever might be his own opinion as to the best plan for carrying out the objects of the Bill, he thought that as this was a Bill for raising money, a Bill much more simple in its details would have answered the purpose. He could, also, bear testimony to the fact that there were many engineers of eminence who maintained that the scheme to which the House was virtually asked to give its assent was not that which it was most expedient to carry into effect, and he might further observe in reference to the expenditure, that some of the engineers and some of the parties examined before the Committee, had coupled with the expenditure for drainage that necessary for works of which the House had at present no knowledge. Those other works, he believed, would be attended with considerable expense, and it was to that he would direct attention. With respect to the system of deodorization which the right hon. Baronet the Member for Marylebone (Sir B. Hall) seemed to think was not calculated to work well, he could only say that some most important witnesses had given it as their opinion, that places where such a process might be put in operation might, without causing inconvenience to the inhabitants of the metropolis, be erected anywhere upon the banks of the Thames. Would it not, then, he would ask, if that were so, be better, instead of expending £3,000,000 in taking down the sewage to Barking Creek, deodorizing it there, and thus abstracting a large quantity of water from that portion of the river which flowed by the metropolis, be better to subject it to the process of deodorization upon the spot? He threw out that suggestion not so much upon the faith of his own opinion upon the subject as upon that of the evidence which had been laid before the Committee; and he might perhaps be permitted in conclusion to observe, that there having been considerable doubts expressed with respect to the success of the proposed scheme, it would be advisable that the Bill before the House should have simply guaranteed the £3,000,000 of money on the credit of the Imperial Exchequer instead of mixing Her Majesty's Ministers up in any manner with any scheme whatsoever. He agreed with the hon. Chairman of the Committee (Mr. Kendall), that they had not yet had sufficient evidence to enable them to say which, under all the circumstances, was the best scheme for the perfect drainage of the metropolis

MR. HENLEY said, that the hon. Member who had just spoken had expressed a wish that the Bill had not indicated any plan, but had simply guaranteed the money. That was exactly what the Bill did. The Bill laid down no specific plan, but left it open to the Metropolitan Board of Works to fix upon such a scheme for the attainment of the end which the measure proposed as they might deem fit. They might construct intercepting sewers or not as they pleased; all the Bill provided being that they should get rid in some way or another of a great nuisance, and that the means of enabling them to do so should be afforded. With respect to the opinion which had been expressed by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Marylebone (Sir B. Hall), to the effect that the process of deodorization should not be resorted to in crowded localities, he need merely remark that, while there was a clause in the Bill giving power to the Board of Works to avail themselves of that process, yet that there was another which provided that no nuisance should be created, and a sufficient security was therefore furnished that no works would be constructed in places surrounded by houses. In reference to the scheme which it might be most expedient to adopt, he was of opinion that the less said the better, inasmuch as that was a point upon which no two hon. Members seemed likely to agree. The simple question seemed to be this. Some two or three years ago Parliament had decided upon intrusting the power of doing this very thing to a local authority. For some cause, however, nothing had been done. Various plans had in the course of the last three years been laid before the public. They had been during that period well thrashed out, but the process simply tended to establish the fact, that no two men could be found to concur in anything. But because no two men could agree in anything, was that a reason why they do nothing? The two chief reasons, he thought, why nothing had been effected by the Metropolitan Board of Works during all that time were, that they had not the power of raising a sufficient amount of money, and that authority to place a veto upon any scheme which they might suggest rested with the Government. When they submitted a plan to the right hon. Baronet the Member for Marylebone, for instance, he at once procured competent men to pronounce an opinion upon it, and when there were competent men upon the side of the one party and of the other they were, as a matter of course, sure to differ. The result had been that one set of competent men had drawn up reasons in opposition to the scheme of the others, and that nothing had been done. The Thames' nuisance had gone on meantime increasing in intensity, until it had at length arrived at such a pitch that it might any fine morning give rise to a pestilence. Now, if we were to wait to remove that nuisance until "competent authorities" should agree among themselves as to the best mode of carrying that object into effect, it was, he thought, perfectly obvious that we might be called upon to wait till Doomsday. That was the position in which the question stood, and it was in order to obviate all the inconvenience which had in consequence arisen, and to effect something, that the Bill before the House had been introduced. Now, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Gladstone) seemed to object to the term sewage rate as contained in the Bill; but he must remind the right hon. Gentleman that the term was one not unknown to the law of England, and that there were many places in which a similar tax was levied at a higher rate than 3*d.* in the pound. It was quite obvious, too, he thought, that none of the inconveniences which had been mentioned would result from the imposition of such a rate, inasmuch as its payment would always form a matter of contract between the landlord and the tenant, rendering the one or the other liable to its payment as might be agreed upon between the two parties. Objections had been raised as to the mode in which the Metropolitan Board of Works was elected, and it had been argued that it did not fairly represent the metropolis. The question was discussed about three years ago, and that objection was not then raised, certainly not in the sense in which it was now urged. After what they had heard against the election of councils by large constituencies, he thought it could not be seriously recommended that the Metropolitan Board of Works should be elected by the entire body of ratepayers in London. He was not aware that any objections had been made on the part of the metropolis to the Metropolitan Board of Works being intrusted with the carrying out of the drainage plans. If the country at large were willing to pay for the works, then the matter might be left to the Queen's Government; but if the country refused to pay, or to assist in paying, for those works, then it ought not to interfere in the construction of them. They had already had some experience in this matter. There could be no doubt that the veto of the Government had brought matters to a dead lock, and with regard to the drainage of other towns, past experience must have taught them that the interference of the Government was neither agreeable nor useful. Therefore, as he believed that whatever scheme might be adopted, it would tend to abate the nuisance which now existed, and as delay would not advance their acquaintance with the subject, he hoped the House would consent to proceed with the Bill as speedily as possible.

MR. STEPHENSON thought the noble Lord (Lord J. Manners) would not have said the subject of the drainage of London was thoroughly threshed out had he been so long occupied in considering it as he (Mr. Stephenson) had been. About eight years since he became a member of the Metropolitan Sewers Commission, and commenced an earnest and continuous study of the difficult question of the sewage of London and the best means of disposing of it. He acted in conjunction with some very able men, and formed an opinion which, although it had undergone some modification since that time, had not been essentially changed. He was called upon at that time to examine 150 different plans which had been sent in by various individuals, in compliance with the advertisements of a previous Commission, which presented every possible variety of scheme for the drainage of London. These plans he studied with great care and considerable anxiety, and came to the conclusion that nothing would effectually meet the evil but an intercepting system. The right hon. Member for Kidderminster (Mr. Lowe) had objected that that system was not adapted to any increase in the population of London beyond three millions and a half; but nothing more inappropriate than that objection could be conceived. The intercepting system divided the sewers of London as they at present existed into a series of zones: each intercepting sewer would deal with the zone immediately above it; and, therefore, any extension of London would only require the construction of a new intercepting sewer for each additional zone without interfering with anything that had been done in the interior of the metropolis. One of the chief recommendations of the intercepting plan was its capability of expansion without involving any interference with the existing drainage. Upon the occasion to which he had referred, after the 150 plans had been examined, plans were drawn up with great care and referred to Government; but when it came to obtaining money for carrying them out it was found that the hands of the Commissioners were tied, and the Government disregarded their applications. Therefore, as the minor sewerage of the metropolis could be constructed under the ordinary superintendence, the Commission resigned. A new Commission was subsequently formed, comprising many eminent men of his own profession, who, after deliberation, came to the same conclusion as he had; and their having done so, without any communication with him, was another strong argument in favour of the intercepting system. This Commission also failed, because the Government refused every application for money. The noble Lord the Member for Tiverton sent them a letter, very brief and very dictatorial, stating that the Commission ought to carry out the scheme of a gentleman recommended by himself. That led to the resignation of the Commissioners. They could not carry it out, and they felt it would be absurd to identify themselves with such a scheme. Objections had been taken to the Metropolitan Board of Works as the body to execute the proposed works, but he could not see the justice of the objection. What other body possessed the information necessary for the performance of such a task. Any other body must acquire and rearrange all the information of which the Metropolitan Board of Works were now in possession. He agreed with the right hon. Gentleman who spoke last in doubting the advantage that would arise from any interference on the part of the Government. The House was arguing in ignorance of the course which this question had taken. If they were to recommence the argument five years hence the debate would assume precisely the same character as it did at present. The right hon. Member for Oxford University (Mr. Gladstone) seemed to object to the mode of levying the tax, as falling unfairly upon lessees and occupiers, and proposed that proprietors themselves should be taxed. But when a bargain was made it must hold, or in cases where the lessees derived a doubled or tripled advantage there must be a rearrangement of terms. Those were matters that could not be dealt with by Parliament in legislating upon a matter of this description. He hoped the House would decide in favour of the Bill, unless they intended to postpone legislation altogether, and leave things just as they were. He did not think any one would agree to that. If the intercepting system was not absolutely a perfect system, yet still it would be better to adopt a plan that would do some good than to allow another year to pass away without doing anything to remove the existing evils. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) said that the Bill did not bind the Board of Works to any particular plan; but he apprehended that that House ought not to advance money unless they knew for what it was advancing it. As a man of experience, he advised the House to insist upon a considerable portion of the intercepting system being adopted, and recommended that the work should be commenced by the construction of the high level sewer for the interception of the storm waters.

Mr. LOWE explained that he had not said that a system of intercepting sewers would necessarily be limited to any amount of population, but that the plan of the Board of Works, which he understood was to be carried out under this Bill, was professedly limited to a population of 3,500,000.

Sir JOHN SHELLEY said, that having sat upon the Commission of Sewers which succeeded that of which the hon. Member for Whitby (Mr. Stephenson) was a Member, he could confirm the statement of that hon. Gentleman as to the labours of these Commissions. He might also add that the majority of the Commission of which he was a Member agreed with its predecessor in preferring the system of intercepting sewers to any other which had been devised. He thought that it would be well to begin with the high level sewer in order to get rid of the storm water. If they waited for any further inquiry, then, after all the delay which might arise, they would only come back to the point at which they had already arrived. Although the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Henley) said that there was nothing in this Bill which bound the Government to any plan, he thought that the first clause bound them to the adoption of the system of intercepting sewers, and that was one reason why he should support it. He was also pleased to hear from the right hon. Gentleman that no works would be put where they would be a nuisance; but who was to determine what was a nuisance? That point ought not to be left in doubt. With regard to deodorization, he reminded the House that though Mr. Cooke, of Leicester, who gave evidence upon that subject, was undoubtedly a man of great intelligence, he was the chairman of a company which was very anxious to sell the produce of deodorizing works of which they had hitherto been unable to dispose. The only fear he had with regard to the Bill was its giving power to the Metropolitan Board of Works to have the outfalls within the metropolitan area. It was hardly fair that although, if the outfalls were within limits of the metropolis, the sewage was to be deodorized all the year, if they were just without, that process was insisted upon during only six months. He should, however, vote for the second reading of the Bill, because it removed the great difficulty under which the Board of Works had hitherto laboured—that of obtaining money; and he hoped that in Committee provision would be made that the outfalls of the sewers should not be within the metropolitan area.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that having been one of the Commissioners upon whose Report the constitution of the Board of Works was mainly founded, he was anxious to say a few words before this Bill was read a second time. The principle of this measure he understood to be that this great work should be executed not by the Government, or by a Board appointed by the Government, but by the Metropolitan Board of Works. To that principle he gave his unhesitating assent. The Government were undoubtedly right; and if they had acted upon a different principle they must have been prepared to ask that House to furnish funds for executing the work; but having proceeded upon that principle they had rightly cast upon the metropolitan rate-payers the duty of providing the funds. They had, he thought, gone quite as far as could be expected in giving a guarantee for all the money which it was said would be required for the work. There was one provision with regard to the guarantee to which he entertained a strong objection; he meant that by which the Government took power to appoint a superintending inspector. He viewed with the greatest jealousy the imposing upon the Government any responsibility, or giving them any power of interfering with the local authorities, which if the plan was unsuccessful, if mistakes were made in carrying it into effect, or if the funds were insufficient, would justify those authorities in saying to the Executive, "You, by your inspector, had had cognizance of what was going on, you tacitly approved our proceedings, and you are therefore bound to share with us the loss which has been incurred." He trusted that the Government would not take upon itself any more responsibility than was absolutely necessary for the protection of the guarantee which the State was to give. Having assented to the principle of the measure, he must add that the Bill upon the face of it seemed to be inconsistent with the statement which had just been made by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Henley). That right hon. Gentleman said that it would be competent to the Metropolitan Board of Works to adopt any plan they might think fit, that the Government would not be responsible for the adoption of any plan or the preference of any one practical principle over another.

MR. HENLEY: What he said was, that the Government were not bound to any particular plan, and that it was quite open to the Board of Works to carry out any plan they thought fit, but he made no reference to principles.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS understood that the Government had expressed no opinion in favour of any plan, and that it was quite open to the Board of Works to adopt any one they pleased. If that was the case, why was the House called upon to assent to this precise sum of £3,000,000? How did they know that £3,000,000 would be adequate to carry out a scheme which perhaps had yet to be conceived, and which was certainly at present unknown? How was it known that a rate of 3*d.* in the pound for forty years would be sufficient to defray the cost of these works? If it was true that no plan had been selected—if the field of choice were quite open—how did they know that the Board of Works might not fix upon some scheme which would require the expenditure of £5,000,000 or £6,000,000 to carry it out? One of two things—either the Board of Works had fixed upon some plan, and the Government, adopting and approving it, had proposed this £3,000,000 as the sum which it was thought would be required for its execution; or this £3,000,000 was a mere guess—any other amount might as well have been inserted in the Bill—and the House had no security whatever that when a portion of these works had been completed that amount would not be found to be insufficient, and they would be called upon to guarantee a further loan. This was his only difficulty in assenting to the second reading of this Bill; and, if it received a satisfactory explanation, he should, without hesitation, consent to the measure passing that stage.

MR. JOHN LOCKE remarked, that if the difficulty he felt at the bringing in of the Bill was great, it was much greater now that he had the measure before him. The Government said that they had no plan at all, but the Bill contained regulations as to the point of outfall. Did that foreshadow a plan or not? If they had a deodorizing plan, no stipulation as to the point of outfall would be necessary. It was clear, therefore, that the Government must have some plan, or must, at all events, have decided upon the principle to be adopted. The House had heard the speeches of the hon. Members for Whitby and Honiton (Mr. Stephenson and Mr. Joseph Locke) than whom it would be impossible to consult higher authorities; but the opinions expressed by those hon. Gentlemen had only added to the perplexities by which Parliament was surrounded. The hon. Member for Honiton's bias was clearly in favour of deodorization; but the other hon. Gentleman was decidedly against that plan.

MR. STEPHENSON said, he was not opposed to the deodorizing system. He was only opposed to relying for the drainage of the metropolis upon deodorization. He quite admitted that some parts of the metropolis could not be drained except by deodorization.

MR. JOHN LOCKE resumed: When doctors differed in this way the House was placed in a most unfortunate position. He had certainly understood that the hon. Gentleman's plan was the zonal system. The hon. Gentleman would divide the metropolis into zones, and he understood from his evidence that he was against adopting the plan of deodorization for London. They were called to guarantee £3,000,000 for nobody knew what. The Government said that they had no system, and that the Board of Works might do what they liked, and still the Government had shadowed out a system of intercepting drains. He regretted that although the sewage might be put in a state of solution, the question of the drainage of the metropolis did not appear to be capable of solution. They were called upon to legislate in the dark. The supporters of the Bill did not seem to have a definite idea of what they were supporting. However, it was not for him, after the speeches of the hon. Members for Westminster and Marylebone, to oppose the second reading of the Bill, though he had no hope that it would be sufficiently altered and amended in Committee.

VISCOUNT EBRINGTON said, he would not enter upon any of the engineering questions that had been alluded to. He disclaimed any notion of being enamoured of this Bill, which was founded on no clear principle. It neither threw the entire responsibility of the drainage of the metropolis upon the Metropolitan Board of Works, nor, on the other hand, did the Government undertake the responsibility of dealing with the question. They proposed to appoint an inspector—they laid down conditions as to the principle of drainage and the point of outfall, and they limited the guarantee to £3,000,000, but they assumed no direct responsibility for the works to be carried out. He had, for his own part, no confidence in the Metropolitan Board of Works. He believed that the landowners of the metropolis were inadequately represented in that body. It was composed of too large a number of members, and from its unwieldly size was unequal to carry out such large and extensive works as the drainage of the metropolis; and he would submit to the Government that, as it would be only fair that the State should, in fairness, contribute something to metropolitan works, so the Government should undertake the responsibility of nominating a smaller and more working body than this large representative council, under whose auspices there would be greater reason to hope for a speedy and economical solution of the present difficulty. He repeated that he was not sanguine respecting the well-working of the present measure, while the Government, who brought it in, would be held responsible by the inhabitants of the metropolis for the failure of the measure, if that failure should afterwards be found, as he felt it would, both signal and costly.

MR. CLAY said, in his ignorance of engineering science—an ignorance shared by most of those present—he thought the duty of the House on this occasion was confined to a very simple point. All that the House had to determine was, whether it was worth while to expend a large sum of money to remove the nuisance of draining into the Thames, whether the work should be undertaken immediately, by whom the money was to be paid, and in what way the work was to be carried out. It appeared to him that those points were settled by the Bill before the House. The right hon. Member for Oxford University seemed to think that the Members of that House were legislating under the pressure of a bad smell, and that they reasoned as they appeared disposed to pay, through the nose. He agreed with the right hon. Gentleman that the matter should be further considered, not, however, by the engineering capacity of the House of Commons, as they had that evening shown their own incapacity for doing so. There was no body more capable of doing so than the body they had themselves created for that purpose. It had been complained that that body had done little or nothing. They had, however, accumulated a large mass of useful and necessary information on the subject, and if they had done little the fault lay with the House of Commons, which declined to give them the necessary power, and then shackled them with the Government veto. If proper power had been lodged in the proper hands, this work would have been undertaken long since. The future consideration which the right hon. Member for Oxford University had spoken of, should be given by the body charged to carry out this measure. If they should prove incapable, he believed it would be because the thing could not be done. He should give his cordial support to the Bill.

MR. PULLER said, he agreed that if the Metropolitan Board of Works had hitherto proved a failure it was because Parliament had not entrusted it with sufficient powers. He thought that the Government were entitled to the thanks of the House for grappling with a subject of enormous difficulty, but he thought that they had produced the wrong measure. At the same time he must deny that the charge of inaction could justly be brought against the House of Commons if they did not sanction the present Bill. That House was not the proper or a competent authority to decide on the value of competing schemes, and therefore, he must protest against any attempt to throw upon them the responsibility of the question. The Bill in effect said, that the plan of Mr. Bazalgette and of the Metropolitan Board of Works should be carried out. Now, that scheme professed to be capable of being carried out for £3,000,000, but to require an annual expenditure of £150,000. The scheme of the Government referees would require for its execution five or six millions. When, therefore, the Government proposed to lend the Metropolitan Board of Works £3,000,000, it was clearly implied that the cheaper but less comprehensive scheme was to be carried out. If, at the end of a few years, the Metropolitan Board of Works came to Parliament for a larger advance and were met with a proposal to lay an increased rate on the metropolis, they would reply that the Government had forced them into the adoption of a bad plan, and that they ought, therefore, to defray the additional outlay thus rendered necessary out of the Consolidated Fund. For these reasons he should move that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

The Amendment, for want of a seconder, fell to the ground.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he hoped that the House would agree to the second reading of the Bill, because its rejection would postpone to an indefinite period the possibility of applying a remedy to an evil the magnitude of which it was almost impossible to exaggerate. He spoke not merely of that evil which the members of that House had in their persons recently experienced, but of the more general and growing evil which arose from the pollution of the waters of the Thames; for, in proportion as the metropolis increased and drew a larger supply of water for its requirements from the Upper Thames, in the same proportion the Thames became from year to year nothing but a great sewer, and like a sewer stank, and would be the source of disease and pestilence. Therefore it was a matter of the utmost importance to prevent for the future the discharge of the sewage into the Thames. He knew that many people said that no doubt it was disagreeable to smell this stench, and that persons were sometimes made sick by it, and were unable to eat white-bait dinners when they went down to Greenwich. He hoped that the members of the Government would not be so situated on Saturday next. Nevertheless, there had been no great amount of disease, for, fortunately, there had been no epidemic in London; but, if there had been the cholera at the time this stench arose, would any man say that it would not have aggravated to an intense degree the disorder? Hon. Gentlemen were not aware of the amount of misery and suffering endured by a large proportion of the population of this great metropolis from the imperfect drainage of the localities in which they resided. When he was at the Home Office it was his lot to hear from persons who resided north of the Thames, in the neighbourhood of Hackney Brook, descriptions of the sufferings they endured from the stench which arose from the sewer, and also from the flooding of their dwellings when there was a heavy fall of rain. On the southern shore of the Thames, also, there was a vast population living in a district where there was no drainage at all, and where there was no outfall, except during a very short period at low water. Whenever there was a heavy fall of rain the sewers of that district were inundated; abominations of all kinds were driven back from the sewers into the basement stories of the houses, and an amount of suffering and discomfort was caused of which hon. Gentlemen who had not received communications from those who had endured it could form no conception. These evils could not be cured by deodorizing tanks, which required great outfall tunnels. Hon. Gentlemen must not imagine that there was any remedy for the great evils now experienced in the metropolis, except from intercepting sewers communicating with tunnels which would carry the drainage down to some lower level of the Thames. He confessed he thought the Bill was defective with regard to the subject of intercepting tunnels. In his opinion Barking Creek and the opposite shore were too near the metropolis, and money expended in carrying tunnels to those points would, to a certain extent, be thrown away. Complete relief would not be afforded to the metropolis by the expenditure of 3,000,000; and if tunnels were constructed to Barking Creek the Metropolitan Board of Works would have to come to Parliament and say, "You sanctioned this work, but by limiting the expenditure you forced us to adopt a plan which is essentially and radically defective, and therefore, on the part of the public, we call upon you to assist us by grants of public money to carry the sewerage to another point, in order to accomplish the object we wish to effect." He thought, therefore, it was most unfortunate that the Government should persist—if they meant to do so—in limiting the outfall of the intercepting tunnels to a point so near the metropolis as Barking Creek and the opposite side of the river. There was another point not immediately entering into the arrangements of the Bill, but to which he must express his hope that the attention of the Metropolitan Board of Works would be speedily and successfully directed; the possibility of converting to agricultural purposes, as manure, the vast amount of matter which was now discharged into the Thames. There could be no doubt that, if the proposed system were carried out, a great quantity of fertilizing matter would be thrown into the stream of the Thames, with the view of being carried out to sea. It must be admitted that hitherto no process had been suggested by which that fertilizing matter could advantageously and profitably be applied to agricultural purposes, beyond a very narrow limit of space, but he entertained a hope that before long some practical mode might be discovered by scientific chemists of converting into a source of great national wealth the matter which it was now proposed to throw into the waters of the German Ocean. He trusted that the House would assent to the second reading of the Bill, and that Her Majesty's Government would attend to the suggestions which had been made with reference to the modification of some of its clauses.

Mr. COX said, that as a metropolitan Member, representing a district, the residents in which would have to pay a very large proportion of the rate, he wished to say a few words with respect to this Bill, although he did not mean to oppose the second reading. He thought that a revision of the area of rating was absolutely required, because under the Metropolitan Local Management Act very extensive districts in the neighbourhood of the metropolis derived benefit from the existing law, and would enjoy the advantages of the Bill before the House, although they were entirely exempted from any rate. He did not wish to mention any particular districts, but he might state, that in the neighbourhood in which he resided there was a very large parish, the sewage from which passed through the metropolitan district, and was discharged into the Thames, but which, not being comprised within the metropolitan area, was entirely exempted from rating. He believed also that the Bill, in its present form, might lead to disputes between the Metropolitan Board of Works and the Commission of Conservancy of the Thames with regard to the mode of dealing with the foreshore; but that was a point which might be more conveniently considered in Committee.

GENERAL CODRINGTON said, that in his opinion the only chance of anything being done was to allow the second reading to take place, and make the requisite alterations in Committee. He would, however, suggest, that as the Bill proposed the appointment by the Treasury of an engineer to control the expenditure of money upon the works, and he would suggest that the appointment of a Government inspector to prevent the creation and continuance of nuisances would be attended with great advantage. He must also object to the proposed plan of sewage, on the ground that, owing to the proximity of Woolwich to the point of outfall, the tide might carry the sewage to that town. This, he thought, would not be unattended with danger.

MR. BUTLER said, he deemed it most unfair that his constituents and the heavily taxed ratepayers of the metropolis should alone bear the enormous cost of purifying the Thames—the principle was a just one, that those who contributed to foul the waters of the Thames should be rated for its purification. Why, for instance, should not the inhabitants of Richmond, Brentford, and other districts bear a fair proportion of that rate? In his opinion, the area of rating prescribed by the Metropolitan Local Management Act was most unjust, and he hoped the injustice would be remedied in Committee.

Bill read 2°, and committed for Wednesday.

HARBOURS OF REFUGE.

OBSERVATIONS.

On the Order of the Day for receiving the Report of Ways and Means,

MR. WILSON said, he had given notice that he would call the attention of the House to the Report of the Committee on Harbours of Refuge, as he had intended to press upon the Government the propriety of appointing a Royal Commission for the purpose of concluding those inquiries which the Committee did not feel itself competent to enter into. He understood, however, that the right hon. Gentleman (Sir J. Pakington) did not object to grant this Commission, and he would not, therefore, waste the time of the House at that late period of the Session by making any lengthened remarks on the subject at present.

SIR J. PAKINGTON said, he had read the interesting and important report presented by the Committee over which the hon. Gentleman had presided, and thought the reasons adduced in it were quite sufficient to justify the appointment of a Royal Commission. The hints contained in the report were of extreme value, and could not be fully or satisfactorily acted upon without the assistance of a Royal Commission to inquire into the exact locality of the harbours, and fix upon their sites. It was, therefore, the intention of the Government to appoint such a Commission.

MR. LIDDELL said, there were the circumstances of trade at various ports, and the capabilities of different places, which must all be accurately weighed and considered before the Commissioners could come to any decision. The limits within which the Committee had confined its inquiries were too narrow, and the principles it had laid down not sufficiently clear and comprehensive to serve as a useful guide to the proposed Commission. He therefore hoped the Order of reference would be large and full, and that the Commissioners would not be restricted from taking that evidence which was necessary to enable them to arrive at a fair and just decision with regard to the different localities where Harbours of Refuge were thought to be required. The subject in itself was of immense importance. A thousand lives a year, and a million and a half of property were lost on our coasts through causes which were in the main preventible. One grave question for the Commissioners to settle was, whether the saving of life and property would be better accomplished by the construction, at a large expense, of one or two new harbours, or by making advances for the improvement of a larger number of existing harbours.

MR. A. SMITH said, he was glad, as a member of the Committee in question, to hear that the Government would agree to the appointment of a Royal Commission. He trusted the Commissioners would be most carefully selected, and that no person who had been examined before the Committee would be appointed a member.

MR. DODSON said, he wished to express his gratification at the readiness of the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty to appoint a Royal Commission to inquire into this important subject. At the same time, he would beg to remind the Government and the House of the necessity of considering the state of our southern and eastern coasts, which, being opposite to the northern coast of France—the latter being well supplied with forts and arsenals—required the most careful attention. The harbours recommended by the Committee differed from those, the construction of which had been previously suggested by Commissions, in this, that they had almost exclusively in view the protection of our commercial marine from the dangers of shipwreck. The Committee, therefore, recommended that a portion of the expense should be borne by the shipping interest itself; but he hoped their views would not be allowed to interfere with or postpone the works at Harbours of Refuge which were intended for the protection of our coast in case of war, and which were already in progress.

MR. INGHAM said, he participated in the satisfaction felt by the House at the consent of the Government to grant a Commission. He feared, however, that there was some ambiguity in the recommendation of the Committee. They recommended the appointment of a Commission to inquire into the best situations for Harbours of Refuge within the limits indicated, but those limits were not clearly pointed out, and for that reason he thought it incumbent on him to impress on the Government the necessity of issuing their instructions to the Commission in the clearest and most comprehensive terms.

MR. WILSON said, he had abstained from making a statement to the House upon the subject under discussion that evening, simply in order to facilitate the despatch of the business upon the paper. He hoped, therefore, hon. Members would refrain from expressing any opinion with respect to the question until he was enabled to bring it more fully before the House.

MR. M'CANN said, he entertained a similar view in favour of the postponement of the discussion.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he thought it very likely the members of the Committee up-stairs present that evening were as numerous as they would be on any future occasion when the subject might come on for discussion, and that there was, therefore, no good reason why they should refrain from at once expressing their opinions with respect to it. For his own part, he must express a hope that the Commission about to be appointed should consist of the most competent persons, and that the order of reference should be of a more extended scope than would seem to be warranted by the evidence which was taken before the Committee, and which was of a most imperfect and desultory character. There were three branches of the question of Harbours of Refuge, all of which required full consideration. There were military harbours, being those which were erected solely for strategic objects; harbours for the shelter of commerce, and harbours for the protection of our fisheries, and unless funds were granted sufficient to construct Harbours of Refuge in these three branches, it was of little use issuing a Commission. It was quite appalling to think that there were lost annually on our coasts more than 800 lives and two millions of property, the greatest portion of which might be saved by the expenditure of a sum which was really a trifle as compared with the result expected. The great increase, too, in the shipping of this country — an increase of about 130 per cent within the last few years—added much to the urgency of the question.

MR. BENTINCK said, that this most important question was always trifled with in that House. He did not mean anything disrespectful to the members of the Harbours of Refuge Committee when he said that although they had been sitting for the last two years, yet, from the fact of the majority of them not being conversant with nautical affairs, they were not in a position to come to a sound conclusion on the matter referred to them. There was an enormous amount of life and property sacrificed every year for want of proper Harbours of Refuge, and yet year after year the House was going on appointing Committee after Committee. This was nothing short of a broad farce and a trifling with the lives of thousands. He hoped that the Commission now about to be appointed would be one competent to deal with the subject, so that something satisfactory and definite might result from its labours.

MR. DUFF said, he would strongly support the recommendation that no person who had given evidence before the Committee should be appointed on the Commission.

WITHDRAWAL OF BILLS.
QUESTION.

MR. LABOUCHERE expressed a wish to know whether the Government meant to persevere with the Chinese Emigration Bill, and a hope that if such were the case it would be brought on this week, as it was likely to lead to considerable discussion.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he trusted the finance accounts would for the future be laid upon the table of the House at a period of the Session when they could be more conveniently discussed than had hitherto been the case.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Arrangements have already been made in order that the necessary financial accounts may be laid upon the table as early as possible; but as preparation and an alteration in arrangements which have long existed must precede the production of these accounts, I cannot speak with certainty on the matter. Her Majesty's Government have given their earnest attention to the recommendations of the Public Moneys Committee; and these recommendations will lead to alterations in the transaction of public business. With regard to the question put by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Taunton (Mr. Labouchere) to my right hon. Friend the Secretary for the Colonies, I must observe that the Bill to which the right hon. Gentleman referred is to come from the Lords, and our attention must, I think, be devoted in the first place to those Bills which have to go up to the Lords; but I think I may say that we shall not press that Bill on the attention of this House this Session. There is another measure of great importance, which I regret to say I cannot ask the House to decide on this Session, though I shall take the earliest opportunity of asking them to sanction it next Sesssion—that is, the Superannuation Bill. I promised the hon. Member for Devenport (Mr. Wilson) that I would communicate with him with respect to this measure; and I take this opportunity of informing him that I shall not press it at present. There is another Bill which is of importance, and which I trust will be, on an early occasion, brought before the House, but which, I think, I cannot, consistently with the rules laid down by the House of Lords, ask this House to proceed further with this Session—the Irish Police Bill. These are the only announcements I have to make with respect to the public business.

Resolutions agreed to.

CORNWALL SUBMARINE MINES BILL.
COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made and Question proposed—"That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. A. SMITH said, that the reason he objected to this measure was that its real object was quite different from that professed by its title. The subject ought to be regarded in two aspects: first, in reference to the Crown revenues; and secondly, to the great foreshore question, which had created much agitation throughout the country for many years. In his opinion the Bill was calculated to increase the great dissatisfaction that had been felt in consequence of the manner in which the claims of the Crown had been pressed in the mining districts. He some time ago moved for the production of the arbitration and the documents upon which the decision of the arbitrator was founded, and the Secretary of the Treasury of that time promised, as soon as a third point, which was still pending, was decided, they should be produced, and it was also stated that no legislation would be attempted in the meanwhile. Nevertheless the documents laid upon the table included nothing but a few letters of reference with comments, and contained none of the statutes, charters, cases, or arguments upon which Sir John Patteson had founded his award. He contended that without such information the House was not justified in confirming the arbitration of any individual, however eminent, which took away from the Crown valuable property in which the public, during the present reign, at all events, had a beneficial interest; and also that other persons, whether bodies corporate or individuals, who might have to enter into similar contests, had a right to have the benefit of knowing on what evidence the Crown claimed, particularly as that evidence had been collected at the public expense. The Bill spoke of mines between high and low-water mark; but property of a much more extensive and valuable character was involved. It was said that the right to such mines involved the right to the fundus or bed of the river or estuary, and the power of disposing of the foreshore, so that the probability was, that the minor right would be held hereafter to carry with it the major. This had been done before; and in the case of the Keyham Docks, where the public had rights of fishing and other rights, those rights had been taken by the Crown without compensation. There were many similar instances where public rights had been invaded, and indeed it was only last year that the Duchy of Cornwall derived a considerable income in this way. It was remarkable that they never heard anything about the rights of the Crown to the bed of a river, or to land between high and low-water mark on the shore of the sea, when there was anything to pay, but only when there was something to be received. If improvements were required the public had to pay for them; but if advantages were to be had, the Crown claimed them. Again, he must demur to the position that minerals in the bed of the sea belonged to the Crown, because it had been settled that anything which was found upon the surface, although under water, belonged to the finder. It also had become a serious question whether the wastes on the sea shore and in estuaries ought not to be considered in the same light as waste lands, and be treated in the same manner; for where there were wastes in a manor in which the public had certain rights, Parliament always gave a compensation when it deprived the public of their rights. Judge Bayley and his commentator Mr. Woolrych, both laid it down that the foreshore was placed in the hands of the Crown, not for its own benefit, but as a trustee for the use of the public. He was moreover inclined to think that the present Bill contemplated something more than mere mineral rights, from what he observed in the 9th clause, where he found this expression — that mines and minerals should comprehend all mines and minerals, and all quarries, veins, beds of stone, and all substrata whatsoever. Now, that, he thought, was an acknowledgment of a right which would be very prejudicial to the owners of property on the sea shore. He had taken up this question solely on public grounds. Scarcely anybody in Cornwall knew anything of the provisions of the Bill, not even legal gentlemen, and he asked the Government whether it was just to bring in such a Bill at the fag-end of the Session. There could be no damage to any one from delay, and he would therefore move the Amendment of which he had given notice.

Mr. WHITE seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,—

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words, "this Bill, to declare and define certain rights of the Crown, in the beneficial interests of which the Public are concerned during the reign of Her Majesty, as part and parcel of the hereditary revenues, ought not to be proceeded with till such times as Copies of all the Documents, Cases, and Opinions of Counsel submitted to Sir John Patteson, and on which his arbitration is founded, are laid on the table of this House," instead thereof.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL said, that he should be wanting in courtesy to the hon. Gentleman if he did not explain the history of the measure, which was simply as follows. Primâ facie, the whole of the soil, and every thing under the soil, between high and low water mark on the shores of the kingdom, belonged to the Crown; and in numerous instances that right had been granted away, or passed to individuals by adverse possession against the Crown. In the case of the Duchy of Cornwall the difficulty had been this—that very large grants were made of the soil and shore to the Prince of Wales in the time of Edward III. by charters, and great difficulty had always arisen with regard to the construction of those charters. That doubt had been further increased by innumerable dealings which had since taken place between the Crown and the Prince of Wales in the shape of statutes, other charters, and deeds of various kinds. In consequence it had in recent times become matter of extreme uncertainty whether, as regarded the soil between high and low-water mark, and even below low-water mark, in the Duchy of Cornwall, the rights to minerals was in the Crown or the Duchy. In the year 1856 it was considered desirable that these doubts should be resolved, for it was found that the existence of doubts had had the effect of putting an end to various kinds of improvement, and checking mining operations. The consequence was that the mines along the shore of Cornwall remained entirely unproductive. In this state of things Lord Cranworth, as representing the Crown under the late Government, and Mr. Pemberton Leigh, as representing the Duchy, considered that it would be unseemly for the two interests to enter into litigation in the ordinary courts of law, and they agreed to request Sir John Patteson to take the very great trouble of reading over all the documents in this case and give his award. Sir John undertook the task, in February 1856, and from that time to June, 1857, when he made his award, he paid to the subject the most unremitting attention; all the charters, grants, and other records extending over many thousands of folios, and which the hon.

Gentleman, not content with results, was anxious to have laid in extenso upon the table of the House, being examined and considered by him. On reading over the award, however, it was found desirable before final arrangements were made for carrying it out, that a further question should be submitted to the arbitrator and settled. In February this year this point was also decided. The rights of the relative parties were determined—those of the Crown to the soil of the bed of the river and the minerals below, and those of the Duchy to the shore between high and low water mark and the minerals below. But as to reach the mines of the Crown it was necessary to pass through or over the property of the Duchy, Sir John Patteson suggested that an arrangement should be made for that purpose, which arrangement this Bill proposed to carry out. The hon. Member said there was no great pressure on the subject, and that it might be delayed till the next year. He could assure the hon. Member that there was very great pressure, as the mines were now remaining wholly unproductive, and besides there were scores of men who were anxious to purchase these rights or to settle disputed claims. He could also assure the hon. Member the rights of no single individual in the kingdom were affected by this Bill; it concerned the rights of the Crown and of the Duchy alone, and there was a saving clause most carefully drawn securing the rights of every person except those in dispute between the Crown or the Duchy. But then the hon. Member said that the Crown sacrificed its own rights. Now the Crown had given up no rights except such as Sir John Patteson declared it had no right to possess. The Consolidated Fund lost nothing, for, in fact, in consequence of these disputes, the mines in question had remained all along unproductive; but now those rights that had been awarded to the Crown would be made available, and their proceeds brought into the Consolidated Fund. Under these circumstances he hoped the hon. Member would not offer further opposition to the Bill.

MR. WYLD said, he thought the explanation of the Solicitor General was perfectly satisfactory, and he believed if the Chancellor of the Exchequer carried out the promise he made on a former occasion with respect to it, that it would prove of great benefit to the county of Cornwall.

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question," put, and agreed to.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee.

House resumed.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered To-morrow.

JEWS' BILL.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MR. KNIGHTLEY said, he did not rise to oppose the House going into Committee, but he wished to made a few observations on the strange and anomalous position in which they found themselves. If the House of Lords were desirous of agreeing to the admission of Jews to Parliament, it would have been better if they had agreed to the Bill which that House had sent up to them. He had opposed the clause in that measure relating to the Jews, but he must say that if the question was to be conceded, he thought it could not have been done more satisfactorily than by the adoption of the courteous and conciliatory clause proposed by the noble Member for the City of London, and he regretted that that clause had not been accepted by their Lordships. Instead of that the House of Lords had sent down this queer odd measure — this sort of Irish compromise — in which one party conceded everything and the other gave up nothing; and which left everything as unsettled as ever. The House of Lords in fact said, we are as opposed as ever to the unchristianising of the Legislature, but if the House of Commons wish to do so they may; and they sent down to that House this Bill, and at the same time, which seemed to be the climax of absurdity, they sent down five excellent Reasons why the Bill should not be passed, and having done so they washed their hands of the whole business. It seemed to him that this was a position which was wholly untenable. He might as well give a latch key of his neighbour's door to a well-known burglar and point out the way to the plate chest, and think himself free from responsibility because he read him a holy homily on the heinousness of breaking the eighth commandment. He should be sorry to go before a British jury in the hope that he would not be considered an accessory before the fact. In his opinion, the House of Lords were in the position of accessories before the fact. When a foreign nobleman came to that table as a representative of the City of London, and took an un-Christian oath, the guilt and responsibility would rest upon the House of Lords. Of course with the consciences of the House of Lords he had nothing to do, but he objected to this Bill, that it settled nothing. The House would no doubt see Baron Rothschild take his seat this Session, but the Resolution which permitted him to do so would last only during the present Parliament. He was convinced that when another appeal was made to the country the question would all be unsettled again. It appeared to him that the House of Lords had only carried a hypothetical Jew Bill, and having abandoned the whole question of Christianity, it was idle to fight for a shadow. Supposing that Her Majesty should summon Baron Rothschild to a seat in the House of Lords, he would have sat in the House of Commons as the representative of the greatest city in the world, and he would go up to the bar of the other House with the patent of the sovereign in his hand; would any one tell him that the House of Lords could refuse to admit him? Would the free admission given to the choice of liverymen of London be refused to the choice of the sovereign? Suppose the House of Lords refused to admit Baron Rothschild, the only result would be a direct collision between the Crown and the other House—the thing of all others in the world most to be deprecated. He would say that if they conceded the whole principle that Members of that House might take the oaths at the table without the words "On the true faith of a Christian," the Bill did not go far enough in the cause of civil and religious liberty, for he did not see why, if Jews were admitted to sit in Parliament, Mahomedans should be excluded. They believed the whole of the Old Testament; and, more, although they denied the divinity of our Saviour, they believed him to be a good man and an inspired prophet; whereas the Jews believed him to be an impostor; so that if there was to be any distinction it ought to be made ratherin favour of Mahomedans. He was opposed to all measures for admitting Jews to Parliament, but of all the measures with that object, that which had received the sanction of the Earl of Derby, the Prime Minister of England and the leader of the Conservative party, was in his opinion, the very worst that was ever submitted to the consideration of the House.

MR. GILPIN said, that he had no doubt the views expressed by the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down were shared by a large majority of that House. He regarded this Bill as a miserable compromise, and he only accepted it as the best that could be got, and as for the present answering the purpose of those who wished to admit the Jews to Parliament. Those who were desirous of admitting the Jews to Parliament advocated their claims as a question of principle, and hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite opposed it as a question of principle, and now there was thrown among them, with an entire ignoring of principle, this miserable subterfuge, and he was not sure that it was creditable to any party to accept it. If he had not felt that there was something more than personal feeling, at stake, he should not have thought it worth while to accept it even rather than to get nothing. He was almost inclined to prefer to postpone this question to another Session, and fighting it out upon principle, instead of agreeing to this unsatisfactory mode of settling such a question. All that could be said was, that it was a little better than nothing.

MR. BENTINCK said, he concurred in the observations of the hon. Member for Northamptonshire (Mr. Knightley) with respect to this Bill. Hon. Gentlemen opposite said that this was the best Bill that could be got; and if so, considering the great majority by which it was carried in both Houses, bad was the best. As so little had been said on this measure—as they were about to un-Christianize the Legislature without discussion—he should like to ask one or two questions. Did the House recollect that this was no settlement of the question at all? Every time a Jew came to the table to take the oath there must be a new Resolution passed, and in every new Parliament the question must be revived. He was not urging this as an objection to the Bill, because he believed the result would be that before many years, when the people were fairly represented in this House, there would be a vote in this House against the Jews; but he would say that the present proceeding was neither satisfactory nor creditable to the House. They had heard a great deal of the determination of this House not to be dictated to by the House of Peers. But what was the position of this question now? The House of Peers told the House of Commons—"We retain all our objections to the admission of Jews to Parliament; we believe that they are not fit to sit in the council of the nation, and we will not admit them to our House; but if you, the House of Commons, choose to un-Christianize your benches, we wash our hands of the matter, and leave you to make the best of it." Was that a dignified position for this House to be placed in? What, on the other hand, was the position of the Jews themselves? The House of Lords told them—"We will not admit you to our House, but if the House of Commons choose to allow you to contaminate them"—[cries of "Oh!"]—he was merely giving expression to the sentiments which would seem to be conveyed in the proposition of the House of Lords, and not using language of his own—"if they choose to admit you, they may do so." Could anything be more insulting to the Jews; It was an aggravated insult both to the House of Commons and the Jews. What he objected to, and what he regretted, was the want of consistency and foresight of those in "another place" in thus dealing with this question. The argument which was urged in favour of that inconsistency was, that if the Jews were any longer excluded from Parliament, there would be a danger of a collision between the two branches of the Legislature. That, however, was an argument which, in his opinion, was absurd, as he did not believe that there was any such danger. He believed the House of Lords might have gone on for a century to come rejecting the claims of the Jews; and if they had persevered in that consistent course, not only would there have been no feeling in the country against them, but their views would have gained ground; for he believed that the feelings of the people were not represented in the House on this question, and that the feeling of the great majority was decidedly opposed to the admission of the Jews to a seat in Parliament. There was another point which he would not pretend to argue, but he looked on this proceeding as a gross infringement of the rights of the Crown, and he should like to hear that point argued by persons competent to deal with it. Another class of persons were unjustly dealt with by this measure, and a clause had been handed to him with a request to move it in Committee; and his only reason for not wishing to do so was, that he did not desire to mix himself up in a matter so little creditable to all concerned in it. Otherwise he believed that the clause would be accepted by those who were in favour of civil and religious liberty by acclamation. It proposed to give the same liberty to all classes, and it proposed to add to the first clause the following words:—"Be it further enacted, that the provisions of this Bill be extended to all Turks, heretics, and infidels of every grade." [Cries of "Move!"] As he had said, he was not prepared to move at all in such a discreditable matter as this, but he would be ready to vote for such a clause, as he contended that the House was bound in justice to include Turks and heretics, and infidels, in the Bill. ["Hear, hear!"] He was glad to perceive, from the manner in which that sentiment was received, that the clause was likely to be so popular, and he should gladly place it in the hands of any of those hon. Members who cried "Hear, hear!" In conclusion, he would compliment the noble Lord (Lord J. Russell) on the part he had played in this matter; and he only hoped the noble Lord's own reflections, and the part he would play in the eyes of posterity in relation to this question, would be as satisfactory as he could wish.

MR. SPOONER said, the House was placed in a most extraordinary position. They were asked to go into Committee on a Bill in favour of which no one had said a single word. On the contrary every one had condemned it. The noble Lord opposite said it was not his Bill, and only agreed to it because it carried out the object he had in view. What was that but saying that the "end justifies the means," and was that to go forth to the country as the principle on which that House acted. This measure was a great disgrace to the other branch of Parliament, and an insult to the House of Commons. The other House asked this House to agree to a measure every word of which they reprobated, and which was only accepted because it carried out the object in view. If the Jew came into Parliament he did so with the declaration of the House of Lords, that he was "morally unfit" to legislate for the country. It was strange that the noble Lord (Lord John Russell) had not favoured the House with his views on the constitutional part of the question. The noble Lord ought not to have been silent on that point after the challenges he had received. He would ask the noble Lord whether it was constitutional for one House of Parliament to ignore the other? The House of Commons had not been consulted in the matter. It was dangerous for the two Houses to begin to act separately by Resolution; and no one knew where such a course was to end. He particularly wished to hear, and he hoped the noble Lord would state, whether according to his views of the constitution, they in that House by themselves and without the consent of the upper House and the Crown, could take on themselves to say who was to sit in that House. In Committee he should move an Amendment to the first clause, reserving to the Crown the right of "veto," and enacting that every Resolution of this nature should be submitted to the Crown for its sanction.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, that at the request of the hon. Member, and for no other reason, he would state his view of the question to the House. The hon. Gentleman seemed to think the House was now bound to proceed by a Resolution of its own and to seat Baron Rothschild or any other Jewish member without any authority of law. Now, if this Bill passed, the House of Commons would clearly be acting under the authority of an Act of Parliament which the House of Lords had already sanctioned, and to which they hoped the Crown would also assent. In the case of Mr. Pease there might be some doubt, but in this instance there could be none whatever. It was not for him to defend the Bill of the House of Lords; but he did think the Earl of Derby, as the head of the Conservative party, was entitled to more respect than he seemed to receive from many Conservative Members in this House.

Motion made and Question put, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair.

The House divided—Ayes 144; Noes 40; Majority 104.

House in Committee.

Clause 1.

MR. VERNON SMITH said, he wished to ask whether the object of the Bill could not be accomplished by better means than those proposed in the Bill? In the early part of the Session they had followed what he thought was a bad precedent inasmuch as the Oaths Bill they had sent up to the Lords did not afford to Roman Catholics the same advantage which was intended for Jews. In 1849 he had proposed to make one form of oath, but was then met by the argument that it would be imprudent to mix up the Roman Catholic question with the Jewish question. As the Bill now stood, taken in conjunction wih the Amended Oaths Bill, there must be a fresh Resolution for each person, whereas he thought that it would be preferable to have one general Act applicable to all cases. Any other course would be only giving a veto to that House, to admit favourite persons, and would not be carrying out the principle of religious liberty, for which they were contending. For they did not maintain that there was any great advantage in having five or six gentlemen of the Jewish persuasion in that House. If this was to be considered a bargain with the Lords, he should not ask the House to break it, for he was desirous to see the Jews in this House, though he would rather see them introduced in some other manner than that they should be smuggled in in this manner. But if there were no such bargain, he would suggest that they ought to make the Resolution one which should be applicable to all cases. In conclusion, he would suggest that the words referring to the Oaths Bill should be struck out, and that the noble Lord should not press the notice he had given in reference to the Lords' Amendments of that Bill.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, with respect to the objection that the form of oath did not apply to Roman Catholics, he would remind the Committee that that House had decided against such form as he wished to adopt. As to the necessity of a fresh Resolution being passed in each case, he did not at all agree with the right hon. Gentleman; but, on the contrary, he believed that when any Jew came to the table to be sworn and declared he had a conscientious objection to the form of oath, it would be in the power of the House to declare that thenceforth every Jewish Member might take the oath without the words "on the true faith of a Christian." The words in the present Bill were framed upon the Oaths Bill as sent to the House of Lords, and if they were to be framed according to the Oath of Abjuration, objectionable terms relating to the Pretender must still be continued. He considered that the object they had in view would be attained by this Bill, and that any Jewish Member duly elected might come to the table and avail himself of the provisions of the Bill.

MR. WILSON remarked that the Bill was not in the same state as when it passed the second reading in the House of Lords. In the original Bill the words were:—

"That if any person professing the Jewish religion shall have a conscientious objection to take the Oath of Abjuration in the terms required."

On the third reading, for the purpose of compelling this House to accept another Bill, which it had already refused, and which it could not accept without assenting to reasons which were inconsistent with the step which it was now taking, these words were substituted:—

"Objection to taking the Oath which by an Act passed, or to be passed in the present Session of Parliament, has been or may be substituted for the Oath of Allegiance."

He did not think that the course which the noble Lord now proposed to adopt would get rid of the difficulty, because, if they accepted a Bill which they had once rejected, they would make themselves parties to the Reasons which were given for its acceptance; and he should be quite prepared to vote for any Amendment which would restore this measure to the shape in which it stood when it was read a second time by the House of Lords.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, that as the Bill originally stood it provided that a person professing the Jewish religion might omit the words "and I make this declaration on the true faith of a Christian." It was truly observed that these were not the words contained in the Oath of Abjuration as sent up from this House, those words being "I make this acknowledgment heartily, willingly, and truly, upon the true faith of a Christian." To remedy that inconsistency the House of Lords might either have put in the words which actually were in the Oath of Abjuration or have referred to the Bill. They adopted the latter alternative, and as that oath had been adopted by this House after considerable discussion, and he thought that any question as to its simplification might well be deferred, he could not admit any such Amendment as that suggested by his hon. Friend.

MR. SPOONER said, he moved a Proviso at the end of the first clause. If this Act passed, a Resolution of one House of the Legislature might in future become law without being liable to the veto of the Crown. He admitted that the Crown might give its veto to the Bill, but if that were not done, the power of placing a veto upon a Resolution of that House would be gone. The present appeared to him to be a most unconstitutional proceeding; and he hoped that some of those who had the constitutional duty and privilege of advising the Crown would point out to Her Majesty the danger of such a principle as that which this clause laid down. As a protest, he would move the insertion of the following proviso, at the end of the clause, without, of course, under existing circumstances, any expectation of its being adopted:—

"Provided always, that such Resolution shall not be acted upon until the consent of the Crown be signified to both Houses of Parliament."

Proviso negatived.

MR. STUART WORTLEY said, he wished to give notice that upon the Report he should call attention to the fact that the provisions contained in this measure were made dependent upon the passing of another Bill.

Clause agreed to, as were the remaining clauses.

House resumed.

Bill reported, without Amendment; to be read 3° To-morrow.

GOVERNMENT OF NEW CALEDONIA BILL.

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

Clause 1,

MR. GLADSTONE said, he rose, not to trouble the House with any formal Motion, but to state some objections to the structure of the Bill, and upon a matter of principle to which he attached great importance. This measure constituted a Royal Government in New Caledonia without free institutions, and then provided that at a future period Her Majesty might, if she thought fit, establish such institutions in the colony. There were two opposite ideas as to the proper mode of founding colonies from this country, one of which was true and the other false. The true mode was that which was historically the oldest. It was that upon which our earliest colonies were established, and which was only abandoned when exceptional circumstances began to mark the origin of our Colonies—when they were founded for the purpose of receiving, not free colonists, but convicts. It was natural enough that in such colonies there should be an absolute Government; but, unfortunately, having taken to this defective principle in deference to necessity, we extended it to cases in which it had no application, and, instead of limiting it to penal colonies, made it a model and founded all our Colonies upon that rule.

Hence grew up a miserable spawn of most mischievous opinions with regard to our colonial policy generally. The opinion prevailed that as it was natural, or at least useful, for a child to be carried in the arms of a nurse for twelve months, so it was natural for a colony to be dandled for a term of years in the arms of the Imperial Government, in order that it might, by a process which was called education, be fitted for freedom; the fact being, on the contrary, that the longer you applied a government of that sort to a society of free men the more you unfitted them for freedom. He had hoped that the controversies of the last twenty-five years, and the Bill passed by the present First Lord of the Admiralty in 1852 for the government of New Zealand, had exploded these fallacies; and he was sanguine enough to believe that the next time we dealt with a colony of free settlers by Act of Parliament we should, like our ancestors in the seventeenth and even in the eighteenth century, recognize it as a free and self-governing society. He regretted that in this instance that mode of procedure had been departed from, and that this Bill began by establishing a society which was not free, and then provided that at a future period free institutions might, if it was thought fit, be introduced into it. He wished the Government could be prevailed upon to embody in this Bill the principle that we were about to establish a free society. It might be said that in this colony of New Caledonia we should have a mixed and promiscuous population, of irregular habits, uncertain objects, and various origin, and that on that account it would not be right that the colony should be founded with free institutions at the outset. He was sceptical with regard to the gist of that argument, because he was afraid that if it was difficult to maintain the public peace in this new colony, if there was likely to be a considerable charge attending its foundation, the evils would be greatly aggravated by placing the responsibility in the hands of the Executive Government, especially when we considered the enormous distance at which they were to wield their powers. At the same time he was prepared to repose confidence in the Executive Government upon that subject, and to throw upon them the responsibility of suspending, if they thought fit, the establishment of free institutions. But he wanted that that should be done in deference to a distinct necessity, of which the Executive Government were to be constituted the judges, and with respect to which Parliament should hold them responsible, and require them hereafter to show for every year and every month during which free institutions were not established that there was an absolute necessity for postponing them strictly connected with the exceptional circumstances of the colony itself. If, therefore, the Government had chosen to frame their Bill in such a way that it should begin with the establishment of free institutions in principle, and should then grant to the Crown a special discretion, strictly limited to peculiar circumstances and a sufficient cause, of suspending their action, he, for one, would not have objected; but that was not a course which had been adopted. Anybody who read this Bill, knowing nothing of our colonial history, would suppose that it really expressed our normal ideas with respect to the foundation of a colony, and that our notion was that a colony should be founded as a community unfit for freedom. Moreover, the power given to Her Majesty to establish free institutions was expressed in a manner so vague that it did not imply any special duty in the Crown or the Minister to give an early development to freedom. He could not help expressing regret at the form in which this Bill had been conceived and framed. Although for a length of time we had been steadily advancing with regard to our colonial policy, and although the public mind at home had arrived at something like a general settlement as to the true principles by which it ought to be regulated, now, when an Act of Parliament was to be passed recording our present ideas, it was one which, instead of carrying them forward, actually appeared to carry them backward.

Mr. LABOUCHERE said, he fully agreed in the general principle laid down by the right hon. Gentleman. He believed that the practice of allowing a colony to start with free institutions and grow up with them was the best means of insuring its prosperity. When in office he had acted on that principle in the case of Vancouver's Island. There was at that time so small a population that free institutions were but a name, but he thought that as population increased that name would become a reality. It was doubtless not necessary to remind the right hon. Gentleman that an Act of Parliament was not necessary for the establishment of free institutions in our Colonies. By the common law of England, an Englishman carried the constitution with him everywhere, and the constitution existed in every colony. The three estates were represented—the Crown by the governor, the Commons by an elective body, and the Lords by a nominated council, and that form of government he believed to be the best. But really, under circumstances so very peculiar as those of the c ny of New Caledonia, they must not shut their eyes to the dangers that would arise from giving free institutions at once. The main attraction was the gold, which was about 300 miles from the coast. The population, which would there be established at a distance from all communication, would be the outpourings of California itself, not a very regular society. Not long ago free institutions had to be suspended in California, and it was only by a sort of Lynch law that any sort of order was maintained. There was also great danger of conflicts with Indian tribes, which were used to find their rights respected, and the settlers would not be of a class likely to respect those rights. The colonial government of England had been often blamed, but most unjustly, for he questioned if any other country in the world ever had a better system. In the colony of Victoria, peace and order prevailed, whereas, in California, under a Republican form of Government, the Executive was almost powerless and in such a state that Lynch law had to be established. A comparison, therefore, between that State and Victoria, where, under our more liberal system, there was very little disturbance, and that little speedily quelled, they would afford a strong argument in favour of our old-fashioned colonial institutions. With regard to the frame of the Bill itself, he thought great credit was due to the Government. They had provided wisely for times of emergency and he should feel it his duty to give them his support. He wished, however, to draw the right hon. Gentleman's attention to the third clause, which purported to give Her Majesty in Council power to establish any constitution which she might think fit in New Caledonia. Now it was one thing to give the Queen, under special circumstances, power to establish something like an arbitrary government there; it was altogether another thing to give the Queen in Council power to establish any constitution she might think fit. As he read the clause it appeared to give the Queen in Council power to establish institutions, which should be permanent institutions, for the colony, by order in Council, without coming to this House. That, he thought, would be most objectionable. He thought it ought to be either the old constitutional form, or one which should be submitted to Parliament and approved by them.

MR. ROEBUCK said, he thought that a mistaken notion was entertained respecting the peculiar power of the Crown. The Crown had authority by charter to give what power it pleased with respect to government, so that, in fact, the Crown, without the aid of any Act of Parliament, could give any institutions it pleased to the colony. That could be shown by past history. He might take the cases of Maryland and Rhode Island, in the latter of which there was one Council, and in the other two Councils, while in Carolina a complicated system of government laid down by Locke was established by charter, but afterwards abandoned. The present Bill would expire in four years, and therefore the Colonial Secretary would be bound to provide for the expiration of the Bill. It was probable that by that time New Caledonia would contain a large population. In 1849 he proposed to frame a Bill with the view of laying down general principles as a guidance in respect to colonial government. That proposition was rejected by the House, but he thought that they would have done well to lay down some general principles beforehand. In the present Bill there was nothing that might not be done without it, and he therefore thought that the House was spending time to no purpose in discussing it. The Bill stated that certain institutions might be given to the colony, but he conceived that it would have been better to make it imperative that at the end of three years representative institutions should be given, so that nothing might be left to the Colonial Office. Not having done that, the Bill did nothing. It would be much better to give the colony free institutions to-morrow than to leave a doubt as to when it should have them. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Labouchere) was under a mistake when he drew a comparison between California and Victoria. California had a peculiar population drawn from all parts of the world. The whole ragamuffin population of the whole universe went there; and, notwithstanding that, if the right hon. Gentleman turned his attention to the constitution they drew up for themselves he would be struck with its great wisdom. It was a model constitution, and the only difficulty consisted in the population. There would be the same population in New Caledonia,—quite as bad, if not worse,—and he would warn the Government to be prepared with a stringent force to coerce the population there, and then to be prepared, also, with a constitution for their government.

Sir BULWER LYTTON said, that whatever fell from the right hon. Member for Oxford University was deserving of consideration, and he was glad the right hon. Gentleman had had an opportunity of expressing his views on this subject. It would, however, have been a fairer course to have done so on the second reading of the Bill, or at any rate to have given an earlier intimation of the important alteration he had suggested, for the present was not an optional experiment in colonial legislation. The intelligence received from the colony of New Caledonia was such as to leave the Ministry no choice but to endeavour to establish, as soon as possible, a Government for a district which was threatened with great danger, and which, up to this moment, had no legal Government at all. The necessity for this measure manifested itself in a few days after he acceded to office ; and his anxious desire, seeing the great perils which surrounded the district, had been to frame a measure that should pass as rapidly as possible, and conciliate all opposition. Well, the Bill he brought in was supported by hon. Gentlemen of great weight in the House, who had taken much interest in the foundation of the colony. It went through a first reading with the general approval of all the hon. Gentlemen who spoke ; passed a second reading with equal unanimity ; in Committee received one or two verbal alterations only ; and would have been read a third time had it not been recommitted to allow the right hon. Gentleman to express his opinion upon this clause. After the Bill had gone through so many of its stages with indulgent favour, the House could hardly go back and accept a proposition that would entirely change its complexion and character, and reverse the provisions which had been so unanimously agreed to. Their first object must necessarily be to give all the power they could to the only authority at present in the colony—the Governor ; but if he were to accept the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman, the consequences would be that the Governor would not have the same power that he had under this Bill. Considering the great uncertainty which prevailed with regard to this colony, the next consideration was to make the Bill as pliant as possible to meet all the necessities of circumstances which we could not perceive. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Labouchere) objected to the third clause. Now, it certainly was the object of the Government that the colony should receive representative institutions within four years, if there were materials for creating them in the colony. Supposing, however, a settled population were rapidly formed, the Government might then be advised to constitute an elective chamber or council, and by Order in Council it could at once be established. He felt the force of what the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield had said with respect to the importance of maintaining a sufficient military force in New Caledonia, but that force must necessarily be to some extent limited by the accommodation and the provisions which could be procured for the troops, and under such circumstances he thought it was of more importance that that force should be efficient than that it should be large. He should have some observations to make on this subject at a subsequent period, but he hoped that as the Bill had been so far favourably received, the House would give a further assent to the measure by allowing it to pass through Committee.

Mr. ROEBUCK said, an hon. Gentleman had asked the other night what the colony would cost. In his opinion it ought to cost nothing, and he believed that if certain portions of the colony were surveyed, if a site were selected for a town near the gold diggings, if town and country lots were planned, and if they were offered for sale in London, a sufficient amount would speedily be obtained for the maintenance of the colony.

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clause 2.

In reply to a question from Mr. Butt,

The SOLICITOR GENERAL said, the Bill provided that the laws established by the authority of the Queen should continue in force for a period of four years ; but if free institutions were established, it would be in the power of the colonial assembly to alter, amend, or abrogate any laws which might have been established by the Royal authority.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 3,

Mr. LABOUCHERE said, he wished to know whether he understood this clause aright, that it gave to the Crown the power of establishing any constitution it might think proper without the sanction of Parliament. If so, he thought it was a novelty and one of a very unconstitutional kind. He quite understood and approved of the arbitrary Government, if he might so call it, which this Bill established in the first instance, but the Crown could establish no other. By the common law every Englishman carried with him to the most distant colonies the representation of our own constitution, and nothing short of that could be established except under the authority of Parliament. He thought the clause should be struck out.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL reminded the right hon. Gentleman that this Bill established in the first instance, as he said, an arbitrary Government, and what this clause contemplated was an abrogation or relaxation of those arbitrary powers. But the short answer was, that all that was done under this Act would be liable to be revised and reconsidered when it came to expire four years hence.

MR. ROEBUCK contended that, supposing this clause were struck out, the Queen would still have the power to give a constitution by charter, and without coming to Parliament, and in proof he referred to the constitution of Rhode Island, which was constituted by Charles II, with only one legislative chamber. He was not aware that either Act of Parliament or custom had since taken away the right of the Crown, which had been exercised so lately as the settlement of the colony of Georgia, the last of the American colonies that was planted by this country.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL was understood to say, that the Crown certainly might grant a charter and appoint a Governor and Council, but the power of taxation should come from the people to be in accordance with the constitution of this country. After four years, if necessary, Government might come to Parliament to establish any other constitution which the Governor and Assembly might agree to recommend.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, it was quite impossible, after the expiration of four years, to establish a constitution under this Act, as powers were given only during the continuance of the Act, the Crown could grant any form of government which it thought fit by charter, but it could not grant the power of taxation by charter. This Bill was framed upon the Acts relating to West Australia and other colonies, in which, under the same words, the right of taxation was conferred. It was one of the reasons why the Government came to Parliament; but there was another reason which seemed to have been overlooked by the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield —namely, that at present Canada possessed certain jurisdiction which would clash with the jurisdiction given by this Bill.

Clause agreed to, as were the remaining clauses.

Preamble agreed to.

House resumed.

Bill reported, without amendment; to be read 3° To-morrow.

CIVIL BILLS, ETC. (IRELAND), ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read. House in Committee.

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clause 2.

MR. J. D. FITZGERALD said, he wished to move an Amendment, the effect of which was to prevent assistant barristers being removed by an Order in Council. Superior Judges could be only removed by an Address from both Houses of Parliament, and he proposed to place the inferior Judges in the same position.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that the Amendment was out of order. They were dealing not with the superior Judges, but the assistant barristers.

MR. J. D. FITZGERALD said, he would, of course, take the law from the Chairman.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE said, he wished to know what was meant by the words "permanent infirmity."

MR. WHITESIDE said, that the Act provided a retiring allowance to assistant barristers in the case of permanent infirmity; and the meaning of these words was incapacity to discharge the duties of the office personally. The phrase occurred in an existing Act; but he would alter the clause, so as to give the Lord Chancellor the power of certifying to the Privy Council that an assistant barrister was incompetent to perform his duties on account of a permanent infirmity; and to make the Lord Lieutenant in Council, after hearing counsel for the barrister, to decide on the question of his removal.

MR. BRADY said, that he still feared that there might be vague and uncertain decisions, under the clause, of what constituted permanent infirmity.

MR. WALPOLE said, he thought that the definition was well understood, and that no difficulty would arise.

MR. P. O'BRIEN observed, that he preferred the constitutional remedy of removal by an Address.

MR. BUTT remarked, that it was much more humane to the individual for the Lord Chancellor to certify that an assistant barrister was incapacitated by permanent infirmity, than that his physical and mental incapacity should be brought before both Houses of Parliament. Moreover, the penalty held over the head of the assistant barrister was, after all, not a very terrible one. At the worst a man could only be sent into retirement with two-thirds of his salary.

MR. ROEBUCK said, that the Bill only gave the Lord Chancellor the power of certifying to the Privy Council that an assistant barrister was incapable of performing his duties, and the Privy Council was then empowered to take steps for the removal of the individual in question. Now, there might be an unscrupulous Lord Chancellor in Ireland, and as the Privy Council was summoned at will by the Government of the day, there was no sufficient provision for the independence of the Judge. He did not think, therefore, that this was a tribunal that would conciliate the confidence of the public.

MR. WALPOLE observed, that the case put was worthy of consideration. He had no objection, in such a case, that the clause should be so amended as to require that on such an occasion all the members of the Privy Council should be summoned.

COLONEL FRENCH said, as the opinion of the people of Ireland was opposed to this change, he hoped that this provision would not be insisted upon. At present, no Bill was necessary to remove incapable Judges, as the Government already possessed the power to do so.

MR. COGAN saw no reason why this power of removal should not be extended, so as to include the superior Judges. He wished to have an instruction given to the Committee to that effect. And in order to effect his object, he moved that the Chairman do report progress and ask leave to sit again.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that such an instruction could not be given to the Committee.

MR. MAGUIRE said, the Government ought to be satisfied with carrying the Bill with one clause; and in a short time there would be no danger of having incapable men sitting upon the bench in Ireland. Give a man the certainty of retiring with two-thirds of his salary, and there would be no danger of any man in a state of infirmity remaining on the bench.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE said, he regarded the office of assistant barrister as altogether an anomaly, and on that ground he was wholly opposed to the Bill, as well as for the reason that the House was increasing the pensions of the old and effete as a bribe to get rid of them.

SIR WILLIAM SOMERVILLE said, he must oppose the clause, as he believed that there was scarcely a single argument having reference to the assistant barristers which had not equal reference to the Judges.

Motion for reporting progress negatived.

MR. COGAN said, he would move an Amendment to the effect that seven days' notice of meeting should be given to the members of the Privy Council.

Amendment agreed to.

Question put, "That the clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

The Committee divided: — Ayes 98; Noes 50: Majority 48.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 3 struck out.

The House resumed.

MR. COGAN proposed a clause to allow the Lord Chancellor to make the appointments from barristers of seven years' standing, instead of ten years. This would assimilate the law to that of England.

MR. WHITESIDE said, the Government could not accept the clause.

MR. J. D. FITZGERALD advised that the clause should be withdrawn and brought up again on the Report.

Clause negatived.

MR. FITZGERALD said, that on the bringing up of the Report he should move the recommittal of the Bill, in order that it might be extended to the Judges of the Superior Courts.

House resumed.

Bill reported, as amended, to be considered To-morrow.

POLICE FORCE (IRELAND) BILL.

WITHDRAWAL OF BILL.

Order for resuming adjourned debate [8th July] read.

COLONEL GREVILLE said, he wished to ask for the production of the correspondence affecting the character of Mr. M. O'Ferrall.

LORD NAAS said, he was surprised to hear that it was supposed that any aspersion was ever cast, or intended to be cast, on Mr. O'Ferrall. Had there been any imputation upon that Gentleman, there would be no objection to the production of the correspondence, but as none had ever been made or intended, it would serve no purpose to accede to the hon. Gentleman's request.

MR. J. D. FITZGERALD said, he wished to give notice that early next Session he would move for a Select Committee to inquire into the Dublin police force.

Order discharged.

Bill withdrawn.

CHELSEA BRIDGE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.—CONSIDERATION.

Order for consideration read.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY asked, whether there would be any objection to extend the exemption from toll now accorded to foot passengers on Sunday to Easter Monday and Whit Monday?

LORD JOHN MANNERS had no objection to the proposition.

Amendment agreed to.

Bill to be read 3° To-morrow.

House adjourned at half-after Two o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, July 20, 1858.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1ª Railway Cheap Trains, &c.; Inclosure of Lands; Legitimacy Declaration; Sheep, &c., Contagious Diseases Prevention; Turnpike Acts Continuance; Public Health; Vaccination (Ireland); County Property Conveyance.

2ª Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction Continuance; Charitable Trusts Acts Continuance; Turnpike Trusts Arrangements; Copyhold and Inclosure Commissions, &c.; Indemnity; Administration of Oaths by Committees; Army Service.

3ª Copyright of Designs; Militia Ballots Suspension.

SALE AND TRANSFER OF LANDS (IRELAND) BILL.—COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee read.

Moved, That the House do now resolve itself into a Committee.

LORD ST. LEONARDS said, that before the House went into Committee, he wished to address a few words to their Lordships. As they were all aware, this Court was originally established at a time when Ireland was in great distress, and that that country had experienced the greatest benefit from a tribunal which had enabled the owners of incumbered estates to give such a title as rendered them marketable. It was now by this Bill proposed to extend the powers of the Court to estates that were not incumbered. He protested against the establishment of any such principle. But whether it were right that the State should enable a vendor to give an unimpeachable title to a purchaser or not, certainly a court of this kind ought to maintain itself, for it was not a court for the administration of justice, but whose object was to furnish good titles to land. He wished to ask, whether under the present Bill it was proposed that the Judges should themselves investigate the titles, whereby, as regarded the professional investigation of titles, the whole bar of Ireland would be thrown over, or that they should merely superintend the matter, and that a conveyancer should be resorted to, to say whether there was a good title or not? By the present Bill, a person was empowered to go into Court and demand that his title should be investigated. Such a system was very different from the principle of the laws of England and of Ireland—a great object of both laws being to take care that a man's estate should not be taken away from him behind his back. When he, for the purpose of facilitating the transfer of land, asked their Lordships this Session to shorten the period of limitation with regard to titles generally to thirty years, they were perfectly shocked at the proposal to bar all adverse claims to an estate on the expiration of so short a period. But what would become of the existing salutary limitation when this Bill passed? The statute that gave that limitation would become mere waste paper, and might be thrown into the fire. Under this Bill a man would go to the Court and ask for a title. He would pay the duty, and obtain a certificate which gave him a good title; but having got it, instead of selling, he kept the estate. Some time afterwards a claimant turned up whose title was clear and unquestionable beyond all doubt. If this Bill became law, however, his claim would be barred in five minutes, for the other person would produce his certificate, which would be a good title as against all comers. He must say, that such a provision would revolutionize the whole law of property, and, although he had no doubt that the Bill would pass, he solemnly protested against the interference with private rights which it would sanction, without the slightest necessity being shown for the measure. He much regretted that Ireland was always made the subject of exceptional legislation. The same laws which obtained in this country with respect to property ought, in his opinion, to prevail in Ireland also; for so long as the practice of exempting Ireland from general legislation was persisted in, so long would she continue to stand in an isolated position with regard to the laws of property, which if they were good for England were, as a general rule, good for Ireland also. Objecting, as he did, most conscientiously to this measure, and regarding it as a mischievous attempt to subvert all the rights of property, he should take no part in any endeavour to improve it in Committee, but should content himself with this simple protest against the further progress of the Bill.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he was sorry he had not been fortunate enough to hear all that had fallen from his noble and learned Friend, inasmuch as on a subject of this kind his noble and learned Friend's advice would be invaluable. He would, however, take this opportunity of explaining to their Lordships the nature of the Bill. It might be described generally as a Bill to facilitate the transfer of land, and to simplify the title to land in Ireland. For many years past there had existed the greatest desire to discover some plan by which land might be transferred without the necessity of going through the long and tedious process of reinvestigating the title from a very early period—some mode by which "a Parliamentary title," as it was termed, might be conferred upon the purchaser, which might serve as a kind of terminus from which only it would be necessary to proceed in any future investigation of the title. Various schemes had been devised for this purpose; but ultimately a state of things arose which made it imperative that some proposal should be brought into practical operation. In the year 1849 a large amount of land in Ireland had become so deeply incumbered that it was quite impossible for the owners to deal with it at all, or to perform those duties which ought to be discharged by the owners of property. In this state of things the Legislature took a bold and decided step, and they passed a Bill establishing a Court for the sale of Incumbered estates. It was apprehended that by forcing on the market a great quantity of land the value of land would be depreciated, and in order to counteract that and to hold out a bounty to purchasers, a Parliamentary title was conferred upon the purchaser, beyond which it would be unnecessary to go in dealing with the property at any future time. The wisdom of the measure was proved by experience, for it was found that, in consequence of the Parliamentary title that was obtained, four years' additional value on the average was obtained for the land sold under the Act. Property to the amount of millions had passed through the Court, and he believed that only one complaint had been made of any improper dealings with the title, or of any acts prejudicial to the rightful owner. In many instances the owners of unincumbered estates created incumbrances in order to obtain a sale through the medium of the Court. The working of the Court had been subjected to the ordeal of a Royal Commission and of a Select Committee of the other House, both of whom recommended that its powers should be extended, and that instead of dealing with incumbered estates only, it should have the like power of dealing with unincumbered property, and giving a Parliamentary title. His noble and learned Friend (Lord Cranworth) acting upon the recommendation of the Committee of the House of Commons, introduced a measure during the present Session, which received the sanction of their Lordships' House, and was sent down to the House of Commons. The object of that Bill was the same as the present — there was a difference only in the machinery — his noble and learned Friend proposing to give the business to the Court of Chancery while the present Bill proposed to establish a new court on the model of the Incumbered Estates Court to deal with the subject. Their Lordships might be said to have given their sanction to the principle of the measure — the giving a Parliamentary title to the sale of unincumbered estates, and therefore he anticipated the support of his noble and learned Friend to this Bill. There was a portion of the Bill, however, which went further than the Bill of his noble and learned Friend, as to which it would be necessary for him to say a few words. An inquiry was instituted in the year 1857 into the question of registration of title. The Commissioners who reported on this question recommended that there should be established a judicial investigation of title, giving to the owners of unincumbered estates the same advantages as were possessed by the owners of incumbered estates. This would complete the measure and put both the two classes of owners on the same footing; for, as he had already stated, the advantages of a Parliamentary title were equivalent to four years' purchase; unless a similar provision were made the owners of unincumbered estates would be under this disadvantage, that if they wished to sell their land they went into the market with their estate depreciated in value as compared with the owners of incumbered property. Ireland possessed very great advantages and facilities for the investigation of titles, which were not possessed to the same extent by this country. There were Registration Acts in Ireland, under which every deed must be registered, whether it were of a sale, a transfer, or an incumbrance. These registers enabled any one to see what was the course of the title. But it might be said, perhaps, that a fraudulent owner might obtain an unjust judicial decision in his own favour, by concealing a deed which would be evidence against the party entering into such investigation, but against no one else. Fraud would continue, if possible, to evade or overcome every contrivance that the wit of man could devise; but there would certainly be this security, that however easily perpetrated in the case of a private sale, there was less danger of it in the case of the publicity which attended the proceedings of this Court, where there must be notices, advertisements, and every precaution which human ingenuity could devise against its perpetration. He asked why should this advantage be given to a purchaser and not to proprietors of land? It might be said what would prevent an owner of land from making a sale to a trustee in order to obtain the value of a Parliamentary title. But why should the owner of land be put to this circuitous mode of obtaining this advantage? What danger could there be in allowing a judicial investigation of unincumbered estates of the same description as that which had taken place with regard to incumbered estates? He understood his noble and learned Friend (Lord St. Leonards), the whole of whose argument he (the Lord Chancellor) was unfortunately unable to hear where he sat, to object altogether to that part of the Bill which related to unincumbered estates, and, as he presumed, to that which related to a judicial title. He understood his noble and learned Friend also to object to the arrangement which had been proposed for defraying the expenses of the Court; but it must be remembered that the calculations upon which it was hoped the Court would be self-supporting were founded upon this part of the business of the Court; and if this class of business were removed from the proceedings that source of emolument must fail. The only objections, as far as he understood, were on the 51st clause of the Bill —a clause which had been inserted on the recommendation of the Commission, and which appeared to him to be a necessary completion and complement to the measure he was then proposing to their Lordships. He had considered the measure very carefully since he had learned the nature of his noble and learned Friend's objections, and he felt perfectly satisfied that it was a measure which it was very desirable for their Lordships to adopt, and therefore he should take his stand upon the clause which he supposed would be the battle-field between his noble and learned Friend and himself.

LORD CRANWORTH said, he believed it to be unnecessary to assure their Lordships that the Bill with some Amendments would have his most cordial support, since it was substantially the same in principle as the measure which he had the honour to lay before their Lordships early in the present Session, and which passed their House by a majority of one. No doubt there were objections in theory to the original constitution of the Incumbered Estates Court. It might be said that in selling an estate under the supervision of a tribunal they were running the risk of overlooking the right of some one not in possession, who, when the estate was sold and the money paid away, might be deprived of the rights which the law ought to have protected. This was the objection in theory to an Incumbered Estates Act, but it was entitled to very little weight. The fact was that a great deal of land in Ireland was held under such enormous and complicated incumbrances that the owners never had the means of performing the duties of proprietors. After the Incumbered Estates Act had been in operation with the most beneficial results, it was found that estates with a Parliamentary title sold for so much more than others, that the more prudent portion of the landed proprietors of Ireland, who had managed their estates well, had to sell them at a disadvantage, because they could not give a Parliamentary title. This state of things was pressed upon him in the first year of his acceptance of the Great Seal, and with the consent of his colleagues he issued a Royal Commission. The late Lord Chancellor of Ireland was at its head, and amongst its members were Lord Justice Blackburne, Chief Justice Monaghan, the Master of the Rolls for England, Sir Richard Bethell, the present Solicitor General, and Mr. Commissioner Longfield. They found that in principle there was no reason why unincumbered estates should not be as safely sold with a Parliamentary title as incumbered estates. They therefore recommended that the distinction between them should cease, and that the tribunal should have the same power of giving an unimpeachable title to incumbered and unincumbered estates. The only question was as to the machinery by which the recommendations of the Commissioners should be carried out. For his own part, he preferred the machinery of the Court of Chancery, and thought that if they constituted a new Vice Chancellor's Court for this class of cases it would act with all the weight of the Court of Chancery, and do away with the necessity for the reference to that Court which now existed; and this proposal of his was strictly in accordance with the views of the Commissioners. When, however, he looked to the provisions of the 51st clause, he must say he considered the measure was so far one of unmixed mischief. He could scarcely hope to change the opinion of his noble and learned Friend (the Lord Chancellor), but he felt bound to express his opinion. The proposed power of giving an owner a right to apply for a declaration that his title was indefeasible, could have no other effect than to defeat the rights of third parties; for what honest purpose could a man who intended to retain possession of his estate ask any tribunal to say that he had a title which nobody could touch? Whenever he wanted to sell, the Court, would have power to give a Parliamentary title to purchasers, and that was all that was required to make his land fetch its highest value in the market. If he intended to retain the possession, his only object in asking for a declaration of title must be to defeat dormant rights. In the Bill which he (Lord Cranworth) had introduced, he proposed that the money should be distributed by the Court; and if any portion of it was paid over in fraud of a third person, the party receiving it should be held to be a trustee for the person rightfully entitled. He believed the new power given by the 51st clause was calculated to produce evil without any corresponding advantage, and so that it was calculated to damage the Bill and affect its popularity. That was, however, the only portion of the measure to the principle of which he objected, although he disapproved of some minor details. He should, of course, not object to going into Committee, but he feared there would be little use in his dividing against the 51st clause.

THE EARL OF WICKLOW said, it appeared to him that this Bill differed very materially from the Incumbered Estates Act, inasmuch as that Act only gave power to sell one particular kind of estate; but this Bill enabled proprietors to dispose of unincumbered estates, and also enabled them to do so without having any intention of selling, but for the purpose of obtaining a Parliamentary title. The Bill went beyond the Incumbered Estates Act, and, so far, he disapproved of it. There was to be a charge of £1 per cent payable to the Court on the value of an estate before a Parliamentary title could be obtained, and he asked how was that value to be ascertained, as the value of land varied in Ireland from five to ten years' additional purchase according to the county in which it was situate. He confessed he thought it would be far better to leave the 51st clause out altogether.

THE EARL OF CLANCARTY said, he did not think a landed proprietor, animated by the natural desire to hold that which he was justly and legally entitled to, could be fairly chargeable with the design of injuring the right of any other person by going to the Court for a Parliamentary title under the provisions of this Bill. In another view of the case, it was important that facilities should be given to persons in possession for raising money for the improvement of their estates; but, as the law now stood, parties declined to come forward and lend money for that purpose in cases where the title was in the least disputable. He had formerly been opposed to the facilities being increased for the transfer of land from hand to hand; but he had of late years witnessed so much of the good effects arising from estates in the west of Ireland changing hands that his opinions in that respect had been considerably modified. Where such changes had taken place they had generally been from hands which were utterly incapable of improving the land to those under which it had become fertile, and now afforded an example of the progress of agriculture in Ireland. He was happy to hear that the general tenor of the Bill had been approved by the noble and learned Lord opposite (Lord Cranworth), and he looked forward to the great advantages which would result from its passing into a law.

Motion agreed to.

House in Committee accordingly.

Clauses 1 to 50 agreed to.

Clause 51.

On Question, whether the said clause shall stand part of the Bill?

The Committee divided :—Contents 29; Not-Contents 10: Majority 19.

Resolved in the Affirmative.

Clauses 52 to 67 agreed to.

Clause 68.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE moved an Amendment, relative to the appointment of rent over the land, or charging the whole or any part thereof; and making such appointment binding on the Crown and every corporation or person.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 69 to 88 agreed to.

Clause 89, which empowered the Lords of the Treasury to invest from time to time unproductive cash, being the proceeds of sales lodged in the Bank of Ireland under the provisions of the Act.

LORD MONTEAGLE inquired why this power should be vested in the Lords of the Treasury, instead of being exercised by the heads of the Court in the same way as similar funds were dealt with in other cases?

THE EARL OF DERBY said, that in the first instance all the expenses of the Act were charged upon the Consolidated Fund; but, on the other hand, all the receipts arising out of the Act were to be repaid to the Consolidated Fund in diminution of the original outlay. The unproductive balances lying in the Bank of Ireland were sometimes very large, amounting occasionally to as much as £1,000,000, and it was the duty of the Treasury, as the guardians of the Consolidated Fund, to see that those balances should be properly invested.

Clause agreed to.

Remaining clauses agreed to.

Report of Amendments to be received on Thursday next.

MEDICAL PRACTITIONERS BILL.
COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee, read.

Moved, That the House do now resolve itself into a Committee.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, that it was probably too much to expect that this Bill would please everybody; but almost all the leading medical corporate bodies in the kingdom were, with very little difference, agreed in its favour, with the exception, he was sorry to say, of the College of Physicians. The state of things which it was the intention of the Bill to remedy was very anomalous. They had a variety of medical interests existing throughout the country, each, mutatis mutandis, with a separate and distinct jurisdiction. The College of Physicians claimed an exclusive privilege seven miles round London, and the College of Surgeons and Apothecaries' Hall claimed similar privileges with regard to conferring power on practitioners; and they existed together with similar institutions in Scotland and Ireland without any reciprocity whatever. The most eminent Scotch physician had no right to practise in London; the most eminent physician had no right to practise in Scotland, and the same question arose regarding Irish practitioners. The Bill before their Lordships would tend to remove those complications and anomalies that had grown up in the course of centuries. The Bill was no destructive Bill, because, while it remedied existing anomalies and evils, it kept alive the twenty-two corporate bodies that now existed in this country. Its further object was to improve the position of the medical profession, to infuse fresh life into these institutions, and to preserve them in their efficiency, besides instituting a complete reciprocity between them. To effect this it proposed to establish one General Council of Supervision for the kingdom, with branch Councils and Subordinate Committees. The Council would have the power of investigating and determining as to the standard of examination. The Council would have the controlling and regulating power over the working of the system, and there would be a virtual power of suspension by appeal to the Privy Council. The Bill contained an important provision relative to the much-desired power of registration, for which at present there was no official means of reference. The Bill, he thought, would be productive of great benefit both to the medical profession and to the public.

LORD EBURY said, the ostensible object of the Bill was to remedy the anomalies that at present existed in the medical profession of this country; but the real effect of it would be to secure a monopoly to these various associations. The only petitions in favour of the Bill had come from the medical bodies themselves, and not from the qualified practitioners. It was, in point of fact, a doctors' Bill. He should object to clauses in Committee. What, he would ask, was the state of the practice of medicine in this country? They were going by this Bill to confer a monopoly in the practice of medicine in this country upon persons who themselves said that they had no confidence whatever in that practice. What said Dr. Bailey just before he died—"He feared that he had done more harm than good." What said Dr. Chalmers in his funeral oration over Dr. Williams? Why, that he had no confidence in medicine. What said Dr. Forbes? Why, that the present practice of medicine was so entirely unsatisfactory that he hoped some new school would be set on foot. In the Bill before the House they were going to confer a monopoly of the medical practice of this country on a set of men who declared they had no confidence in the system.

Motion agreed to.

House in Committee accordingly.

Amendment moved, and negatived.

Amendments made; the Report thereof to be received on Thursday next.

GOVERNMENT OF INDIA BILL.

AMENDMENTS REPORTED.

Order of the Day for receiving the Report of the Amendments read.

Amendments reported accordingly.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH moved, that the word "alone" should be inserted in the second clause after the words "government of India," so that it should be made evident that the expenses of the government of India were paid out of the revenues of India alone.

Amendment agreed to.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, a proposal had been made in Committee that the Governor General of India ought to have the appointment of his own Council. He had promised to consider the question, and had now to state that, after consultation with those best qualified to judge, he found they were unanimously of opinion that the Governor General should not have the nomination of his own Council. He would, therefore, leave the Bill as it now stood in this respect, and he only mentioned the matter now in order that the noble Earl (the Earl of Ellenborough) or any other noble Lord might, if they thought proper to do so, re-open it on the third reading.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH moved, to insert words in Clause 52, empowering the Auditor specially to note in his audit from time to time any case, if any such there should be, in which it might appear to him that any money arising out of the revenues of India had been appropriated to other purposes than those of the government of India.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 66, which provides that all contracts, covenants, liabilities, and engagements of the Company made and incurred before the commencement of this Act, may be enforced by and against the Secretary of State in Council, in like manner as they might have been by and against the Company if the Act had not passed.

THE EARL OF DERBY proposed to include the word "treaties," which the terms "contracts, covenants, liabilities, and engagements" might not be thought to cover. He took that opportunity of stating, that at the commencement of those discussions, questions had been raised as to whether the saving clauses introduced into the Bill with regard to the East India Company were sufficient. His noble Friend opposite (Lord Monteagle) had since stated, that he had examined those clauses and thought they were calculated to secure all the rights and privileges of the Company. He ought, however, to mention that, within the last few days he had had placed in his hands some clauses which had been prepared on behalf of the East India Company, which he proposed to examine, and if he should find that any further provisions were required for the protection of the Company, he should be happy to move their insertion on the third reading of the Bill. But he apprehended, with his noble Friend (Lord Monteagle), that the saving clauses already embodied in the Bill would be found sufficient for the purpose.

Amendment agreed to.

Further Amendments made.

Bill to be read 3ª on Thursday next.

House adjourned at a quarter to Nine o'clock, till To-morrow, Four o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, July 20, 1858.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1° Factories.
2° Consolidated Fund (Appropriation); Militia Act Continuance; Militia (Servic Abroad) Act Continuance; Militia Pay; Ecclesiastical Commission.
2° Government of New Caledonia; Chelsea Bridge Act Amendment; Returns to Secretary of State; Law of False Pretences Amendment.

THE CASE OF THE CORMACKS.
QUESTION.

THE O'DONOGHUE said, he would beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland whether it is the intention of the Government to bring up Spillang as a witness on any future occasion.

MR. WHITESIDE said, that no criminal trial was at present pending in which it would be necessary to examine Spillang.

DIVORCE ACT AMENDMENT AND PROBATE ACT AMENDMENT BILLS.
QUESTION.

MR. HADFIELD said, he rose to ask the Attorney General when he intended to proceed with the Divorce and Probate Amendment Bills.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he had been very anxious to bring the Probate Act Amendment Bill and the Divorce Act Amendment Bill under the consideration of the House on some day during the last three weeks, but the House had been occupied with Bills which it was necessary to send up to the House of Lords. He would endeavour to make an arrangement with his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer for a day to consider the Bills, and he hoped that Thursday or Friday might be secured.

MR. GLADSTONE said, that the Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Amendment Act, which involved considerable novelty, would probably lead to a lengthened discussion. He wished to know whether it was the intention of the Government to proceed with the new clauses.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that it had not occurred to him that any of the clauses of the Divorce Bill were open to the observations just made. If it turned out, however, that any of the clauses note in the Bill, or any of the Amendments of which he had had notice either appeared to introduce any important change in the law or to be likely to give rise to much discussion or opposition, he should be quite ready to postpone the consideration of those clauses or amendments to a future session, merely proceeding with those portions of the measure which related to the procedure of the Court.

THE INDIAN REVOLT.—QUESTION.

MR. BUXTON said, he would now beg to inquire of the noble Lord whether, in the opinion of Her Majesty's Government, considering the great number of executions that have already taken place and the great slaughter of the enemy in battle, it would not now be desirable to offer a complete amnesty to all who will lay down their arms, unless they can be proved to have been present at the murder of Europeans?

LORD STANLEY: Sir—The observations which the hon. Member has addressed to me is rather in the nature of a suggestion than of an inquiry, and I think I shall best reply to it by reminding the House of the instructions which have actually, within the last few weeks, been sent out from this country to the Governor General in Council. On the 24th of March the Secret Committee — that is to say, my noble Friend Lord Ellenborough—addressed to the Governor General a Despatch, which has been laid before this House, and of which the most important paragraph is as follows:—

"To us it appears that, whenever open resistance shall have ceased, it would be prudent, in awarding punishment, rather to follow the practice which prevails after the conquest of a country which has defended itself to the last by desperate war, than that which may perhaps be lawfully adopted after the suppression of mutiny and rebellion, such acts always being excepted from forgiveness or mitigation of punishment as have exceeded the license of legitimate hostilities."

On the 5th of May the Court of Directors, adverting to the letter from which I have just quoted, addressed the Governor-General in a Despatch which has also been laid before this House. They say:—

"That letter emphatically confirms the principles which you have already adopted, as set forth in your circular of the 31st of July, 1857, by impressing upon you the propriety of pursuing, after the conquest of the revolted provinces, a course of policy distinguished by a wise and discriminating generosity. You are exhorted to temper justice with mercy, and, except in cases of extreme criminality, to grant an amnesty to the vanquished. In the sentiments expressed by the Secret Committee we entirely concur. While there are some crimes which humanity calls upon you to punish with the utmost severity, there are others of a less aggravated character which it would be equally unjust and impolitic not to pardon and to forget."

The Despatch defines the crimes with which the Governor-General would be called upon to deal in such a manner as to show that what was intended amounted, except in the case of aggravated offences, to an amnesty for political offences, reserving punishment for crimes of personal violence. The Directors go on to say :—

"As soon as you have suppressed the active hostility of the enemy your first care will be the restoration of public confidence. It will be your privilege, when the disorganized provinces shall no longer be convulsed by intestine disorder, to set an example of toleration and forbearance towards the subject people, and to endeavour, by every means consistent with the security of the British Empire in the East, to allay the irritation and suspicion which, if suffered to retain possession of the minds of the native and European inhabitants of the country, will eventually lead to nothing less calamitous than a war of races."

These are the instructions which have been sent out from the Government in this country. If they have not since the date of that Despatch been reiterated it is only because it seemed to us that their simple reiteration was needless, and that the good sense and good feeling of Lord Canning would incline him of his own accord to act upon the policy which is here indicated to him. In saying that I do not speak without evidence, because we have a Despatch, —it has not been officially received, but it has appeared in the newspapers — addressed by the Secretary to the Governor of the North West Provinces to the Commissioner in Rohilcund on the 28th of April. In that Despatch I find the following paragraph :—

"Further, in respect of treason, and defiance of British authority his Lordship desires that criminal proceedings shall be taken only against leaders, and against such persons, whether high or low, as have distinguished themselves by activity or rancour against the Government, or by persistence in opposition to its authority after the advance of troops and the reoccupation of stations. The Governor General will admit to amnesty all other classes, even though they have borne arms on the side of the rebels, provided that they tender an early and complete submission. But continuance in opposition will exclude from pardon."

That is the expressed policy of Lord Canning. What is the policy of the Government in this country I have already stated, and, if we have not sent out positive and peremptory orders that an amnesty shall be declared by a certain day it was simply because we were not willing, having confidence in the judgment of Lord Canning, to tie his hands by imposing upon him an absolute command to do a certain act at a time when we, considering the matter here, could not possibly foretell what the state of India would be. But as far as the intentions and wishes of the Government are concerned they have been as plainly intimated to Lord Canning as it was possible for them to be.

MILITARY PROMOTIONS.—QUESTION.

LORD ADOLPHUS VANE-TEMPEST said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he has any objection to state at what period any decorations or promotions intended to be bestowed by Her Majesty on such officers who have been recommended by the General Commanding in India will be made public?

GENERAL PEEL said, that the names of those officers who had been recommended for distinction would appear in that night's Gazette, and the honours would be conferred as soon as the Warrants were issued.

BURLINGTON HOUSE.—QUESTION.

SIR WILLIAM FRASER said, he would beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether he will consider some plan for removing the wall between Burlington House and Piccadilly, and for giving the public the advantage of the ground in the front and rear of that building.

LORD JOHN MANNERS stated, in reply, that some time ago the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho) submitted to him a design which had for its object the removal of the wall in question. Since then the whole subject of the appropriation of Burlington House and the grounds for the public service had been under the consideration of the Government, and until that larger question was settled it was impossible to say what ought to be done with respect to the wall.

HUDSON'S BAY COMPANY.
RESOLUTION.

Orders of the Day read, and, on Motion of the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, postponed till after the Notices of Motions relative to the Hudson's Bay Company and Bothina.

MR. ROEBUCK rose to move the Resolutions of which he had given notice respecting the territory and privileges of the Hudson's Bay Company. The hon. and learned Gentleman said that at this late period of the Session, he should feel it an unpardonable act on his part if he sought the attention of the House to anything that was not really important; but, as he believed that our interests as an empire were deeply involved in the question which he was about to propound, and as he knew that the Government desired some information as to the opinions of the House, he thought he had sufficient reasons for asking hon. Members to attend to the suggestions which he wished to make. The present state of the North American continent was a matter of great interest to England. That continent, as was well known, was divided among three possessors. The southern and most important portion belonged to the United States of America, which ran up to the northward until they met the dominions of England, which stretched from the Atlantic to the Pacific. England possessed the larger part of the continent, and her territory proceeded northward until it reached upon its western frontier the territory belonging to Russia, which formed a small portion in the north-west corner. In former days we planted colonies in that portion of the continent which he had first named. We originally planted thirteen colonies in that country. Those colonies declared their independence, and had since increased to the number of thirty-five or thirty-six independent States. We had created a power there which, if something were not done by England as a counterpoise to the United States of America, would overshadow not only England but the whole earth. He believed that in the northern part of the continent we had the means of establishing the counterpoise which he sought. If England would carry out a systematic plan of colonization upon that portion of the continent which now belonged to her she would enable the world to resist what he believed would otherwise be the predominant power of the Anglo-Saxon race now established in the United States. It was on this ground that he solicited the attention of the House to the few words which he wished to address to them. The English possessed that portion of the American continent which stretched from the Atlantic to the Pacific, north of the great lakes. Prince Edward's Island, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Lower and Upper Canada, were colonies when the English became possessed of the country, and since that time they had not created one new colony there, preferring to leave that portion of the continent, as we found it, in the distribution of the old colonies. In the meantime the Americans had increased from thirteen to thirty-six independent States, and from 3,000,000 population to very nearly 30,000,000; while all this time the English had remained idle, and though they had seen the Americans become one of the greatest nations, they, notwithstanding that they had the means, had effected nothing as a counterpoise to the Americans. He wished to see this state of things ended; but he was met by a curious observation. Canada—and with Canada he would alone deal—with a strip of land along the shores of the St. Lawrence, and in the reign of Charles II. certain persons asked and obtained from the Crown powers over certain portions of territory which they called the Hudson's Bay territory. At that time Canada belonged to France, and France was supposed to have dominion to the North Pole; but, with that curious habit which then belonged to all the nations of the earth with respect to wild lands, Charles II. dealt with these wild lands as if they belonged to nobody, and gave the Hudson's Bay Company power with respect to that territory and those wild lands. The Hudson's Bay Company applied to Charles II., in 1670, for a charter, and in the very words of the request the King granted their desire "to have the sole trade and commerce of all those rivers, creeks, straits, and sounds lying within the straits called Hudson's Straits, that are not actually possessed by any of our subjects or by the subjects of any other State." After this the history of the Hudson's Bay Company was very curious. For many years they did nothing; but an Act was passed giving them those lands and powers which were granted in the charter, but only for a definite term—thereby clearly imputing that when the Act of Parliament expired all power on the part of the Company over those lands would expire also. When Canada came into the possession of the English the energy of the English race stretched from Montreal, and carried a trade in furs and peltries up the river St. Lawrence to the wild territory west of Canada. This led to great opposition on the part of the Hudson's Bay Company, and great wars actually took place between the two Companies—the Hudson's Bay Company and the North-West Company—which no doubt would have shed glory on the belligerents if they had been known to historians. Then an astute and clear-headed man interfered, the right hon. Member for Coventry (Mr. Ellice), and he told the Companies that they were fighting a useless battle, and advised them to unite. They did unite, and by so doing they cheated the public. From that time to the present day they depended on the charter, declaring that they would do all they could to enforce the rights conferred on them. He (Mr. Roebuck) would at once say that he meant to bring no charge against the Hudson's Bay Company. They had done what by their nature, as a Company, they were called on to do; but he asked the House to consider the circumstances under which the Company acted. It was a fur company, and a fur company by its very nature was opposed to colonization. Where wild animals congregated, there man could not live; and the introduction of man as a colonist drove away the fur-bearing animals, and put an end to all fur companies. Therefore the Hudson's Bay Company, following up their own interest, had maintained the territory in its wildest state, and had kept out colonization. In this state of things he appealed to the House of Commons, and said that they had the means in their hands to advance civilization over an uncultivated territory, and to carry there all the arts and happiness and all the improvement in manners, laws, and religion which attend civilization, making the territory, what God intended it to be, a happy home for many millions of people. All this the House of Commons had in their power; but to such a consummation the Hudson's Bay Company, having a narrow interest, was opposed. He was told that the Hudson's Bay Company had certain rights which they derived under the charter granted by Charles II. He maintained that the Company had no such rights, and it was the duty of the Government to determine whether they had or no. If the Company had no such rights, Parliament would know how to deal with them; and if they had, Parliament would also know how to deal with them — by purchasing them out immediately. If they had rights, the Government ought to buy them out immediately, and if they had none, they had been illegally enjoying the territory for many years, and the sooner they were ousted the better. The first Resolution he should move was—

"That the privileges of the Hudson's Bay Company, about to expire, ought not to be renewed."

He ought to explain to the House that the privileges about to expire were not privileges claimed under the charter of the Company, but belonged to them by a grant from the Crown, which grant expired early next year; and he said to the Ministerial bench that these privileges ought not to be renewed. But, in order that the country might derive all possible benefit from the non-renewal of those privileges, he thought it proper that the rights of the Company under their charter should be ascertained, so that the whole of the land should be converted to the purposes of civilization, and the dominion of England be carried from the Atlantic to the Pacific. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir Bulwer Lytton) had brought in a Bill in the present Session to enable him to create a colony west of the Rocky Mountains. Perhaps the House were not aware of the fact that goods could be shipped in London, and carried without transshipment to the western shore of Lake Superior. This had been effected by rendering, among other things, the St. Lawrence navigable by great ships, and the English were now further across the great Continent of America than the Americans themselves. Although America had established a State on the Pacific called Oregon, he believed the line of route from Halifax to Lake Superior exceeded in extent any possessed by America. Taking the western side of Lake Superior to the Rocky Mountains, they would cut the new colony which the right hon. Secretary for the Colonies proposed to establish, and he believed plans had been laid before the right hon. Baronet for carrying a railway completely across the continent, so that a direct communication would be established between England and Vancouver's Island, by way of Halifax. This was a magnificent scheme. He believed the right hon. Secretary for the Colonies was ambitious of renown; indeed, he had already given to the world pledges of that ambition; and he would tell the right hon. Baronet that the man who carried out this scheme would have achieved greater things than even he (Sir Bulwer Lytton) had done for literature, and his name would be handed down to posterity as a great Colonial Minister. The accomplishment of such a scheme would unite England with Vancouver's Island and with China, and they would be enabled widely to extend the civilization of England. When he referred to the civilization of England, he wished it to be compared with the civilization of America, and he would boldly assert—here, in the House of Commons, where every word that was said travelled round the whole world—that the civilization of England was far above that of America. Why did he say this? Because the English were a free people; they were not contaminated by the infernal blot of slavery; and they would, as a free people, carry England's name, and England's laws, and England's literature across the whole continent of America. They afforded a refuge to the slave, and they exhibited to the populations they had planted in the more favoured portion of America a most striking example of greatness, goodness, and happiness. He maintained, then, that it was the duty of every man who wished well to mankind to promote to the utmost of his power this great project. He hoped the right hon. Baronet would take immediate steps to ascertain the legal rights of the Hudson's Bay Company, for when those rights were ascertained they would be enabled to compensate the Company. The next measure should be to plant a colony from the western shore of Lake Superior to the Rocky Mountains. And he entreated the right hon. Gentleman to carry out this object without delay. If that were not done, Minnesota would send her cohorts into the territory, and they would have to fight over again a boundary question similar to that which had arisen between this country and America some years ago. He therefore entreated the right hon. Baronet at once to bring in a Bill which would enable the Government to apply to the formation of a colony as much of the land now belonging to the Hudson's Bay Company as was suitable for such a purpose. His belief was, that if this country really fulfilled the great mission intrusted to her, she would establish English nations in Australasia, in South Africa, and over the whole of North America. It was formerly said that the language of Spain was spoken over a greater portion of the world than any other language; but if the scheme he pressed upon the Government were adopted, the English tongue, English laws, the English religion, and English literature would be predominant in the world. He believed this result would lead to the happiness of mankind; for he would venture to say without fear of contradiction that the English nation, as a nation, was the great nation of the earth, and that by spreading their language, their institutions, and their literature over the various countries of the earth, they would render an invaluable benefit to mankind, and would fulfil the purpose for which they had been placed in such a high position. He could not imagine what opposition would be offered to the Resolutions of which he had given notice. He had been told that the "Previous Question" was to be moved, but that was always a cowardly mode of proceeding. It was saying in effect, "We admit the truth of the proposition, but this is not the time for considering it." His first proposition was that the privileges of the Hudson's Bay Company ought not to be renewed. Did the Government intend to renew those privileges, which would expire next May? If not, why should not the House of Commons now declare that it was expedient at once to put an end to such privileges? He warned the right hon. Baronet that if he intended to renew the privileges of the Company strong opposition would be offered to the measure; but if he did not entertain such an intention, on what ground could he object to the Motion? If the right hon. Baronet declined to express any opinion on the subject at present, the Hudson's Bay Company would only regard him as a cowardly Minister, who dared not declare what his intentions were. He (Mr. Roebuck) had brought no charge against the Hudson's Bay Company; he did not intend to bring any charge against them; but he believed it would be for the interests of England that the Resolutions of which he had given notice should be adopted, and he hoped they would receive the assent of the House.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That the privileges of the Hudson's Bay Company, about to expire, ought not to be renewed."

VISCOUNT BURY, in seconding the Resolutions said, this question was one which possessed a double interest, inasmuch as it involved not only the welfare of some of our important colonial possessions, but, to a very great degree, the Imperial interests also. He thought the House ought to be informed what were the intentions of the Government on this subject, because the time was getting very short, as the exclusive license of trade possessed by the Hudson's Bay Company would expire early next year. He could only hope that the opinions of the present Government would not coincide with those of the late Government on this subject. He had in his hand a letter addressed by Mr. Merivale, while Secretary for the Colonies, to Captain Shepherd, which evinced a disposition on the part of the late Government to renew the license of trade upon certain conditions; but Mr. Merivale stated that he did not think it incumbent upon the Government to investigate the legality of the rights claimed by the Hudson's Bay Company, and that he considered it no part of his duty to moot that point. He said that if persons in Canada wished to contest the legal rights of the Company the Government must leave them to take that course on their own responsibility. Now, he (Viscount Bury) thought that when a question was certain to arise as to whether a large amount of compensation for these rights, or supposed rights, was to be given to the Company, it was a matter which very much concerned both that House and the Government to examine into those rights before they talked about compensation. Then the Government went on to say that, if no such proceedings were taken, they were prepared to propose, as a condition of the renewal of the license, that the Company should surrender such portions of the territory as were required by Canada for the purpose of settlements. Now, this begged the whole question. In the first place, why should all this land be reserved to the Company when neither the Government nor the House knew whether they had any right to it? Again, the question was treated as exclusively one between Canada and the Hudson's Bay Company, though it seemed to him that the matter concerned the whole empire. If Canada were placed in possession of this vast territory to-morrow she would not be able to govern it; she could not colonize it, for the country she already possessed was not filled up. The real point at issue was whether the Company should continue their monopoly, should keep closed doors, should put up a "no thoroughfare" board at every inlet into this country, or whether it should be thrown open to the enterprise of all Her Majesty's subjects. In the same correspondence there followed a letter from Mr. Shepherd, in which he said that the territory mentioned as likely to be taken by Canada was not only of value to the Hudson's Bay Company in connection with the fur trade, but because from it the Company's store of provisions was drawn, and he added that their expenditure would be largely increased if this district were taken away. Here was another assumption on the part of the Company that their rights and claims were quite unapproachable. They chose to assume this, and then assigned as a reason for not throwing open this route to the West—through which he believed our intercourse with India and China would at no distant day be carried on—that they would be at fault for want of pemmican, and would have to go into the United States or Canada to make their markets. In consequence of the statement made that it was not the part of the Government to investigate these claims, the task seemed to devolve upon anybody who had an interest in that portion of Her Majesty's dominions. Connected as he was, therefore, by all sorts of ties with these colonies, he had endeavoured, to the best of his ability, to inquire into the subject for himself, and to ascertain how far the Company's rights were founded on truth and justice. Before, however, stating the result of his investigation, he should like to say a few words upon the nature of the territory claimed by the Company. Out of the House he seldom heard that territory mentioned without being more or less associated with the terms "barren," "sterile," "ice-bound," "unfit for colonization and the support of human beings." But that was an entirely erroneous supposition. It might be true that comparatively only a small portion of this vast territory was fitted for colonization, but it was no less true that that comparatively small portion consisted of something like 500,000 square miles, and would afford occupation and means of subsistence to, he believed, every person of full age in Her Majesty's dominions, both in the Colonies and at home. Eastward from the Rocky Mountains, and as far south as Peace River and Lake Athabasca, the country was barren and unfit for settlement; but southward from that point, as far down as the boundary line, the 49th parallel of latitude, it was magnificent, consisting of the same fine prairie land as that in which the Ohio and Mississippi sprung—well watered, very fertile, stocked with wild animals and fish of every description. Another part of the country consisted of impenetrable forests, the soil of which, like that of the Canadian forests when reclaimed, would be found well suited for agricultural purposes; but the prairie lands were those most susceptible of cultivation, and upon which the development of the country and its future prosperity would chiefly depend. His right hon. and learned Friend had alluded to the possibility of forming a communication by railway from the head of Lake Superior to the Pacific, but he had made no allusion to the water communication which might be opened.

Viscount Bury

It was only within the last few years that the United States had, by very great exertions, formed a ship-canal to overcome a fall of eighty feet called Sault St. Marie, by which ships were able to pass from Lake Michigan to Lake Superior. He thought that the system adopted by the United States in the formation of a certain ship canal might be very easily applied. In that case 180,000 acres of land were set aside in the State of Michigan, and were given in trust for the persons who made the canal on condition that they finished it; and as it advanced and they wanted money part of the land was sold, and supplied funds for prosecuting the work. It was found that the sale of these lands, made infinitely more valuable by the canal itself, fully remunerated the shareholders for their undertaking; and he thought it would not be at all difficult to set aside reserves of land along the line from Lake Superior to the Pacific, and apply the proceeds of the lands sold to defray the expense of constructing the communication between those two points. With the exception of a single rapid (which might be avoided by a canal) the navigation of the Saskatchewan offered no difficulty. With this one exception you could take a vessel of considerable size up to the foot of the Rocky Mountains; and at this point there was a gap in the mountains which would interpose no great obstacle in the way of a junction between the Columbia and the Saskatchewan, whose sources were but a little distance apart. In fact, there were very great facilities for the completion, not only of a railway, but of a water-communication with the Pacific, and he hoped some day to see this great work accomplished. As regarded the claims of the Company he apprehended it would be conceded that no grant could be valid unless the land were absolutely and de facto in the possession of the grantor at the time the grant was made. Now, he believed it might be proved that this country did not belong to England when Charles II. gave it to the Hudson's Bay Company. For some time prior to the date of the charter it was, he believed, the property of another Christian king, and as such, by the terms of the charter itself, it was expressly excluded from the grant. Further, he thought he could show that, supposing all these difficulties overcome and the charter to have been originally valid, the Treaty of Ryswick at once and for ever upset it. In 1598, many years before the date of the charter, Henry IV. of France made the Sieur de la Roche Lieutenant Governor of lands the boundaries of which were described by the French geographer, L'Escarbot, in his edition of 1611, and which were sufficiently wide to include a large part of the Hudson's Bay territories. Subsequently, in 1627, the Cardinal Richelieu granted to the Compagnie de la Nouvelle France seignorial and territorial rights such as were usually given in feudal times, over a tract of country extending from Labrador to the Pacific. It would, therefore, appear that under the terms of their charter the Hudson's Bay Company were for the second time debarred from setting up any just claims to the territory which had thus been disposed of. In 1629, a few years after Charles I. came to the throne, Quebec, as well as the towns of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia were taken by the English, who held possession of them during the war; but when peace was concluded by the Treaty of St. Germains, the whole of Canada was relinquished to France, all the conquered territory was given back to her, and the British forces were withdrawn from the positions which they had taken and occupied. There was, therefore, an international treaty by which the charter of the Company was barred. That charter was granted in 1670, but it was not for some years afterwards that any attempt was made upon the part of the inhabitants of this country to establish themselves in that portion of North America to which the charter related. The cause which led to the granting of the privileges which the Hudson's Bay Company enjoyed were to be found in the fact that two French Canadians, named Grozelier and Radisson, who in 1668 applied to the French Government for powers something similar to those which had been conferred upon the Compagnie de la Nouvelle France, had their application refused, and in consequence came over to this country and gave a most glowing account of those districts which were now under the control of the Hudson's Bay Company. In 1668, they fitted out an expedition to that country, and it was so successful that Charles II. was induced to grant that Charter to the Hudson's Bay Company, of which they now heard so much. The Company proceeded to establish forts and factories on the territory thus ceded to them. Now, for the first time, the British established themselves on the coast of Hudson's Bay; but no sooner had they done so than France took measures to oust them. Those measures, however, were insufficient for the purpose, and the English for a few years held their position, although they lived in a miserable way, on the shores of the country. England and France were then at peace, and if the Hudson's Bay Company had then a right to the territory, the attempts made by France to oust the English might have been treated as a casus belli; and it seemed strange they had not been so treated, unless indeed, it was then tacitly admitted that the rights of the Company were very slender. Then came the Treaty of Ryswick, of 1697, one of the articles of which was, that the forts taken by the English in a time of profound peace should be given up to France. Surely if the Hudson's Bay Company had at that time a leg to stand upon, or if the British had the slightest claim to the shores of Hudson's Bay, they would not have tamely submitted to such a treaty. Through some oversight one of these forts was not given up to France. In 1713 came the Treaty of Utrecht, when England became possessed idisputably, for the first time, of the Hudson's Bay territory, and they returned into the possession of their forts, which they held ever since; but that Treaty conferred nothing on the Hudson's Bay Company which had not been conferred by the Treaty of Ryswick, and the Treaty of Ryswick conferred nothing which they had not had before, and what they had before was absolutely nothing. When Canada was ceded to Great Britain, the Hudson's Bay Company were only in possession of one fort. Canada had been infinitely more successful than their rivals of Hudson's Bay; but as soon as the country came into the possession of Great Britain, the Hudson's Bay Company began to oppose in the interior the French Company of Montreal. Previously that part of the country was in the undisputed possession of the French. Now he came to 1812. At that time the stock of the Company had become greatly depreciated by mismanagement and ill success. But there rose up at this time one who would be a great man in any age, a man of the most iron nerve and determined resolution—Lord Selkirk, who soon acquired a predominant influence in their councils. He saw the French Company trading up Lake Superior, and that they were obliged to carry up supplies a long distance, and that it was impossible they could carry on their trade in Canada in any other way. It was at this time Lord Selkirk formed the Red River Settlement, which had been instanced as a proof of our colonizing power; but it was not owing to our colonizing power, or to the Hudson's Bay Company, or to anything but the adventurous and military spirit of Lord Selkirk. Its object was not colonization, but was due to the prompting of a military and strategic spirit. The object of Lord Selkirk was to cut off the supplies of the French Canadian Company. If the Montreal Company were unable to reach the interior and bring supplies, it was easy to see what would be the result. A few years after this Lord Selkirk went down to Quebec, and soon after became possessed of great power. He became a magistrate of Canada, and was invested with considerable authority. Lord Selkirk enlisted a body of disbanded soldiers, set off and took Fort William, which was not within the bounds of what the Hudson's Bay Company claimed under their charter, but belonged to Canada. Attempts were made to oust him from the fort; the force sent to do so was defeated, and the constables imprisoned; and when the sheriff was sent to levy a fine of £500, he imprisoned the sheriff also. Now Fort William was on the extreme verge of civilization, and tidings such as these were a long time in reaching England. In 1821, however, the right hon. Member for Coventry (Mr. Ellice) pointed out that both parties were fighting an up-hill game, that litigation would exhaust their funds, and especially warned the Hudson's Bay Company that their charter would not hold water if contested; but, said that Company, let us trade under your charter and we will hold your monopoly against all the world. The rights claimed by the Hudson's Bay Company were of a twofold nature. One was the monopoly of trade over Rupert's Land, granted by charter, and the other was a license of occupation for twenty-one years, which would expire next year. With respect to the license now on the eve of expiration he had nothing to say, that being strictly within the power of Parliament to grant or withhold as it might think proper; but as to the monopoly of trade over Rupert's Land, even if the charter was valid, there were legal objections to it. He found that Blackstone, in his Commentaries, laid it down that, in a newly-discovered country, having no laws of its own, the laws of England came into force as soon as we took possession of the land, and remained in force until others were made by competent authority. The charter of 1670 declared the Hudson's Bay territory to be one of His Majesty's plantations or colonies of America, and therefore it was liable to the same laws which governed the other dominions of the King of England. One of these laws declared that all monopolies were illegal and bad, and Lord Coke, a contemporary authority, had said that monopolies of traffic were opposed to the liberties of the people. It followed, then, that King Charles, by the charter, granted what he had no power to grant. There was an Act of the reign of James I. which made all monopolies void, and two knights who were found guilty of being concerned in a monopoly of the sale of gold lace were exposed in the pillory and made to ride through the streets with their faces to the horses' tails. He did not advocate such strong measures towards the Hudson's Bay Company, but he thought it time their exclusive privileges should cease. The license of exclusive trade was, in fact, a complete and exclusive power over the lives, the liberties, and the labour of the Indians. If, by the charter, the Indians were compelled to sell to the Hudson's Bay Company alone, at any prices which the Company might choose to give, those Indians were completely at the mercy of the Hudson's Bay Company, through whom alone they could obtain the ammunition that was necessary to enable them to kill those animals from which they derived the means of subsistence. If the prices given by the Hudson's Bay Company were not as high as could be obtained in an open market, then the charter simply granted them a monopoly of power over the lives, the liberties, and the property of a large body of Her Majesty's subjects. Much had been said about the colonizing tendencies of the Hudson's Bay Company; but he would invite the House to consider what was the fact. There was an astronomical boundary, south of which was to be found a teeming population, while north of that line the country was in respect of population a perfect desert. Every year the population of the United States advanced northwards, and very soon would overstep the astronomical boundary which marked the commencement of British territory. When that happened the hard-headed American farmer would not stop to inquire whether he was on British or American soil, but he would miss the protection of American laws, and would demand to be placed under their safeguard. He believed that there was far more danger of difficulty arising from that source than from any Central American question. In conclusion, he would quote the words of a Canadian legislator, one who occupied a prominent position in that country, who declared:—

"This was the very madness of monopoly. Surely the Hudson's Bay Company could not expect by their effete and stupid charter to shut up for ever the route to the great West?"

He (Viscount Bury) agreed with that sentiment. It was utterly impossible that this monopoly should be permitted to endure after public attention had been called to the subject, and he trusted the discussion which would take place that evening would open the eyes of the nation to the importance of the matter, and that Her Majesty's Ministers would not be backward in acting upon the suggestions that would be made.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I am sure I only express the unanimous feeling of the House when I say that I have listened with great interest to this discussion as far as it has gone. My hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Roebuck) is a veteran in these matters. It is a fact upon which the hon. and learned Gentleman has a right to reflect with gratification, that upon this subject and other questions relating to our policy in British North America he has frequently been the expositor of truths at an early date, which although not at once acknowledged have subsequently obtained complete recognition. I believe the exposition he has now made is one in which he is so far fortunate that it is not even now unpopular; and I am convinced that the history he has given us and the opinions he has expressed are so sound and just that they must become the basis of our future policy in respect of that country. Although a veteran in the cause, I am sure my hon. and learned Friend has hailed with joy and satisfaction the accession he has received to-night in the person of one who is a novice indeed in years, but who in knowledge and accomplishments has shown himself a thorough master of the subject. If I do not say more of the speech of the noble Viscount it is because I feel that he has so completely possessed himself of the matter, in all its facts and bearings, that it would be presumptuous in me to comment upon it. As to the question that is immediately before us, my hon. and learned Friend has laid down three propositions. Of these, the first is that that portion of the privileges of the Hudson's Bay Company which are now about to expire ought not to be renewed; next, that the legal validity of the exclusive rights of the Company under their charter should be determined by force of law; and, thirdly, that arrangements should be made with the Hudson's Bay Company for extricating from their possession, whether rightly held or not, but upon the mere grouud of policy, so much of the territory as might be needed for the purposes of colonization. Of these propositions the most important is the second, and upon that I wish to address a few observations to the House. No one can have listened to the speech of the noble Viscount without being convinced that this is a most serious matter. Here is a large portion of the surface of the earth with regard to the character of which we have been systematically kept in darkness; for those who had information to give have also had an interest directly opposed to their imparting it. I am at liberty to say so because I refer only to public documents; and as an illustration of the truth of what I have said I need only direct attention to the interesting and important work of Governor Simpson, his Voyage Round the World—he will find in that work that Governor Simpson, who, when he had a pen in his hand, was not dreaming of any controversy about the Hudson's Bay Company, giving a glowing description of the agricultural capabilities and fitness for colonization of a very considerable and important portion of the territories of the Hudson's Bay Company. Last year my right hon. Friend the then Secretary of State for the Colonies (Mr. Labouchere), moved for, and the House granted a Committee to inquire into the affairs of the Hudson's Bay Company. Before that Committee questions were raised seriously involving all their rights. Governor Simpson was examined before it, and the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield and other hon. Gentlemen questioned him upon the agricultural and colonizing capabilities of the territory of the Company. An entire change had come over the spirit of his dream. He represented that these territories were bound up by frost and banked in fog, and that woe would betide any unfortunate individuals who might by a reckless spirit of adventure be so far diverted from the path of prudence as to endeavour to settle in those parts. And, when some Member of the Committee, with inconvenient curiosity, ferreted out the book of Governor Simpson and made quotations from it, the Governor, with all his ingenuity, which is not small, was greatly puzzled, and indeed entirely failed to reconcile the account of the country which he had given as an author, and that which he gave as Governor of the Hudson's Bay Company, when the object was to prove to the Committee of the House of Commons, that it was useless to pluck and feather the Company because they had got nothing which was worth having. Now, the truth is beyond question, that a great part of this country is highly valuable for colonizing purposes, and it is impossible to state in too strong language the proposition, that the Hudson's Bay Company is, by its very existence and its character the enemy of colonization. All its traditions, all its habits, all its establishments—the fruit of generations—all its purposes and arrangements, are not only not directed to colonization, but are directed to purposes the attainment of which requires that colonization should be absolutely excluded. If it be necessary for a gentleman who makes a deer forest in Scotland to remove the sheep and the shepherd's hut from its range, still more necessary is it that from the whole of the Hudson's Bay territory which is to be used for the purposes of the fur trade, colonization should be excluded with the utmost and most unyielding rigour. The noble Viscount (Viscount Bury) has pointed out to the House many of the reasons which lead us to suppose that the rights of the Hudson's Bay Company in that country are extremely doubtful. He has shown that it is very questionable whether the country which was purported to be given did not at that time belong to France. The hon. and learned Member for Sheffield has pointed out that it is at least very doubtful whether it was not admitted in the reign of William III., in the year 1689, that the validity of the charter hung upon an Act of Parliament which expired seven years afterwards. There is another point which is extremely doubtful, and a most proper subject for legal argument—but which has not been mentioned to-night. The charter, if I recollect rightly, while it purports to give the privilege of exclusive trade—a privilege which it is very questionable whether the Crown could confer, as against British subjects—gives that exclusive trade only with the Indians; but the policy of the Hudson's Bay Company has been to prevent parties carrying on any trade or any enterprise whatever within its territories. Yet, when the charter was granted it was not trade with the Indians alone which was contemplated; on the contrary, those who refer to that charter will see that it was then anticipated that trades of other kinds might be carried on in this territory, and in particular that mining enterprise would there prove highly successful. My noble Friend, if I may call him so, says, taking up the expression, that the Hudson's Bay Company have written up "No thoroughfare." The usual mode of prohibiting entrance is to put up a board bearing the words "No admittance except on business;" but this Company have done worse—they have refused admittance, especially when it is upon business. Admittance for the purpose of carrying on business is what they will on no account permit; and my hon. and learned Friend is right when he says that from the nature of their undertaking it can only be carried on upon the assumption that all human enterprise is to be excluded from the country, which is to be left solely to the Indians and to those agents of the Company who deal with them. This is a most interesting question. Although it concerns a vast tract of country much of which is a hopeless and inhospitable waste, there is a colouring of romance over the whole history of this territory; and although romance and law are not usually associated, yet I will venture to say that, turning from the wild life of these regions and the pursuits of the people connected with the objects of the Company to the legal points concerning its condition and status, there never were presented for the exercise of human ingenuity and intelligence a more interesting or more curious set of questions than are involved in the consideration of this matter. Let me, in showing that there are fair and probable grounds for raising these questions, refer to another point connected with the validity of the Company's charter, and it shall be the last which I will notice. At present the Hudson's Bay Company are in possession, by virtue, as they consider, of their charter, of the whole country reaching from the source of the Saskatchewan, in the Rocky Mountains, for some thousands of miles across the country, to Hudson's Bay. Now, even if you admit the rights of the Crown over this territory—if you admit its right to grant the charter, and to give an exclusive privilege of trading, as against all other British subjects, to these favoured parties, it still remains extremely doubtful, upon the language of the charter, whether it did give, or was ever intended to give, to the Hudson's Bay Company that vast range of territory, and whether the true legal interpretation of it is not that the lands intended to be given were those upon the shores of the Bay, and upon the shores of the lakes and rivers in its immediate neighbourhood. And in conformity with that was the state of facts, because the Company did not at first possess themselves of this vast territory reaching to the Rocky Mountains. On the contrary, for a hundred years and more after the granting of the charter, they departed, but by comparatively small and trifling distances, from the shores of the Bay, and the time at which they extended themselves over this vast range of country was the more recent date at which they formed their fortunate coalition with my right hon. Friend the Member for Coventry. It would, therefore, I think, appear, without endeavouring to make the House responsible for the arguments which have been addressed to it, that there are very serious reasons in law for questioning the powers at present possessed and exercised by the Hudson's Bay Company. I dare say that it is in the knowledge of many hon. Members that there are upon record the opinions of very high legal authorities—counsel not Judges—including Lord Brougham, Mr. Serjeant Spankey, and Sir A. Pigott, which to the full bear out the opinions that have been expressed in the course of this debate. There is, however, an impression that there would be great hardship in raising this question at the present time. It is said that the Company have been in possession for nearly two centuries, and that, even supposing that the grant was originally wrong, yet by some peculiar process that wrong has gradually been enured and hardened into right. Let the House briefly examine that view of the question. In the first place, it is not a view which the House of Commons has ever yet consented to recognize; because in the year 1849 this House unanimously adopted an Address praying that the Crown would be pleased to take legal steps for the purpose of testing and ascertaining the validity of the rights of the Company. I had the honour of moving that Address, and I certainly thought that "legal steps" meant a process in a court of law according to the good old constitutional fashion, dating from 200 and more years back, under which, when powerful companies were found exercising rights which were considered hostile to those of the public, it was usual to try those rights by a suit in a court of law, such companies being perfectly competent to defend themselves, and a legal issue being the fairest mode of ascertaining the rights of all parties. The noble Earl who was then Colonial Secretary (Earl Grey) understood that Address in a different sense, and, instead of causing any judicial decision to be taken, he obtained, I think, from the Company an ex parte statement of their claims, that ex parte statement he submitted to the law officers of the Crown, and upon it obtained their opinion that they saw no reason to question the charter upon the case stated to them. His last step was to inform a young gentleman named Isbister, a most meritorious man but in humble circumstances, who was struggling to pay for his own education at the University of Aberdeen, and assisting in the work of teaching there, that it was open to him as a private individual to try the question on behalf of the public at his own cost and charge. The Company agreed to this, and I must say that they have never in any improper manner endeavoured to shirk the raising of this issue. I only refer to this because it is a proof that the House of Commons has not recognized any principle averse to the Motion of the hon. and learned Gentleman, but on the contrary has been of opinion that the ascertaining by legal process the rights of the Company was the proper and justifiable course to take. There is also, I think, a great deal of error in the impression that the possession of the Company is consecrated by time. It is quite a mistake to suppose that the flourishing monopoly which we now see is the creation of the charter of Charles II. For 150 years from the date of that charter the Company dragged on a feeble and inert existence, and the present flourishing and powerful monopoly is a child, not of the charter of Charles II., but of somebody who understood his business much better than the drawers of that charter—namely, of the right hon. Member for Coventry, whose absence this evening we most deeply regret, for here he ought to have been to receive the honours due to his industry, sagacity, and skill. At the same time, while we place the saddle upon the right horse, or rather the chaplet upon the right brow, it is not to be denied that in admitting that truth we strip the case of the Company of the character of venerable antiquity which the friends of the Company are rather fond of claiming, and give it, on the contrary, a character of what may be called something like modernism. The possession of the Company as it now stands is recent; but, at the same time, I would be the last person to maintain that any harshness ought to be shown towards the Company on that account. If the Company has rights, then, as my hon. and learned Friend says, the case is clear, it is entitled to the full and absolute enjoyment of them, and cannot be deprived of them except upon that ample compensation which it may claim on the ground of justice. It might, on the other hand, appear that although the Company have not very great rights in law, yet that in point of equity and fairness there are reasons for a liberal entertainment of their claims. That is an intermediate course which it might probably be expedient to pursue. I do not attempt to prejudge the question, but we should not assume that those who think the legal rights of the Company ought to be tested by an investigation are therefore of opinion that the Company should be harshly and severely dealt with. When those who have entered upon such an enterprise have staked their lives, their fortunes, their industry and energy in the undertaking, it cannot be a question that they should be treated by Parliament upon liberal principles. I feel strongly, however, that the British public have rights in this matter as well as the Company. I shall not now enter into the question, which is an important and difficult one, whether the colonization of the territory now possessed by the Company ought to be conducted by a direct agency from hence, or whether it would not be better to leave Canada to undertake the work; but I do say, that the rights of the British public and the necessity of opening new fields for the enterprise of British adventurers impose a duty upon us which we must not neglect. Whatever we may think with regard to the Company, however we may be disposed to deal with them, we ought not to allow this enormous obstruction to cover over a large space of the surface of the earth, with great capabilities for the exercise of human industry and enterprise, until we are certain that strict law and right stand in our way. Justice to the British public demands that steps should be taken such as those which the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield indicates by his Motion. I now come to the last point the course to be taken on the present occasion. The mover and seconder of the Resolutions must be satisfied, from the reception their speeches have met with from the House, that they have greatly advanced by this discussion the general views and principles which they seek to establish. They have no reason, as far as I am aware, to anticipate any hostile feeling on the part of the Government, and I shall not be suspected of any want of sympathy if I venture respectfully to submit to them whether they would not do well to leave the further treatment of the question for the present in the hands of Her Majesty's Ministers. The Government have heard from the mover and seconder of the Resolutions much that will be useful to them, and that will assist them materially in determining their course. Were we to proceed upon the present occasion I know not what might be done by the Government; but I think it probable that any division which might take place would tend to create a false impression out of doors. I hope, therefore, that the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield will listen to the statements that will doubtless be made by the Ministers of the Crown, and, unless these statements are of a character entirely hostile in principle to his views, he will then be prepared to leave the subject in the hands of the Executive Government.

Mr. Gladstone

MR. LABOUCHERE said, the subject before the House was of the highest interest and importance, and one which might fairly be discussed in view of the near approach of the termination of the license enjoyed by the Company. He did not agree with the right hon. Gentleman who spoke last (Mr. Gladstone), that the real question was whether the charter of the Company was valid or not. The real question, in his opinion, was whether, while giving up to colonization all those portions of the territory now possessed by the Company which were adapted for it, we should not maintain, for Imperial purposes and the preservation of law and order, the existing monopoly in those immense tracts which were unfitted for colonization. He believed that every Member of the Committee which inquired into this subject a few years ago, including the right hon. Gentleman himself, was of opinion that—setting aside the question of charter or no charter as merely a secondary one—those vast tracts ought not to be left to chance, but should, for Imperial purposes, be intrusted to the care of some body or other, the general feeling being that the preference should be given to the existing Company, which was already in occupation of the territory. If the country to which he had referred were thrown open, without limitation or restriction, to adventurers from all parts of the world, the consequences would be very serious. For a few years there would be a lucrative fur trade carried on; but the fur-bearing animals, as a necessary result of being hunted in and out of season, would soon be destroyed and the Indians would doubtless share the same fate. For this reason, among others, he recommended that, whatever else might be done with that portion of North America which was capable of settlement, that part which was incapable of colonization and settlement should not be thrown open to indiscriminate occupation, but should, for the sake of civilization and humanity itself, be left in the hands of the Hudson's Bay Company. If he mistook not, the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield himself had expressed such an opinion; but on this occasion he had not told them how he proposed to deal with those portions of the territory which he proposed to take from the Hudson's Bay Company, and how he would prevent the bloodshed and anarchy among the natives which were likely to ensue if they were left to themselves. But he (Mr. Labouchere) thought that was a view of the subject which the House should not lose sight of. With regard to the validity of the charter, he agreed with those who held that it was desirable that its validity should be ascertained by a legal process. He could assure the House that, when he was in office, he looked most anxiously to see if there was any way of having its validity tested. But the question was not new. More than a hundred years ago the Government of that day were anxious to obtain information on the same point, and referred the propriety of raising this question to their law officers, men so eminent in their profession as Lord Mansfield, who was then Attorney General, and Sir Dudley Ryder, who was Solicitor General. Their answer was, that considering how long the Hudson's Bay Company had enjoyed and acted under their charter, without the slightest interruption, they did not think it was advisable that the Government should try the question of its validity in the Courts of law, but should await some implied or express declaration of a Court of law against it. Well, when he was in office he raised the subject again, and referred it to the law officers—Sir Richard Bethell and Sir Henry Keating. Sir Richard Bethell soon afterwards told him, in conversation, that he never could recommend the bringing of a quo warranto against a charter of that description; that he thought it a tyrannical and high-handed proceeding which no Government ought to undertake. The two law officers afterwards gave their opinion, in writing, that the Crown ought not, in justice, to raise this question as to the general validity of the charter; but that, on every legal principle, the Company's territorial ownership of the land, and the privileges and rights incidental thereto—as, for example, the right of excluding persons acting in violation of their regulations—ought to be deemed valid. He did not pretend to give any legal opinion of his own; but, from conversations he had held upon this subject with the most eminent lawyers, both of this country and of Canada, he believed what could be affirmed on the matter was, that so far as a right to the territory was concerned the charter was good, but that so far as an exclusive trade was concerned, the Crown had acted ultra vires in granting it. He did not think, however, that much would be gained by the affirmation of that principle, because, if the Company had an undoubted right to the territory, they would be sure to make such use of it as would be most suitable to their own interests, and would prevent any competitors from entering into the market with them as rival traders. This had reference to the territory held under charter; but, with respect to the territory held under license, there the Crown had power to revoke its license at pleasure; and this latter land had a better soil than the other, was nearer to the sea, and was more fitted for the purposes of colonization. The country held under license was never given to the Company, except with the distinct reservation on the part of the Crown of the right to establish colonies. At the present moment the Government might erect in that part of the territory a colony without asking the leave of the Company, and the Bill before the House in reference to New Caledonia was a proof of the correctness of his statement. He was not so sanguine as some other gentlemen appeared to be as to the results of this system of colonization; but he was willing that the experiment should be tried. He was anxious that justice should be done to the Hudson's Bay Company, for it was his duty to declare that in dealing with them he had not found them unwilling to listen to him when he impressed on them the necessity of attending to the general interests of the country, and he had no doubt that the right hon. Baronet opposite had also heard the Company express the same desire to meet the wishes of the Government and the interests of the country as far as they could do consistently with a fair regard to the interests of the members of the Company. With regard to the Indians, he believed that on the whole the Hudson's Bay Company had acted humanely towards that people. This he knew, that they had managed to keep peace between the Indian and the white man in their territory, while across their border there were too often exhibited scenes of anarchy and bloodshed. The other day he read in a book giving an account of four years sojourn in Oregon, written by an American unfriendly to the Company, a statement to the effect that, in respect to the Indians, they had acted not only with more humanity, but with more good sense than the Americans; that they had gone on a policy, perhaps for the first time ever adopted towards the red man—they had employed and paid him; made him useful, and given him a value in his own eyes, while at the same time they attached them to the whites by the tie of a common interest. He (Mr. Labouchere) admitted that there was truth in the assertion that a fur trade company must be essentially adverse to colonization. Let the Government take such portion of the territory as they might for colonization, but let them not throw open the whole of those vast lands without having first secured the means for preserving peace and order. With respect to the Resolutions which had been moved, he could not advise the House to concur in them. It was premature to attempt to cut those knots, which required careful untying, by such Resolutions. As for the first Resolution it was his opinion, that it was for the public interest that the privileges of the Hudson's Bay Company should, on proper conditions and with proper arrangements, be renewed; but of this he was sure, that his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Roebuck) had entirely failed to tell the House what he would do with the territory if those privileges were not renewed. Lord Grey, when Colonial Minister, referred the question as to the validity of the rights claimed by the Hudson's Bay Company to the law officers of the Crown, who came to the deliberate conclusion—to which he had himself subsequently arrived—that it would not be becoming or consistent with precedent for the Government to institute proceedings with a view to try the validity of a charter granted by the Crown. He should therefore object to the Resolution now proposed in relation to that point; but, if the law advisers of the present Ministry entertained a different opinion from that of their predecessors, and thought that this charter could be fairly discussed, no doubt a great impediment to the final settlement of these questions might thereby be removed. The third Resolution, declaring that such of the lands under the Hudson's Bay Company as were needed for purposes of colonization ought without delay to be resumed by the Crown was a mere truism in which all must concur; and the Company was perfectly willing, upon fair terms, to surrender any part of its land for such an object. Under these circumstances he thought the House had better leave the matter in the hands of the Executive Government, whose views would doubtless be explained by the right hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Bulwer Lytton). An unfavourable contrast had been drawn by the hon. and learned Member between the Colonies of the United States and our own North American possessions. He must say he was greatly surprised to hear that comparison. He had watched with great interest the progress of that noble colony of Canada, and he believed that in all points of material prosperity, in true freedom, in all that constituted true happiness, the inhabitants of British Canada need not envy their neighbours. The care of the Ministers and of the Parliament of England should be to maintain that feeling in the colony. The true defence of Canada — the link which bound her people to the mother country lay in the fact that they could look across their own frontier and see nothing in the condition of their American neighbours which they had any reason to envy. The colonists of Canada were deeply sensible of this, and fully conscious of the blessings they enjoyed under British sway, and they were as thoroughly loyal and attached to the Crown of England as any portion of Her Majesty's subjects. He trusted, therefore, that nothing would be done which was calculated to offend their just susceptibilities. He had, himself, when in office, intimated to the Government of Canada that the Crown would not drag the charter of the Hudson's Bay Company before a judicial tribunal, although it was open to them or to any other subjects of the Queen to take that course if they thought proper; and that if the people of Canada desired to extend their territory into this region, they would have the assistance of the Home Government in doing so upon an equitable arrangement with the Company. He knew not whether any answer had been received to that proposal, but perhaps the right hon. Baronet opposite could afford the House some information on the subject. He could not agree with those who said that the people of Canada had no other right to any part of this territory except that possessed by all the rest of Her Majesty's subjects, because he regarded the prosperity and the loyalty of Canada as the keystone of the arch which kept together that portion of our colonial empire, and he therefore thought that nothing ought to be done which trenched upon their rights or wounded their just feelings.

SIR BULWER LYTTON: Sir, it is with some reserve that I approach the great and difficult questions involved in the Resolutions of my hon. and learned Friend. The Government, as yet, are in the condition of negotiators. Certain distinct propositions, as the right hon. Gentleman who spoke last told us, were made to Canada by the late Government with regard to any districts now covered by the charter of the Hudson's Bay Company which she might desire for the purposes of settlement; and, whatever cause there may be to suppose that the Canadian Government will reject those proposals, still every motive of policy as well as of respect to that great colony would make us desire that any scheme for colonization in that region may have her sympathy and concurrence. To those propositions we have had no official answer — still, Sir, I own that the probability that they will not be accepted is so notorious, and the interests involved in this question are so great, that I cannot hesitate to state, at least, the general views by which I venture to think that we ought to be guided. In glancing over the vast regions devoted to the fur trade, which are loosely said to be as large as Europe, the first thought of every intelligent Englishman must be that of humiliation and amaze.

Is it possible that so great a segment of the earth, under the English sceptre, can have so long been abandoned as a desolate hunting ground for wandering savages and wild animals? I put aside, for a moment, excuses of soil and climate; it is always presumptuous to decide hastily between man and nature—to say what man may or may not do to conquer those obstacles of soil and climate which nature may raise against him. It is enough for us to cling to the grand principle that civilization should be left to find its own voluntary channels; that we should not force it, but should take care not to obstruct it. No one can deny that a trade which preserves wild animals and has a direct interest in excluding civilized men does obstruct civilization if it claims territorial rights in any district which civilized men are disposed to cultivate and inhabit. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Gladstone) summed up the general evidence before our Committee in the first two of a series of Resolutions which he proposed to that Committee: first, that the country capable of colonization should be withdrawn from the jurisdiction of the Hudson's Bay Company; secondly, that the country incapable of colonization should be left to that jurisdiction. In the two abstract principles involved in these propositions lies the readiest solution of the gravest difficulties that beset the question; it is the attempt of a practised statesman to effect a compromise by which civilization may gain all it asks at present, and humanity may not only preserve to the savages scattered over frozen deserts, inaccessible to regular government, the trade on which they depend for existence, but guard them from the terrible demoralization produced by rival bribes of ardent spirits, and the strife and bloodshed among themselves, or between themselves and the whites, which might follow if the administrative machinery which it is the interest of a trading company to establish were destroyed before any effective substitute could be found. These are the reasons which will weigh upon the Government in considering the renewal of the license. The Government will certainly not renew the license over any part of the Indian territory which promises early settlement; but they reserve for further deliberation whether they will renew it for a limited period over the more remote and northern regions, taking care that the Crown shall have always the power to withdraw from that license any land that may be required for the uses of civilized life; that it shall retain all the imperial rights to fisheries and mines, and whatever may call forth human industry and enterprise in pursuits more congenial to our age than that gloomy trade in the skins of animals which seems to carry us back to a date before the annals of history. Now, although the renewal of the license may possibly form a part of any fresh negotiations with the Hudson's Bay Company for arrangements respecting the Red River Settlement; yet it ought in principle to be considered apart from such arrangements, and on its own merits—in lands held as yet only by the Indians does the exclusive license, or does it not work well for the Indians? The license is a question wholly distinct from that of the charter; the license gives none of the territorial rights which the charter assumes—it involves no principle of compensation in case of any lands which colonists may require, and it ought to be regarded simply as an instrument by which the Government can effect that safeguard from broil and disorder which in so vast and profitless a wilderness the Government is not able of itself to establish. But, whatever doubts may be entertained as to the second proposition of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxford, namely, that land incapable of colonization should be left to the jurisdiction of the Hudson's Bay Company, no one can dispute the soundness of the first proposition, that the country capable of colonization should be withdrawn from that jurisdiction; and turning our eyes from a trade which, unlike all other commerce, rests its profits, not on the redemption, but on the maintenance of the wilderness, it must cheer us to see already, in the great border lands of this hitherto inhospitable region, the opening prospect of civilized life. Already, by the Pacific, Vancouver's Island has been added to the social communities of mankind. Already, in the large territory which extends west of the Rocky Mountains, from the American frontier up to the skirts of the Russian domains, we are laying the foundations of what may become, hereafter, a magnificent abode for the human race; and now, eastward of the Rocky Mountains, we are invited to see, in the settlement of the Red River, the nucleus of a new colony, a rampart against any hostile inroads from the American frontier, and an essential arch, as it were, to that great viaduct by which we hope one day to connect the harbours of Vancouver with the

Sir Bulwer Lytton

Gulf of St. Lawrence. This is the district offered to Canada, and I think my hon. and learned Friend has good reason to presume that Canada will decline the task of forming it into a colony at her own responsibility and charge. If the answer from Canada be unfavourable, we have two options—either to leave the district, as now, under the jurisdiction of the Hudson's Bay Company, which nothing but absolute necessity would justify, or to take it into our own hands and form a colony, which will, no doubt, one day constitute a confederate part of a great Canadian system, and which might meanwhile, perhaps, be administered by a Government in concurrence with Canada. To this there have been two objections. The first is the presumed expense. This I do not at present anticipate. All heathful colonies should be self-supporting, and I agree with my hon. and learned Friend in the general theory he advances with so much eloquence and wisdom. Colonies will be self-supporting in proportion as you leave them to raise their own revenues under free institutions. The second objection is, that such a colony would not be peopled by Canadians; that, owing to the easier access from the American frontier, the majority of immigrants would be Americans. This objection does not alarm me. In the first place, though the immigrants come from the American territory as the readiest access, it does not follow that they should all be Americans. Probably large numbers of our own countrymen, especially the Scotch, would flock there, as well as Americans; and as for Americans, once settled as British colonists, it is probable that they would soon identify their national feelings and interests with the land in which they lived, and the conditions of the Imperial Government. It has been so already in Canada; it would be so at Red River; because all history tells us how soon men, if at all of kindred race, take, as it were, the stamp and colour of the land in which they settle. We, in this country, are an instance of that truth. No less than sixteen counties in this kingdom were given up to the immigration of the Danes, and probably the great mass of the population in those counties, more particularly in Yorkshire, Lincolnshire, and Norfolk, are of Danish origin to this day; yet in a very short time they became as heartily English and as hostile to the Danes of the Baltic as the Anglo-Saxons of Kent. Nay, even the Normans, despite their pride as a conquering race, despite the difference of language, became in the third generation as intensely English and anti-French in their national feelings as if they had been Saxon Thegns. In short, no matter where men come from, place them in ground covered by the British flag, overshadowed, though at a distance, by the mild British sceptre, and they will soon be British in sentiment and feeling. All that I say on this score is, do not, on account of such jealousies and fears, obstruct civilization. Here is land fit for settlement; if civilized men will settle in it, let them. Never let us mind the difficulties of access, soil, or climate, Leave the difficulties to them. Nature and man will fight their own battle and make their own peace. With regard to the fitness of the place itself for colonization, I an contented to take the opinion of the Hudson's Bay Company themselves; for, in a letter from the Company to Lord Glenelg, February 10th, 1837, when asking for a renewal of the license, I find it said.—

"The soil and climate of the country of the Red River settlement are favourable to colonization; that it was intended that this settlement should be peopled by emigrants from Britain, and that the Company hoped to establish in time a valuable export trade from thence to the mother country, in wool, flax, tallow, and other agricultural produce."

Sanguine hopes, not realized since 1837 under the auspices of the Company, but which may be more rapidly fulfilled when the Company withdraws from the place the shadow of its chilling protection. With regard to the safety of a settlement at the Red River from all ordinary attacks that might be made on it from the American quarter, I have a most satisfactory Report from Sir William Eyre, the Lieutenant General commanding the forces in British North America. He states that—

"The Red River settlement consists of about 8,000 persons, of whom 2,000 are Irish, English, and Scotch; the remaining 6,000 all mostly half-breeds. They are generally good shots, skilled in the use of fire-arms, and good horsemen. A local force or militia, of at least 1,000 men, could be easily organized and embodied. . . . . The barracks are perfectly habitable, and the post defensible, except against heavy ordnance, which it would be difficult to bring up against it. Norway House is the chief depot of the Company—the position might be made impregnable. All communication between Lake Superior and the Red River is now, according to Sir George Simpson, impracticable for any body of troops. . . . A few individuals might go, but not any force. There is abundance of provisions in the country; no want need be apprehended; water is good—wood abundant. The climate is severe in winter, but healthy at all seasons."

These few extracts may suffice to show that a settlement once established would be safe from danger from without. As regards the fur trade in this district, I need scarcely say, that if you take the land from the Hudson's Bay Company, the monopoly that goes with the land will expire. To attempt to maintain the monopoly there would be impossible, and only give rise to perpetual feuds. In fact, I must be pardoned if I say that there is good reason to believe that that monopoly has practically, in a great measure, ceased to exist in those parts. Major Seton reports from Fort Garry itself:—

"The Hudson's Bay Company have long since abandoned in practice their pretensions to exclusive trade in this district and far beyond it."

Captain Pallisser writes word:—

"That monopoly there is unattainable now and for evermore; that the people engaged in the illicit trade are inhabitants of the Indian land, and born on its soil. Most of them are half-breeds; they are British subjects; and whatever the rights of the Hudson's Bay Company under the charter, they think it a very hard case that they should be debarred from trading in the land of their birth. There appears to be a shadow of justice in this complaint; but, just or not, the opposition exists, and nothing short of extirpating the people engaged in it can ever stop it."

Indeed, this Report is so far confirmed by Captain Shepherd himself, on the part of the Hudson's Bay Company, that he states, in a letter to the Colonial Office:—

"That the diversion of the fur trade is carried on by the inhabitants of the Red River Settlement, who, regardless of the Hudson's Bay Company, conduct an illicit trade in spirituous liquors and furs in various parts of the country."

I think, therefore, there can be no doubt that, where the Company yields the land, it must resign the monopoly. It will be an after-consideration by what regulations the trade should in that case be carried on, so as to maintain order and peace, and respect that considerate humanity which is due to the Indians. But now comes the difficulty. The land we would thus dispose of for colonization is within the charter of the Hudson's Bay Company, and if that charter be valid, the land belongs to the Company, but not the monopoly of the trade, except as includes the right of ownership to keep others off the land. The law officers of the late Government, men of very high distinction, consider—

"That the Crown cannot now, with justice, raise the question of the general validity of the charter; but that, on every legal principle, the Company's territorial ownership of the lands granted, and the rights incident thereto—as, for example, the right of excluding from their country persons acting in violation of their regulations—ought to be deemed valid."

While this opinion of the late law officers remains before us, unexamined by our own law officers, it would be presumptuous in me to express any opinion of mine. It is our intention to submit the question to the most careful and deliberate consideration of our law officers, and ascertain from them whether, in equity and justice, we could advise the Crown, or recommend to Parliament any mode by which to facilitate a judicial decision upon this venerable title-deed. But I am bound, in justice to the Company, to say that, though it might be very desirable to try the validity of the charter, it is not absolutely necessary to do so for any immediate objects of colonization. It is but just to the Company to say that it has not hitherto shown itself stubborn or intractable. It does not say, "You shall not have the land which our charter covers." It says, on the contrary, "Take whatever land you please; Heaven forbid we should stand in the way of civilization. We are not the fit agents to colonize; we have not the means for it; we tried it at Vancouver's, and are glad to get rid of the experiment; take, then, whatever land you desire within the range of the charter. But"—here comes the critical but!—"we rely on your honesty." In other words, "If you take from us that which we actually possess, without proving that we have not the right to possess it—we are human beings, and we expect some kind of compensation." Seeing all the embarrassments of this dilemma, I cannot but admire the skill with which, in pursuance of the report of our Committee, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Taunton (Mr. Labouchere), devised a scheme which was intended to unite the objects we have in view with a temperate conciliation towards the claims of the Company. He proposed to cede this territory to Canada if she would agree to open a line of communication to it, and give satisfactory evidence of her intention to take steps for laying out townships and settling and administering the affairs of these districts; and as to the Hudson's Bay Company, he proposed to renew its trading license for twenty-one years over the wilderness not fitted for colonization; and that three Commissioners—one chosen by Canada, one by the Imperial Government, and one by the Company,—should consider and report what, under all the circumstances of the case, might be justly payable to the Company in consequence of such contemplated annexation, and in respect of property which they might be required to surrender. Well, if Canada reject these proposals, our hands are free for fresh negotiations and unfettered action. Meanwhile, to sum up my answer to the hon. and learned Gentleman, first, I think the license ought not to be renewed except where civilization has no requirements and law no other machinery but that of the Company. Secondly, with regard to raising the question of the validity of the charter, it will be submitted to our law officers, and we can obviously say nothing one way or the other till their opinion is received. Thirdly, I grant the expediency of strengthening our empire in North America by substituting, and in one connected frontier line, the colonies of Great Britain for the hunting grounds of a trading company. It is my sincere wish and hope that arrangements for that object may be effected in a spirit of reasonable conciliation to all parties concerned, and that we may thus lay the foundation of a civilized community, upon those principles of humanity towards the red man, and of honour and honesty towards the white, which our civilization should carry along with it wherever it extends, as the colonizers of old carried along with them a fragment of their native earth, and a light from the altar of their ancient council hall. The Company have assured us of their desire to meet the necessities of the case in a spirit of concession, and I do hope that early next Session we may propose to Parliament arrangements that will receive its approval. In the object before us we all have a common interest,—to fulfil the mission of the Anglo-Saxon race, in spreading intelligence, freedom, and Christian faith wherever Providence gives us the dominion of the soil, and industry and skill can build up cities in the desert. Sir, hoping that what I have said will satisfy my hon. and learned Friend at least as to the general views of the Government, I have only to thank the House for the indulgence with which it has heard me.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: The right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down has a difficult task before him, and I am quite sure that this House will be inclined to give him whatever time he may think necessary in order to decide upon the course of policy which may seem most useful to the country and most beneficial to mankind. Having served, however, upon a Committee on this question, and having at various times had my attention called to it, I will venture to state to the House my impressions on the subject as it now stands. It appears to me there is one part of this question which is easy, or apparently easy; but we have no sooner settled that than we find ourselves in almost inextricable difficulties. The part of the question which I say is easy is that on which my right hon. Friends the Members for Oxford and Taunton, my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sheffield, and the Colonial Secretary, are all perfectly agreed. They say there is a portion of this territory which is fit for colonization, and ought to be so applied. So far we are sailing in smooth water; there are no rocks ahead. But directly we have settled this point, an infinite number of questions arise which cannot be easily settled. One is, how much of this territory is capable of colonization? We have heard a very able speech, and one full of information, from my noble Friend the Member for Norwich (Viscount Bury), but still that is a point which requires to be examined. We have next the question, by whom shall that territory be colonized? Shall it be by Canada? Shall it be from this country? We have then this further question—what are the rights of the Company? Now, coming to this last point, which I think involves the greatest difficulty of all, it is right we should remember that the Company consider themselves, I believe, entirely mercantile in their constitution and character. You have not to deal with a body like the East India Company, which has a certain pride of dominion and possesses a certain power of patronage which it does not like to abandon. As far as I have ever heard, the Company look upon theirs as a mercantile speculation which returns a certain amount of profit—a very high amount—on all the capital they advance; and, provided that profit is secured and that capital replaced, they take no further interest in the question than as they are morally bound to consider the state of the Indians with whom they have had to deal. Now, although that appears to make the question more easy of treatment, yet there remains a point which must be solved before we can go far in the projects we are asked to entertain—namely, what are the legal rights of this Company? The Company say—"Take the whole territory if you will; take any part of it you choose; leave us either a small or large portion; only don't let us be unjustly deprived of what we consider our property." Well, but what is their property, and what are their rights? Last year, when the subject was considered in Committee, I was willing to leave it in the hands of the Government of the day, and I confess I was rather sanguine that my right hon. Friend (Mr. Labouchere) might find means of solving this question with the consent of Canada and of the Hudson's Bay Company. I was strengthened in that belief by a passage in Blackstone's Commentaries, in which he says that all questions respecting the boundaries of colonies can be properly adjudicated upon by Her Majesty's Privy Council. But my right hon. Friend has made the attempt; nearly a year ago he forwarded a proposition to Canada, and he now tells us that no answer has been returned, and that therefore no effectual advance has been made. But we cannot wait year after year in this way, for if we do not make some advance towards a solution of the question, we may have disorder; we may have the United States encroaching on our territory; we may have every kind of anarchy prevailing there. Well, then, I confess it appears to me now, that notwithstanding the opinions of the law officers of the Crown, you must have some legal decision on this question. If it should be found that the Hudson's Bay Company possess no right whatever to that of which my hon. and learned Friend near me proposes to deprive them, then they would have no valid claim to compensation; but if, upon the other hand, it should be found that they do possess such a right, and that you think it necessary for Imperial purposes to take away from them privileges which they now enjoy, then, I think they must be held to have a claim to compensation which you cannot resist. But be that as it may, I cannot help feeling that until you have ascertained in what the rights of the Company consist, you will be unable to arrive at any satisfactory solution of the important question under discussion. Mr. Murray, afterwards Lord Mansfield, and Sir Dudley Ryder, who filled the offices of Attorney and Solicitor General in 1749, gave, with respect to this subject, what to me appears to have been a very wise opinion at that day. "Here," they said, "is a charter granted by the Crown. There are no particular State reasons why that charter should be disturbed. It would, therefore, be an ungracious act upon the part of the Crown to raise the question whether the privileges which it confers are or are not good in law. We, for these reasons, beg to be excused from pronouncing any opinion on the matter." Now that, I repeat, was a very wise mode of dealing with the subject at the period to which I have referred. It was very much in accordance with the maxim of Sir Robert Walpole Quieta non movere, and no doubt answered its purpose very well. But we have fallen upon different times. This question is no longer in a state of quietude. Everything with respect to it, on the contrary, is disturbed and in motion. I, therefore, maintain that you cannot now rest satisfied until you have obtained in reference to it the opinions of the law officers of the Crown. You must at all events have some decision upon which to proceed, whether that decision be obtained through the medium of the Privy Council or in our courts of law by means of a writ of quo warranto.

But now, to refer more particularly to the Resolutions of my hon. and learned Friend near me, let us see what it is which he proposes. The third of those Resolutions says:—

> "That so much of the territory hitherto held by the Hudson's Bay Company as may be needed for the purposes of colonization ought without delay to be resumed by the Government of this country."

Well, in asking the House to assent to that Resolution, he does not ask us to pledge ourselves to the opinion that the whole of the territories of the company should be taken out of their possession. He seeks to deprive them only of so much of those territories as is needed for the purposes of colonization. It seems to be admitted that there are certain districts which cannot be employed for that purpose—in which fur-bearing animals and a few scattered Indians are alone to be found, and in which colonization could have no place. What that portion of the territories of the Company is which would be required for the promotion of the objects which my hon. and learned Friend has in view neither he nor the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford undertakes to state. They have very properly abstained from fixing any particular boundaries,

That is a matter with which it is the duty of the Executive Government to deal, and for my own part I have no doubt that the right hon. Baronet the Secretary for the Colonies will enter upon its consideration with an enlarged view of the general interests of the country, and also with that strict regard to justice by which our proceedings should always be characterized. With respect to the first Resolution which has to-night been submitted to our notice by my hon. and learned Friend—namely, "that the privileges of the Hudson's Bay Company ought not to be renewed," I can only say that I am perfectly satisfied with the declaration which the right hon. Baronet has made. I think that declaration is quite adequate to all the purposes of the present day. I trust, however, that the right hon. Baronet, in carrying his views into operation, will ask the law officers of the Crown in what manner a judicial decision upon this question is to be arrived at, rather than again submit to them the question whether it is expedient that there should be any such decision at all. It has become a matter of necessity that the question should be decided. The prospect before us is one of immense magnitude. We have to deal with the important subject of the colonization of that country which stretches from Vancouver's Island to the banks of the St. Lawrence. The habitation of that vast territory, its being traversed by railroads and canals, all are questions which depend very much on the decision which within the next twelve months may be arrived at. The subject is one well-worthy of occupying the attention of the right hon. Baronet between this and the next Session of Parliament. For my own part, I believe with the right hon. Gentleman that we shall have in the territory with which we are called upon to deal colonists attached to the institutions of this country—attached even to her name. We shall have there none of those difficulties to encounter which arise from the endeavour to assimilate different races. We shall not be called upon to blend the Norman with the Dane. Those who are destined to be the future occupants of that country will be men speaking our own language, conversant with the language, accustomed to the habits and ways of England. I am, however, disposed to concur with my hon. and learned Friend near me, that in order to accomplish those great results, we should proceed to establish separate colonies rather than attach the whole of this vast territory together. I am also of opinion that those colonies should be established under the protection of this country, inasmuch as neither they themselves nor Canada could be expected to be in a position to bear for some time the expense of maintaining the necessary military force for their defence. With the exception of some outlay at the commencement they would require no further assistance. That I think is a result which it is most desirable to attain, for I have no confidence in those sickly colonies which owe their safety to State support. I believe it is the nature of the people of this country to struggle with difficulties, to fix themselves upon the soil on which they happen to be planted, and to overcome all those difficulties which circumstances may happen to throw in their way. That great empire which now exists upon the other side of the Atlantic—that great American Union—has been created by the force of qualities such as these, and I entertain no doubt that, by the exhibition of similar qualities, those colonies which may hereafter be established upon the American continent will rapidly increase in prosperity and power.

MR. A. MILLS was understood to say, that on the more fertile portions of the Hudson's Bay territory, there need be no apprehension of a war of races, for there would be none but the whites in those portions of the Company's territory. But if we withdrew or discontinued the Hudson's Bay Company, we ought to be also prepared to place some power in their stead; for it was impossible to expect that either Canada or the Imperial Government could undertake the administration of a country in which colonization was impossible. He wished some machinery could be devised for protecting the native Indians, who in North America were fast becoming extinct through the rifle and the poisonous stuff they obtained from the whites, and it was the duty of the Imperial Government to delay, if it could not altogether prevent, the extinction of that unfortunate portion of its subjects. He certainly agreed in the spirit of the three Resolutions proposed by the hon. and learned Gentleman, and he cordially hoped the day was not far distant when the important question alluded to by the noble Lord would be settled in a manner satisfactory to the people of Great Britain.

MR. LOWE said, he did not think there would be any difficulty in dealing with the Hudson's Bay Company in case their territory should be required for colonization, or that it should be wished to open the fur trade to all the world. The Company were possessed of two functions—as a governing body and as a commercial association. He held that so far as related to the exercise of the delegated functions of Government, conferred upon the Company by Parliament, there could be no claim for compensation in case Parliament should think fit to relieve the Company of those functions; but as a commercial body, he thought, upon the clearest principles of justice and the invariable practice of Parliament, that they were entitled to fair and reasonable compensation if for the public benefit it was found necessary to put an end to their existence. The capital of the Company was only half-a-million, so that there was no enormous amount to deal with, even if that sum should be doubled on account of the high rate of interest which the Company now received. If compensation was given the Government would soon reimburse themselves from the proceeds of sales of land which would take place if emigrants could be induced to settle in these territories. Therefore, he did not see that the Hudson's Bay Company stood in the way of any great object of Imperial policy. There was one course which, notwithstanding the high authority of those who urged it, and the general feeling there seemed to be to support it, he could not look upon with the slightest favour — that was the course of submitting the validity of the existing charter to the judgment of a court of law. If a private person let to another a piece of land which at the time he had not in his possession, and if he subsequently came into possession of that land, the law would not allow him to set up the fact of non-possession at the time of the contract as against the grantee. He put the matter, not as one of legal technicality, but of the first principles of justice. The British Government in the time of Charles II. granted the land in question—whether they then had it or not was no matter—to the Hudson's Bay Company. Since then the land then granted had been acquired, the existence of the charter had been recognized in treaties, Act of Parliament, and other State documents, and he (Mr. Lowe) held that it would be derogatory to the dignity of the Government, derogatory to the dignity and good faith of the House, if they were now to turn round on the Company, and say, "we have permitted you to occupy this territory for 200 years, we have recognized your existence in all kinds of public documents, but now we wish to get rid of you, and we will not even repay you the capital you have invested in posts and buildings for your trading operations; we will raise a question of law, and we will chicane you out of the rights which our own charter gave you." No authority, however high, could induce him to sanction such a step. It would be disreputable in a private individual—it would be disreputable and infamous on the part of a Government. There was no practical difficulty in dealing with the license of the Company. As he understood the matter it was quite indifferent as regarded colonization whether the right hon. Baronet granted or withheld the license, for in that license he believed there was a special exception of land required for colonization. He had been sorry to hear the right hon. Gentleman (Sir Bulwer Lytton) state that, anticipating a refusal from Canada to take the charge of the new territory, he was prepared to take the country at once out of the hands of the Hudson's Bay Company and form a separate colony. He earnestly hoped the right hon. Gentleman would reconsider that determination, for he was thoroughly convinced by the evidence given before the Committee last year that if a separate colony was established it would involve the Government of this country in inextricable difficulty and confusion. This was eminently a practical question, and he begged to call the attention of the House to the position of the territory they were now considering. He might lay down the proposition that no country would do wisely in forming colonies which they could not defend, which she could only reach through foreign countries in time of peace, and which were practically cut off from all communication with her in time of war. And such he thought would be the position of any colony formed in the territory in question. It would not be consulting the dignity or the safety of this country to place her in the position of deserting those of her subjects who most needed protection. He asked the House to consider what would be the means of access to this new colony, and in recapitulating them he would rely only upon the evidence given before the Committee by witnesses who were most thoroughly and practically acquainted with the subject. Now, how did the goods of the Hudson's Bay Company reach the Red River Settlement, and how were the furs and peltries which they bought sent to England? The trade was carried on through Hudson's Bay. Ships had to sail through the stormy waves of the North Atlantic to beyond 60 degrees North latitude, which was a very severe climate. Hudson's Strait, the opening to the Bay, was only open for about two months in the year, and even then was very much encumbered with ice. The goods, after reaching Yorktown, were sent by portage to Lake Winnipeg, and thence to Red River, a distance of 700 miles, in the course of which there were no less than thirty-four different portages—that was the goods were transferred from canoes and conveyed certain distances upon men's backs no less than thirty-four times. Sir John Richardson stated that a canoe with fourteen men, which could carry sixty pieces of goods of 90lbs. each, cost from £300 to £500 for the season. That was the mode of access adopted by the Hudson's Bay Company. There was another way of reaching Red River, starting from Montreal up the valley of the Ottawa, which was almost unexplored, and thence by Lakes Nipissing and Superior, through a country described by Sir John Richardson as a series of hills and valleys, to the Red River. Those were the only practicable routes by which the country could be reached through British territory. The third route, which was through American territory, and would therefore be closed to us by a war, was by the canal Sault St. Marie to the entrance of Lake Superior, and thence to Fort William, between which and the Red River there was a navigation of 700 miles with sixty portages. These were all the routes by which the Red River Settlement could be approached from England without going entirely through American territory. A fourth route, which passed altogether through that territory, but was comparatively easy, was to go from New York to Chicago, from Chicago across to Dubuque, and up the Mississippi to the Falls of St. Anthony; thence to the Red River was a distance of 700 miles, 450 of which were uninhabited; but the road ran over a flat plain, which could in summer time be easily traversed by light waggons. Therefore, in forming a colony upon the Red River, we should be making ourselves responsible for a community which we could not reach in large numbers even in time of peace, without going through four or five States of the American Union, all the imports and exports of which must pass through the United States, and from which a war with that country would entirely cut us off. Therefore, if there were no other objection, he should beg the right hon. Baronet well to consider this subject before he sanctioned a scheme which would, when war broke out, give into the hands of the Americans, bound hand and foot, any number of British subjects who might be foolish enough to go to this colony. He would, however, go further. He maintained that before we established a colony we ought to be satisfied that there was some reasonable prospect of success, and that success could only be secured by its being the interest of a number of persons to go and live there. Now, what possible inducement could there be for a bonâ fide colonist to go to the Red River? He must either grow corn, or salt beef; he must produce something for exportation, and expect to live comfortably on the imports. How was he to get those imports except through the United States, stricken with the immense duties of their tariff? And how was he to pay for what he wanted? If he grew wheat, he would have to carry it 700 miles in waggons to the Falls of St. Anthony, there to compete with the wheat of Minnesota, essentially a wheat-producing State, grown upon the spot. How could he live by such a trade as that? But it was said that the climate of the Red River territory was so delightful that it would induce people to settle there. He would not quote the evidence of the Hudson's Bay people, but impartial military men and surveyors said that the ice in Lake Winnipeg did not melt until the 12th of June, and that it gathered again towards the end of October. That was the length of the summer: all the rest of the year was an exceedingly severe winter—it was as cold as the coldest inhabited parts of Siberia. Throughout the greater part of the Hudson's Bay territory the soil was even during the summer frozen to a depth of two to three feet, and the trees were frozen to the hearts, so as to require a particular sort of axe to hew them. This was the sort of country, so accessible, and blessed with such a climate, by opening which to the general resort of mankind we anticipated that we should be doing great things for civilization. Unless we founded a colony, and did not merely announce one—unless we tempted people to resort to it for purposes of colonization, we had much better leave things as they were. Every one agreed, and this Motion itself did not dispute, that it would be advisable to leave all the districts which could not be used for colonization in the hands of the Hudson's Bay Company, because if you introduced competition into the fur trade it would lead to the introduction of spirits, the demoralization of the Indians, and the indiscriminate slaughter of the fur-bearing animals at all seasons of the year. Therefore, it was quite clear that it would not be desirable to open that trade to competition. He thought that it was equally clear that you would not, in the present state of things, get a bonâ fide colony on the Red River. You might induce people to go there, nominally for purposes of legitimate colonization, but really to engage in the fur trade; but that would be all that you could accomplish. The reason why his right hon.Friend (Mr. Labouchere) proposed to annex this territory to Canada was, that if Canada would accept it she could also make a road to it through British territory, carrying forward settlements on each side, and thus making herself a connecting link between this country and the Red River. Canada was accessible from England, and the Red River settlement would be accessible from Canada. Such a colony we might hope to defend; but instead of making it a colony by itself, we had better, if they would be kind enough to take it, hand it over to the United States. A colony English in name, but consisting chiefly of Americans, would be the most fruitful source of differences between the two Governments which could possibly exist. As he had expressed opinions which were probably held by himself alone, he would conclude by thanking the House for the patience with which he had been heard.

Mr. CHRISTY said, the speech of the right hon. Gentleman who had last spoken sounded very much like that of an advocate for the Company, and was founded upon the evidence taken before the Committee of last year, which was most favourable to them, and would have been received with much more favour ten years ago when the public were thoroughly impressed with the barrenness and inhospitable character of the country and the impossibility of raising any valuable produce from it. But it was now known that this was a magnificent territory, which ought no longer to remain shut up. He would beg to remind the right hon. Gentleman that there was already a flourishing colony at the Red River, which was founded by Lord Selkirk, and which had reached a population of 8,000, notwithstanding the difficulties they had had to contend with under the sway of the Hudson's Bay Company. He believed that the access to it was easy—not by the old roundabout route by Hudson's Bay, but by the route annually taken by the Governor himself. The inquiries of the Committee of last year ended in the difficulty of attaining a solution of what has been so much questioned—the legality of the Company's rights. He had himself contended in that Committee that, unless the Hudson's Bay Company made large concessions steps should be taken to ascertain their rights. If the Company had no right in law, and it was so decided, it was a very simple question, and one merely of policy as to what should be done with this vast territory. The circumstance that an ex parte statement had been made by the law officers of the Crown, and that the Government had come thence to the conclusion not to try the question, might fairly be set against other opinions, including those of the late Attorney and Solicitor Generals, which had been given against the validity of the Hudson's Bay charter. But be that as it might, that need not prevent the House taking the course of giving over to the Hudson's Bay Company, for a limited period, that portion of the territory not suitable for colonization. Even if it was decided that the charter was not valid, provision might be made to enable them to carry on their traffic in furs in the northern and more inhospitable portions of their territory. The right hon. Member for Coventry (Mr. Ellice) had, before the Committee of last year, stated that even if the fur trade were thrown open the Company could prevent any other person trading with the Indians, on account of their long relations with those tribes and by means of posts now in possession of the Company. He believed that the Company could very much exclude other persons from a share in the fur trade even if this commerce was thrown open. But it was said that if the trade was thrown open it would lead to war, either with the Indians or even with the United States. He did not believe that there was any such danger. He had presented a petition from the Red River Settlement, in which it was stated that the apprehended danger to the Indians, from the abolition of the privileges of the Hudson's Bay Company, was entirely illusory, for that body had never laid down any regulations for their government, and that there was no reason why commerce should be carried on through the medium of spirits. He saw no reason why the legal rights of the Hudson's Bay Company should not be settled by a friendly suit, the crown paying the costs of both sides. He thought that the intention of the hon. Baronet at the head of the Colonial Department to consider whether it would not be desirable to found a new colony in the Hudson's Bay territory, governed under the mild auspices of the country, instead of under the rigorous rule of the Company, was a very valuable idea, and he hoped the Government would resolve to carry it out.

MR. GILPIN said, that after the very full and satisfactory discussion of the subject which had taken place, he would not have intruded on the attention of the House, but with the object of alluding to a feature of the subject which had not as yet been much alluded to, and yet which he thought one of the most important features of the whole question. He alluded to the interests of the Indian inhabitants of the territories of the Hudson's Bay Company. He had paid great attention to the monopoly of the Hudson's Bay Company long before he had the honour of a seat in that House,—less, he must confess, as affecting the interests of that Company, or even the interests of the English colonist, than as involving the welfare of the natives of the soil, the protection of whom was put forward, somewhat ostentatiously, as one claim of the Company to the consideration of the House. For himself, he might acknowledge that if that claim could be substantiated, if the Hudson's Bay Company were indeed the protectors of the red man, he should find in this fact the strongest reason he had yet heard against the spirit of the Resolutions of the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield, which went to deprive them of their charter. He had intended to allude to the constitution of the Committee, whose Report had been so often quoted that evening to the House, to the fact that such Report had only been carried by six Members to five, showing the amount of difference of opinion existing in the Committee; but at that hour of the evening he would content himself with saying, that he regarded the recommendations of the Committee as wholly opposed to public, imperial, and colonial interests. If he sought for the basis of those recommendations, he found them in the following considerations :—

"1st. The great importance to the more peopled portions of British North America that law and order should, as far as possible, be maintained in these territories, 2nd. The fatal effects which they believe would infalliby result to the Indian population from a system of open competition in the fur trade, and the consequent introduction of spirits in a far greater degree than is the case at present. 3rd. The probability of the indiscriminate destruction of the more valuable fur-bearing animals in the course of a few years."

First, as to "law and order." He believed that law and order would be better promoted by a well-ordered colony of British subjects than under the present system. He now came to the second consideration, which involved the claim of the Hudson's Bay Company to be considered the protectors of the Indians within their territory; and without desiring to import into the discussion any such element, he must say that such assumption savoured of hypocrisy, in the face of facts which could not be controverted, connected with the history of the Company. How had the Company treated the natives? How had they treated them commercially? He would only trouble the House with one extract on this point from a document he held in his hand, issued under the high sanction of Mr. Robertson Gladstone, of Liverpool :—

"The Company's mode of dealing with the native hunters can scarcely be characterized as honest. It always keeps the Indians in debt. All the articles furnished to them are charged at most extortionate rates. Lieutenant Chappel estimates the profits of the Company in some instances as high as 2,000 per cent.—Voyage to Hudson's Bay, London, 1817, p. 221.

The Rev. C. G. Nicholay says that—

"A fourpenny comb will barter for a bear's skin worth £2."—The Oregon Territory, London, 1846, p. 162.

Dr. King says that—

"A coarse knife, worth, all expenses included, no more than sixpence, is bartered for three marten skins, worth in London five guineas; and that for the skin of the Black sea otter, worth fifty guineas, the natives obtain, in exchange only goods to the value of two shillings."—King's Narrative, vol. ii. p. 53.

Where there is competition with the Americans or Canadians, the Indians obtain better value for the spoils of the chase, and are in a far less degraded condition than where the Company bears absolute sway. He would now quote an extract or two which would, he thought, in the judgment of the House, justify, and more than justify the position he had taken as to the humanity of the Company's treatment of the natives. Here is a specimen of atrocity not exceeded in the annals of the most savage of bucaneers — Spanish or English :—

"In that winter (1836-7) a party of men, led by two clerks, was sent to look for some horses that were grazing at a considerable distance from the post. As they approached the spot they perceived a band of Assineboine Indians, eight in number (if I remember rightly) on an adjacent hill, who immediately joined them, and, delivering up their arms, encamped with them for the night. Next morning a court-martial was held by the two clerks, and some of the men, to determine the punishment due to the Indians for having been found near the Company's horses, with the supposed intention of carrying them off. What was the decision of this mock court-martial? I shudder to relate that the whole band, after having given up their arms, and partaken of their hospitality, were condemned to death, and the sentence carried into execution on the spot: all were butchered in cold blood."—M'Lean's Notes, vol. xi. pp. 222—3.

It does not appear that these ruffians were ever brought to justice. Once more, what had the Company done for the Indians?—When the "merchant adventurers" took possession of the red man's land, there were upwards of fifty powerful races of Indians inhabiting their own vast hunting grounds, many of the tribes numbering 10,000 souls each, even at the beginning of the present century. They were free, prosperous, and happy, according to their wants and knowledge; savages and heathens, indeed, and ignorant of all that the white man calls civilization, but also endowed with all the virtues of the savage, and untainted with the white man's vices. Heathens and savages, for the most part, they still remain, but they are also vitiated and degraded slaves, and but a miserable and scattered remnant of what they were. Entire races of them have been swept away by drunkenness, by diseases introduced from Europe, and by sheer starvation. Cannibalism, which was unknown amongst them until they made the white man's acquaintance, has been a thing of common occurrence. Having lost the use of their native weapons, the bow and spear, they are entirely dependant on the Company for those by which they have been superseded. Guns and ammunition are supplied to them at exorbitant rates of profit; and when withheld, as they are when the hunters become old or otherwise unfit for profitable employment, the Indians are reduced to a state of helpless destitution, and often left to perish of want, or to eat each other. This state of things, in a country possessed and ruled by people who pretend to be Christians, seems too horrible for belief; but the fact is stated on unquestionable authority. Dr. King says—

"When they (the Indians) become advanced in life, and no longer able to hunt, they are refused a supply of ammunition, which has become essential to their very existence, and they die consequently from absolute starvation. . . . . They have become cannibals by necessity; and scarcely a month passes but some horrible tale of cannibalism is brought to the different establishments."—King's Narrative, vol. ii. p. 52.

As to the light in which Indians are regarded by the Company's servants, the Rev. Mr. Beaver, once the Company's chaplain on the Columbia River, makes this declaration—

"God knows that I speak the conviction of my mind, and may He forgive me if I speak unadvisedly, when I state my belief that the life of an Indian was never yet by a trapper put in competition with a beaver skin"—Parliamentary Paper, 227, Sess. 1849, p. 14.

He thought these extracts (which he might have multiplied but for fear of wearying the House) would justify the position he took, that no claims of the Company on the ground of alleged humanity to the natives, of their vast territories, could be successfully pleaded as a reason for the continuance of their charter. As to the anticipated destruction of fur-bearing animals, which seemed to be regarded with such serious apprehensions by hon. and right hon. Gentlemen, he confessed he had small misgivings on the subject: could it be shown that the interests of humanity required the opening of these vast countries to the energies and industry of mankind, he should not regard it as a very serious consequence if ladies had to exchange the skins of fur-bearing animals for the fine woollen manufactures in which our own countrymen excelled. He now came to the question of the charter itself, and without claiming to be a legal authority he thought he could interpret it on the principles of practical common sense. What was the charter? It was granted by Charles II., in 1680, to Prince Rupert and others:

"Never was such a gift as that made by King Charles to Prince Rupert and Co., and to their successors to the end of time. The charter confers upon them 'the sole trade and commerce of all those seas, straits, bays, rivers, lakes, creeks, and sounds, in whatsoever latitude they shall be, that lie within the entrance of the Straits, commonly called Hudson's Straits, together with all the lands and territories, coasts, and confines of the seas, bays, lakes, rivers, creeks, and sounds aforesaid, that are not already actually possessed by or granted to any of our subjects, or possessed by the subjects of any other Christian Prince or State.' This description seems vague and comprehensive enough, especially as its interpretation appears to have been left to the grantees, though there is one important exception, of which more anon. It did not, however, sufficiently correspond with his Majesty's magnificent spirit of generosity towards these highly favoured men, for in a subsequent part of the charter, the grant is extended to 'all havens, bays, creeks, rivers, lakes, and seas, into which they (the Company) shall find entrance or passage, by water or land, out of the territories, limits, or places aforesaid,' which, taken literally, may mean not only the whole continent of America, but the whole world, or at least, such portions of both as were not 'possessed by the subjects of any other Christian Prince or State.' All the earth was clearly accessible by land or water, from Hudson's Bay. Coupled with the grant, there was the reservation that the territories thus handed over to private individuals, should 'be from henceforth reckoned and reputed as one of our plantations or colonies in America, called Rupert's Land;' but the Governor and Company for the time being, and in all time, were declared to be 'true and absolute lords and proprietors of the same territory,' holding it as of the 'manor of East Greenwich,' and paying for it yearly two elks and two black beavers, whensoever and as often as we, our heirs and successors, shall happen to enter' into the said countries, territories and regions hereby granted."

He disputed altogether the validity of the charter. It was easy to say that this or that high legal authority had expressed an opinion that the charter should not be questioned, but he knew enough of the opinions of legal authorities to require to see the case submitted before he was guided by the opinion. Lord Brougham, Serjeant Spankie, and Sir A. Pigott, have given a most decided and conclusive opinion that the charter was illegal in its origin, and even that, if it had been legal, it had been voided by the violation of all its conditions. The King did not give, and could not give, and did not intend to give, the powers assumed by this Company. These powers were contrary to public policy and the express laws of England. The Company had assumed the power of taxing, of making laws, of imprisoning British subjects, and even of life and death. The inhabitants of those territories which England called her Colonies should be recognized and treated as British subjects, and not handed over to their responsible control and government of a Company like this. He thought that the question of the charter and its validity must be thoroughly investigated in the first instance. If, indeed, the Hudson's Bay Company were really as anxious for simple justice as they were represented to be by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Kidderminster, the question would be materially simplified. In common, he believed, with every Member of the House, he only asked for justice —justice to the natives, justice to the colonists, and justice to the Company. But when the Company came to speak of compensation, let him quote the case of Vancouver's Island as an illustration of what sort of compensation would be, or ought to be, required. This island was rather larger than Scotland. [The hon. Gentleman here quoted several extracts from the blue-book, showing the climate and fertility of the island, and its suitability for producing all the necessaries of life.] Now, Earl Grey had actually transferred this island to the Hudson's Bay Company, for ten years, for 5*s.* per annum. An island the size of Scotland, with one of the most magnificent harbours in the Pacific. Well, setting aside improvements, let them take this rent at twenty-five or thirty years' purchase, and the strictest economist would scarcely object to the compensation. A petition had been sent ten years since from 1,000 British subjects in the Red River Settlement, containing the gravest charges against the Company—charging it with one continued policy of the grossest injustice and oppression to the British subjects generally, and to the natives. But Earl Grey had decided that there was no ground for requiring a stronger decision. He regarded this question as a question between England and the Colonies on the one hand, and the Company on the other. Europe's teeming millions seek an outlet for their energies, their industry, their subsistence. This Company held the key of a country which would provide food for the hungry and clothing for the naked, but they turn the lock against the world's wants, and a deaf ear to the necessities of millions. He had endeavoured to show that the original grant was illegal, that it was opposed to sound policy and public interest; and he earnestly hoped that the House would take its stand on the ground of simple justice, would abrogate unrighteous assumptions, and by the adoption of these Resolutions of his learned Friend the Member for Sheffield would declare to the world its determination to uphold against all selfish, private, and illegal claims, the interests of commerce, the extension of civilization, and above all, the rights of humanity.

MR. KINNAIRD said, as a Member of the Committee, that if the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had studied with more attention the evidence given before the Committee, so often referred to, he would have come to quite a different conclusion. There was much force in the observations of the right hon. Member for Kidderminster (Mr. Lowe). The attempt to foster colonization unnaturally at the expense of the mother country was neither wise nor prudent; and in time of war it was almost impossible for her to defend the settlements thus created. Still he hoped that every facility would be given for the advantages of the Red River settlement, and he argued the best results from the foundation of New Caledonia. The evidence taken before the Committee negatived the charges of cruelty towards the natives which had been made against the Hudson's Bay Company. It was the obvious interest of the Company to promote the well-being of the Indians, on whom the success of their trade in furs so much depended, and the condition of the natives under their jurisdiction would bear favourable comparison with that of the native tribes under the authority of the United States. A number of red Indians had been settled under the auspices of the Hudson's Bay Company, and were carrying on farming operations very successfully. He must, however, express his concurrence in the opinion of the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield that it was most desirable that the question, as to the validity of the Company's charter, should be determined.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, the hon. Gentleman near him (Mr. Gilpin) was evidently the representative of the Aborigines' Protection Society, and he had been astonished at the course which the hon. Gentleman, as the professed friend of the Indian population of North America, had pursued. He must say he thought that course was not very likely to effect the object which the hon. Gentleman was desirous of attaining. It was clear, from the evidence given before the Committee, that, whatever might have been the effect of the Hudson's Bay Company's administration in other respects, they had at least carefully protected the interests of the native population. He did not mean to say that the native population of North America were now in a happier condition than before the white man reached their shores, but he would venture to assert that in no instance had the two races been brought into contact with less injurious results to the inferior and savage race. He thought it was proved to demonstration that not only was it the interest of the Company to promote the welfare of the natives, but, upon the evidence of parties entirely unconnected with the Company, it was shown that the Indians received the most kind and considerate treatment from their servants. The hon. and learned Member for Sheffield had treated the subject as an abstract question, without reference to climate, rivers, or other natural obstacles to civilization, and had maintained that monoply must be as great an evil within the Arctic Circle as it was in other regions. He (Mr. Fortescue) believed it was a most fortunate circumstance that there had existed in the distant and inhospitable territory under the control of the Hudson's Bay Company such a power as they had exercised, and he was satisfied that if their authority were destroyed the country would become absolutely valueless, and that it would be impossible to establish an efficient government in its place. He admitted that the time might arrive when certain portions of that territory might become settled and civilized, but he believed that until more desirable and valuable tracts of land had been occupied such a result could not be anticipated. He (Mr. Fortescue) agreed generally in the views which had been expressed by the noble Lord the Member for the City of London and by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe). In his opinion it would be an extremely rash measure on the part of Her Majesty's Government to undertake the establishment of a colony in the Red River district, in default of the action of Canada; for, if such a settlement could be successfully founded, it must certainly be the interest of Canada to undertake the task. He trusted the House would not forget the facts of the case, would not sacrifice the interests of justice, and would not allow themselves to be carried away by the abstract proposition of the hon. and learned Gentleman, which would be committing an act of pedantry instead of an act of statesmanship.

MR. C. W. FITZWILLIAM was understood to say that the Hudson's Bay Company did not manage their territory so well as their Friends asserted, and that the opening up of the district would be a change considerably for the better.

MR. WYLD said, that this discussion had been forced on the House by the circumstances of the times and the state of things which existed in connection with the frontier trade. The fact was that the system of emigration which was now going on to North America would virtually abrogate the exclusive trading rights of the Hudson's Bay Company over a large portion of its territory, and the few armed men at the disposal of the Company were quite inadequate to enforce proper police regulations. He thought that the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Colonies had prepared a satisfactory solution of the question; but he suggested, in the event of the arrangement with the Hudson's Bay Company being carried out, that the right of inland navigation should also be preserved. He believed that the proposed compromise would prove agreeable both to the Canadians and the people of this country.

MR. J. D. FITZGERALD said, that in the few observations which he wished to address to the House he would confine himself to the second Resolution of his hon. and learned Friend—namely,

"That the validity of the exclusive rights claimed by the Hudson's Bay Company under their charter ought at once to be determined by process of law."

The noble Lord the Member for the City of London had impressed upon the House and the Government, not the necessity of obtaining the opinion of the law officers of the Crown upon this point, but of a judicial decision upon the rights of the Hudson's Bay Company. But he (Mr. J. D. Fitz-Gerald) thought it must be obvious that that was the very difficulty which met them on the threshold, and that they could not see their way until those rights had been ascertained. Now, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Kidderminster (Mr. Lowe) said that he thought it would be infamous and disgraceful if proceedings were instituted by the Government to ascertain what the rights of the Hudson's Bay Company were. In this he entirely differed with the right hon. Gentleman; for, assuming that he and other hon. Members only desired that the Hudson's Bay Company should be treated with justice and liberality, he could not for his own part see how it was possible to proceed to deal with them in that spirit until their rights had been ascertained. Those rights, he contended, had never been properly decided upon, for he regarded the opinions given by the law officers of the Crown upon former occasions on the cases submitted to them as entirely valueless upon this important point. The charter of Charles II. to the Company granted them, in consideration of their endeavouring to find the long-sought passage to the Indian Ocean, exclusive rights of trading over certain large districts, together with territorial dominion of an undefined and enormous extent. But he questioned, in the first place, whether that grant of exclusive rights of trading was not a direct infringement of the statutes previously passed condemning all monopolies; and if that were so, he need hardly add that the length of time during which it had been exercised could not sanction or remove its original invalidity. With regard to the territorial rights, he submitted that the opinion given in 1748 was not given upon a case submitted on the part of the public, but was called forth by the claims of rival adventurers. As regarded the colonizing powers of the Company, he reminded the House that Chief Justice Draper had stated, on evidence before the Committee, that for a period of forty years—from 1812 to 1852—the population of the district under the control of the Company had not increased by one individual, although in a neighbouring district a population of no less than 70,000 souls had been created in that time. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would feel it necessary, in accordance with the expressed wish of the majority of Members who had spoken, to put the matter in a train for discussion.

MR. ROEBUCK, in reply said, that the interest which had been manifested by the House in the subject under discussion afforded a sufficient justification for his having introduced it to their notice, and he was happy to be able to add that in consequence of the frank and liberal spirit in which his Motion had been met by the right hon. Baronet the Secretary for the Colonies he should not trouble the House by pressing his Motion to a division. His first proposition was, that the privileges which had hitherto been enjoyed by the Hudson's Bay Company, and which were about to expire, ought not to be renewed. By that he intended to signify that they ought not to be renewed over such portions of the territory as were applicable to colonization; and in that proposition, as far as he could judge, the right hon. Baronet concurred. His third proposition was, that all the land which was applicable to colonization ought to be immediately resumed by the Government; and that proposition too received the concurrence of the right hon. Gentleman. But the second proposition he believed the right hon. Gentleman did not quite agree with, which was that the rights of the Company ought to be at once ascertained by legal process. The right hon. Baronet said that he thought the rights ought to be determined, and that he would apply his mind to the consideration of the best mode of determining them; but he did not say that he would do so by means of a legal process. He came, however, so near to his proposition, that he (Mr. Roebuck) felt that he had better leave the matter in the hands of the right hon. Baronet to be dealt with as he might deem best. He might, however, before he sat down be permitted to advert to the objections which had been raised against the adoption of the course which he proposed. The ball had been led off by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Kidderminster, in opposition to his Resolutions, who had expressed the fears which he entertained of our being led into a war with America should they be adopted; who also objected to them upon the score that the territory in question was not worth being colonized; and upon the ground that the difficulties of reaching it for want of a road would be very considerable. Now, so far as the first objection was concerned, he would only say that he thought that there was much greater danger that such a calamity would arise from our quarrelling about the population which would cross the boundary from America than if we were to colonize from our own side down to the United States. Neither could he concur in the justice of the objection that the territory was not worth being colonized, and in support of his views upon that point he might refer to the authority of Governor Simpson before he had become Sir George Simpson, and had no interest in not telling the truth. Now he was, he must confess, very much surprised at the right hon. Gentleman's geography. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to think that the only mode of reaching the Red River settlement would be by going up the Ottawa; but he must bear in mind that the line dividing the American from the British territories ran through Lakes Erie, Huron, and Superior, and that we might proceed altogether upon the waters of Great Britain upon the north side of Lake Superior. [Mr. LOWE: No!] The right hon. Gentleman might say "No," but he should answer him by saying "Yes." In reply to the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Taunton (Mr. Labouchere) who had made an appeal to the House in favour of the native Indian population, he could only say that, whatever abstract notions of humanity might be involved in the question, it was an undoubted fact that where the white man appeared there the red man faded away. That such was the case was the result of the operation of Nature herself. There was in the Negro a buoyancy of nature which did not render association with the white man intolerable to him; but the red man was a being of a melancholy, a proud, and to a certain degree a noble nature, and it was that very nobility of nature which rendered the mental and physical superiority of the white race unendurable. He therefore disappeared before that superior race, and the only question to be considered was whether it was better for the interests of society and of the world that the red man should be allowed to wander uncontrolled, or that the civilization of the white man should be extended. That was a question with respect to which he thought no difference of opinion could prevail. Having made these observations he should, with the permission of the House, withdraw his Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

BOTHNIA—CLAIMS OF BRITISH MERCHANTS.

COMMISSION MOVED FOR.

MR. CRAWFORD rose, according to notice, to move that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She would be graciously pleased to appoint a Royal Commission to inquire into the Complaints made by certain of Her Subjects of the destruction of their property by Her Majesty's Forces at Uleaborg, in the Gulf of Bothnia, during the recent war with the Emperor of Russia, as more particularly set forth in Memorials addressed by Messrs. Mathiesen and Ritter, and Messrs. Henry Dresser and Co., to the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury. The hon. Member said he had hoped that the necessity for bringing this case under the notice of the House would have been obviated by the Government recognizing the claims of these parties, but as he had been disappointed in that hope he had no alternative, but to ask the House to express its judgment on the subject. The question was an important one, not only as regarded the commercial interests of the country, but as affecting in some degree the reputation of the country as one of the great belligerent powers of Europe, which, in all proceedings in war, and especially in maritime war, should show an example of humanity to other nations. He had no personal interest in the matter, for his business did not at all connect him with Russia or the Baltic; but he brought forward the Motion in deference to the wishes of his constituents, and in justice to the parties whose claims were involved. He wished it also to be understood that he imputed no blame to those gallant officers and men by whom the property in question had been destroyed; they had merely obeyed orders:—no doubt every man, from the admiral, to whose conduct he should have more particularly to allude, down to the common seaman, had behaved as gallantly and honourably as if they had been under the guns of Sweaborg or Cronstadt, but he could not approve of their destruction of the property of peaceable, harmless, unprotected people. The circumstances to which he wished to draw their attention were these: From the papers before the House it would be seen that there were three parties in this case—Messrs. Mathiesen and Ritter, and Messrs. Dresser and Co., of London, and Messrs. Lewin of Boston. He had to deal only with the claims of the two first-named firms; Messrs. Lewin, who belonged to Boston, left their case in the able hands of the hon. and learned Member who represented that town (Mr. W. H. Adams). He might, however, mention that the aggregate claims of all those gentlemen only amounted to £5,446, so that hon. Gentlemen need not fear that by agreeing to this Motion they would impose any serious burden upon the tax-payer. It would be sufficient for him to state the circumstances of the case of Messrs. Mathiesen and Ritter, the other being nearly similar. Messrs. Mathiesen and Ritter were largely engaged in the Baltic trade, trading more especially to the Gulf of Bothnia. In 1853 they purchased a quantity of deals and house timber, which, having resold to a party, he believed, at Hull, they chartered two vessels to bring away from Uleaborg. One of these vessels, the John, reached Uleaborg before the winter set in, but not in time to clear out before becoming ice-bound, and in the spring shared in the conflagration at that port. The other was more fortunate—she did not reach Uleaborg, and, consequently, escaped the fate of her consort. The war broke out in March, 1854. It would not be necessary to trouble the House with many details; but he must mention this fact—that by Orders in Council, for the first time, the principle was introduced in time of war of the immunity of enemy's property in neutral vessels, always excepting articles contraband of war; and war was waged, not against the property of individuals, but against the public property of the State with which we were engaged in hostilities. Russia presented to a maritime enemy three sea-boards for attack. One, Old Russia in the Baltic; another, the White Sea, including the port of Archangel; and a third, the Black Sea, including Odessa, Kertch, &c. Referring first to the White Sea, it would be found that the Orders in Council for the blockade of that sea stated that in the event of any ports not being blockaded neutral vessels might be allowed to trade. The White Sea was not blockaded, and trade was allowed to be carried on by British ships till the 15th of May, and by neutrals till September, when a proclamation placed the ports of the White Sea in a state of blockade. In the Black Sea the same course was pursued. In so doing he thought our Government had taked a wise and proper course. In the Baltic the blockade was established by the gallant Admiral near him (Sir Charles Napier) on the 28th of March. The Orders in Council regulated the time at which British ships should be allowed to clear out from Russian ports, and it was limited to the 15th of May. At that date in the case of the upper ports of the Baltic the sea was frozen, and there was no opportunity afforded to merchants to take away their goods up to the 15th of May. In one case, that of Messrs. Lewin, of Boston, who had a considerable property in those ports on the breaking out of hostilities, they advised the Government of their property being there, and asked leave to remove it, but were refused. He would show the course adopted by Her Majesty's ships in the various Russian seas. The first hostilities of any consequence took place at Odessa, where, a flag of truce having been fired upon, a partial bombardment of the city took place. Questions were put to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Carlisle (Sir James Graham), and to Lord Clarendon on the subject, who said that the greatest caution had been used not to injure private property; and the Duke of Newcastle subsequently said that it was the desire of the Government that during the war private property should be spared as much as possible. No doubt those directions were loyally fulfilled by the officers in command of vessels, and he knew of no case in which they had been disgregarded in the White or Black Seas. The case, however, was different in the Baltic. He must now refer to the operations of the squadron under Admiral Plumridge which had been detached from the fleet of the hon. and gallant Admiral (Sir Charles Napier). This squadron, as soon as the ice allowed, began its operations in the Gulf of Bothnia. It arrived before the Port of Brahestad, situated near the town of Uleaborg, which was the chief town of the province of the same name, and the most northern town in the Gulf. In the Gulf of Bothnia the population had been most friendly towards this country for centuries, and carried on a large trade with us, and we had their sympathies in the war against Russia, until the occasion on which the circumstance occurred which he would now relate. He held in his hand a protest drawn up and signed by six merchants of that locality, which contained a historical narrative of the proceedings of that squadron, by which it appeared that on the 30th May, at three o'clock, a thick smoke was seen rising from Brahestad, and it was found that the squadron under Admiral Plumridge had set fire to the pitch, the yards, and the vessels in the port. The town of Uleaborg, fearing that it would be attacked in turn, sent a flag of truce, demanding what the Admiral meant to do with respect to an unprotected town. In answer to that a proclamation was sent in five languages, to the effect that the English Admiral did not intend to molest or injure private persons or property, that he would only destroy the castles, fortresses, shipping, and property of the Emperor of Russia; that so long as the inhabitants remained in their houses they would be protected, but if they made any attempt at resistance they would be treated as enemies; and the Admiral recommended that all women and children should be sent out of the town. The bearer of the flag stated that there were no Russian imperial property, no Russian troops in the town, nor were there any fortifications. The Admiral said he should examine the ships to ascertain if they contained any articles contraband of war, and that he should destroy the timber in the yard. To this it was replied that the timber was private property, was not fitted or intended to be used for purposes of war, but for export to England; and that much of it belonged to Englishmen who had paid for it. The Admiral said he was sorry for it, but he must fulfil his duty, and if any of the property of his countrymen was destroyed, they must look to their country for compensation. It was in consequence of that declaration that he (Mr. Crawford) now asked for compensation for losses sustained on that occasion. The Admiral went on to say that in ten minutes his operations would begin, that he had plenty of boats, as they would find out in a short time. It was important that the House should understand that the property destroyed was piled up on an island near Uleaborg; none of it was such as, under any circumstances, could be considered contraband of war, but consisted of pine timber which was to be sent to England in the spring. The Admiral sent seventeen boats on shore, and burnt the whole of the property. The question the House had to determine was whether the goods so destroyed were contraband of war, and such as the Admiral was justified in destroying. With respect to articles contraband of war, he held in his hand a convention entered into in 1801 between His Britannic Majesty and the Emperor of Russia, and which still regulated the subject, which was to the effect that in order to avoid misunderstanding as to what was to be considered contraband of war, it was agreed that only such articles as were enumerated, and which would be considered as useful for purposes of war, should be so treated, and a long list of cannons, guns, swords, pistols, &c., was given; amongst those articles timber or wood of any description was not to be found. The clause went on to say that all other articles not mentioned in the list were not to be considered contraband of war. It might be asked if there was any justification for the destruction of this property irrespective of contraband of war? It appeared from this paper, which was printed by Her Majesty's printer, that timber was not an article contraband of war. Moreover, the timber in question had been sold to merchants in Hull for building purposes, and was useless for ship and boat building, and the sellers were obliged to pay compensation to the merchants of Hull for its non-delivery. He was told that there was one ground on which the destruction of this property would be justified by the gallant Admiral (Sir C. Napier), and that was that he had information that at Uleaborg certain gunboats were being constructed by the Russian Government, and that at that place gunboats were constantly built. He (Mr.

Mr. Crawford

Crawford) had before him the despatches of the different officers employed, describing the operations on which they were engaged, in which they state that there had been destroyed in timber, building-yards, and so on, property which the gallant Admiral had in his despatch stated to be of the value of £300,000, but not a single gunboat was mentioned. Some of the inhabitants of Uleaborg declared on oath that there had not been any gunboats or vessels built there for the Russian Government, that the Russian Government had no troops in the town, that there was no Government property there, and that all the property that was destroyed had been sold to Englishmen, and actually paid for; and with regard to gunboats it was especially declared that none had been built there for forty years. It would be seen so far that there was no justification for the attack on Uleaborg. He was unable to comprehend on what grounds any justification of this barbarous proceeding could be based. It could not be said that it had been done to impress the Russians with an idea of our prowess, as it was simply the destruction of undefended property, and it was impossible to have conveyed any part of the stores in question to the Russian fleet, neither could the Russian Government suffer any damage or inconvenience by this disgraceful proceeding. We had only destroyed the property of our fellow subjects, and the effect was to raise the price of the produce in question in this country. This question might be treated on broad and general grounds. In the year subsequent to this occurrence Finland was visited by a famine. He did not mean to connect it with these operations, but he could only say that in Uleaborg not only was merchandise and timber burnt, but a great quantity of salt fish and other provisions. A subscription was raised for the relief of the Finlanders in this country, and £10,000 was conveyed thither by a deputation of gentlemen, members of the Society of Friends, and they stated that instead of the friendship which had existed towards this country on the part of the Fins, there was now an intense feeling of animosity, which was caused wholly by these operations. His (Mr. Crawford's) object in making this Motion was not so much to arrest the sympathy of the House in favour of the inhabitants of Uleaborg as to show that there existed on the part of the owners of the property destroyed a claim on the House of Commons. That property was destroyed without justification, in the teeth of the proclamation of Admiral Plumridge himself; it was not contraband of war; its destruction did no good to us and no damage to the Russian Government. It was a wanton action, which he trusted would not be allowed to pass without reparation. The aggregate amount of the claims was £5,446; having, stated the grounds on which he considered the parties entitled to compensation, he would conclude with his Motion.

Motion made and Question proposed,—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to appoint a Royal Commission to inquire into the complaints made by certain of Her subjects of the destruction of their property by Her Majesty's Forces at Uleaborg, in the Gulf of Bothnia, during the recent War with the Emperor of Russia, as more particularly set forth in Memorials addressed by Messrs. Matthiesen and Ritter, and Messrs. Henry Dresser and Co., to the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury."

MR. ADAMS, in seconding the Motion, expressed his regret that Her Majesty's Government had decided on opposing it. He could not help thinking that both the late and the present Government laboured under some misapprehension of the facts of the case. Last Session the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton (Viscount Palmerston) in answer to a question which he put to him, likened the case to that of a bombardment, and said the destruction of the property might be justified on the ground that it was property lying in an enemy's country, and he had compared the case to the bombardment of Grey Town. He hoped to be able to satisfy the House that this general proposition was not a correct one, but must be taken with very considerable qualification. During a bombardment it was impossible to discriminate; all property must suffer alike, and therefore neither neutrals nor our own countrymen could make claim to compensation; but that was not an accurate description of what took place in the instance before them. The defence of the proceedings at Uleaborg, founded on the circumstance that the timber lay in an enemy's country, and therefore might be destroyed, was a fallacy which pervaded the whole of the correspondence of the Government, being laid down as a broad principle without any qualification. The timber trade was a peculiar one. The payment for timber to be imported into this country was made by British merchants long before the timber was shipped—sometimes two or three years, for it was allowed to lie till a ship could be chartered and sent out for it—in fact, nearly the whole of the timber trade of the Gulf of Finland was carried on with British capital; and therefore it was that this property had remained on the wharves after it had been purchased and paid for. The timber being the property of British subjects, if it had been the interest of any parties to destroy it the Russians might have done so, because it belonged to an enemy; they, however, suffered it to remain. He was better acquainted with the case of Messrs. Lewin, who were his constituents, than with those of the other parties, and a letter from those gentlemen which he now held in his hand, and the reply of the Government, would show that it was no after-thought to represent this property as English property. It was written by Messrs. Lewin as soon as they heard that Admiral Plumridge was about to visit the Gulf of Bothnia, and was dated the 18th May, 1854. In it Messrs. Lewin say:—

"Having in the year 1852 purchased two cargoes of timber lying at Uleaborg, in Russia, and for which, in 1853, I could not obtain vessels to bring the same from there to here, but was in the usual course of business compelled to pay for the same, I shall feel obliged by your informing me if I charter neutral vessels for these cargoes—if such cargoes are allowed to be shipped from Finland—whether such vessels and cargoes will be allowed to be brought here without detention by the Fleet or Government."

The reply they received was that the Lords of the Council, having considered their application, had sent them copies of the Orders in Council, notifications of blockades, and Her Majesty's Proclamation of war, and had to acquaint them that they must be guided by the opinion of their legal adviser. This was all the information and assistance they were able to obtain from the Government of their own country. It was well known that Uleaborg was shut up by ice during a great part of the year; so that even if the Proclamation of war had been known then it would have been impossible to take out a cargo within the time specified. Archangel, Odessa, and other ports were more favoured than Uleaborg, for there cargoes were allowed to be removed till September, while the destruction of property at Uleaborg took place as early as June. It was a great misapprehension to suppose that gunboats or contraband of war lay at Uleaborg. There was nothing of the kind. There were the declarations of the merchants of the place, which they were desirous of verifying before a commission, that the supposition was totally unfounded. Had there been either gunboats or contraband of war, he would admit that they might have been very properly destroyed; but that would have been no justification for destroying timber belonging to British subjects, and adapted only for domestic uses. Supposing, as he believed was the case, there were no gunboats at the place, nor anything contraband of war, then there was the additional circumstance that Uleaborg was a completely defenceless place. In order to justify the proceedings of the Admiral it must be shown that the property destroyed was either the property of the Emperor of Russia or contraband of war. The international law upon the subject was clearly laid down by all the most eminent authorities, as he would prove by quotations from their works. He had of course the highest respect for the opinions of the law officers of the Crown, and should not for a moment presume to set up his opinion in opposition to theirs; but when, on such a question as that under discussion, he found the law officers of the Crown on the one side, and all the great writers on international law, including Grotius, Vattel, Heineccius, and Wildman on the other, he had no difficulty as to the conclusion at which, as a lawyer, he ought to arrive.

Vattel laid down the rule as follows;—

"All damage done to the enemy unnecessarily, every act of hostility which does not tend to procure victory and bring the war to a conclusion, is a licentiousness condemned by the law of nature."—VATTEL, Book 3, chap. ix., sec. 171.

Wildman, a great authority on such subjects, and whose valuable work on International Law was by far the best treatise on that subject which had appeared in modern days, said:—

"By the usage of nations, whether derived from civil or from international law, certain persons and property in the offending state are exempt from reprisals: for example, the property of persons whose residence is merely transitory. The same exemption attaches to property which is under the protection of the public faith."

The Emperor of Russia had certainly recognized that exemption, for the property of British subjects at Uleaborg had not been injured by his acts or those of his subjects. Vattel added,

"And with respect to things, the case is the same as with respect to persons:—things belonging to the enemy continue such wherever they are. But we are not else to conclude, any more than in the case of persons, that we everywhere possess a right to treat those things as things belonging to the enemy. Since it is not the place where a thing is, but the character of the person to whom it belongs—things belonging to neutral persons, which happen to be in an enemy's country, or on board an enemy's ships—are to be distinguished from those which belong to the enemy. But it is the owner's business to adduce evident proof that they are his property; for, in default of such proof, a thing is naturally presumed to belong to the nation in whose possession it is found."—VATTEL, chap. 5, sec. 73.

In the case which he (Mr. Adams) mentioned, the agent of the owners had offered to prove the ownership of the property, but in vain. Grotius, too, took the same view of the rights of innocent parties. He said,

"This is also plain, that before the right of war can entitle us to anything taken, it is requisite that our enemy had first the true propriety of it; for what things may be within the enemy's towns, or other places whereof he is master, the owners thereof being neither subjects to our enemy, nor animated with the same spirit as he against us, cannot be acquired by the right of war. Indeed, there is no reason that authorises us to take the goods of those who are not of our enemy's party, under the pretence that they are found in his country."—GROTIUS, Book 3, chap. 6, sec. 5.

And altogether the opinions of the writers upon the law of nations were strongly in favour of those who now asked for an opportunity of proving their statements. He ventured to think that in this case the parties who were asking for satisfaction at the hands of the Crown and the Government had made out a case as far as a statement could go, and if they had not supported that statement by evidence, it was no fault of theirs, because no tribunal had been offered to them for the purpose.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he was extremely sorry that he was unable to fulfil the expectation which the hon. Member said he entertained of the support of the Government to the Motion. Without occupying the House for any length of time, he hoped he should be able to show that there were two sides of the question. He admitted the perfect fairness with which the hon. Member opposite and the hon. and learned Member behind him had stated the case, and he hoped that the House would agree that the Government had met the question with equal fairness. The hon. Gentleman had complained of delay, but he hoped that the hon. Gentleman was aware that the delay was not the fault of the Government. He thought the hon. Gentleman would admit that the Government might fairly rest its opposition to the claims of these merchants for compensation on the fact that within the last two years no less than four applications had been made to the Government on the subject—two to the Treasury, two to the Admiralty, and, he believed, one also to the Foreign Office. In all these cases the answer was, that the property destroyed was property open to destruction by the law of war, being found in an enemy's country, and that consequently no claim for compensation could exist. Government might have rested their opposition upon their answer; but, looking to the interests involved in the question, they desired to meet the case as fairly as possible. They had accordingly referred the question to the law officers of the Crown, and it was his duty to inform the House that they had given a decided opinion against the claim of these parties. As to the facts of the case there was no dispute. On the 1st of June, 1854, Admiral Plumridge sailed up the Gulf of Bothnia, and sent boats on shore at Ulcaborg, and destroyed by fire a large quantity of pitch, tar, timber of various kinds, and other articles used for the purposes of ship building. The merchants represented by his hon. and learned friend (Mr. Adams), said this was British property, that it ought not to have been destroyed, and therefore that they had a claim on the British Parliament for compensation. The first ground on which they rested their claim was, that this property was altogether of a private nature, and therefore ought to have been respected. His (Sir J. Pakington's) answer was, that the property was not of a private nature; that, on the contrary, it was property contraband of war; and he joined issue with his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Adams) and would tell him that the quotations he had read to the House did not apply to the case under consideration. His hon. and learned Friend used the expression that this was property solely used for domestic purposes. The description given of the timber in question proved that it was fit for domestic purposes, no doubt, but fit also for the planking and decking of vessels. Admiral Plumridge stated, that three-inch deals were most applicable for the decks and bulwarks of gun-boats. The hon. and learned Gentleman had quoted Vattel; and he (Sir J. Pakington) would appeal to the same authority, and would tell him that Vattel included timber and naval stores among the articles which were particularly useful for purposes of war, and therefore were liable to be seized as contraband of war. Having shown what the law of nations was as adopted in England, he would now show what the law of nations was as adopted in France. By a treaty of commerce concluded between Denmark and France in 1842, pitch and tar were also declared to be contraband, together with resin, sailcloth, hemp, cordage, masts, and timber. According to Wheaton's work on the Elements of International Law —according to Kent, whose authority was adopted in America—the same proposition was distinctly laid down; and it was also declared that in a naval war, ships and materials for ships, became contraband. Nobody would deny that the materials destroyed were materials for ships. With regard to the gunboats, it seemed to be disputed that there were any; but, according to Admiral Plumridge, it appeared that the timber was available for building the next batch of gunboats; that twelve gunboats had been built at Uleaborg, and that they were built of materials precisely similar in character to the material that was destroyed. Not only did he (Sir J. Pakington) find among the papers at the Foreign Office that gunboats were built, but he also found, from a letter from Mr. Grey, our chargé d'affaires at Stockholm, what had become of them. Mr. Grey, in a letter to Admiral Plumridge, stated that he had received intelligence from a source on which they could rely that twelve gunboats were launched at Uleaborg in May, shortly before the approach of Her Majesty's squadron. They were afterwards removed inland up the river, and sunk in shallow water for concealment. They were then got up again and fully armed; so that at the very time that Admiral Plumridge approached Uleaborg and destroyed this timber, these very gunboats were sunk in the river for the purposes of concealment; they were then raised again and fully armed for the purpose of carrying on war with England. This, he trusted, would dispel the idea that this timber was not fit for the construction of vessels of war, and was not in any sense contraband of war. Then came the question was there anything in the language of Admiral Plumridge to make an exception to the rule, and to render it improper on his part to destroy these materials. Now, the Royal Proclamation, it appeared to him, justified what Admiral Plumridge did. Stress had been laid on the words not to molest private persons, or the property of private persons, but only the property of the Emperor of Russia. A deputation of the inhabitants of Uleaborg came out to the Admiral, and in reply to the appeal made to him that this property might be spared, told them that it was his intention to destroy all articles that by the law of nations were contraband of war. Again, it was said that the Admiral ought to have respected the property as being that of English merchants; but he (Sir J. Pakington) maintained that the Admiral had no proof whatever of that, and the passage quoted from Vattel on that subject told equally well in favour of the other view of the question. What proof had Admiral Plumridge that it was the property of English merchants? There was no representative of their firms at Uleaborg. [Mr. CRAWFORD: Mathiesen and Ritter had an agent on the spot.] That was not stated. They never made that known to Her Majesty's Government. It did not appear in the papers; it only appeared that a deputation came out and said so and so, and Admiral Plumridge had a right to assume it was an artifice. There was a mass of property there, all of which was contraband of war, and it was impossible to draw a distinction between property on one side of the yard belonging to English merchants, and property on the other side that did not. The opinion of the law officers of the Crown distinctly stated that this property was strictly contraband of war, and thus completely destroyed the case sought to be set up by the memorialists; and however sorry Her Majesty's Government might be for the loss these gentlemen had sustained, and however reluctant they might be to resist the Motion, he could not see that either on the ground of the law of nations, or upon the just view of the case, Her Majesty's Government could come to the conclusion that these gentlemen had either a legal or equitable claim upon Parliament in the shape of compensation for the loss they had sustained.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, he had made many inquiries into the subject, but had never heard that the twelve gunboats were built in May, 1854, sunk in the ice, and afterwards fished up and used in the war by the Russians. He did not believe this story; on the contrary, he fancied there had been a great mistake in the matter; for he could not conceive it possible that a British subject living in Russia would be guilty of such a fabrication. Nor did he think that if it had been true these British merchants would have denied it. He did not wish to say a word on the subject of international law, or to contend that these gentlemen had a legal claim; but he thought they had a strong moral claim. When we made war with Russia we proclaimed that Englishmen and neutrals should be at liberty to remove their goods and merchandise from any of the Baltic ports at the opening of the ice. The 15th of May was fixed as the day on which ships could leave the ports of the Baltic. That date was fixed because it was supposed that at that time the ice would have broken up. As it turned out that was too early a date—the ice at Uleaborg did not break up so early: and that was the sole reason why this property was not removed. If Admiral Plumridge had destroyed property at Uleaborg a day or two earlier than the 15th of May, the British Government must have made good the loss. Why, then, should they not make compensation when the merchants of Uleaborg were unable to remove their goods by reason of the ice not breaking up so soon as was expected? Moreover, the merchants in the White Sea had their property protected as late as August and September, and why should not the same indulgence have been given to merchants at Uleaborg? He contended that this was a pure question of equity, and that it was in the last degree unfair too meet the case by old musty pleas based upon international law. The whole course of proceedings in this matter showed that the property of Russian subjects had been more respected than that of Englishmen. Had the British merchants of Uleaborg known that Admiral Plumridge was coming to destroy their property, they would either have removed it themselves, or placed it under the care of the Russian Government, who could have protected it. It was singular that property placed under the protection of the Russian Government had been reclaimed and recovered at the conclusion of the war; and thus the only enemies from whom the British merchants suffered were their own countrymen. He did not wish to find fault with Admiral Plumridge or Sir Charles Napier; but those officers were like other men, not infallible, and were therefore liable, like other persons, to make mistakes. The whole thing, in fact, was a mistake, and as he believed the property of these British merchants had been destroyed in mistake, he considered the owners were entitled to compensation. He should therefore give his cordial assent to the Motion of the hon. Gentleman the Member for London.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER said, he did not intend to enter into the question whether or not the Government ought to give reparation to these merchants; but he maintained that Admiral Plumridge, having received from Mr. Grey, Her Majesty's Minister at Stockholm, a letter, stating that twelve gunboats had been built at Uleaborg, sunk, and afterwards recovered and fitted out, would not have discharged his duty if he had not taken the step which he did. Until the commencement of the last war he never heard the doctrine that pitch, tar, planking, and timber, were not contraband of war, and no British officer would ever have hesitated to destroy such stores. If you did not do that, how could you distress your enemy and bring him to make peace? If Admiral Plumridge had not destroyed the stores at Uleaborg, he (Sir Charles Napier) would have brought him to a court martial. It was not correct to say that the blockade was declared on the 24th of March. It was declared on the 15th of May; but time was allowed for vessels to escape, and not a single ship was touched till after that period. The British Government was not asked to pay for the property destroyed at Beyrout in the Syrian war, and he did not think that a better claim for compensation could be advanced in the present instance. He denied that any salt fish was destroyed at Uleaborg; Admiral Plumridge touched nothing but what was contraband of war. That was "according to Hoyle." The Admiralty had expressed their entire approval of his conduct, and it was too bad, after the lapse of four or five years, to attempt to question the propriety of his proceedings. Let the present Motion be adopted, and there was no saying what serious charge would be brought against Admiral Dundas for firing shells into Sweaborg. Admiral Plumridge was one of the most gallant officers in the naval service, and the accusation which the hon. Member for London had brought against him was entirely destitute of foundation.

MR. WEGUELIN said, that no charge had been brought against Admiral Plumridge. The question at issue turned upon whether the articles destroyed at Uleaborg were contraband of war. That was a fair subject for inquiry, and the hon. Member for London asked no more than that a Commission should be issued to investigate the whole case. It had been said that the property destroyed consisted of timber and scantling which might be employed in the construction of vessels of war. That was denied in the most emphatic manner, and, for his own part, he did not believe—he suspected that the Government themselves did not believe—that any portion of the property in question was intended for warlike purposes. With reference to what had been said about gunboats, he was convinced that no gunboats had ever been built at Uleaborg. A fairer claim for compensation had never been made out; and, considering that there were plenty of precedents for the course suggested by the hon. Member for London—as, for example, in the case of the bombardment of Copenhagen, as well as in that of Antwerp, when the noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston), who was then Foreign Secretary, and afterwards the Earl of Aberdeen, pressed the claim on the Dutch Government, and after fourteen or fifteen years obtained the compensation required—he trusted that the Motion would be agreed to. He thought that fair ground had been made out for the issue of a Royal Commission to inquire into the circumstances of the case.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he must contend that the various grounds on which the claim for compensation had been sought to be founded entirely failed, Messrs. Mathiesen never made a claim until April, 1856; the first trace of an application from Messrs. Lewin was in November, 1856, and no application was made from Messrs. Dresser until June in the present year, being four years after the transactions took place. Would it be right, then, or convenient, to entertain applications on the subject of compensation made so long after the occurrence took place, and at a time when, if inquiry were granted it would be impossible satisfactorily to arrive at the truth. The Proclamation stated that any Russian vessel which, prior to the 15th May, 1854, sailed from any port of Russia, situated either in or upon the shores or coast of the Black Sea or of the White Sea, bound for any port or place in Her Majesty's dominions, should be permitted to enter such port and dischargo her cargo. That was a great ralaxation of the rules of war; and as these applicants did not come within the terms of the Proclamation, they had no right to appeal to Parliament for compensation, The words used by Admiral Plumridge to the deputation of Finland merchants, who told him that the merchandise in the port was private property, and in great measure belonged to English merchants, had been referred to. Now, all that Admiral Plumridge said was that his instructions were to spare private property, but to destroy all materials of war, and, if British merchants suffered from it, they would have to ask their Government for compensation. Admiral Plumridge did not say they would get it, but that, if they wanted compensation, they must apply to the Government. Yet these Gentlemen remained quiescent for two and four years, and now the difficulty must be intense to trace out the real facts of the case. He did not impute any design to them, but it was incumbent on them to apply at the earliest moment, when the matter could have been properly investigated, and it was not competent for them to make these allegations now, when the matter could not be properly inquired into. The Admiralty considered the claim in 1856, and refused to entertain it. The Treasury afterwards was obliged to refuse it, and then the parties applied to Lord Clarendon, who, acting upon the advice of the Queen's advocate, also refused the application. Another point was whether the articles destroyed were contraband of war or not, but he thought after the discussion which had taken place that point must be abandoned by the advocates of the Motion; for there could be no doubt that they were contraband of war, and were not entitled to protection under the head of private property. He believed the Government were in every respect in the right, and he trusted the House would adhere to the determination come to, after grave deliberation, by the late Government.

MR. CLAY said, the delay in bringing forward these claims was in great measure attributable to him; the subject having been brought under his notice early in 1855, but he advised that the claim should not be pressed until the war was over; first on account of the difficulty of obtaining evidence on the spot, and, secondly, because whilst the war continued there would be an unwillingness to do anything to damp the ardour of the naval officers. It was for the House to judge how far his advice was correct, but he hoped the claimants would not be prejudiced by having followed it. He contended that there was no necessity whatever for Admiral Plumridge to have been so precipitate in destroying this property. He insisted that it was private property, and that it was impossible that it could have been used for the construction of gunboats. He thought Mr. Grey had been deceived by a cock-and-bull story.

MR. MALINS said, that the Solicitor General had stated that a strong circumstance against listening to this claim was that it was not made till 1856 ; but he had a long correspondence in his hand asking for compensation, beginning in June, 1854, one month after the destruction of the articles. That correspondence continued during the whole of 1854, and the gentlemen with whom it originated were requested to state the particulars of their claims in order that they might be submitted to the Government. This correspondence disposed of the argument against this claim, founded on the alleged delay which had occurred in bringing it forward. The claimants were British merchants who were carrying on their lawful calling when they suddenly found that their Government had declared war against the country with which they were conducting their transactions. Under those circumstances they were surely entitled to every protection from their Government. It was admitted that on Admiral Plumridge going to Uleaborg the representatives of the merchants came out and assured him that there was nothing but private property there which was not contraband of war, and that they also claimed his protection for this property. No doubt that gallant Admiral had done nothing but his duty ; but as the parties were perfectly innocent, and their property had been destroyed for the public good, compensation could not now in fairness be refused to them. He could hardly believe that the Solicitor General was in earnest in laying down the extraordinary proposition that if they conceded this demand on the part of British subjects they must be prepared to act on the same principle towards the subjects of Russia and every other foreign Power. To that proposition of his hon. and learned Friend he could not at all assent—there was a broad distinction between enemy's property and English property which had been destroyed for the benefit of England. He appealed to Her Majesty's Government to consider whether, following the example of the late Administration, they had not taken too strict and technical a view of this subject ? The question was whether, on the broad principles of justice which the British Government was bound to act upon with reference to its subjects, the memorialists had not a clear and intelligible claim to ample compensation for the destruction of their property.

MR. PRICE assured the First Lord of the Admiralty that the timber in respect of which compensation was claimed could not be regarded by any practical man as ship-building timber. It was, in fact, essentially house-building timber, and was scarcely ever used for ship-building. At the time of the war representations were made to the right hon. Member for Carlisle (Sir J. Graham), who was then First Lord of the Admiralty, and to Lord Clarendon, in consequence of which instructions were sent out to the naval commanders to protect British property at Riga, St. Petersburgh, Cronstadt, and other ports, and not a particle of British property was destroyed at any of those places ; and as, by some misconception on the part of Admiral Plumridge, the property of British subjects had been destroyed at Uleaborg, he thought the Government ought to regard themselves as responsible for the acts of their officers. In his opinion this was a case in which the memorialists were fairly entitled to compensation, and he appealed to Her Majesty's Government to reconsider their decision, and to grant a Committee.

MR. CRAWFORD, in reply, with reference to an observation of the hon. and gallant Member for Southwark (Sir C. Napier), denied that he had used any language which could be construed as imputing to Admiral Plumridge that he had conducted himself in a brutal manner.

Question put.

The House divided—Ayes 65; Noes 105: Majority 40.

CONSOLIDATED FUND (APPROPRIATION) BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, that if the present system of appropriating without the sanction of Parliament the balances of Votes for particular objects to totally different purposes were pursued, the power of the House over the distribution of the public income would be frittered away. No less than £516,000 of the £4,977,000 granted by the House for the transport of troops to the Crimea had been added, without the sanction of Parliament, to the Vote of £3,900,000 for naval stores for the year 1856-7. With the view of a remedy, he suggested that a clause should be inserted in this Bill requiring a supplementary Estimate to be laid before Parliament of the mode in which the Government intended to appropriate the balances, or within one month after its meeting, if Parliament were not then sitting.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER hoped to be able to show the hon. Baronet, when the Bill went into Committee, that there was nothing unconstitutional in the present practice, and that there had been no abuse of the powers intrusted to the Government.

Bill read 2°, and committed for Thursday at Twelve o'clock.

CHELSEA BRIDGE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

COMMITTEE.

Order for Third Reading read, and discharged.

Order for re-committal read.

House in Committee.

MAJOR SIBTHORP moved, that the bridge should be free to foot passengers on Easter Monday and Whit Monday, as well as on Sundays.

MR. INGHAM moved, that Christmas Day should also be a toll-free day.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, that he had no objection, although he was not aware that Christmas Day was much devoted to out-of-door amusement.

Motion agreed to.

House resumed.

Bill reported, as amended, considered, read 3°, and passed.

JEWS' BILL.

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL moved the third reading of the Bill.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."

MR. NEWDEGATE moved the adjournment of the debate, on the ground that there had been an understanding that the Bill would not be brought on at so late an hour, owing to which many Members had gone away.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he should be glad to postpone the third reading, if it were put down first on the Orders for to-morrow.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the first Order for to-morrow was the Freedom from Arrest Bill, and, as there were great objections to the Bill, and it had very little chance of passing this Session, probably the hon. Member for Northamptonshire might be induced to withdraw it, when the Jews Bill might be taken first.

LORD ALFRED CHURCHILL did not think it at all likely that the hon. Member for Northamptonshire would withdraw his Bill.

Motion made and Question put, "That the Debate be now adjourned."

The House divided:—Ayes 38; Noes 86: Majority 48.

Question again proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."

COLONEL NORTH moved the adjournment of the House.

MR. WARREN again appealed to the noble Lord the Member for London to postpone the Bill.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, he saw no reason why the hon. and learned Member for Midhurst should not, if he were anxious to do so, proceed to address the House. Though the hour was late (a quarter to two o'clock), hon. Members must be prepared to submit, at the present period of the Session, to the inconvenience of sitting somewhat beyond the usual hour.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he saw no reason why the House should not at once be favoured with the additional enlightenment which the hon. and learned Member for Midhurst might be prepared to throw upon the question.

MR. SPOONER protested against proceeding with the Bill, on the ground that many hon. Members had left the House under the belief that the third reading would not be pressed forward at so late an hour.

MR. WALPOLE did not think that much was to be gained by persevering in such Motions as that for the adjournment of the debate and of the House. For his own part he could not vote for the Motion for the adjournment of the House, as he was anxious that the other Orders on the paper should be proceeded with.

MR. NEWDEGATE contended that it was unfair to press on the Bill under the circumstances.

Motion made and Question put, "That this House do now adjourn."

The House divided:—Ayes 22; Noes 99: Majority 77.

Question again proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."

MR. W. N. HODGSON moved the adjournment of the debate.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE thought, that as there was a large number of hon.

Sir Henry Willoughby

Members who were opposed to the Bill, and as there was no absolute necessity for proceeding with it at once, it would be but doing an act of courtesy to afford those hon. Members an opportunity of expressing their opinions with respect to the measure.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL, not wishing to inconvenience the House, consented to postpone the Bill until this day, although the sense of the House had been shown by the last division.

Debate adjourned till To-morrow.

House adjourned at a quarter after Two o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Wednesday, July 21, 1858.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1ª Government of New Caledonia; Cornwall Submarine Mines; Chelsea Bridge Act Amendment; Returns to Secretary of State; Detached Parts of Counties.

2ª Inclosure of Lands; Legitimacy Declaration; Sheep, &c., Contagious Diseases Prevention; Turnpike Acts Continuance; Public Health; Vaccination (Ireland).

LEGITIMACY DECLARATION BILL.

SECOND READING.

LORD LYNDHURST moved the second reading of this Bill, which was founded on a great omission in the law of this country. There was no such defect in the law of Scotland. By that law a man could obtain a declaration as to the legitimacy of a marriage and of the issue. This Bill had been introduced to remedy the defect in the law of England, and it had met with the support of the most eminent lawyers in the other House of Parliament. He hoped under these circumstances that their Lordships would be of opinion that it should be read a second time. It was proposed that the matters dealt with by the Bill should be taken before the Court for Divorce and Matrimonal causes, which was presided over by that eminent Judge, Sir Cresswell Cresswell. The Court would have power to cite parties and to hear them, and no person was to be bound by the decision, except those who had been cited or had appeared. Every guard had been adopted to prevent injurious consequences from arising.

Bill read 2ª (according to Order), and committed to a Committee of the whole House To-morrow.

PUBLIC HEALTH BILL.

SECOND READING.

On Motion,

LORD WYNFORD said, it would be useless to purify the Thames unless they stopped those noxious trades that were carried on on the south side of the river. At present there was a most unfortunate defect in the law with regard to those noxious trades, for the Act did not affect those which were established when it passed, though as to grave yards already existing there was power given to suppress them. He suggested to the Government to consider whether they should not put in a clause giving power to inspectors to visit these places, so that either with or without compensation such horrible nuisances might be suppressed.

LORD HARDWICKE had no doubt that many of the places referred to were a great nuisance to the surrounding neighbourhoods, though originally they had probably been constructed in the suburbs of the city, and the city had afterwards closed around them. This Bill did not, it was true, go so far as his noble Friend required, yet it gave the Privy Council power to inquire into any such matters as those referred to.

LORD WYNFORD said, it did not give them the power of suppression.

Bill read 2ª and committed to a Committee of the whole House To-morrow.

JEWS BILL.

Returned from the Commons agreed to.

OATHS BILL.

Returned from the Commons with a Message, that they do not insist upon this disagreement to the Amendment made by the Lords upon which the Lords insist.

House adjourned at Five o'Clock, till To-morrow, half-past Ten o'Clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, July 21, 1858.

MINUTES.] NEW MEMBER SWORN—for Stamford, Sir Stafford Henry Northcote.

PUBLIC BILLS.—3° Cornwall Submarine Mines; Detached Parts of Counties; Jews'; Marriages (Moscow, Tahiti, and Ningpo); County Court Districts.

OPENING OF THE NATIONAL GALLERY ON SATURDAYS.

OBSERVATION.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE said, he wished to call attention to the fact that the National Gallery was shut on Saturdays, while by a recent resolution of the trading community upwards of 50,000 persons in the metropolis now enjoyed a half-day holiday on that day. He wished to know from the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether it was not possible that arrangements could be made to give that vast number of persons the opportunity of visiting the Gallery during the hours of their half-holiday? He thought the case might be met by opening the Gallery from one to six o'clock on Saturdays.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he thought that some arrangement such as that indicated by the hon. Member would be very desirable, and that the regulations of the National Gallery should be made to harmonize with that beneficial change in the national manners which gave the working classes a half-holiday on Saturday. He should most certainly give his attention to the subject.

TRANSPORT OF TROOPS TO INDIA.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

VISCOUNT GODERICH claimed the indulgence of the House while he brought before it a question of a personal character, which he regretted to say involved a reflection upon some proceedings of the hon. and gallant General the Member for Westminster (Sir De Lacy Evans), for whom he entertained, on account of his public services, the highest esteem. Had those proceedings concerned himself alone he should not have been inclined to trespass upon the attention of the House; but they concerned other Members of the Committee upon the Transport of Troops to India, and it was at their request that he brought this subject before the House. Another reason for his doing so was that he had been told by the highest authorities that the proceedings of the hon. and gallant General were altogether unprecedented, and if they did not constitute a breach of the rules of the House, were so gravely irregular that they ought to be submitted to the House, in order that they might not be drawn into a precedent. In the month of February last a Committee was appointed, on the Motion of the hon. and gallant General, to inquire into the mode in which reinforcements had been, and ought in future to be, sent from this country to India. That Committee originally consisted of Sir De Lacy Evans, Viscount Goderich, Lord Stanley, Sir John Pakington, Mr. Horsman, Sir Edward Colebrooke, Sir James Elphinstone, Mr. Adderley, Sir Charles Napier, Mr. Bernal Osborne, Captain Vivian, Mr. Byng, Mr. Willoughby, Mr. Crawford, and Mr. Danby Seymour. Shortly afterwards, owing to the change of Government, Lord Stanley and Sir John Pakington retired, and, upon the Motion of the hon. and gallant General, Mr. Sclater-Booth and Lord John Hay succeeded them. Mr. Adderley was reappointed. That Committee took evidence, and at the commencement of the month of June the gallant General, as Chairman, presented to it a draught Report, with the conclusions of which several Members felt that they could not concur. In consequence he (Viscount Goderich) put in circulation certain Resolutions, and when the gallant General moved the second reading of his Report the hon. Member for the City of London (Mr. Crawford) moved, as an Amendment, that before considering any Report it was desirable to ascertain by Resolutions the opinion of the Committee on the principal points involved in the matters referred to it. That Amendment was carried by a majority of one, and certain resolutions were adopted, which, with the evidence, had been reported to the House. That Report having been made, he did not contemplate that the personal conduct of any of the Members of the Committee would be called in question. The hon. and gallant General, however, entertained a different view of the course to be pursued, and had circulated a document in which he appeared to insinuate that some Members of the Committee were actuated by motives unworthy of their position, and of the trust which was reposed in them by that House. If the hon. and gallant General entertained this opinion, he might either have expressed it in the Committee or in that House, when those whom he accused would have met him face to face. The latter course the House knew that he had not pursued, and so far was he from adopting the former, that on the last occasion on which the Committee sat he (Viscount Goderich) publicly assured the gallant General that it had been with the greatest regret that he had opposed the acceptance of his Report. The hon. and gallant General replied to him courteously, and he left the Committee without supposing that the hon. and gallant General entertained the slightest suspicion that he had been actuated by any other than public motives. Instead, however, of adopting either of these two courses, the hon. and gallant General put in circulation the document to which he was about to call the attention of the House. Before noting the contents of that document, however, he must refer to the mode in which it was circulated. It was printed with the outward appearance of a Parliamentary paper, and circulated under a covering having the heading "Parliamentary Proceedings;" consequently it bore the appearance of having received some Parliamentary sanction. To whom was it sent? It was circulated, he believed, among the other Members of the House, but it was not sent to himself, to the hon. and gallant Member for Bodmin (Captain Vivian), to the hon. Member for Dover (Mr. B. Osborne), or to his noble and gallant Friend the Member for Belfast (Lord John Hay); and yet it was upon their conduct that it reflected. The first intimation which he received was from his hon. Friend the Member for Middlesex (Mr. Byng), who was one of the Members who voted for taking the draught report into consideration; but when his hon. Friend applied for a copy for him, he was told that his (Viscount Goderich's) name was not upon the list, and he could not receive one. He never had received a copy, and that which he held in his hand he had only obtained by the kindness of a friend. The hon. Member for Bodmin also applied for a copy, and was refused. Therefore, if he had a right to complain of the contents of this paper, he had still more right to complain of the manner in which it had been circulated. It did appear to him that in withholding from those whose conduct was criticised in it copies of this document the gallant General was guilty of a want, he would not say of courtesy or generosity, but of the fairness which one man might be expected to extend to another. The paper consisted of the draught report of the gallant General, which had been printed in extenso in the published Report of the proceedings of the Committee, of extracts from the appendices to the Report not yet in print, and of a preface written by the hon. and gallant General, and for the sake of circulating which it must have been that this document was issued. It was to this preface that he especially wished to draw the attention of the House. This preface contained severe criticisms on the conduct of those who differed from the hon, and gallant General, and the charge insinuated was that the seven Members of the Committee who voted against taking the Report into consideration were actuated, not by a sense of public duty, not by the result of the evidence and their own thought, but by a desire to screen the Members of the late Administration from the censure which they deserved. The hon. and gallant General said in this preface—

"The task of drawing up a draught Report devolved upon the Chairman, who deemed it his duty and for the public advantage to mark without favour or affection, and in direct terms, the serious official mistakes alluded to. This, however, seemed displeasing to several of his colleagues. The draught Report was read a first time on the 8th of June. On the 18th the Committee met again, when a Motion was made to consider Resolutions before taking into consideration any draught Report. There were present during this Vote—Sir De Lacy Evans, in the chair, who voted for considering the Report; Sir C. Napier, Sir J. Elphinstone, Mr. Horsman, Mr. Byng, Mr. Sclater-Booth, and Mr. Willoughby, who voted for proceeding by Resolution before considering any draught Report; Lord John Hay, Mr. D. Seymour, Sir E. Colebrooke, Mr. Osborne, Captain Vivian, Lord Goderich, and Mr. Crawford."

The hon. and gallant General then went on to say—

"A technical majority of seven of these were apparently anxious to obtain for their political friends, as far as practicable, the usual amiable verdict, 'Nobody is to blame.' As a censure of the late Administration was involved in the result, an impartial judgment by the Committee could only have been expected from a fair balance of parties in the Members, but that balance did not eventually exist, because the unexpected change of Government during its proceedings deprived it of the valuable assistance of the present President of the India Board, the First Lord of the Admiralty, and the President of the Board of Health. It had also the effect of depriving the Chairman of the right of voting."

That sentence he did not quite understand, because the gallant General had the same rights as any other Chairman of the Committee.

"Thenceforward the seven Members of the Committee abovenamed, some of whom had held office under the late Government, or had been supporters of it, were enabled, though not in a numerical majority, to carry any Motion agreeable to their wishes."

That the hon. and gallant General should say that the majority were quite wrong in their conclusion did not surprise him, but what they had a right to complain of was, that in a document privately circulated he accused them of having been actuated by wrong motives, not by a sense of public duty, but by a desire to screen the Members of the late Administration from a censure which they deserved. To that assertion on his own part, and on the part of those who acted with him, he gave the most distinct and emphatic denial. He was most especially surprised that the gallant General should have made such a charge against the hon. Member for London (Mr. Crawford), who, as the representative of the first constituency in the kingdom, might have been considered above any such suspicion, and who, on the very last day of the sitting of the Committee, moved the insertion in the last Resolution limiting the praise there given to the East India Company, and most remarkably excluding Her Majesty's late Government from all share in it. He should also have thought that the character of his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Bodmin (Captain Vivian) and the manner in which he had criticised the conduct of the military departments with reference to the war in India, would have saved him from such an accusation. For himself he would say nothing. He would content himself with giving a distinct denial to the charge made by the gallant General, and would leave his character to the judgment of the House. He must, however, call attention to the manner in which the gallant General had criticized the proceedings of the Committee. Having stated that the Chairman could not vote in favour of his own report —as, of course, according to the rules of the House, he could not—he went on to say that Mr. Adderley, though entertaining opinions entirely in unison with those of the Chairman, did not feel at liberty to vote in this division for reasons apart from the merits of the question. He called upon the gallant General to prove that the right hon. Gentleman referred to did approve his draught report, or had even read it. He believed the fact was, that his right hon. Friend concurred in his opinion as to the conduct of Sir George Grey at the Cape, but he doubted whether there was any further concurrence between them. He agreed with the gallant General in regretting the retirement from the Committee of the President of the India Board and the First Lord of the Admiralty; but as the draught report said that there was reason to fear that the present Government were committing the same mistake as their predecessors in sending troops round by the Cape, it was doubtful whether that document would have received the support of the noble Lord and the right hon. Baronet. The hon. and gallant General then went on to criticise the language and grammar of the Resolutions. With regard to that matter, however, he would not trespass upon the House. What he was anxious to do was, to give to the charge of the hon. and gallant Officer, impugning the motives of those who sat with him on the Committee, a most distinct denial. The course taken by the hon. and gallant Officer was entirely without precedent, and if followed upon other occasions would materially alter the character of Select Committees. Members of Committees stood towards each other in friendly and, to a certain extent, confidential relations. They deliberated with closed doors; other Members of the House were excluded, the object, doubtless, being to enable the Committee to consult with the utmost freedom. It was obvious that that object would not be attained if members of a Committee were to be subjected to a criticism of their conduct and motives in coming to a particular Resolution. As far as his own character and feelings were concerned, he should not have thought it necessary to bring this subject before the House, but having taken a rather prominent part in the Committee, and having been requested by his Colleagues to vindicate their proceedings, he had considered himself bound not to shrink from a painful duty. He would be glad to accept an assurance from the hon. and gallant Officer that he did not intend to impugn the motives of those whose names he had mentioned in his pamphlet; but if the hon. and gallant Officer persisted in his assertions, then all he could say was, that he should feel he had discharged a duty he owed to his friends, leaving his own character to the impartial judgment of the House of Commons. With the view of giving Sir De Lacy Evans an opportunity of making a statement, he would formally move the adjournment of the House.

SIR DE LACY EVANS, who was imperfectly heard, was understood to say that he was not surprised, nor did he regret, that the noble Lord had brought forward this subject, although he thought that due notice had not been given. He himself had arranged with three or four Members of the Committee to call attention to the question of the transport of troops to India on Friday next, because he believed that a full and ample discussion of the whole matter was required by the public interests at the present moment. He could assure the noble Lord that, on personal grounds, he regretted having felt himself obliged to cause the publication which occasioned the noble Lord's present remarks; and he certainly should not have done so, had not the noble Lord and his friends so inadequately appreciated the great national importance of the matter. The noble Lord urged that, if he (Sir De L. Evans) had any complaint to make of the Committee, he should have urged it in the Committee; but the fact was that he had done so, and, he was sorry to add, not in the most polite terms. When the few sentences termed Resolutions were brought forward as the result of three months' labour, concluding in the effect with the statement that no department of the Government was to blame, and that "considering the sudden emergency, and the distance which the troops had to be sent, the Committee were of opinion that credit was due to those on whom the sending of the troops devolved," he (Sir De L. Evans) exclaimed that such Resolution was neither more nor less than a full exoneration of the late Government. If that was not objecting, he did not know what was. It was not correct to say, therefore, that he abstained from stating his objections in the Committee. The noble Lord had spoken of the impropriety of circulating privately criticisms upon the conduct of a Select Committee. How could a document be called private which had been sent to all the principal Members of the House of Commons, including, if his memory served him rightly, the noble Lord himself, and the apparent official publicity of which the noble Lord, in the early part of his speech, had compared to a Parliamentary paper? He had asked the printer of the House for 100 copies of the draft Report, and, setting down 100 names from recollection, requested him also to forward them through the post; and as soon as he heard that the hon. Member for Dover had been inquiring for a copy, he ordered one to be sent to him at the Reform Club. [Mr. OSBORNE: I never got it.] The noble Lord considered that he (Sir De L. Evans) had made grave imputations as to motives against certain Members of the Committee, but really all he attributed to them was an amiable desire to favour their political friends. He was astonished to find this represented as a grave charge. It was merely a laudable attempt to obtain the usual amiable verdict, "Nobody to blame." It was said, also, that he had violated the forms of the House. He was ready to express his regret if he had done so; but there were some things which, in his judgment, were more important than forms, and those were the great interests of the people. At the same time, he much regretted having fallen into any irregularity, and begged to state, frankly and explicitly, that he had no intention to wound the feelings or impugn the motives of the noble Lord and his friends. When he first moved for the appointment of this Committee, the present Chancellor of the Exchequer told him that he came upon the House "like a thief in the night"—such were the very words used; but he did not think it necessary to call upon the House to protect his character against such an imputation; on the contrary, he laughed at it, and he saw no reason why the noble Lord and his friends should pursue a different course on the present occasion. But, on the subject of party, had not they recently heard from the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and from the noble Lord the Member for London also, time after time, homilies on the importance of party in a constitutional Government, and the importance of upholding party ties? He had heard over and over again, from the right hon. Gentleman and the noble Lord, that the only true way to conduct the affairs of this House was by maintaining party organization and respecting the ties of party. Such high authorities he was bound to suppose were right; and was there, therefore, anything wrong in his (Sir De L. Evans) saying that the majority of this Committee were good friends of their party? He never should have thought of this criticism on the proceedings of the Committee—which, he admitted, was singular—but for the importance of keeping attention directed to the subject, seeing that the Session was drawing rapidly to a close, and the crisis in India did not yet show symptoms of being brought to a speedy termination. The Report, as it appeared to him, indicated a magnificent contempt for facts, and for the evidence on which it proceeded. He (Sir De L. Evans) stated last Session, when the tidings of the mutiny were first received, that it would be practicable to send troops by the overland route. At the same time, he urged that steamers should be employed as well as sailing ships, and expressed his regret that orders had not been at once sent to the various Colonies to expedite the forwarding of whatever military resources they could spare to meet the emergency. He also recommended that some of our great war steamers should be brought into requisition for sending out troops. There was another reason for calling attention to the matter, in the fact that, though the Resolutions of the Committee had been published, the evidence had not been yet circulated. But what in fact was the real state of the case? The evidence completely bore out the statements made on moving for the Committee. Admiral Leeke stated that two or three war steamers, sent at once from this country with troops, would have had a great moral effect. The senior member of the Council of Bombay gave similar testimony. Captain Harris, the naval assistant, who had been sixty-eight times across the Red Sea, and over the route he (Sir De L. Evans) recommended, declared that there was no single objection to it; and the Quartermaster General in Egypt in his Report, and Colonel Fraser, who had conducted the transfer over Egypt, of the dragoon regiments from India to the Crimea, had both borne testimony to its practicability. After such evidence, he thought the House and the country would be surprised at the conclusion to which the Committee came. He contended that the overland route was proved to be perfectly safe; and it was important, therefore, that the country should be made aware of the serious mistakes made by the late Government on this subject, in order to provide, as far as possible, against a repetition of them. These were his objects in the course he had taken.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I rise to order, Sir. I understand that the House, in consequence of a personal charge having been made against some of our Members, agreed to grant an opportunity for a vindication of the character of the Members of the Committee, and also to afford an opportunity to the hon. and gallant General to substantiate his charge, or to give such explanations as he might think necessary. With that view we have consented to the postponement of business of great importance, as I am sure that on all occasions, when the personal conduct and the personal character of any hon. Member is concerned, there is no sacrifice which we will not be ready to make; but I put it to the hon. and gallant General whether the opportunity thus afforded by the House should be made use of to go into a discussion of the whole question which was the subject of the Committee's investigations? Such a discussion would lead to a debate of great length, and therefore, I would put it to the hon. and gallant General whether it would not be more in consonance with the understanding on which the House permitted this matter to be brought forward to confine himself on this occasion to the personal considerations, without going into the general question?

SIR DE LACY EVANS: This matter is before us.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The evidence taken by the Committee is not before us.

SIR DE LACY EVANS said, he should be sorry to trespass upon the indulgence of the House, but he certainly thought himself free, on the Motion of adjournment, to make some remarks upon the evidence taken before the Committee. As he stated orginally, it was on public grounds, and not from any personal considerations, that he wished the subject to be inquired into. But as the right hon. Gentleman did not wish the discussion to be prolonged, he would but refer to one statement of the Committee, which he thought demanded some comment. They stated that, though the overland route might be advantageously resorted to in an emergency, it would not be advisable to rely upon it for the transport of troops to India. Now, he had only adverted to the case of an emergency ("Question!"). If this is not the question, I have nothing more to say.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, in all these cases, in which the conduct of a Member of this House, and especially a Member who, on so many grounds, is entitled to our respect as the hon. and gallant Member for Westminster, is impugned, there are generally details of a painful character which it is desirable that a fair opportunity should be afforded of discussing. But in this case I think it proper that the House should take an early opportunity of expressing its opinion. It does appear to me, after having listened, not only to the noble Lord (Viscount Goderich), but to the gallant General himself, that he (General Sir De L. Evans) has committed a very irregular act. That Act, the irregularity of which he himself admits, is, I think, not free from considerable impropriety also. I do not understand how the business of our Select Committees is to be carried on in a manner to give satisfaction to this House and to the country if, when the proceedings of a Select Committee are concluded, any hon. Member of that Committee who has not succeeded in having his opinions adopted, is not only to play the critic but to circulate a document which impugns not merely the judgment but the motives of his colleagues who were in the majority against him. Suppose this proceeding of the hon. and gallant General was accepted as a precedent, and that after a Committee had come to a decision and made its report, an hon. Member, who may be in the minority on that Committee, should publish a pamphlet imputing motives to the majority, and circulate it amongst Members of this House? I think the inconvenience to the public business as well as the injury to the private feelings of hon. Members would be so great that it is not necessary to make it the subject of comment. The hon. and gallant General has alluded to me—I am sure in no unfriendly spirit—in regard to some observations I made when this Committee was first proposed. Those remarks were made, not certainly in my character of leader of the House, but in a character of far less responsibility. However, I am sure the hon. and gallant General will not for a moment put in the same class observations made openly, in the full heat of public debate, and which can be immediately noticed and answered, with a document written and printed and circulated certainly in a manner and under conditions which, whether intended or not, succeeded in preventing the parties most interested from being acquainted with their contents. Sir, the gallant General will not on reflection put under the same head that freedom of debate which always is indulged in during our discussions in this House, and which is necessary to a frank and satisfactory criticism of public affairs, with the course which he has thought proper to adopt. Now the hon. and gallant General has, I am sorry to say, directed most of his observations in vindicating the course which he took, and which I think all Members of the House must regret that he did take. At the same time the hon. and gallant General has frankly expressed his regret if he has not pursued the usual course. He has expressed, in a manner more marked and emphatic than any other part of his observations, his regret that he should have hurt the feelings of any hon. Member who served on that Committee or should have violated the usual order of proceeding in this House. I trust, therefore, that that will be considered sufficient, and that this conversation may now end. The noble Lord has fairly and completely vindicated the conduct of himself and his colleagues whom he represents in this matter, before both the House and the country. The gallant officer has shown to the House—what indeed was not necessary—that in all he has done he has been animated solely by that high sense of public duty which always actuates him. I hope, therefore, we shall not be drawn into debate on this matter; especially as the matter is not formally before us, and the House is not asked to give any opinion on the subject. The object of this conversation has been, I apprehend, not, on the part of the noble Lord, that the House should express any censure on the conduct of a hon. and gallant General, whom we all very much respect and honour, but rather that he should place the conduct of himself and his colleagues in a right position, and also that the general rules regarding the conduct of business by Select Committees should not be changed, or in any way departed from without some notice to this House, conceived in such a spirit and expressed in such a manner as that the violation of our rules should not be drawn into what I think would be a very dangerous precedent. The object of the noble Lord being entirely gained, I think this Motion should end without any feeling on the part either of the noble Lord or of the gallant General, which would disturb that accord which I hope will always characterize our debates, and which tends so much to maintain the dignity of our privileges.

VISCOUNT GODERICH said, that he had not the slightest wish that this debate should be continued after the regret which he understood the hon. and gallant General had expressed for having impugned the motives of the majority of the Committee. He most cordially agreed with what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and hoped that the hon. and gallant Gentleman would not permit anything that had passed to interrupt that courtesy and good feeling amongst the Members of the House, which he (Lord Goderich) concurred with the right hon. Gentleman in thinking were so necessary to be continued. He thanked the right hon. Gentleman for the handsome manner in which he had done him justice; and would now ask leave to withdraw his Motion.

Motion by leave withdrawn.

JEWS' BILL.—THIRD READING.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read for resuming adjourned debate on Question [20th July] "That the Bill be now read the third time."

Question again proposed.

MR. WARREN: Sir, I purpose to intrude for a few minutes only upon the indulgence of the House while I state the grounds of my unconquerable repugnance to the provisions of this Bill. I have to thank the noble Lord the Member for London for the ready courtesy and kindness with which he met my application to him last night, that he would not proceed with the Bill at a late hour; but I was taken by surprise when at an early hour this morning I found that, by what appeared to me, I own, something like a little management in a quarter not far from me, the intentions of the noble Lord were nearly frustrated, and might have been so, had not a number of hon. Members on this side the House resolved that the matter should not be huddled up in a corner, and the Bill passed in so discreditable a manner. Sir, nothing that I have ever heard since I had the honour of a seat in this House, has satisfied me that the fundamental principle of this Bill is one to which a Member of a Christian Legislature can possibly give his assent. This Bill which has been sent down from the House of Lords, comes to us under circumstances so extraordinary and so utterly unprecedented that everybody must have been taken by surprise. It is a conclusion in which nothing is concluded. It is a concession in which nothing is conceded. It is a settlement in which nothing is settled. And I do believe in my conscience that every Member of this House, on both sides, whatever his views on the great question before us, really entertains that opinion. The noble Lord the Member for London is deservedly a great constitutional authority, and has much experience as a Member of the Legislature; but he has not one syllable to say in favour of this extraordinary production of the wisdom of the upper House,—of which I desire to speak with unfeigned respect and deference,—except that he receives it simply because he cannot get anything better, and that at all events it is, in his view, a step in what he considers the right direction. We have several of the occupants of the front bench on this side of the House in favour of the Bill, yet we have had no explanation from any of them of the nature of its precious provisions; whilst there seems to be on the part of the House generally a sullen acquiescence in the passing of the Bill. It is considered as bad a Bill as can be; but, as the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Gilpin) said the other night, bad as it was, it would be accepted by him, because he saw at present no chance of getting anything better. If this Bill does involve a great principle, and the country believe it does, is it, I ask, consistent with the dignity of this House to pass it in the manner — the furtive manner, in which it was attempted to be passed at an early hour this morning? not, certainly, by the noble Lord the Member for London, to whom I again tender my thanks for the readiness with which he consented to give us the opportunity of deliberately expressing our opinions. In the name of those friends with whom I am acting, I would also thank hon. Gentlemen opposite for the promptness with which they responded to the appeal addressed to them on the same occasion by the hon. Member for Maidstone (Mr. Hope). Sir, I know it is utterly in vain for me to move, as I am moving, an Amendment that the Bill be read a third time this day three months. I have no doubt that within twenty minutes or three quarters of an hour from the time at which I am speaking, the Bill will have received the formal and final sanction of this House; but that is no reason why the Members should not listen with patience for a few minutes to one of those who have often taken part in this great contest, especially as the present is the last occasion upon which I shall open my lips upon the subject. For that very reason, then, I ask the House to favour me with their indulgence, whilst as a Member of this Christian Legislature I protest against the passing of the Bill. The other branch of the Legislature very recently, within a few weeks, appeared to justify the confidence of the country that it was firm in its determination to uphold the Christian character of Parliament. The Bill which was sent up to their Lordships by the House of Commons they rejected by an overwhelming majority; but at length, in the very hour of triumph, as we thought, a scheme was propounded by a noble Earl which resulted in the Bill now before us, and placed us in a totally different position with regard to this important and harassing question. The Bill provides that one co-ordinate branch of the Legislature may receive as an element—as one of its Members—a person whom the other co-ordinate branch of the Legislature solemnly pronounces to be morally unfit to legislate for a Christian country. Now I think that that is a wholly unprecedented course—a course which is calculated to lower the Legislature in the estimation of the country; and that those who have been parties to this so-called compromise, will find that it turns out to be nothing but a sham, or in the words of my right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Cambridge, a piece of patchwork legislation. And here I beg to thank my right hon. Friend, for the noble part he took the other night, in coming forward and unhesitatingly committing himself to that view of the question. I follow humbly and at a distance in his steps, and I say that if it were possible for anything to raise him in the estimation of the country, in the estimation of the educated, the thinking, the religious classes of the community, and the great and distinguished constituency which have done themselves the honour to elect him as their representative, it would be the fearless conduct of my right hon. Friend in differing from so many of his colleagues on that occasion. But, bear in mind that it is by no means all smooth sailing in respect to this Bill; for I find, upon looking at the division list, that on the Motion for the second reading, not fewer than twelve Members of Her Majesty's Government in this House went into the lobby with the opponents of the Bill, of whom four were Cabinet Ministers. And I do entirely concur with my right hon. Friend, that, if this important step is to be taken, of admitting the Jews to seats in this House; if the great principle, in opposition to which we on this side have so long, so anxiously, and consistently laboured, is to be established, it ought to be done in a direct and straightforward manner, in a manner worthy of the dignity and character of the British Legislature. Let both branches of the Legislature concur in submitting to Her Majesty a Bill which she shall have the satisfaction of knowing is the production of the united efforts of the two Houses with a view to future united action upon it. But, with reference to this Bill, nothing of the kind has taken place. I repeat that the Bill is presented to us under false colours. It is not a compromise; for the case is not one for a compromise in the opinion of the conscientious Members of the Legislature. It is not a concession; for it is a case in which no concession can be made, except by those who unhesitatingly range themselves under the banner of expediency, as opposed to that of principle; and I shall never be tired of enunciating the truth, which I so deeply feel, that that which is morally wrong can never be really expedient, however it may appear so to shallow, short-sighted, and selfish politicians. About a century ago another Jew Bill was submitted to the Legislature. In the year 1753 a Bill was brought forward in the other House of Parliament, and sent down to this, and passed, after much opposition, for the purpose of enabling Jews to be naturalized without first partaking of the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper. I am alluding to the Act 26 Geo. II., cap. 26, and it recites—and the recital is particularly significant in reference to the present case — the Act of the 7th James I., which required that every person, before being naturalized, should have taken the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper one month before the Bill for naturalization was presented to the Houses of Parliament. It then goes on to say, that "Thereby many persons of considerable substance, professing the Jewish religion, are prevented from being naturalized." On that ground the Legislature was prevailed upon hastily to pass that Act—the 26th Geo. II.—and so "certain persons of considerable substance, professing the Jewish religion," were entitled to be naturalized as such, without receiving the Sacrament, or giving evidence of their being members of the Established religion of the country. But what became of that Act? Why, it was repealed in the very next year—the year 1754—because of the strong indignation which it had excited throughout the length and breadth of the land; and on that occasion an ancestor of a noble Friend of mine in "another place" particularly distinguished himself by the spirit and power with which he contributed to that result. The Earl of Egmont said, that if the Act of 1753 were a proper measure it ought not to have passed into law until the country had had an opportunity given it of pronouncing an opinion on the measure; and he declared in his place in Parliament that if on the general election then pending, any Member of the House should be found supporting it before the people of these realms, he would be there to oppose him in order to mark the sense he entertained of the surrender of principle involved in the acceptance of the Bill. Now, I cannot help thinking that much of what was then said is especially applicable to the present case. Rather more than a century has since elapsed. That Act of 1753 was repealed in 1754; and it was not until the year 1830 that the question of the admission of the Jews into the British Legislature was brought forward by certainly an excellent person (Sir Robert Grant). Ever since that time the struggle has been maintained to the present moment, and only a few weeks ago the country, as I have already said, supposed that the matter had been set at rest, at least for another year, by what had just taken place in the other House of Parliament, when, to their and our astonishment, a sudden change of opinion was announced on the part of that House. Sir, I say I cannot help thinking that the measure we have now before us ought not to be passed into law until the country shall have had an opportunity given them of answering a specific and direct appeal as to whether the admission of Jews, as such, to seats in this House is consistent with their sense of duty as a Christian community; and if an affirmative answer were returned, everybody must give way to the public opinion of the country so expressed. Whilst I still retained my own conscientious convictions and opinions upon the subject, I should, nevertheless, say, that the Legislature was bound to give effect to that public opinion, as it has already done on several memorable occasions. But if we this day set our seal to the extraordinary Bill before us, we are at once declaring that in this House we are ready to receive a person whom the other House declares to be morally unfit for entrance into either House; that although their Lordships will not receive such a person there, we may, if we choose, receive him here. I hold that that is a position of things derogatory alike to the character and dignity of this House—nay, to the whole Parliament—and equally offensive to the feelings of members of the Jewish persuasion, whom the Bill vouchsafes to give us an opportunity of seating in the House if we think fit. In whatever light I regard the measure, I protest I see nothing but irresistible reasons for persevering in my opposition to the principle on which it is founded. And I ask the House why they should give it a third reading, when there is not a single Member of the House who will rise in his place and say that it has his cordial approval? Is that a fitting position for the House to occupy before this great country? Shall we be conciliating the respect of that country, by passing a Bill effecting an organic change in the constitution of Parliament, of such vast moment in the opinion of three-fourths or four-fifths of the most enlightened and pious members of the community, in the way in which we are challenged to pass this? Sir, I am not one of those who regard the assertion of Christian principle, or the maintenance of Christian supremacy in a Christian legislature, as a mere counter with which heartless politicians may play the selfish game of politics. I believe Christianity to be the vital source, the very mainspring of the welfare and prosperity of the country, and that it is only by submitting ourselves to its injunctions, obeying its principles and practising its precepts, that we can promote the happiness of our species, advance the interests of this mighty empire, and commend ourselves to the blessing and favour of Almighty God. I know that there are French philosophers, so called, in the present day who speak of Christianity as a decaying superstition, a form of religion nearly effete, though still useful to statesmen and politicians to further the ends they think expedient, so long as any considerable number of persons are found believing in an expiring faith. But, if they were to be the last words I have to utter in this House, I would with indignation and horror repudiate all such doctrines. I would say that, as members of a Christian Legislature, we are bound to assert the supremacy of Christianity in principle, in practice, in our public, and in our individual capacity; and that he is a traitor to Christianity, he is false to his own convictions, and lost to a sense of his duty, as a member of a Christian Legislature, who is, for an instant lukewarm or backward in expressing his opinions upon a matter of such unspeakable moment as that involved in the present discussion. If a flagrant dereliction of principle is involved in the Bill introduced, but in a straightforward manner by the noble Lord the Member for London, the present Bill varies from his only by its greater departure from principle, and the unsatisfactory and discreditable grounds upon which it is based. The noble Lord the Member for London occupies a worthy place in the history of his country; and I tell him here to his face that I know he is really ashamed to have his name connected with the passing of such a Bill as this through the House of Commons. It is true that the noble Lord, who has been throughout his career the sincere, the dignified, the temperate, the conciliatory, the constitutional promoter of the great but, in my view, unhappy change now impending over us, may say that he accepts this wretched Bill as an instalment—that he regards it as a step in the right direction, and in a guarded and stern spirit, not acknowledging it to have any good in itself, except so far as it gets in the thin end of the wedge, and will enable him to secure the final triumph of the principle for which he has so long contended. But has the House well considered the statement which a very few years ago fell from the lips of my right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Oxford, himself one of the most brilliant and successful defenders of the measure against which we contend? He, nevertheless, was obliged to admit that if a Bill for admitting Jews to Parliament should become the law of the land, it would undoubtedly tend directly to the separation of Church and State. I ask the House, is it prepared to sanction a change of that description—a change, moreover, presented to us, at last, in so anomalous and discreditable a form as it is by the Bill upon the table? Sir, I belong, and have always belonged, to a party which is called Conservative; and if the principle upon which we have from the first resisted the admission of Jews to Parliament, and which as I have shown involves as many other momentous changes, is sacrificed, I, as a Member of the Conservative party, do not see what there is really left that is worth fighting about. The next thing to be surrendered is that exponent of the union between Church and State, which is to be found in the maintenance of church rates. The enemies of the Established Church—all who contend for the unqualified and unconditional abolition of church rates—will find their hands strengthened, and the path before them cleared, by the enactment of the Bill now under consideration. For many of the occupants of the front bench below me, Sir, I entertain feelings of the warmest regard and personal and political confidence, and especially for the noble Earl at the head of the Government, at whose hands, unsolicited, I have received a great and proud academical distinction. I will not attempt, therefore, to disguise with what pain and reluctance I feel it my imperative duty to stand up in my place and protest against any Bill sent down to us with the noble Earl's sanction. I should hardly have ventured to take the part I now do if I did not believe that, in yielding reluctantly to a pressure of circumstances constituting an exquisite—I may say an excruciating embarrassment which all must appreciate—the noble Earl is really acting contrary to his better judgment. Nay, I go further and say, that to pass this Bill with the sanction of Her Majesty's Government, will inflict a very deep wound upon that great Conservative party, the Members of which constitute the most attached and faithful supporters of the noble Earl and of those Members of the Government, not few, thank God! in number, who have shown themselves entitled to the confidence of the Conservative party in the country. That party is greatly shocked and deeply hurt by the step which has been now taken. It is not a noisy, it is not an agitating party; but I shall be very much surprised, indeed, if unlooked-for results do not follow the adoption of this measure. It may even lead, for aught I know, to new political combinations, and effect not only temporary but permanent changes in the relations of parties, which are not contemplated by those who have so unexpectedly sanctioned the introduction of this Bill to the House. Dr. Paley has some admirable remarks in his Chapter on Government, one of which is this. He says, that in politics the most important and permanent effects have for the most part been incidental and unforeseen, a proposition, he continues, inculcated for the caution which teaches that changes ought not to be adventured upon, without a comprehensive discernment of the consequences, without a knowledge as well of the remote tendency as of the immediate design. He gives various striking instances which are familiar, I have no doubt, to many Members of this House. But I follow this matter no further.

As for the structure of this Bill, brief as it is, I think I may challenge the acutest intellects in the House to say that they can make sense, especially of one of the sections. But I pass on. The House of Lords have not only sent us down this Bill, but returned that which a majority of this House had sent up to them, and have accompanied that latter Bill with their Reasons for not agreeing to it; and I must take leave to say that in all the records of our constitutional history and of our Parliamentary annals I do not know of any thing approaching, in inconsistency, and, if one must speak out, in utter absurdity—the course of procedure which is now forced upon us. I appeal not only to those friends with whom it is my pride and pleasure to act on all occasions, not only to the friends and adherents of the great Conservative party in this House; but I fearlessly appeal to hon. Gentlemen opposite, whether in their opinion also we are not called upon to enact a derogatory legislative absurdity. But I have now done. Sir, the members of the House of Lords are privileged to exercise a function which we are not. Peers who dissent from the majority, may place upon the journals of that House their reasons, in the form of a protest, and some of these protests contain the loftiest sentiments and noblest expressions of wisdom and patriotism that the annals of mankind can furnish. We have no such privilege entrusted to us by the Constitution. We speak only by our votes, and by those discussions which precede and govern our votes; by those debates which instantly find their way to every quarter of the country—of the world indeed—and by which the nation, so vitally affected by our proceedings, acquires an opportunity of knowing what were the premises from which its representatives deduced the inferences eventuating in the contents of our statute-book. But, with the leave of the House, I will sum up these remarks, some of which I have made with no small pain and reluctance, by reading the grounds upon which I protest, to the last, against this, or any Bill admitting Jews into either House of Parliament. Several of those reasons, I am sure, must commend themselves to the judgment of even hon. Gentlemen opposite, who are so near the hour of triumph that they may well—as I am sure they will—be forbearing and patient. I Protest, then, against the passing of this Bill, because—1. In language used in "another place," a Jew, demanding admission, as such into the Legislature of this Christian country—and that for such purpose the profession of Christianity required from other members of the Legislature be dispensed with—is a man repudiating HIM, who is the central point of the whole Christian Revelation, and declaring HIM to be an impostor. The Jew must, therefore, in the whole tone of his thoughts, and in the whole series of his principles, be so at variance with the principles and tone of thought of a Christian community, that he cannot safely be trusted with the discretionary power of making laws for that Christian community. 2. That it is reasonable and just that none but Christians should be Members of the Legislature of a Christian country, whose laws are, and have for ages been, professedly Christian. 3. That the object specified in the summons to Parliament being to consult "for the state and defence of this kingdom, and the Church," it is a mockery to summon a Jew to take part in such deliberations. 4. That a Jew cannot, as such, join in the prayers with which both Houses of Parliament have from time immemorial commenced their daily deliberations, one of such prayers concluding with a supplication that "the result of all our counsels may be the uniting and knitting together of the hearts of all persons and estates within the realm, in true Christian love and charity one towards another, through Jesus Christ our Lord and Saviour." Such prayers a Jew must treat with derision, or recoil from them with horror. 5. That the greatness or smallness of the number of Jews who may be admitted into this hitherto Christian Legislature, is immaterial, the principle contended for by the opponents of the Bill being finally and completely surrendered by the admission of a single Jew, as such, and of right. 6. That the fundamental principle of the Bill is one which, when formally adopted and promulgated by the Legislature, will tend directly to lower the influence of Christianity upon public opinion, and promote indifference to Christianity and unbelief. 7. That the formal and deliberate surrender of the exclusively Christian character of the Legislature, is fearfully inauspicious at the moment of inaugurating a new system of Government for India; and is calculated to entail disastrous consequences on legislative and executive action when made known to the many millions of the Queen's subjects in India. 8. That the admission of Jews into the Legislature is opposed to public opinion and the wishes of the people, which ought to be distinctly ascertained by means of a general election before taking a step so seriously affecting the constitution of the Legislature.—And here I beg leave to pause for one instant, to point out that I have found the signatures to petitions presented during this Session against the Jewish claims to be 14,500 in number, and those in favour of them only between 300 and 400. 9. That the Bill now before the House empowers one of two co-ordinate branches of the Legislature to admit into its number those whom the other has solemnly declared to it that they are "in a state of moral unfitness to take part in the legislation of a professedly Christian country;" and from such an anomalous and incongruous organization, no safe or advantageous legislation for the highest interests of the country can proceed. 10. That the Bill before the House is, in the above and other respects, without precedent in our legislation; opposed to the genius and spirit of the Constitution; offensive to the Jew; derogatory to the dignity of this House; provocative of disunion and collision between the two Houses; and violates equally the principles of both parties to this unhappy contest. Lastly. That the admission or rejection of the Jew as a member of the Legislature is either morally right or morally wrong; and, as such, cannot legitimately form the subject of concession or compromise.

Mr. Warren

I most sincerely and respectfully thank the House for having listened with such patience to one who, upon this question, may be said to be in extremis. Henceforth my lips are sealed, so far as this matter is concerned. When this Bill has passed into a law, no doubt a Resolution will be submitted to the House for the practical carrying into effect the objects of the Bill. That Resolution will doubtless be agreed to with acclamations by the majority; the usual organs will announce to the country and the world at large that the result was received with vehement cheering; but from that moment I believe will date the decline of the moral and religious influence of the House of Commons. Sir, I have no quarrel whatever with any Member of the Jewish persuasion. With regard to the particular gentleman whom the City of London has returned as its Member, who takes his place so frequently under that gallery, and is so soon—it would seem—to find himself on the floor of the House, and sit on its benches, I have only to say that I cannot anticipate, without emotion, the moment when he will stand at that table;—when a new volume will be presented to him for the first time in the annals of the House; when he will put on his hat, and take an oath which is utterly different to, and irreconcilable with, the oath which all other Members of the House have taken, and must take before they can occupy a seat in this House. Well, Sir, if such be the will and pleasure of the House, then there is of course nothing left for the minority but to submit; but to submit with a solemn protest against the entire proceeding. I now beg to move the Amendment, of which I have given notice, that the Bill be read a third time this day three months.

Amendment proposed to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."

MR. HOPWOOD, in seconding the Amendment said, that it was a bold assertion to make; but if the Bill passed in its present shape, he believed they must of necessity exclude the Jew from Parliament. By the first clause any Member professing the Jewish religion, and coming to this House to be sworn was not compelled to use the words "on the true faith of a Christian;" but, according to the second clause, it was provided that, "in all other cases, except for a seat in Parliament, the words "I make this declaration on the true faith of a Christian" should be omitted. He really should like to have an explanation of that. He had pointed out the seeming discrepancy to his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Adderley) who had addressed the House, the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, and a great supporter of the Bill opposite, the hon. Member for Sandwich (Mr. Hugessen), and none of them was able to give a satisfactory explanation of the matter; in fact, they could not understand it. What, then, he wished to know, was the use of passing a Bill which few cared for, everybody despised, and nobody could understand? He thought the clauses were contradictory in the extreme; for whilst the first admitted the Jew, the second excluded him; and he believed that if, after the passing of the Bill, a Jew were to present himself and take the oath, omitting the words "on the true faith of a Christian," any hon. Member could move that the Act had not been complied with. He would take the liberty, therefore, of suggesting to the noble Lord the Member for London, that his better course would be to withdraw the Bill, and next Session introduce a measure that should be a little more intelligible and consistent with itself.

MR. ROEBUCK observed that Dogberry, in a fit of virtuous indignation, wished that somebody would write him down an ass; but the House of Lords, unlike Dogberry, without calling for extraneous aid, had done that piece of business for themselves. A more remarkable proceeding never occurred in the annals of Parliament, for the Lords, after stating that a Jew was morally unfit to sit in Parliament, sent down a Bill by which the Jews might be admitted to Parliament. He accepted the Bill, but his opinion of the wisdom of the Lords was not increased. But it was not surprising, as the House of Lords was always doing the same thing. He recollected that the measure to do away with the Test and Corporation Act was described by the Lords as the destruction of the constitution; but they passed it nevertheless. Then, again, it was said by the Lords, that Catholic emancipation would destroy the Protestant constitution of the country, but the Lords passed that also. Then came the measure for amending the representation of the people, and the Lords nearly drove the country into revolution by opposition to that Bill; but, in spite of their strong feeling that the British constitution was about to be destroyed, they assented to that Bill likewise. Then the English and Irish Municipal Corporations Acts were both destructions of the constitution, according to the Lords, but the Lords passed them both. At last came that measure, which was to destroy, not the English constitution alone, but the English people—namely, the abolition of the Corn Laws. The Lords were in fits about that matter, and thought ruin was coming on the country headlong. Well, the Lords passed that measure, and now the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Warren) was thoroughly astounded at what the Lords had just done. The truth was, they had done a good thing in a foolish manner. If the Lords had passed the Bill of the noble Lord the Member for London, they would then have done in a straightforward and candid way what they had now done, for the sake of saving their dignity, as they fancied, in a paltry, pitiful, and disgraceful way. The House of Lords had cut a remarkable antic on this occasion. It had attempted to maintain its own dignity, and, in so doing, it had covered itself with dirt. He congratulated the House of Lords upon its feat, and he congratulated the country upon having obtained a right, even from the folly of the House of Lords.

MR. SPOONER said, he felt greatly honoured that the vote he had given on the last occasion had been thought worthy of the remarks which had been made, not only in that House, but in those public organs to which they were indebted generally for very accurate accounts of their proceedings; with reference, however, to that vote, he wished to set himself right with the House and with the public. It had been stated that his vote was given under a mistake. Now he wished to say that it was given under no mistake at all. It was given advisedly, and with a full conviction that it was a right vote. His vote on that occasion had nothing whatever to do with the merits or demerits of the Bill. If the question had been that the House should resolve itself into Committee on that day three months, he would have unhesitatingly supported such a Motion; but what was the fact? Every hon. Member who had spoken against the Bill in the course of the debate, recommended that no division should take place on that occasion, and he concurred in that opinion. A division was, however, suddenly challenged by some two or three hon. Gentlemen who sat behind him, and who did not assign any reason for the course they adopted. The effect of negativing the Motion before the House would simply have been to occasion great inconvenience to hon. Members, because the Speaker could not have left the chair, and the only result would have been the loss of a day, and at such an advanced period of the Session, he for one was not prepared to make such a sacrifice. He wished it to be understood, therefore, that he had neither given his vote by mistake nor had he changed his opinions. He had acted advisedly; and if his opinions with reference to the Jew question had undergone any change, he would have frankly stated the fact. He would not have followed the example of many others in proclaiming that he retained his opinions while he reversed his vote. He hoped this explanation would satisfy those who were under the impression that he had given his vote either by mistake or in consequence of a change of opinion. He had been informed that the noble Lord the Member for London had charged certain members of the Conservative party in that House with want of respect towards the noble Earl at the head of the Government. Now, he begged to tell the noble Lord that he entertained very great respect for the Earl of Derby; he also felt great respect for the noble Lord himself; but, however deep that respect, nothing should restrain him, so long as he had the honour of a seat in that House, from exercising that freedom of speech which the right hon. Gentleman in the Chair always claimed for the House at the opening of every Parliament, or muzzle him in the expression of his views upon any measure which came before the House, no matter the quarter in which it might have originated. With regard to the Bill itself, he agreed with the hon. and learned Member for Midhurst (Mr. Warren) that the ingenuity of man could not have devised a measure more calculated to degrade the House of Lords, to drive the House of Commons into the commission of an absurdity, and to insult the very persons to whom the Bill professed to afford relief —for any person of the Jewish persuasion taking his seat under the provisions of that Bill, took it also under the ban contained in the "Reasons" sent down from the other House for being morally unfit to legislate in a Christian house and for a Christian community. He believed this measure would by no means settle the question, and he would give his vote for the Amendment.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE said, that it was not for him to defend any inconsistencies of the House of Lords, or to palliate any absurdities of the present Prime Minister; but when he heard it asserted by hon. Gentlemen opposite that this Bill was an absurd measure, which every one despised and nobody could understand, he would venture to state that, in his opinion, the Bill would effect the purpose for which it had been proposed, and that it would not hereafter prove a despicable measure, although it had come from the House of Lords. Indeed, he had no right to cavil at the Bill, for the fact was that the measure was simply the Resolution of which he gave notice in December last, wrapped up in the form of a Bill. When the noble Member for the City of London introduced his Bill on this subject in December, he (Mr. Duncombe) had said of it that it seemed as if it was framed for the purpose of tempting the pruning-knife with regard to one of its clauses, and that had been the case; for when it was sent back by the House of Lords on the 30th of April, the clauses relating to the Jews were omitted. On the 11th of May the House placed a Jewish member upon a Select Committee, and sent him to confer with the Lords as to their reasons for rejecting the clauses relating to the Jews. That step placed the House of Lords and the Prime Minister in a new position. It was very well known that in the House of Lords a great deal of bigotry, prejudice, and intolerance existed on this question, but the noble Lord at the Head of the Government was rescued from his difficulties by the intervention of the Earl of Lucan, who brought forward the Bill now under consideration. Lord Brougham truly stated at the time of these occurrences, that the moment the House of Commons placed a Jewish member, who had not taken the oaths, upon a Select Committee, and sent him to a conference with their Lordships, the contest as to the admission of Jews into the House of Commons was at an end. It was said that a compromise had been made on this question, but there had been no compromise so far as that House was concerned. The fact was that the House of Lords had made a concession, because they found such concession was necessary. He only wished the concession had been made in a more noble and generous spirit by assenting to the Bill of the noble Lord (Lord J. Russell), with the restitution of the clauses which had been struck out in the House of Lords. The noble Earl who brought in this Bill had stated that he was aware that by the Resolution of the House of Commons a Jewish Member had been placed upon the Select Committee, and he expressed his hope that that hon. Gentleman did not attend the conference because it would have been an insult to their Lordships. The noble Lord might, however, easily have ascertained from Lord Eversley, or the Bishop of Carlisle, or any other member of the conference, that Baron Rothschild attended and voted upon the Committee, and that he was also present at the conference. He (Mr. Duncombe was convinced that by such a proceeding, neither that House nor Baron Rothschild intended to offer any insult to the House of Lords, and he did not believe that any of the Peers who conducted the conference felt themselves insulted by the presence of a Jewish member. Baron Rothschild asked his (Mr. Duncombe's) advice as to whether he should attend the Committee and the conference, and he told him by all means to do so, as then was the moment to prove himself the champion of a great principle. That step did much to settle this question. He saw at that moment an hon. Gentleman, a member of the Jewish persuasion, who had been returned to that House by the city of London on five different occasions, sitting, as it were, by favour, among strangers below the bar, while he ought by right to be seated within the precincts of the House. [The hon. gentleman referred to Baron Rothschild, who was sitting on the benches allotted to Peers beneath the Speaker's gallery.] It was disgraceful and discreditable to a reformed Parliament of the 19th century that any man should be excluded from that House on account of his religious opinions, but he rejoiced that this exclusion would speedily be removed by the present Bill, which he did not regard, therefore, as so despicable a measure as it had been represented to be. It had been said that the feeling of the country was opposed to the admission of Jews to Parliament, but he thought that statement was unjustifiable, for a member of the Jewish religion had been repeatedly returned to that House by large majorities, and year after year they had seen the representatives of important constituencies voting in favour of the object which would be accomplished by the Bill before the House. The struggle upon the question of the admission of the Jews to Parliament, which was now about to terminate, was not likely to be soon forgotten, but he trusted that the acrimonious language which had been used in the course of the discussion would ; and that without reference to the religious opinions of any party or sect whatever they would hereafter meet only for the purpose of consulting for and promoting the rights, welfare, and the happiness of all classes of Her Majesty's subjects.

MR. NEWDEGATE: Sir, the hon. Member for Finsbury has appeared in the character of the apologist general, for the measure before the House. He has apologized for the House of Lords ; he has apologized for Lord Derby; he has apologized for the nature of the measure itself. He has endeavoured to reconcile this House to this measure, which I humbly contend is most vicious in principle. Very different was the tone of the hon. Member for Sheffield: he declared that the House of Lords has written itself down an ass, because that House has declared its reluctance to having this measure forced upon it. He says also that their Lordships have at different times, of late years, unwillingly passed measures which they considered dangerous to the constitution of the country, and condemns the House of Lords for having entertained these scruples. Now, I wish the hon. Member would some day state to the House what he understands to be the constitution of the country. I have been in the House with the hon. Member for some years, and I have heard him support changes of many kinds as being consistent with the constitution of the country. I should be glad therefore to know what is his impression, not only of what the constitution is, but what it ought to be. It appears to me that the hon. Member, and those who think with him, accept every concession to their demands with contumely, and are for ever assailing the House of Lords for not yielding implicit obedience in a spirit of sufficient humility. I deeply lament this Bill. I understand it as a concession wrung from the House of Lords contrary to their own opinion against the admission of Jews to Parliament. I do not defend the House of Lords in the course which they have taken, because if this is a measure contrary to their judgment they ought to have rejected it. I do not defend the conduct of Lord Derby, who has agreed to a measure contrary to his principles, because I think he ought to have appealed to the country. I see, in the form of this measure, that it is the intention of its framers to give this House time to reflect, which, in reality, is a recognition of the fact that the country ought to have been appealed to. I cannot say anything in condemnation of the principle of this Bill, and of its tendency to destroy the Christian character of this House, that I have not already ventured to state ; but when the conduct of Lord Derby is assailed, I cannot hear all the imputations which are heaped upon him, without calling attention to the difficulties of his position. Now, who has been the main promoter of this infraction of the Christian character of Parliament on this side of the House ? Why, the Chancellor of the Exchequer. We know that the Chancellor of the Exchequer—himself of Jewish extraction—fosters towards the Jewish race feelings which one can trace in almost every work of fiction which he has written. Especially do we find that feeling honestly and frankly declared in the chapter which he has interpolated in his biography of Lord George Bentinck. He claims as the right of the Jewish race the government of the other races of mankind, and claims for them this supremacy, whilst they remain in the present state of rebellion against their own true King. He endeavourd favourably to contrast Judaism with Christianity, and he tells us plainly that our blessed Lord came to expiate, not to teach. Perverting the fact that the doctrines of the New Testament are substantially the same as those of the Old Testament, he arrives at the false assumption that Judaism is the religion of the Old Testament, and, consistently with that false assumption, justifies the crucifixion. When, therefore, I see sitting on these benches, and taking a leading part among the members of this party, one holding these opinions, who has declared them, and uses his influence to carry them into effect, I will not hear Lord Derby's difficulties underrated in regard to this question. I have seen several leading Members of the Conservative party brought over to his opinions by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. And when the noble Lord at the head of the India Board seceded from his noble father's opinions on this question, and joined the Chancellor of the Exchequer, I felt that Lord Derby's position, sooner or later, might become intolerable, and that there was great danger that by degrees he would be forced from the high position which he has held for many years, as leader of the great party whose pride it still is to be the defenders of the Christian character of Parliament and of the State. In my anger I will have justice—I will not hear Lord Derby's difficulties undervalued; and although I lament that he has succumbed, I see in this a manifestation of a weakness, which is natural, however much it is to be deplored. The House knows that I am sincere on this subject. I thank the House for the patience with which they have heard me upon this, as well as upon former occasions. I trust that liberal Members opposite will pardon me if, when I see them urged forward in a course of which this measure is only one of the steps, I venture to address to them a few words of warning against the danger of the course upon which they are entering. There are many hon. Members opposite who value as highly as I do the Protestant Christianity of this country, who value the freedom of our constitution, who would not willingly retrograde from the great principles upon which the Revolution of 1688 was based —who are, in short, still Whigs at heart, and attached to the great principles upon which that party was formed. I beg them to consider this—they are exposed to the machinations of an enemy who is now powerful throughout almost the whole of continental Europe, who is making constant advances, and whose power is felt more and more, until it threatens the constitutional freedom of these islands. I mean the Jesuit confederation, which is now all-powerful at Rome. It was only a year or two since in Holland, our nearest Protestant neighbour, when the Roman Catholic bishops in that country had forced upon them the dogma of the immaculate conception, that these Dutch Roman Catholic Bishops protested emphatically against the reception of that doctrine, and attributed the enunciation of it to the Jesuits, whom they declared to be all-powerful at Rome. I allude to this circumstance, because so strange are the machinations of that order that they have persuaded many actually to ignore their existence as an order, and thus to favour the secrecy of their operations. Now, Sir, I warn the Liberal party in this House and out of it that the Jesuits use them for the objects of their order. The Jesuit knows how to profess himself a Liberal. I do not ask you to believe this on my statement, but I refer you to the works of the fautors of the Jesuits, to those who proclaim and desire the accomplishment of their objects—to the works of Lammenais, of De Maistre, of Montalembert. The latter writer shows in his work, The Political Future of England, that this system of using Liberalism for their own purposes was first put into operation by the Jesuits in England 200 years ago. The first instance was what Count Montalembert cites in 1632, when this system was tested in the constitution of Maryland, then one of the dependencies of the British Crown; but I will be content with referring you to the Proclamation of James II., in 1687, which was based upon the principles on which the Liberal party are now acting. That Proclamation was identical in principle with the measure before the House, and for refusing to read that Proclamation in the churches of this country seven Bishops of the Church of England were sent to the Tower; their imprisonment was the culminating point of the policy which led to the Revolution of 1688, and the termination of the Stuart dynasty. The Proclamation upon which the Bishops of the Church of England refused to act was drawn in precisely the spirit in which you are now legislating; it virtually abolished every religious test, and declared practically that religion has nothing to do with either civil or political administration; that Proclamation was issued at the instigation of Jesuit councillors. Trace the operation of the Jesuits in every free country, and you will find that its tendency is almost invariably to turn liberty into license, and to break every safeguard of freedom, whether it be civil or whether it be religious, for the Jesuits know that they are bound together by a most wonderful organization, by means of which they operate against freedom, and, wherever freedom is undefended by adequate institutions, with every prospect of succeeding in its overthrow. I do not ask the House to accept these statements on my mere assertion, but to look to the works of those writers who are the supporters of the Jesuits, who boast of the success of their system, and who, like the Count de Montalembert, show how they make use of Liberals and Liberalism, for the establishment of their own tyranny, who laud the policy by which the Jesuits strive in every free State to create a legislative equality as to religion, with a view to establish their own ascendancy. Hon. Members opposite proclaim that every safeguard for the preservation of the constitution is an absurdity. I beg them to read the history of their own country and of the Jesuit Confederation, and not obstinately to ignore the effects of the iron hand of this wonderful confederation abroad. The persons to whom I refer boast of the success of the Jesuits in this country, and consider the late Mr. D. O'Connell their most efficient minister. Mr. O'Connell went to Rome and died, and who pronounced his funeral oration? [A laugh.] The circumstance may seem trivial, but I think it an incident worth recording, that it was a Jesuit who pronounced the funeral oration over the remains of O'Connell, and that this was done by the Jesuit Ventura, the very man who first appears to have fostered the Republic of Rome, and afterwards to have betrayed the city to his master, at Gaeta.

Mr. Newdegate

It is my firm belief that in this fatal measure you are taking the first step in a course that the Jesuits will most heartily rejoice to see you pursue, which they seem almost to dictate to you. By adopting this course, you are in reality playing the game of the Jesuits against the freedom of England, and are introducing into the constitution and government of this country the very principles which were effectually resisted by our ancestors in the Revolution of 1688. I shall not detain the House any longer. I thank them for having allowed me to attract their attention to these circumstances. I am firmly convinced, that every step you take in this course of pseudo Liberalism is injurious to the constitution of this country, and that by adopting such a course you are doing the work of the Jesuits, and sacrificing that freedom which deservedly you value so highly, but which you imperil by exaggerating the liberty which you enjoy.

MR. LEFROY said, it was from no feeling of indifference that he had not hitherto taken any part in the debate on this all-important subject, because, looking to its consequences, both religious and political, he was of opinion that the dangers which were likely to result from it, had not, and could not, be exaggerated; but as these dangers had been so ably and fully urged upon the House by other hon. Members with great ability, he preferred sparing the time of the House, and recording his agreement in the reasons thus given by his vote. However, as the debate had been so protracted, he desired not so much on his own account, as from a feeling of what was due to those whom he represented, and who were conscientiously opposed to this measure, to say that in a relative point of view he regarded it with great sorrow and apprehension. He could not agree with those hon. Members who defended the course which had been pursued by the House of Lords, as he believed it was most inconsistent and unfortunate to send down to this House a proposition accompanied with, perhaps, the strongest reasons that had anywhere been urged against its morality and propriety; and yet, on the other hand, he did not think it was his duty to join with those who expressed themselves with great bitterness against the course pursued by that House. Upon the Lords must rest the discredit, whatever it was, of sending to this House those Reasons under such circumstances. With respect to the observations of the hon. Member for Finsbury as to the results to be expected, and the acerbity which he had said had been shown by some hon. Members who had spoken, he (Mr. Lefroy) might add that he had not rendered himself liable to such a charge, nor would he, looking back to the history of the Jews with solemnity and pain, and forward to the future destinies of that people with hope, after this measure had passed, view with any jealousy a Jew taking his seat in this House, or apprehend that, as an individual, he would attempt to injure the Church or constitution; but he would now rather indulge the hope that as those who with him had conscientiously opposed this great change in our constitution had been defeated, their failure might be overruled for good.

MR. COLLINS said, that believing that the House of Commons ought to have the power of modifying the oaths, he rejoiced that the House of Lords had passed this Bill, and trusted that it was a prelude to the establishment of one oath for all its Members.

MR. GRIFFITH said, it might be difficult to defend the conduct of the Lords on the ground of consistency, but he did not consider the rejection of the Oaths Bill at all unfortunate. He infinitely preferred the present measure to the one passed by this House, and should have no objection to see a difference in the proceedings and practice of the two branches of the Legislature on the subject. Indeed, he believed the deliberate opinion of the House had always been limited to the admission of Jews into the House of Commons, and that they had never desired to interfere with the proceedings in that respect of the other House.

ADMIRAL WALCOTT: Sir, in reference to the Bill on the table of the House, I will endeavour (seeing that the debate has been exhausted), to condense my observations into the smallest possible compass. I cannot admit the principle of the Bill, and I regard with a deep-rooted objection its ultimate consequences. If passed, that form of oath which gives us the assurance of Christianity will be abolished. Now, the Jew, in whose favour this Bill is principally introduced, is not degraded by his exclusion from this House. He is simply regarded as a foreigner, and so is debarred from certain privileges. For the sake of a few thousand persons it is proposed to set aside what had hitherto been a fundamental law of our constitution, and thus wound the consciences of millions. For a slender benefit to individuals—virtually aliens in religious habits and wishes—we are desired to slight that sacred claim upon this country which a religion professed for centuries had inculcated—a faith which is the foundation of our monarchy, our laws, our social happiness, and the ground of our hope hereafter. I cannot be a party to any such proposition.

Question put "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 129; Noes 55: Majority 74.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read 3° and passed.

OATHS BILL—LORDS' AMENDMENTS.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, the course he proposed to take with regard to this Bill was somewhat unusual, but it arose from the position in which the House was placed on this subject by the conduct of the House of Lords, which was certainly very peculiar. The Lords had sent down the general Reasons which moved them to exclude the Jews from Parliament in any case whatever, but had accompanied those Reasons by another Bill which provided for the admission of Jews. Of course, that being so, it was unnecessary for this House to resist the Lords' Amendments, because their Lordships had departed from their own Reasons. The only way in which the dignity of this House could be saved was not, he thought, by sending a message back to the Lords, or by entering into any further controversy with them on the subject; but, in order to show that the majority of the House receded in no degree from the position which they had hitherto held, he had given notice of the following Resolution:—

"That this House does not consider it necessary to examine the Reasons offered by the Lords for insisting upon the exclusion of Jews from Parliament, as by a Bill of the present Session, entituled 'An Act to provide for the relief of Her Majesty's subjects professing the Jewish religion,' their Lordships have provided for the admission of persons professing the Jewish religion to seats in the Legislature."

The House was aware that the Oath referred to in the Bill just passed, was the Oath contained in the Bill as originally sent up to the Lords, so that the two would form one measure. He now begged to move the Resolution.

Motion made and Question proposed,—

"That this House does not consider it necessary to examine the Reasons offered by the Lords for insisting upon the exclusion of Jews from Parliament, as by a Bill of the present Session, entituled 'An Act to provide for the Relief of Her Majesty's Subjects professing the Jewish Religion,' their Lordships have provided for the admission of persons professing the Jewish Religion to Seats in the Legislature."

MR. SPOONER said, he quite agreed that the House was placed in a peculiar position, and he thought their own sense of dignity required them to say something more. He should move the following addition to the Resolutions of the noble Lord:—

"The said Bill being in direct contravention of the clear and cogent reasons assigned by their Lordships against the admission of Jews to Parliament."

Amendment negatived.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE said, he agreed with the noble Lord that some Resolution was due to the dignity of the House, but he thought it would be more advisable to place on the Journals the exact state of the case. In the Lords' Reasons they stated, that they had left out Clauses 5 and 8, and he would suggest the propriety of altering the Resolution, and making it read in this way:—

"That this House does not consider it necessary to examine the reasons offered by the Lords for insisting on their Amendment to leave out Clauses 5 and 8, as by a subsequent Bill, entitled 'An Act to provide for the relief of Her Majesty's subjects professing the Jewish religion,' their Lordships have provided for the admission of persons professing the Jewish religion to seats in the Legislature."

He considered that a more correct statement of the facts than the statement in the noble Lord's Resolution, and by such an alteration in the terms, the two Houses would avoid bandying charges of inconsistency.

Amendment proposed,—

To leave out the words "the exclusion of Jews from Parliament," in order to insert the words "their Amendments to leave out Clauses five and eight," instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he did not see any material alteration or improvement in the proposal. It was certainly true that the Lords left out Clauses 5 and 8, but the whole of their Reasons pointed to the exclusion of the Jews from Parliament, and he thought it much better to render the subject at once clear upon the Journals than to make a reference which would oblige persons to go back and examine the Bill as originally passed, in order to see what Clauses 5 and 8 were.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE said, he thought the Resolution as it stood would only appear like the exhibition of pique and temper on the part of this House. He did not wish, however, to press his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. HENLEY said, he doubted whether the Resolution did not exactly express the fact as it really existed. The Bill did not enable either House of Parliament to admit the Jews, but enabled the Houses by Resolution to do so, and probably the noble Lord would not object to an alteration in the last line of his Resolution.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, the words "provided for the admission" which appeared in the Resolution, met the objection of the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. WALPOLE said, the Bill did not provide for the admission of the Jews; it only enabled either House to make such provision.

MR. WARREN pointed out that the terms of the Resolution were in accordance with the title of the Bill.

MR. A. MILLS said, he thought the Resolution proposed by the noble Lord quite sufficient. The position in which the House was placed afforded an illustration of the evil consequences of statesmen attempting to carry out a policy against which their whole lives had been a protest.

LORD JOHN MANNERS: Suppose neither House should admit the Jews. In that case, how would people read the Resolution? The House would have stated that their Lordships had provided for the admission of persons who were still excluded from the Legislature. Thus the Resolution would not accurately express what had really been done.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM said, he was satisfied with the Resolution, but to meet the difficulty raised he would suggest the insertion of the word "means" after "provided," which would, he thought, meet the difficulty.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he would accept this Amendment.

MR. SPOONER said, he did not think the noble Lord went far enough in his Resolution. The dignity of the House required that they should say something more, and he would therefore propose to add to the Resolution the words he had previously mentioned.

Amendment proposed,—

To add at the end of the Question the words, "the said Bill being in direct contravention to the clear and cogent reasons assigned by their Lordships against the enactments of such Bill."

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he would have no objection whatever to the Amendment, if instead of "the clear and cogent reasons" the hon. Gentleman would substitute "the clear but very insufficient reasons."

MR. LABOUCHERE said, it would be absurd to begin the Resolution by declaring that they had not examined the Lords' Reasons, and yet end it by praising or condemning them.

MR. KNIGHTLEY said, he would express a hope that the hon. Member for North Warwickshire would not press his Amendment, and he did not think that in assenting to it the House would be pursuing a dignified course.

Question, "That those words be there added," "put and negatived.

Main Question, as amended, put and agreed to.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he would then move a Resolution, to the effect "that the House do not insist upon their disagreement with the Lords in their Amendments upon the said Bill."

MR. J. D. FITZGERALD said, he could not permit the Resolution to pass without calling the attention of the House to the fact that when the Bill which had just received the assent of the House of Commons had passed into a law, Members of that House professing the doctrines of the Roman Catholic religion would be placed in a worse position than that which the members of any other persuasion would occupy. He had not brought the question forward during the progress of the Bill as he did not wish to endanger its passing; but under present circumstances he begged leave to give notice that he should, early next Session, move that the provisions of the Bill be so extended as to include Roman Catholics within its scope.

Resolved, That this House does not consider it necessary to examine the Reasons offered by the Lords for insisting upon the exclusion of Jews from Parliament, as by a Bill of the present Session, intituled "An Act to provide for the Relief of Her Majesty's Subjects professing the Jewish Religion," their Lordships have provided means for the admission of persons professing the Jewish Religion to Seats in the Legislature.

Resolved, That this House doth not insist upon its disagreement with the Lords in their Amendments to the said Bill.

THE DEAD BODY AT SHEERNESS.

QUESTION.

MR. STAPLETON asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention had been called to a statement in the public papers, to the effect that a corpse had been for several days moored to a stake in the water, in the immediate neighbourhood of Sheerness, and whether he intended to take any steps to compel the proper local authorities to put an end to the scandal.

MR. WALPOLE said, that he had received no official information with respect to the dead body which had lately been found exposed at Sheerness. He had merely seen an account of the circumstance in the newspapers, and had learnt that it was owing to some conflict of opinion between the local authorities. He should, however, make further inquiry upon the matter.

House adjourned at Four o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, July 22, 1858.

MINUTES.] Took the Oaths.—The Lord Gifford.

2ª Art Unions Act Amendment; County Property Conveyance; Chelsea Bridge Act Amendment; Returns to Secretary of State; Detached Parts of Counties.

3ª Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction Continuance; Charitable Trusts Acts Continuance; Copyhold and Inclosure Commissions, &c.; Indemnity; Administration of Oaths by Committees; Army Service; Universities (Scotland); Stipendiary Magistrates; Turnpike Trusts Arrangements.

GOVERNMENT OF INDIA BILL.

OBSERVATIONS.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE said, that he wished to draw the attention of the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby) to the fact, that certain alterations agreed to in Committee on the Government of India Bill had not been inserted in the measure as now printed. By the 28th clause of the Bill it was proposed that the Secretary of State, without the intervention of his Council, and not the Secret Committee, should in future be the organ of communication with the Governor General. The noble Earl at the head of the Government, in consequence of some remarks made on both sides of the House while the Bill was in Committee, consented to alter the clause so as to provide that the Secretary of State should be assisted in such matters by the Vice President of the Council and one of the Members of his Council to be nominated by himself. He had looked at the Bill, and found that no such alteration was made on the bringing up of the Report. There was another trifling inaccuracy, in the 52nd clause, which, as well as that in the 28th clause, would, he hoped, be rectified before the third reading was moved. The noble Earl would recollect that the 52nd clause, as it originally stood, provided that, when an order for the commencement of actual hostilities was sent to India, notice thereof should be given to Parliament within one month after the issuing of such order, or, if Parliament were not then sitting, within one month after it met. The noble Earl, after considerable discussion, agreed that three months, instead of one, should be inserted. But, as the clause now stood, the order need not be produced till within one month after the meeting of Parliament, if Parliament were not sitting when the order was issued; so that, although three months might have expired from the time it was issued before Parliament met, another month must expire before the Government could be called upon to produce it.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, he had been occupied for some time in going through the Bill carefully, together with the Gentleman who drew the Bill, in order that the alterations that were to be made in it should be duly inserted. He did not make any alterations on the bringing up of the Report, but proposed to make them before he moved the third reading. With regard to the first point to which the noble Duke had called his attention, he had to state that the 28th clause, as it would stand when the third reading was moved, would provide that with reference to communications with the Governor General the Secretary of State should be assisted by the Vice President of the Council and such Member of the Council as he might from time to time nominate. With regard to the other point, the noble Duke seemed to misunderstand the clause. The clause was quite correct. It provided, that if an order should be sent authorizing the commencement of hostilities, notice thereof should be given within three months if Parliament were then sitting — that was to say, at the expiration of three months —but if Parliament were not then sitting, then within one month after it met.

The Duke of Newcastle

CHELSEA BRIDGE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.—SECOND READING.

On Motion that this Bill be now read 2ª,

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE said, that it ought to be made clear that the £17,000, which had accumulated as interest, was to be repaid, as well as the £80,000—capital sum—borrowed from the Exchequer Bill Loan Commissioners, before the opening of the bridge toll-free to foot passengers. This did not appear to be distinctly provided in the Bill, which only mentioned the sum of £80,000 with interest; but the interest already accrued raised the sum to £97,000. He was extremely glad that both the present and the late Governments had resisted the applications which had been so strenuously made to them for the abandonment of the whole of this sum, because, if they had yielded, it would have been a gross breach of faith, and might have led to the introduction of a very inconvenient and objectionable precedent. So far as the public interests were concerned, there was no argument in favour of opening this bridge free of toll which did not apply in a greater degree to all the metropolitan toll bridges.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, that it was the intention of the Government to provide by the Bill for the payment of the interest as well as the principal, and if that were not made sufficiently clear at present, the clause should be altered so as to leave no doubt upon the subject.

Bill read 2ª (according to Order) and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

COOKING APPARATUS FOR THE ARMY.

ADDRESS FOR PAPERS.

EARL FORTESCUE moved an Address for Copy of Proceedings of Two Committees assembled at Woolwich on the 6th March and 26th April, to report on Captain Grant's Cooking Apparatus; and, Copy of Correspondence between the Quarter Master General and Captain Grant, respecting the Erection of a Cooking Apparatus at Shorncliffe. The noble Earl also asked the Under Secretary for War, whether after the three years' experience that has been had of Captain Grant's Cooking Apparatus, there appears any reason to doubt its superiority over every other previously in use; and, if not, whether any or what steps were being taken to extend its adoption generally throughout the army?

VISCOUNT HARDINGE said, there was no objection to the production of the papers moved for by the noble Earl. The last meeting of the Woolwich Committee took place on the 20th of April, and the evidence laid before the Secretary of War had induced him to come to the conclusion that Captain Grant's cooking apparatus—the great saving of fuel and other desideratæ being most satisfactorily proved—was the best that ever had been submitted to him. The report, however, recommended that before the general adoption of the apparatus in the army, Captain Grant should be desired to superintend the erection of a model kitchen on his principle for 500 men at some station or other—to verify his estimate of prime cost and test its capabilities; and hence it was that the further trial at Shorncliffe had been determined on. If the report of that experiment should be as satisfactory as the other reports had been, the Secretary for War, he believed, would take steps for the general adoption of the cooking apparatus in the service. The delay of three years mentioned in the noble Earl's question had not occasioned any great inconvenience, but it had certainly been productive of great improvement in the apparatus, for every time a new one had been erected, some additional improvement had been effected. The last submitted to trial was very different from that originally erected at Aldershot.

Motion agreed to.

House adjourned at a Quarter to Eight o'clock, till To-morrow, half-past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, July 22, 1858.

MINUTE.] PUBLIC BILL.—3° Clerk of Petty Sessions (Ireland).

CONSOLIDATED FUND APPROPRIATION BILL.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: Sir, before you leave the Chair, I am anxious to call the attention of the House to a consideration of the figures which appear on the face of this Bill. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in making his financial statement, estimated the revenue for this year at £63,900,000; and he calculated the charges upon that revenue at such an amount as to show to the Committee, according to his estimate, a surplus of revenue over the expenditure. The debt and Consolidated Fund charges he took at £30,300,000. The Army Estimates were £11,750,000; the Navy Estimates, £9,860,000; the Civil Service Estimates, £7,000,000; and the charge for the Collection of the revenue at £4,700,000—making the total of the Estimates £33,310,000; which, added to the Debt and Consolidated Fund Charges, gave a grand total of £63,610,000, to be compared with a revenue of £63,900,000, showing a surplus of about £300,000. Such was the Estimate of Revenue and Expenditure in the financial statement. We now see from the Appropriation Bill the result of the Votes of the Session; and from what took place in Committee of Supply we may gather what other charges may be anticipated in addition to those which appear in the Appropriation Bill. In this Bill the Debt and Consolidated Fund charges stand at the amount estimated, £30,300,000; the Army Estimates at £12,010,000; the Navy Estimates at £9,839,000—somewhat less than that at which the right hon. Gentleman took them in his Budget; the Civil Service Estimates, 7,240,000; the Collection of Revenue, £4,730,000—nearly the same as the Estimate—making the total amount of Supplies voted £33,819,000. In looking at these figures, however, it must be borne in mind that there must be added to some of the Votes for the Civil Service the amount of balances of previous Votes, which, although they are intended to be defrayed during the year, were not included in the Estimates. There is a difference between balances unexpended and balances unappropriated which it is difficult for some hon. Gentlemen to understand. Balances in the Exchequer are real balances of money, similar to the balance of a private individual at his bankers; but the unappropriated balance of a Vote does not represent money, it is merely an authority to incur expense; and therefore, when the Government diminish the Civil Service Estimates by the unappropriated balances of Votes, they do not provide any Ways and Means, unless they fall back upon the balances in the Exchequer. Therefore, inasmuch as they have, contrary to the usual custom, as was explained in the Committee of Supply, diminished certain Votes by employing the unappropriated Votes of former years, it is necessary to add these amounts to the Votes of the year, in order to ascertain what will be the real charge upon the Exchequer during the present year. On going through the Votes I cannot ascertain that the amount to be so added will be less than £326,000; making the total estimated expenditure of the year, as appears from the Appropriation Bill and the explanations in Committee of Supply, £64,445,000, against an estimated revenue of £63,900,000. Therefore, instead of there being an estimated surplus there is an estimated deficiency in the Ways and Means of the year of £545,000, and an estimated excess of expenditure over the expenditure estimated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer of £835,000. The only way in which the Chancellor of the Exchequer can supply that deficiency is either by showing that the produce of the revenue will be greater than his estimate in his financial statement, or by diminishing the balances in the Exchequer, which he is entitled to do if circumstances required it, and if he can show that the balances left at the end of the year will be sufficient. The point to which I wish to call the attention of the House, however, before we go into Committee upon this Bill, is, that as the matter now stands there is an excess of £835,000 over the right hon. Gentleman's Estimate of Expenditure, and that, therefore, instead of there being an estimated surplus of £300,000, there is an estimated deficiency of £545,000. Some Members of the Government have, on certain public occasions, called attention to the state in which the finances were left by the late Government, and have repeatedly asserted that they were in a disorderly and discreditable state. I must reiterate the statement which I have made on former occasions, that the financial difficulty which is alleged to have existed was purely imaginary, unless the present Government had been prepared to fulfil the obligations for the liquidation of debt which had been created in former years. If they had provided Ways and Means to pay off the £2,000,000 of Exchequer bills, and £1,500,000 due to the Sinking Fund, undoubtedly their difficulties would have been considerable; but those difficulties they have avoided by postponing these obligations, and, as a result, they were actually able to propose a diminution of taxation for the year. That is to say, the plan which the right hon. Gentleman proposed to the Committee was, that £2,000,000 of income tax should be ultimately abandoned, and that £1,000,000 should be given up in the present year. At the same time he proposed to impose taxes which would produce £800,000. Therefore, according to his scheme, the taxes for the year were reduced by £200,000. Now, it is quite clear that if the right hon. Gentleman has been able to propose a reduction of taxation, and at the same time to propose estimates in excess of the estimates of the preceding year, there could have been no real financial difficulty. Had he proposed any financial plan which would ultimately have diminished the annual burdens of the country by liquidating a portion of the debt this year, he might with justice have affirmed that he had a great financial difficulty to deal with; but the obligations for the repayment of debt being postponed, that difficulty was purely imaginary and unreal. The result to which we come, then, is this—that, according to the apparent state of the finances, the right hon. Gentleman has not an estimated surplus, but an estimated deficiency. The deficiency, I admit, is not large, but, nevertheless, it is a deficiency. I must also call the attention of the House to the fact that the Government have brought in Bills enabling them to embody the militia, and to send regiments of that force abroad; but they have provided no Ways and Means to defray the probable expense of carrying out those Acts. I trust that they may not be called upon to exercise to any great extent the powers which they seek, and that the amount voted for the army may furnish them with the means of meeting that extraordinary expense. Still, this is a power which cannot be exercised without incurring expense, and we have not yet heard by what means it is intended that that expense should be defrayed. There is only one other point to which I wish to call the attention of the House. On one occasion the right hon. Gentleman said—I do not know whether or not he meant it as a deliberate statement—that every day proved to him more and more the lavishness and profuseness with which the late Government had conducted its expenditure. He gave no example, and I do not know that there is any better mode of testing the truth of the charge than by comparing the Estimates of the late Government, presented last year, with those which the present Government have submitted to the House in the present one, both of which Estimates have received the assent of the House. The remark of the right hon. Gentleman, as I understood it, applied particularly to the Civil Service Estimates. Those Estimates last year were £7,400,000; for the present year they are £7,240,000. To that sum, however, we must add undisposed-of balances £326,000, making the real amount this year £7,566,000, which shows an increase of £166,000 over the Estimates of last year. Therefore, notwithstanding the statement of the right hon. Gentleman as to the great profuseness of the late Government, particularly in regard to the Civil Service, it appears that their Estimates for that service exceed those of last year by more than £160,000; and, under these circumstances, I think that he will find it difficult to substantiate his charge. I thought it important that the House should not pass this Bill without its attention being called to the comparison which I have laid before it, and I trust that upon examination it will be found that the details of that comparison are fully borne out by the figures to which I have referred.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I am not surprised that the right hon. Gentleman opposite should have taken so legitimate and proper an occasion to call the attention of the House to the general state of our finances. I do not think, however, that the House will expect me at this moment to enter into a rival criticism of the two systems of finance which have been recently brought under our consideration. I am, however, prepared to give, if the House should require it, an authentic statement of the real position of the revenue and expenditure of the country. The right hon. Gentleman stated that I had failed to prove that the revenue exceeded the expenditure of the country, as I had alleged, when I made my financial statement to the House. Now, I believe that the right hon. Gentleman will find it difficult to bring forward any single instance in which, after the expiration of a quarter of a year or more, the estimated expenditure of the country has been found to be precisely the amount at which it was fixed when the financial statement was made. Estimates at all times are very difficult results to ascertain, and there is no doubt that as matters now stand there is an excess of expenditure over the estimate I offered to the House in the course of my financial statement. At the same time, I trust I may be allowed to say, that the revenue has considerably exceeded the estimate I then offered. If I had to make the financial statement now, and to estimate the revenue for the current year, I should place it at a much higher figure than when I made my first financial proposition to the House. We have now before us the experience of one quarter of the financial year, and more than a fortnight of the second quarter. In making the financial statement I recognized the fact that the two first quarters of the financial year were really those in which the present Government would find the greatest difficulty. The country was recovering but very gradually recovering from a state of great commercial pressure and even convulsion; and in the first quarter of the financial year we were compelled to meet circumstances certainly of a not very encouraging character. It was hoped in the second quarter that the state of affairs would improve. It appears that our expectations then were not too sanguine. We have now experience of the first quarter of the financial year, in which some hon. Members were disposed to anticipate the most gloomy results. The result, however, is that our surplus of income over expenditure for the first quarter in the present year is £223,944. Therefore, in the first quarter, when our expectations were thus differently directed, we have obtained a not very inconsiderable surplus of income over expenditure, and that increase may be observed by this analysis:—The Customs produced in the first quarter £5,879,000, being £30,000 in excess of the amount at which in the course of my financial statement I estimated the revenue derived from this source, and that too at a time when, I need not remind the House, the trade of the country was peculiarly depressed. Well, the Excise I estimated at £4,307,600, which was considered at the time too high. There has been an excess over that estimate in the last quarter of nearly £70,000. This augmentation took place, notwithstanding the steps which were taken by the distillers to anticipate the contemplated increase of duty, which naturally produced an injurious effect upon the revenue. The stamps produced in the last quarter, in round numbers, £2,084,000; the proportion, according to my estimate, was £1,962,000. Therefore there was in the receipt of stamps an excess of £122,000. The income tax produced, in that quarter, £1,200,000, being considerably more than I calculated upon. The receipts of the Post Office and the Crown lands I need not now comment upon. But under the head of miscellaneous, I calculated the amount for the year to be £1,200,000. There was, however, received in that quarter upwards of £355,000. Thus in the first quarter of the financial year there is an excess under this head of £55,000 over the estimate I made. So much for that question, in respect to which some hon. Members took the most gloomy view. As the state of our revenue has been especially called under the attention of the House, I trust I shall be allowed to mention the following further gratifying facts which I have obtained from the most authentic information. I wish to show the House the state of the revenue with regard to a portion of the present quarter, namely, from the 1st July to the 19th of the same month. I will leave the House to draw their own conclusion from the facts I am now about to state. These are the last Returns I have had. Now, in 1857, during those same eighteen days, the Customs produced £867,000—that being a time, it will be recollected, before commercial convulsion, and when the prospects of our commerce and the activity of our trade were apparently encouraging. Well, during that same period in the present year, 1858, the Customs produced £1,063,000, leaving a surplus of £196,000. The Excise during the same favourable period of 1857 produced £623,000. The Excise during the same period of the current year was £728,000, being a surplus of about £105,000. The stamps during those eighteen days in the last year amounted to £297,000. In the present year they produced for the same period £340,000, being a surplus of £43,000. The Post Office department during this busy time in 1857 produced £30,000, and my estimate on this head was said to be greatly exaggerated. Now, in the eighteen days of the present year, being a comparatively depressed time, it has produced £50,000, being a surplus of £20,000. The aggregate of the income in those four great branches shows more than anything else the real condition of the country. Well, that aggregate increase in the receipt for the eighteen days of this year over the same period in the last year is £364,000. Now, I think that this statement will enable you all to go to your respective constituents with no very gloomy view of the financial affairs of the country in the present year at all events. And when I am told that instead of a surplus I have left the country exposed to all the inconveniences of a deficiency, I appeal with confidence to those figures and congratulate the House upon the encouraging condition of our revenue. Although, Sir, the House gave us the power of raising £2,000,000 in order to pay off the Exchequer bonds, we have only availed ourselves of that power to the extent of £1,000,000, and we have every hope and expectation that we shall not find it necessary to exceed that amount. So that if affairs proceed as they promise to do now there is no doubt we shall be able to reduce our debt to the amount of £1,000,000 this year. After the statement I have just made, I trust that the House will consider that I have given a sufficient answer to the criticism of the right hon. Gentleman. There are, however, one or two points to which the right hon. Gentleman referred which I feel I must notice. The one is with reference to the possible expenditure to be incurred in respect to the Militia Bills which I have introduced. One of those Bills is for the embodiment of the militia; the other is to enable the Government to employ the militia force in foreign countries. On that subject I can only say that the expenditure under those heads is contingent. It does not at all follow that although we have thought it prudent to ask for them, we shall recommend to Her Majesty to avail herself of the powers granted under those Bills, or that those powers will ever be put in operation. I believe, Sir, it is quite unusual, and indeed unnecessary, for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to anticipate an expenditure under such circumstances. The right hon. Gentleman also observed that I had charged the late Government with profuse expenditure in the administration of the public revenues, and he appeals to a comparison of the Estimates of the two Governments to prove the fallacy of that charge which, he further remarks, was applied especially to the Civil Service Estimates. Now, Sir, I believe that no charge of the kind was ever made by me against the late Government, namely, that they left the finances of the country in disorder, or in a dangerous position. No such words have ever escaped my lips. So far from entertaining such an opinion, I can bear witness to the wise and prudent administration of the office I now have the honour to hold by the right hon.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

Gentleman opposite. The observations I made involved a charge generally against the late Government and was not applicable to the right hon. Gentleman individually. That was a charge of profuse expenditure generally, and did not apply to the Civil Service Estimates, but rather to those greater branches of the expenditure which are brought before us for our consideration. I said—and this is my answer to the right hon. Gentleman when he tries to prove that there has not been a profuse expenditure by comparing the almost similar amounts of the estimates of the late and present Government—I say that you cannot have reduction in a moment. I say now what I impressed upon the House when I made the observation which is complained of—that expenditure depends in a great measure upon policy. When I said that I was not thinking at all of the Civil Service Estimates, I was thinking rather that it was the policy of the late Government which had brought the public affairs of the country into such a state, as to render it necessary to keep up large armaments in a time of peace. I trust, Sir, that by following a different policy, we shall be able to reduce those armaments, and consequently to lessen considerably the burdens of the country. Therefore, the observations of the right hon. Gentleman, founded on the similarity of the Estimates, and apparently attributing to me a want of candour, when brought to the test of truth, fall pointlessly to the ground. I think, Sir, I have now answered the principal observations of the right hon. Gentleman. From the statements I have made, I am fully justified in congratulating the country upon the improved state of our finances. It appears to me that the prospects before us are highly favourable. Through the gloomiest quarter, as anticipated by some hon. Members, of the financial year we have obtained a surplus of income over our expenditure to the amount of £239,000. During a period of less than three weeks in the present month there has been a gradual, but at the same time considerable, augmentation in our revenue, amounting in the whole to £364,000. And those principal heads show, more than any other, the social prosperity and commercial condition of the country. Our prospects for the continuance of this quarter and for the next half year give us, therefore, no reason whatever to assume that they will be of a gloomier character. Quite the reverse. By the blessing of Providence we have before us the prospect of an abundant harvest, and the influence of that fact upon the revenue of the country is too well known to every Member of this House for me to dwell upon. What are the other prospects before us? The prospect of peace at this moment—without any offence to hon. Gentlemen opposite—is far more satisfactory than it was a year or six months ago. No one can deny, whether we appeal to the continent of Europe or to the other side of the Atlantic, that everything wears a most encouraging aspect to those who believe that by a conciliatory, though firm policy, this state of things may be secured and maintained. The only source of anxiety and trouble that the House and the country have at present is, no doubt, the present condition of India. But the condition of India is one which, we consider, must not only be met with energy, but at the same time with a policy of conciliation. Sir, I not only hope, but believe, that under such a policy our affairs in India will assume a very different, and far more favourable character than they have heretofore been. Without indulging in any language of exaggeration, without colouring our position in too favourable a light, I think it is one upon which I may very fairly congratulate the country; and, so far as the finances of the country are concerned, it appears to me that they were never in a more healthy condition than at present; and the prospect before us, too, is one which I think ought to give satisfaction to every lover of his country.

MR. WILSON said, he did not rise to throw any doubt upon the statements made by the right hon. Gentleman. It must be doubly gratifying to the House to hear that the finances were in a better state than appeared from the public accounts, and to learn that, as was shown by the increase of revenue from the sources to which the right hon. Gentleman referred, trade was really reviving. He must, however, remind the House that it was somewhat unusual to estimate the revenue of the whole year from that of a portion of the year. Those who were acquainted with commerce must know that when trade began to revive after a period of depression, the retail dealers made large purchases, and it was from these purchases, and the consequent clearances at the Custom-houses, rather than from the actual consumption of the moment, that the increase of revenue was derived. He did not wish to throw any doubt upon the anticipations of the right hon. Gentleman; he sincerely hoped that they would be realized, and that the thorough revival of trade might bring into the Exchequer those large sums upon which he had calculated. He must remind the House that his right hon. Friend the Member for Radnor (Sir G. C. Lewis), by no means questioned the present state of the finances. All that he desired to do was to call the attention of the House to the miscalculations which were made by the right hon. Gentleman in his budget, and which seemed to throw some blame upon the late Government. Because when the right hon. Gentleman made his financial statement he proposed to reduce the Estimates by £800,000; 400,000, on the Army and Navy, and £400,000 on the Civil Service Estimates. Experience had since proved that instead of there being a decrease in the Civil Service Estimates there was an increase of upwards of £100,000; instead of there being a decrease in the Army Estimates there was an increase of nearly £200,000, and in the Navy Estimates there was a decrease of only about £30,000. The result of all the financial operations since the budget was, that instead of there being a surplus of £300,000, there was a deficiency of £535,000. At the same time the right hon. Gentleman was quite right in saying that the increased expenditure had been met by an increase of revenue, and therefore it might lead to no financial embarrassment. In the present excited and depressed state of the financial world out of doors he would drop no word which might lead any one to believe that there were any grave apprehensions of financial difficulties in the coming year. To one point he would refer, in the hope that that of which he complained might not occur again. It was altogether contrary to the practice of that House to present Estimates which did not represent the exact expenditure of the year, and thereby inferentially mislead the House. He did not mean to blame his hon. Friend the Secretary of the Treasury; but, in regard to the Civil Service Estimates, this irregularity had been committed. Under six heads of expenditure they had Estimates amounting to £1,013,000, showing a decrease of not less than £398,000, upon those of last year; and any one who looked at the Vote would think that a saving to that amount had been effected. Such, however, was not the case. The actual expenditure during the year would be not less than £1,340,000, or £326,000 more than the sum voted. The Vote for Government prisons, convict establishments, &c. last year was, in round numbers, £653,000; this year it was only £544,000, showing an apparent saving of £120,756. The fact was, that the actual expenditure during the year would be £665,000, or £12,000 more than the estimate of last year. He could not but express a hope that in future the Estimates would be prepared so as to show the probable expenditure within the year, and not, by depending upon the unappropriated balances, show an apparent reduction when there was a real excess. Some time ago the House was told that it was quite wrong to provide Ways and Means for a Sinking Fund, that they ought to rely upon the natural excess of income over expenditure. If such an excess was provided, well and good. His right hon. Friend had, however, shown that, according to the frame of the budget for the present year, instead of a surplus there was a deficiency of £500,000; and it was worse than idle to talk of reducing the national debt by means of the excess of income over expenditure, if no such excess was provided. Between the years 1816 and 1828 the Sinking Fund paid off £54,000,000 of debt, while during the twenty-five years after the abolition of that fund only £21,000,000 was paid off; and now, instead of the debt being less than it was in 1828, it exceeded it by £6,000,000. Despite the flattering account which the right hon. Gentleman had given of the revenue, he had never seen a time at which for so long a period there had been such gloom and despondency in the money-market as had existed lately; and he hoped that the statement of the right hon. Gentleman would produce a more cheerful state of things. Our Estimates, both for the naval, military, and civil services, had lately seriously and steadily increased, and unless we could take some step which would lead to their diminution, we must be prepared to submit to an increase of taxation in some form or other.

MR. G. A. HAMILTON said, he could assure the House that there had been no material departure from the ordinary mode of framing the Estimates. His own opinion was however, that that matter was susceptible of great improvement, and it was the intention of the Government to carry out as far as practicable the suggestions of the Committee on Public Moneys.

The hon. Member for Devonport (Mr. Wilson) had stated that something had been done in the present year with regard to the Estimates which had not taken place upon former occasions, alluding to the fact that there were six items in which reference was made to the unexpended balances of previous years. In the Estimates for 1857-8 there were just the same number of items in which the same observations were contained. The hon. Gentleman knew as well as any one the mode in which the Estimates were prepared. The object of every department was to ascertain the amount requisite to be put in the Estimates for the purpose of defraying the expenses of the current year, and he did not think that any department allowed itself to be actuated by any consideration except a honest desire to do its duty. In the present instance the Government had not sought to reduce the amount of the Estimates by a reference to existing balances. The practice in question was not a good one, and it would be far better that the amount likely to be required for the current year should be voted by the House, unexpended balances being paid as surplus into the Exchequer.

MR. CRAWFORD said, he wished to ask whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer could state what portion of the increase that had taken place in stamps and taxes during the greater portion of July was due to the penny stamp upon bankers' cheques?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that he could not give the information which the hon. Gentleman required at the present moment, nor did he think it was necessary to do so. He might state generally that the impost upon drafts had quite realized the Estimate made in April.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY observed, that he viewed with some degree of alarm the silent but gradual growth of the public expenditure. The people of England paid in the shape of compensation and superannuation alone as much as would maintain the whole civil establishments of any other kingdom on the face of the earth. Upon that one item the repeal of a single clause in an Act of Parliament had cost the country something like £80,000 a year. This item, which he might call the dead weight, was gradually increasing every year, and demanded the special attention of the Government with the view to its better control and reduction. It was gratifying, no doubt, to hear from the Chancellor of the Exchequer of the buoyant state of the public revenue; but it should not be forgotten that they were doing nothing whatever towards the extinction of the National Debt, to which £40,000,000 had been added within the last few years. He was glad to hear from the Secretary of the Treasury that the Government were likely to have the recommendations of the Committee on Public Money carried into effect. He was of opinion that they should take measures to check the expenditure of the country.

MR. W. WILLIAMS stated that the expenditure for the army and navy last year was just double the amount of the Estimates for those services when the Duke of Wellington and Sir Robert Peel were in office. The present Government had, much to their credit, made a considerable reduction, and he hoped they would continue to pursue the same course.

House in Committee.

Clauses 1 to 24 were agreed to.

Clause 25.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he would move to insert the following proviso:—

"Provided always, that whenever, in consequence of an exigency of the Public Service, the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury shall authorise an appropriation of the Public Money, in addition to the aggregate sum voted for any Service in any Department, every such appropriation shall be presented in a Supplementary Estimate to be approved and sanctioned by the House of Commons, if Parliament is sitting, and, if Parliament is not sitting, then within one month after the meeting of Parliament."

The object which he had in view was simply to impose a check upon the expenditure of money by providing that the purposes for which the House voted sums of money should be strictly observed, and that there should be no departure in the appropriation of the public money, except an application were made to Parliament on the subject, and the House should assent to the proposed diversion of the public money. Last year a considerable sum was spent in the Naval Department in excess of the authorized Estimate—a proceeding which he regarded as utterly destructive of the power and control of Parliament, and which ought to be prevented in future. It was a fact, that the supervision exercised by the Controller of the Exchequer was not adequate to effect the object for which it was intended.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that this was the revival of a suggestion which had been laid before the Committee on Public Moneys last Session, and would probably form matter for consideration next Session. If the Report of the Committee should be acted upon by the Government proposing a measure founded upon it, all cause of complaint might be removed. The practice adopted recently by the Government was, that no money voted for special purposes could be otherwise dealt with than by leave of the Treasury. It was absolutely necessary that the Government should be armed with discretionary powers in those matters; and although no Government liked to be armed with large discretionary powers as they entailed a proportionate increase of responsibility, nevertheless he submitted it was for the convenience of Parliament that the Government should be allowed, in cases of emergency, to make transfers from one branch of a department to another. If such discretionary powers were not intrusted to them, they might be compelled to call Parliament together in October or December to give its sanction to the transfer or expenditure of the comparatively trifling sum of £100,000. He was opposed to the Amendment, believing that it would not only create a great inconvenience in the conduct of the financial affairs of the country, but that it would be in effect repealing the former part of the clause. He thought that the hon. Gentleman should, in the first instance, have proposed to expunge the clause altogether.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he thought some such provision as that proposed by the hon. Baronet was required. Sums in excess might be so voted that a Vote of an unpopular character might be made up out of the surplus of a popular Vote. They were not informed of the disposal of the money until long after it had been expended.

MR. G. A. HAMILTON confessed he felt considerable difficulty in understanding what the hon. Gentleman meant by his proviso. The provisions of the Bill were sufficiently stringent for all practical purposes, and he thought that the adoption of the proviso would have the effect of tying up the hands of the Government in cases of great emergency, and would therefore fetter that discretion which it was found necessary to give them. The Government had only power, upon leave of the Treasury, to transfer, in cases of need, the power granted under the head of a particular department to another head of that same department. They had no power to divert the money voted from any one department to another.

MR. WILSON stated that the object which the hon. Baronet had in view was already practically attained. This question had been raised two years ago, and a provision was then made that when Parliament met it should be put in possession of the mode of disposal of these sums. He thought it was desirable the correspondence should be laid before the House, as well as the statement of expenditure.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he was not bigotedly attached to the phraseology of the proviso, but he wished the House to have the fullest control over such expenditure by means of express communication from Government to the House.

Question put, "That those words be there added."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 41; Noes 89: Majority 48.

House resumed.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered To-morrow.

METROPOLIS LOCAL MANAGEMENT ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. BUTLER said, he thought they were legislating too hastily, and, as it appeared to him, very unfairly on this matter. He would call attention to the fact that the Thames received not only the sewage of London, but that of every town and village on this side of the Cotswold hills, and that, therefore, the whole cost of purifying the river ought not to be cast upon the ratepayers of the metropolis. Further than this, there was a large amount of Government property within the metropolis, such as the Royal Palace, Dock Yards, Government Offices, and other public buildings, which would not contribute to the cost of this improvement, although it contributed to the nuisance. Unless, therefore, the noble Lord having charge of the Bill would give the House an assurance that he would reconsider the question as to the area of rating, he should move that the House resolve itself into Committee on this Bill this day three months.

Amendment proposed,—

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House will, upon this day three months, resolve itself into the said Committee," instead thereof.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER said, that he also considered that those who contributed toward the evil complained of should be called upon to contribute towards its removal. An enormous quantity of dirt was brought up the river by the shipping, and he wished to know why the shipping interest were not to contribute towards the works in question?

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he hoped that the House would not now be drawn into a discussion of the principle of the Bill then before the Committee, and he would remind the gallant Admiral that a few days ago two persons were fined for throwing dirt into the St. Katharine's Docks, and that the representative of the dock company then undertook that such practices should be discontinued in future.

VISCOUNT EBRINGTON said, he thought that some discussion upon the principle of this measure, the provisions of which were reconcilable with no sound opinion, would be exceedingly useful. He, for one, would not have assented to its second reading had he not anticipated that it would leave that House in a shape very different from that in which it was introduced. He had yet to learn that a body of forty-three gentlemen was the fittest for carrying this work through in the best and most economical manner. It was easy to make speeches on the question, but the difficulties of the question were best appreciated by those who possessed engineering experience. He, therefore, doubted whether the Government had acted wisely in handing over this great work to the Metropolitan Board of Works, in whom, and in their engineer, he had not implicit confidence. If the matter was to be handed over to them, however, why was it not handed to them without any restrictions. He thought there was much exaggeration abroad respecting the existing evils, and that therefore there was no necessity for haste in passing the present measure. At the same time he hoped that what hon. Members had experienced would have the effect of causing them in some degree to realize what sort of atmosphere was breathed by many families in this kingdom during the hours both of work and sleep. He hoped that Her Majesty's Government would consent so to amend the measure as to remove the limitations as to outfalls, &c., which were contained in it.

SIR DE LACY EVANS said, he thought a little discussion would be by no means amiss. He hoped that an assurance would be given by the noble Lord at the head of the Board of Works, that he would consider the suggestions made by the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Butler). He had more confidence in the Metropolitan Board of Works than seemed to be entertained by the noble Lord the Member for Marylebone (Viscount Ebrington), and did not doubt their competency to perform the work entrusted to them by this Bill. The Government had exercised a wise discretion in not undertaking this task itself, but in committing its performance to the representatives of the metropolitan ratepayers, who had exerted themselves most honestly and fairly, and had devoted the greater portion of their time to the discharge of their duties as members of this Board.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the Government was quite willing that all the points involved in this Bill should be fully considered and discussed, but they thought that the best time to take that discussion would be when the Bill was in Committee. They had not proposed this measure because they shrunk from responsibility, but because they knew that the House would never give to them unlimited power to expend any sum of money they pleased upon the drainage of the metropolis. Under these circumstances they were obliged to use the machinery already in existence, and had availed themselves of a body which was constituted for the very purpose of undertaking the work. They had heard much of late of the benefits of local administration and of the value of having the right man in the right place, and from what he had seen of Mr. Thwaites he thought that it was fortunate that they could obtain the assistance of so sensible and practical a man, one who was an honour to his class, and fairly represented all the virtues of which Englishmen were proud. It was quite possible that Amendments might be made in this Bill, but that could only be done in Committee, and therefore he hoped that Mr. Speaker would now be allowed to leave the Chair.

MR. HEADLAM said, he wished to know whether the Government could say that the Metropolitan Board of Works was fully open to consider this question, and was not by Resolution committed to the plan which went by its name. If that Board was so committed, the House would, in fact, by passing this Bill be adopting that plan, to which he had such an objection that rather than sanction it he should certainly vote against this Bill.

Mr. CONINGHAM said, that if the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Butler), divided the House, he should certainly vote with him, because he saw with alarm the intention of the Government to commit the performance of this great work, the execution of which was estimated to cost £3,000,000, to a Board which had yet done nothing to merit the confidence of the public. If the system recommended by that Board was adopted the drainage of the metropolis would cost, not £3,000,000 but £30,000,000. No reliance could be placed on the reports of Mr. Bazalgette, which, in his opinion, were contrary to fact, whereas everything bore testimony to the superiority of the scheme proposed by Mr. Ward, whose calculations and statements had never been confuted. He thought that some further investigation should take place, because he believed that no scheme could prove successful which did not utilize the sewage and separate it from the rainfall.

Sir J. SHELLEY said, he did not think his hon. Friend (Mr. Conningham), had dealt quite fairly with the engineer of the Board of Works. He begged to inform the hon. Gentleman that the present Board of Works was not responsible for the operations carried on in the Victoria sewer. He hoped that the House would be allowed to go into Committee, with the view of rendering the measure as unobjectionable as possible. The House had not as yet given the Board of Works the opportunity of displaying their skill and efficiency, and he trusted that that opportunity would now be given them by throwing the whole responsibility of those works upon them.

Mr. COX said, the people put no faith in the Executive Government carrying out works economically. As an instance he might mention the Estimate of £750,000 for Westminster Palace, but which had cost upwards of two millions. If the Metropolitan Board of Works had to carry out the drainage of the metropolis, he thought they would carry it out within a reasonable sum. At the same time he must express his regret that the public offices were not to contribute towards the expense, and he would ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he was prepared to introduce a clause rating them towards it.

General CODRINGTON said, he wished to ask whether it was to be made a condition by the Government that the intercepting plan — that was to say, a succession of tunnel sewers down to Barking Creek—should be adopted.

Mr. WALPOLE said, that the question of the hon. and gallant General, as well as others which had been put to the Government in the course of discussion, could better be answered in Committee.

Mr. JOHN LOCKE said, he differed from the right hon. Gentleman, as he thought the House should not proceed further without hearing from the Government what plan they proposed to adopt. In Committee it was very often difficult to get these matters explained.

Mr. CLAY said, the Bill did not give to Government the power of adopting any plan. It gave the power of doing so to the Metropolitan Board of Works, and he had the authority of the Chairman to say that they did not consider themselves pledged to any particular plan.

Mr. JOSEPH LOCKE urged the Government to answer at once the question of the hon. and gallant Member for Greenwich.

Sir WILLIAM DUNBAR said, he must protest against the proposal to assist the main drainage of the metropolis by a grant from the public purse.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said, his right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade stated clearly the other night that the Government were not bound to any scheme whatever by the measure they proposed. He did not know how they could give a clearer assurance to the House. He would, however, repeat that the Government were not connected with any particular scheme whatever in connection with the drainage of the metropolis. All the Government professed to do by the present measure was, to place the Metropolitan Board of Works in that condition which would enable them to carry into effect any plan they thought best calculated to attain the desired result. The Government did not interfere at all with their discretion.

Mr. STUART WORTLEY said, that whatever might be the intention of the Government, the Bill clearly pointed to a particular plan. The very first clause directed the Metropolitan Board of Works to intercept the drainage, for example.

MR. H. B. SHERIDAN said, he must again urge that the public offices should contribute towards the proposed expense.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

The House divided :—Ayes 133 ; Noes 11 : Majority 122.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

House in Committee.

Clause 1,

MR. HEADLAM said, he wished to move, in line 14, after the word "speed,' to leave out to the end of the clause, and to insert "such works as may be necessary for purifying the Thames and improving the drainage of the Metropolis." His object was to throw upon the Board of Works the whole responsibility of devising the particular scheme that was to be adopted for the drainage of the metropolis. If his Amendment were adopted, the Bill would not express either directly or indirectly any opinion in favour of any plan.

Amendment proposed,—

In Clause 1, line 14, after "speed," to leave out to the end of the Clause, and insert "such works as may be necessary for purifying the Thames and improving the drainage of the Metropolis."

Question proposed,—

"That the words 'according to such plan as to them may seem proper,' stand part of the Clause."

MR. AYRTON said, he thought that the Amendment would place the House of Commons in a great difficulty, inasmuch as it would in effect be committing the House of Commons to the purification of the Thames. What was "purifying" the Thames? Were the Metropolitan Board to be compelled to convert the Thames into pure drinking water at London-bridge? All they could do was to prevent the river being injured by sewage. He apprehended that the Amendment in its present form could not be acceded to.

MR. CONINGHAM said, he would support the Amendment, with the addition of the words he would propose to prevent the sewage of the metropolis going into the Thames.

MR. STUART WORTLEY said, he was clearly of opinion that the clause, as framed, provided for intercepting the sewage, and preventing it going into the Thames. He thought that the Amendment would be made much more objectionable by striking out the word "preventing."

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, that the Bill was one to provide for the main drainage of the metropolis. The clause had been very carefully considered, and was, he believed most intelligibly framed to carry out the objects in view. He trusted, therefore, that the Committee would not consider it necessary to adopt the Amendment.

SIR BENJAMIN HALL said, he thought that words might be inserted to meet the views of all parties, and such as would secure, not only the main drainage of the metropolis, but also the purification of the Thames.

MR. HENLEY said, the object of the Bill was to enable the Board to get rid of the sewage of the metropolis in a manner that would not be injurious to the health of the metropolis, but it did not empower them to apply money to the making of a sewer, for example, through Oxford-street.

It being four o'clock, Mr. SPEAKER resumed the Chair.

ALLEGED PROTRACTED CONFINEMENT IN A LUNATIC ASYLUM—QUESTION.

MR. FITZROY said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether it is true, as stated in a daily paper, that at a recent Visitation the Commissioners in Lunacy discovered in a private provincial Lunatic Asylum a concealed cell, in which a man, who is stated to be in full possession of his faculties, had been for many years confined.

MR. WALPOLE said that, after making inquiry, he could not find that the Commissioners of Lunacy had made any such discovery.

CREDITORS ON THE STATE OF OUDE. QUESTION.

MR. DILLWYN said, he would beg to ask the President of the Board of Control what has been done with regard to the Creditors on the State of Oude since Mr. Otway called for a Return of their names and respective claims on the 9th of May, 1857 ; and whether a Commission has been appointed in India to investigate the merits of those claims.

LORD STANLEY stated, that on the 17th of June in last year the Court of Directors instructed the Governor General to cause, with as little delay as possible, all bona fide claims against the Government of Oude to be investigated and reported on either by the Finance Commissioner at Oude or by some Officer appointed for the purpose. On the 22nd of August the Government of India replied that the instructions would be carried into effect as soon as the state of public affairs in Oude would permit, and he apprehended, therefore, that any delay in carrying them into effect had been due to the disturbed state of the country.

THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.—QUESTION.

MR. HUME said, he would beg to ask the First Commissioner of Public Works whether there are any grounds for the rumours that serious decay has taken place in the foundation stone of this House, causing the structure to give way in several places.

LORD JOHN MANNERS replied, that he had called the attention of Sir Charles Barry and of the gentlemen in the Office of Works having charge of that Department to the subject, and their Report did not confirm the accuracy of the rumours in question. Sir Charles Barry reported that there was not any ground for the rumours, and that though the stones of the building, like all stones in London subject to atmospheric influence, had suffered decomposition on the surface to some degree, yet the stability of the structure was not affected, and there was no real ground for apprehension. The Report of the other gentleman was to the same effect.

THE PROBATE ACT AND THE DIVORCE ACT—QUESTION.

MR. HADFIELD said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether it is intended to proceed with the Probate Act Amendment Bill and the Divorce Act Amendment Bill, or either of them this Session; and, if it is, when it is intended to proceed.

MR. WALPOLE said, that what the Government at present proposed to do was to try to pass such clauses of those Acts as were absolutely necessary, in order to amend certain defects which interfered with the administration of justice, and to take out those clauses which were not so immediately essential, and which were likely to give rise to discussion. The particulars of the arrangement would be stated when the Bills came before the House on the following evening.

THE OUTRAGE AT JEDDAH.—QUESTION.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he would beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, what communications have passed between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of Turkey on the subject of the recent outrages at Jeddah; whether Her Majesty's Government have insisted on the summary punishment of the offenders; and whether they are in possession of any information whether it is possible for ships of war to take up such a position in the Harbour of Jeddah, as to enable them to give effectual protection to the Christian population in the event of any future disturbance?

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD in reply said, that on a former occasion he had stated that the Cyclops had been telegraphed to, and ordered to return with other vessels to Jeddah immediately, and the officers were instructed, if ample reparation were not given, to bombard Jeddah, and insist on the immediate punishment of all the parties concerned in the outrage. He could now state that the Cyclops immediately sailed for Jeddah, and he was informed by the captain that by lightening the vessel she could approach quite close to the town; and the captain added that she was so heavily armed that she could perform any service required of her. There was also a very heavy armament for the whole of her boats. This determination of the British Government was immediately communicated without reserve to the Turkish Government, and information had been received that the Turkish Government forthwith ordered a general officer to Jeddah to enforce the summary punishment of the murderers. In a subsequent despatch from the Foreign Office, Sir Henry Bulwer was instructed to say that this was a case in which the British Government could not be trifled with:—

"And that even great political objects, as they regard our alliance with the Porte, must yield to the paramount principle of supporting Christian and British prestige in those regions. It was not enough to send a general to Jeddah. Troops were wanted there, but, above all, a public execution of the murderers immediately. The Pasha ought to have the power of life and death without tedious references to Constantinople. Three ships had been ordered to Jeddah, and we should seize the place if justice was not speedily obtained."

Sir Henry Bulwer was instructed to state this to the Grand Vizier without reserve. He (Mr. S. FitzGerald) could further inform the hon. Gentleman that, in consequence of these representations, an officer of the highest rank had been despatched from Constantinople; that he was backed by a very large force; that he was authorized to proclaim martial law, and without any reference whatever to Constantinople to inflict immediate punishment upon the authors of the outrage. He could state also, that not only had the Ministers of the Sublime Porte at Constantinople adopted these measures, but that the Sultan had personally sent his Secretary to Sir Henry Bulwer to say there was nothing His Majesty would not do to testify his indignation at the outrage and to satisfy the British Government. In testimony of that feeling his Imperial Majesty had placed 1,000,000 piastres at the disposal of the British and French Governments, to be distributed among the sufferers, and had also signified his intention of settling an amount of upwards of £400 a year upon the daughter of the French Consul and the representative of the British Vice Consul.

REVIEW GROUND AT HOUNSLOW.
QUESTION.

MR. BYNG said, he wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, whether there would be any objection to permit the inhabitants of Hounslow and the vicinity to pass across the Review Ground at that place, and to use it for recreational purposes, subject to proper restrictions, and at such times as would not interfere with military duties and regulations?

GENERAL PEEL replied, that the drill-ground was let on lease, the terms of which were extremely stringent; but he could state that, happening to live in the immediate neighbourhood, he was in the constant habit of riding and walking across the Review Ground, and he had seen many other persons doing so also.

FIREWORK MANUFACTORIES.
QUESTION.

MR. LAURIE said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, whether any steps have been taken to prevent the manufacture of fireworks in populous places?

MR. WALPOLE said, that no steps had been taken by the Government with such an object, but he might state that there was in existence an Act, passed so long ago as the reign of William III, which, if it were put in force, would, he apprehended, prevent the nuisance.

EVENTS IN THE EAST.

MR. WALPOLE said, he would beg to interpose before they proceeded to the Orders of the day for the purpose of asking permission to read a telegraphic despatch just received by the Government relating to the capture of Gwalior, and the progress of the British and French arms in China. The right hon. Gentleman then read the contents of a telegram received from Consul General Green, announcing the recapture, by Sir H. Rose, of Gwalior on 28th June, after four hours' hard fighting. Also the taking by the English and French gunboats, in China of a fort on the river Peiho, with trifling loss on our side.

METROPOLIS LOCAL MANAGEMENT ACT AMENDMENT BILL.
COMMITTEE.

On Question that the House do immediately resolve itself into Committee on this Bill,

COLONEL FRENCH said, the course adopted by the Government was extremely inconvenient, for hon. Gentlemen expected that the business would be taken in the order in which it stood upon the paper. The Government had given notice of their intention to proceed with two Bills at the morning sitting, and it was now proposed to continue the discussion upon one of those Bills at the evening sitting, thereby completely overriding the arrangement which, according to the printed papers, had been made. The first two Bills on the paper to be taken at the evening sitting related to Ireland. Hon. Members representing Irish constituencies had been kept up night after night until past one o'clock in the expectation that some discussion would be taken upon these measures, and now that they had obtained a favourable position on the paper the Government proposed to proceed with other business.

MR. SPEAKER said, the House had been occupied at the morning sitting until half-past three o'clock by preliminary discussions before this Bill got into Committee, and by the direction of the House the Report was ordered to be presented at six o'clock. It was, therefore, for the House to decide whether or not they would at once resume the consideration of the Bill in Committee.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, there was no intention on the part of the Government to take any unfair advantage of Irish Members but the reverse. As, however, they had been unable to make much progress with this Bill at the morning sitting, he hoped the House would now consent to continue its discussion in Committee.

House in Committee.

Clause 1.

Question again proposed "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

MR. HEADLAM said, he had at the morning sitting moved the omission of the latter portion of the clause, in order to insert the following words,

"Such works as may be necessary for the purifying the Thames and improving the drainage of the metropolis."

If this Amendment were adopted he would propose the omission of the 2nd clause. It had been said that the House would not be asked to sanction any particular scheme, but as the Bill now stood it would, in fact, sanction the plan of the Metropolitan Board of Works. It was absurd, then, to say that the Bill was not connected with a plan. One authority was in favour of the plan of the Metropolitan Board of Works, while two were opposed to it. The report of the referees on metropolitan drainage was opposed to it, and the report of the Select Committee of that House, so far from sanctioning anything in the nature of the scheme, gave an opinion in favour of deodorization. If deodorization could be adopted, there was no use in making the elaborate and costly system of intercepting parallel sewers. He would press on the House that they were doing wrong if they threw their authority into any particular plan. He believed that to be the feeling of the Committee, and therefore he had proposed words to carry out that desire. By the first clause, as it stood, the Bill defined a particular site where the works might not be, and that was in connection with the second clause, which laid down where the works might be. It was clear that this was the commencement of the definition of a plan of intercepting sewers to carry off the sewage to Barking Creek. He wished the Act to give powers to the Metropolitan Board of Works without pledging them to any particular plan. The two objects embraced by the Bill were the improvement of the main drainage of the metropolis and the purification of the Thames, neither of which necessarily involved the other; and the effect of his Amendment would be to make this clear, to impose on the Metropolitan Board the duty of carrying out these objects with all convenient speed, and also charge them with the whole responsibility of the work, without defining the means of executing it.

MR. STEPHENSON did not think that by passing the Bill in its present form the House would be at all committing themselves in the way which the hon. and learned Member for Newcastle (Mr. Headlam) seemed to suppose. It was quite clear that the hon. and learned Gentleman had not devoted much time, professionally at all events, to the consideration of this subject. The hon. and learned Member had observed that the question resolved itself into two distinct parts—the purification of the Thames, and the main drainage of the metropolis. [MR. HEADLAM: No.] He thought the hon. and learned Member had conveyed to the House that one of these works might be executed without the other. He (Mr. Stephenson) denied that proposition. He maintained that the execution of one involved the execution of the other, for if London were well drained the Thames would be purified, for the impurities of the river resulted from the bad drainage of London. The House was not asked to agree to any plan about which there was any material difference of opinion between the Government referees and the engineers of the Metropolitan Board of Works. No doubt the two Reports made by these Gentlemen were antagonistic as to the end proposed, and their ultimate views; but they perfectly coincided with respect to the intercepting system. Both were in favour of intercepting sewers, and since all parties were agreed on the principle, why should not the House, before it advanced money for some special object, know how that object was to be carried out? He repeated that he did not think the House was committing himself, more especially as the only difference between the intercepting system of the Government and that of the Board of Works was as to the size of the sewers, and the place of outfall. This was unquestionably a subject which deserved careful consideration; but it was a mere question of detail, and involved no principle. He would ask the House, then, to sanction the principle as far as this measure did sanction it, or otherwise the question would be left as open and as unsettled as it was seven or eight years ago, when he first entered Parliament. At that time shoals of devices were brought forward for purifying the Thames, and improving the drainage of London; but these had all resolved themselves into the intercepting system as the basis of action, and after having devoted years to the consideration of the subject, he could conceive nothing more likely to carry out the object they had in view in advancing this large sum of money. The referees only differed as to the outfall. Now, whether or not it might be necessary hereafter to go down to Sea Reach was not a question for the House now to decide. Meanwhile, let them be contented to get down to Barking Creek. For his part, he thought it important not to go too far down the river in the first instance. The plan of the Government referees would, they computed, cost £6,000,000; the plan of the Board of Works would cost £3,000,000. Now, suppose the £6,000,000 scheme were adopted. Four or five years hence some plan of deodorization (which was yet in its infancy) might be perfected, and then they would, perhaps, find they had unnecessarily spent £3,000,000—a sum which would double itself in seventeen years; and therefore, even supposing they finally carried the outfall down to Sea Reach, much in a monetary point of view would be gained by not adopting that plan in the first instance. Moreover, he believed that sewage matter would eventually be made useful for agricultural purposes, and he therefore thought it impolitic to enter into any larger expenditure than could well be helped for the present, if even it were found necessary to carry the sewers down to Sea Reach hereafter. Now, as to the second point—the deodorizing of the sewage, at the mouth of the sewers, on the banks of the Thames—he must state that the system was entirely unfitted to deal with the extension of the metropolis. The sewers in the lower parts of the metropolis were constructed for a population inhabiting an area of about half a mile in width along the margin of the river. If the sewers were prolonged to any great extent, spreading into the high levels on the north side in the direction of Highgate and Hampstead, the amount of sewage would necessarily be increased; but if the sewers in the lower parts of London were inadequate to dispose of the sewage now passing through them, how much more inadequate must they become as the metropolis expanded? With regard to any deodorizing system that might be adopted along the margin of the Thames, supposing, after a month or six weeks of dry weather, during which the sewers had been accumulating a great quantity of filth, and the deodorizing system had been efficiently performing its office, that a storm came on, a tremendous rush of water would then take place through the sewers, and the result would be that the sewers, being totally inadequate to bear it, and the deodorizing machinery inadequate to do its work, we should be in precisely the same perdicament that we were at present, and an enormous mass of sewage would be poured into the Thames. He hoped the House would now allow him to turn to the attack which had been made upon him at the morning sitting by the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Coningham); for there were one or two points in that attack which it would be scarcely respectful to the House that he should pass unnoticed. So far as his professional character was concerned, the remarks of the hon. Member fell upon him with perfect indifference. But the hon. Member had spoken to-day as if he (Mr. Stephenson) were the engineer of the Victoria sewer. Now, he begged to say that he was not.

MR. CONINGHAM said, that what he had stated was that the hon. Gentleman had made an estimate for the Victoria sewer.

MR. STEPHENSON had never made an estimate for it in his life; and he now appealed to the hon. Member to withdraw the term "false estimates," which he had used. With respect to the metropolitan sewers, it happened that he had been so unfortunate—as any man must consider himself unfortunate—to be placed upon a Commission of Sewers in this metropolis, the members of which were exposed to every possible abuse, notwithstanding all the time and talent which they had brought to bear upon their duties, and he had found it to be a most thankless office. The hon. Member for Brighton then drew an illogical conclusion, which was rendered still more illogical now that he understood that he (Mr. Stephenson) had had nothing to do with the Victoria sewer, that taking his (Mr. Stephenson's) estimate for the Victoria sewer as a criterion, the £3,000,000 to be guaranteed under this Bill would be extended not to £10,000,000, but to £30,000,000. He admitted that the hon. Gentleman spoke under the influence of some little excitement when he stated the last amount. But what was the course he had adopted? Why, he first took an estimate with which he (Mr. Stephenson) had had nothing to do, multiplied it three or four times, and then applied it to another estimate with which, if that were possible, he had still less to do. The hon. Member had also talked of his (Mr. Stephenson's) being challenged to mathematical contest with Mr. F. O. Ward. Now, Mr. F. O. Ward had for years been engaged in making accusations against the very active, industrious, and intelligent engineer of the present Board of Sewers; and in reply to the challenge he begged to say that he should not receive it, nor would he, under any circumstances, meet Mr. F. O. Ward on a mathematical problem. The hon. Member had also accused him of using false formulæ. Now, the word "false" was, he must say, rather an offensive expression.

MR. CONINGHAM explained that he had not used the term "false formulæ." What he did was, to accuse Mr. Bazalgette of falsifying formulæ.

MR. STEPHENSON would take the responsibility of that also. Mr. Bazalgette did not falsify formulæ; and the responsibility of asserting that he took upon his own shoulders. He denied that the formulæ were false or even erroneous. He had devoted his best attention to them; and he hoped that neither Mr. Bazalgette nor himself would be supposed capable of falsifying formulæ for the purpose of bringing about a particular result. Another accusation against Mr. Bazalgette was his having made a falsification with regard to pipe sewers. Now, he could assure the hon. Member that these stoppages did actually take place, because he had himself, with his own eyes, seen stoppages in pipe sewers. As to the other charge of the hon. Member against Mr. Bazalgette, that he had gone into the sewers one night at twelve o'clock, and that no honest man ought to have been there at that hour. Suppose the hon. Member should apply that criterion to that House? He (Mr. Stephenson) had many a time visited great works in which he had been concerned, not only at midnight, but all night long; but could any one justly say that he was a dishonest man for that? Certainly not. Mr. Bazalgette was prompted by his sense of duty in going to a particular point of the London sewers at that time of night, and he would be bound to say that he could give a good account of his reasons for doing so.

MR. CONINGHAM rose to reply,

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER interposed, and said that he was not at all surprised that the hon. Member for Whitby should have desired to make the explanation and statement he had now laid before the Committee; but as the hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member for Brighton had both had an opportunity of expressing at length their views upon this controverted question, he would remind the Committee that the matter had nothing whatever to do with the clause under consideration.

MR. CONINGHAM appealed to the Committee to allow him to say a few words by way of explanation. The hon. Member for Whitby had treated the statements he had made at the morning sitting as if they had emanated from Mr. F. O. Ward; but he would remind the hon. Member that he had quoted each of these statements from Parliamentary documents; the charges he had brought against Mr. Bazalgette were upon record, and although ample opportunity had been given him to refute them, he had never yet done so. He had not charged the hon. Member for Whitby with having falsified data.

MR. CHAIRMAN called the hon. Member to order, and reminded the House that the Question before them was the omission of certain words from the clause. He would suggest, in order to confer unrestricted power of choice upon that Board, the propriety of adding the words, "according to such plan as may to them seem proper." In the Amendment, also, he thought some verbal alteration was requisite, and would suggest that it should run, "such works within the metropolis."

SIR BENJAMIN HALL said, that two opinions had been expressed by different Members; one was that no money ought to be advanced to the Metropolitan Board of Works till the plan proposed was known, and the other was, that the whole execution of the plan ought to be given up to the Metropolitan Board of Works. He was of opinion that the whole matter should be placed in the hands of the Metropolitan Board of Works. He would not enter into the consideration as to whether they were to proceed by intercepting sewers or tubular drains, or by the plan of one engineer or the other; but the question was whether the House should or should not throw all the responsibility on the body delegated by the ratepayers of the metropolis. That he thought was the best course, and so to leave the Metropolitan Board of Works to adopt such plan as they thought fit.

MR. HEADLAM, in reference to the remarks of the hon. Member for Whitby, explained that he had not intended to say there should be two separate works for the purification of the Thames and the drainage of London. He had no objection to the addition suggested by the right hon. Member for Marylebone.

MR. AYRTON hoped the noble Lord would adhere to the clause as it stood. He thought the clause was properly framed to get the House out of the difficulties arising from the controversies existing between engineers upon this matter.

MR. COX said, he had to complain that no answer had been given by the Government to a question he had asked at the morning sitting whether public buildings were to be subjected to the rate, and what was to be the area of rating. He would divide the Committee on every clause until he got an answer. He also wished to know whether the Metropolitan Board of Works had not agreed on a plan and submitted it to the Government.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the inquiry of the hon. Gentleman was no doubt an important one; but it had nothing to do with the clause; but as the hon. Gentleman thought that he had been deficient in courtesy in not answering his question, he might perhaps say that when the hon. Gentleman put the question the House was not in Committee, and he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) had already spoken. However, with the permission of the Committee he might state to the hon. Gentleman that the whole question of the rating of privileged buildings had lately been inquired into by a Committee of the House of Commons, who had made a report upon the subject; and, so far as he was at present advised—he spoke his own opinions and those of his colleagues—he agreed with the recommendations, generally speaking, of that Committee, who certainly did not approve of any buildings being privileged by exemption from rating. It was the intention of the Government to deal with that subject; but they thought it ought to be dealt with generally, and not by a side wind, or the introduction of a clause into a Bill of this kind, which referred only to one particular rate. It was not his intention, therefore, to propose a clause in the Bill with the object to which the hon. Member had referred; but the whole subject was under the consideration of the Government, and he trusted that it would be dealt with in a manner that would be satisfactory to the House. With regard to the area of taxation, it was intended that that area should consist of what was called the metropolitan area; and he did not see how in justice they could go beyond it.

MR. COWPER said, that if the second clause was to be agreed to, he would consent to adopt the words proposed by the right hon. Member for Marylebone (Sir B. Hall), but as he was about to move to expunge that clause, he preferred the words of the hon. and learned Member for Newcastle (Mr. Headlam) as more general, and not referring to any particular plan.

MR. PULLER said, if the Government carried out their declaration that it was not their intention to impose any plan on the Board of Works, the second clause must go. Otherwise they would sanction the adoption of such a system of sewers and works as might be necessary to prevent the sewage from passing into the Thames near the metropolis, but there would not be any provision to prevent the sewage when it had got into the Thames from being brought back into the metropolis. They must, therefore, add to the first clause such words as would impose on the Board not only the duty of preventing sewage from going into the Thames within the metropolitan boundaries, but to prevent it from coming back, or they must adopt the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Newcastle.

MR. TITE said, the Bill appeared to be drawn with reference to a distinct plan, and he thought all the objections which had been raised would be met by the omission of the word "sewers," for the clause would then stand thus—"according to such a plan as to them may seem proper, the necessary works"—which would include sewers if the Board should think them neeessary, but would leave the question entirely open. He should, however, support the Government in whatever course they might deem most advisable.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, that having listened attentively to the present discussion, he must press upon the Committee that in his opinion the effect of it was to show that the words as they stood in the clause were the best adapted to carry out the views of the Committee. If, however, it was desired to insert other words he should prefer those which had been suggested by the right hon. Baronet (Sir B. Hall) in the morning to those which had been proposed by the hon. and learned Member for Newcastle (Mr. Headlam). If, therefore, the Committee rejected the latter, and the right hon. Baronet would propose his, he (Lord J. Manners) would give the latter his assent.

VISCOUNT EBRINGTON said, he hoped the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Headlam) would not press to a division, though if he did so he (Viscount Ebrington) must vote with him. He regretted that a personal question had been introduced, but the Committee must not think that because Mr. Ward was not here to answer for himself, he must be in the wrong.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN said, that for the sake of simplicity, he should support the clause as it stood in the Bill on the distinct understanding that he was not committing himself to any particular plan.

GENERAL CODRINGTON said, that he wished to know if Government had made up their mind not to insist on the intercepting sewers?

MR. BYNG said, he supported the clause because it empowered the Board of Works to carry out the undertaking according to the plan they might think best, but without committing the House or the Government to any particular scheme.

MR. AKROYD said, he should support the Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Headlam), on the ground that the clause in its present shape gave power to the Board of Works to carry sewage wherever they pleased, provided it were beyond the limits of the metropolis. On every ground of justice the people of the localities beyond the area ought not to be subjected to the accumulated sewage of the whole metropolis; even for the sake of Londoners themselves they ought not to be deprived of the benefit of making visits to the country just outside the town. He could see no reason for pouring the whole of the filth of London into one place, such as Barking Creek, and thought some plan ought to be adopted for deodorizing the sewage.

MR. HUDSON said, he rose to order, and would submit that the hon. Member was discussing a plan not before the House, instead of confining himself to the clause.

MR. AKROYD said, the question was whether the sewage should be carried without the bounds of the metropolis. He must also complain that after the Committee, of which he was a Member, had taken evidence on all sides, had listened attentively to suggestions on all sides, and had drawn up a Report with great care, it was now proposed to legislate without reference to the conclusions to which they had come. He thought there was no use in calling the Committee together if their labours were to be treated in that manner.

MR. D. GRIFFITH said, he supported the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle. On the authority of the evidence of Dr. Barnes, of the Dreadnought Hospital, he denied that the air of the river was unwholesome. It was desirable that the words of the clause should be as neutral as possible.

GENERAL CODRINGTON said, he must press his question with respect to the intercepting sewer.

LORD JOHN MANNERS remarked that the question had been answered during the morning sitting by the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

MR. GARNETT said, the whole of the difficulty in which the Committee was placed was caused by the unsatisfactory proposition of the Government. The Government had themselves said they had no distinct plan in view, and yet the Committee was called upon to endorse the Metropolitan Board of Works' plan, and to guarantee £3,000,000 to be laid out in executing that plan. Either the Board or the Government ought to have power to deal with the question. But the Bill was nothing less than a daring attempt to amalgamate the authority of the House of Commons with the power of the Board of Works. It was his intention to vote against every clause of the Bill.

MR. YOUNG said, that the House should either have before it all the plans which had been devised, and go through them all, or should throw that duty on some independent body. The Government had chosen the latter alternative, and so far he thought their proposition fair; but it would not be fair to introduce into the Bill words which, by and by, when the plan failed, and all the money was spent, would enable it to be said that the House sanctioned such and such a plan.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 81; Noes 38: Majority 43.

Upon the Motion of Sir BENJAMIN HALL, the words "for the improvement of the main drainage of the metropolis" were added; and the Clause, as amended, was agreed to.

Clause 2 (Points of outfall, &c. Sewage to be deodorized).

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he proposed to alter this clause so as to provide, that if the sewage was deodorized, there might be an outfall in the parish of Chelsea, with other outfalls not higher up than the River Lea on the one side, and Deptford Creek on the other.

Amendment proposed,—

To leave out all after the word "matter," in line 15, and insert the words, "the Board may make outfalls at any point in the parishes of Kensington or Fulham, on the left bank of the River Thames, and also outfalls at any point on the left bank of the river, not higher up than the River Lea, and at Deptford Creek on the right bank."

VISCOUNT EBRINGTON said, he objected both to the clause and to the words proposed to be added, as they made the House responsible for the success of a scheme which might turn out an utter failure. He had been charged by the noble Lord opposite with being an enemy to self-government. He denied that he was so; but what he did object to was, a half-and-half scheme of local self-government, the responsibility being divided between the Parliament and the Board of Works, leaving nobody accountable for anything that might be done wrong. He trusted, before they had done with this Bill, they would make it rather more logical than it was then, and that if they were to have local self-government in the matter they should give that government a fair chance, and hold it responsible for failure and give it credit for success.

MR. WINGFIELD said, he had a serious objection to the clause as it stood. As the purification of the Thames was the principle of the Bill, surely the sewage at any outlet ought to be discharged at that outlet effectually. He objected to take so narrow a view of the principle and scope of the Bill, or to confine its operation to the purifying of the metropolitan area only.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, he thought the clause would be the better for the insertion of the Amendment proposed, but it would be better still to strike out the whole clause. He did not think, as a member of the Committee, that the evidence they had taken sanctioned them in the idea that deodorization could be carried out to any great extent within the metropolitan area, and he thought the House ought not to take the responsibility of suggesting any mode in which it could be carried out; for if the scheme turned out a failure the inhabitants of the metropolis would then turn round upon them and say they had in the Bill pointed out the very spots where the outfalls were to be. All they had to do was to guarantee the money, and leave the Metropolitan Board of Works to carry out their own plans.

MR. CONINGHAM intimated, that he would not press an Amendment of which he had given notice, but that he would oppose the whole clause.

MR. ALDERMAN CUBITT remarked, that if he understood the clause aright they might deodorize anywhere and discharge where they pleased, provided they deodorized during the whole year.

SIR BENJAMIN HALL said, the Amendment which the noble Lord proposed would determine the highest points of the outfall.

GENERAL CODRINGTON said, he understood that the process of deodorization might be carried on at Deptford Creek. An accumulation of sewage at such a spot could not fail to be a great nuisance, and he wished to ask whether this process ought to be carried on in the neighbourhood of a great town?

MR. AKROYD said, he objected to the scheme of deodorizing only for six months in the year, as the sewage thus poured out in the winter months would form mud banks, which would ferment and poison the atmosphere in summer. They ought to insist upon deodorization for the whole year. He should support the omission of the whole clause. There were Resolutions containing the opinion of parties who paid the rates of the metropolis, and they were consequently entitled to weight and consideration.

MR. COWPER said, that as the clause at present stood the Metropolitan Board of Works would have full liberty to send the liquid results of deodorization into the river at any point within the metropolitan area, but now the proposition was to continue the deodorization to Kensington and Fulham, and certain parts of the Lea and Deptford. It was said that if the deodorization was effectual there would be no nuisance, and if so, why limit the discharge to these particular points. The wiser course he would suggest would be not to call on the Committee to decide where the points of outfall should be, but to leave the clause as it was.

LORD JOHN MANNERS observed, that the object of the measure was to accord full liberty to the Metropolitan Board of Works to do that which seemed to them proper for the purification of the Thames, and the effective drainage of the metropolis. It was in consequence of this that the first paragraph of this clause was inserted by way of protection and safeguard to the inhabitants on the banks of the Thames and in Essex, but, as far as the Board were concerned, they would be glad to be without such a clause. It had been objected that if the Board were permitted to throw the sewage water after deodorization into the Thames, nuisances would arise, and therefore it was agreed to amend the second paragraph. The Government, however, had no great wish on that subject. The clause, amended or unamended, was purely a clause in the nature of a safeguard to relieve apprehensions and exaggerated fears. At the same time he believed the 26th clause would provide ample protection against nuisances, and if, when those interested in the question came to that clause, and found it was not altogether sufficient for their own locality, it might be so amended as to bind the Metropolitan Board of Works so as to carry out their work as effectually to prevent the possibility of nuisances.

SIR DENHAM NORREYS said, he thought it was rather hard to pass a clause which the Government did not wish and the Metropolitan Board of Works did not ask for. He appealed to the Government on behalf of hon. Gentlemen like himself who were neither odorizers nor deodorizers, neither interceptors nor non-interceptors, not to pledge them and the Committee to any particular mode of drainage. He was willing to give the noble Lord all the money, £6,000,000 instead of £3,000,000 if he wished; but he asked him not to tie the hands of those who were not masters of the question by any such clause as this.

MR. T. BARING remarked, that here was a clause which the Government did not wish, and which the Metropolitan Board of Works did not ask for. He thought the clause ought not to be forced, and that the House ought not to be either odorizers or deodorizers, interceptors or non-interceptors, and so make them responsible or particeps criminis to any mode of drainage that might be adopted, and so leave it open to the Board of Works to turn round on them and say, that Government forced a particular plan upon the country.

MR. AYRTON appealed to the Government to withdraw the clause. The House had passed through various phases of opinion already. At first it insisted upon a definite plan; and then, when everybody found that his own would not be adopted, all were opposed to any defined plan. He had read all the blue books and all the appendices; he was indoctrinated with all the schemes, and the more he read of them the less he was satisfied with any. The only conclusion to which he had arrived was the same as that of the hon. Member for Whitby—namely, that they must have an intercepting main drainage. This was a strict necessity, arising from the internal system of drainage in the metropolis. The pouring of sewage into a river was not necessarily a nuisance, it only depended upon the proportion it bore to the waters of the river. At present, unfortunately, above London Bridge, the sewage was to the water as one to fifty. It was proposed to carry it to a point where it would be one to 1,000. But it was a question of experiment to say at what point between these limits the river would be in a healthy and innocuous state. It was necessary, however, to go on at once with the works for the internal drainage of the metropolis, and probably by the time these were finished some project would be devised as to the mode of disposing of it. As it would take several years before they could get to that point, he hoped the Government would not ask the House to commit itself to any particular scheme.

MR. PULLER said, he thought it would be necessary, if this clause was struck out, to introduce a clause making it incumbent on the Metropolitan Board to carry the sewage to a point from which it could not be floated back again to the metropolis.

Amendment withdrawn.

Clause struck out.

Clause 3 (Metropolitan Board may Construct Works on the Shores and Bed of the Thames.)

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he intended to propose this clause for the purpose of preserving the rights of the Board of Conservancy and of the Admiralty.

MR. WARREN said, he would propose after "may" to insert—

"With the sanction and approbation of the Conservators of the River Thames and of the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Works and Public Buildings, but not otherwise."

He should withdraw the other Amendment of which he had given notice.

MR. CRAWFORD said, he hoped that no provision would be inserted to debar the Board of Conservancy from taking steps for the embankment of the Thames. He thought the rights of the Admiralty and of the Conservators of the Thames should be saved.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, a plan had been proposed for carrying the sewage down the bed of the river, thereby avoiding the inconvenience that would arise to the metropolitan traffic by carrying the works through the crowded throughfares of the Strand and elsewhere, and if this were done it would be quite necessary to save these rights.

MR. NORRIS considered that if care were not taken powers might be given that would render the Metropolitan Board of Works obnoxious to the conservators of the river .

Amendment withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 4 (Powers of taking Land to apply for the purpose of Deodorizing Works).

Mr. CONINGHAM said, he would move to leave out the words "either within or," so that the deodorizing works might be beyond the limits of the metropolis. He believed that these deodorizing works would not only fail, but that they would be a nuisance to the neighbourhood.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he thought the widest possible discretion ought to be left to the Board.

MR. TITE said, he could not agree in the conclusion that these deodorizing works would be a nuisance, and quoted the evidence of Mr. Wickstead, engineer, of Leicester, who stated that the deodorizing works there were not at all offensive to the town, and that there was no reason why they should not be erected in the middle of the street without inconvenience to the neighbourhood.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, whenever the Committee heard scientific evidence on this subject it was always sure to be contradicted by somebody else soon afterwards.

SIR CHARLES BURRELL said, he could bear testimony to the effective power of deodorization by lime as practised by the late Lord Chichester.

MR. CONINGHAM quoted the opinions of Dr. Hofman and Mr. Whitwell, two eminent chemists, who declared that the process of deodorization was offensive.

Amendment withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 5 (the Metropolitan Board of Works may appoint a Committee for the purposes of the works).

MR. ROUPELL said, he would move, as an Amendment, that the number of the Committee should be nine instead of fifteen.

Amendment proposed in line 35, after the words "consist of" to leave out the word "six" and insert "fifteen."

SIR BENJAMIN HALL said, he hoped the noble Lord would strike out the clause, the Board of Works having already the power of appointing Committees for any purpose, provided that such Committees reported all their acts to the Board of Works for its approval. The number of the Committee ought, at any rate, to be much larger than six, but the precise number had better be left to the Board.

MR. STUART WORTLEY said, he also thought the clause should be omitted. It might, if adopted, give power to a bare majority, and a small number, to take the entire management of the Thames, and so take it out of the hands of the ratepayers.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he was of opinion that six was too limited a number, and the number fifteen was now proposed in deference to the opinions of a meeting of metropolitan delegates. The Board of Works would, of course, determine on the plan, but when it had once done that, it would be far better to leave the carrying out of the plan to a Committee. Besides, the clause left the appointment of such Committee entirely to the discretion of the Board.

MR. AYRTON said, he thought the clause narrowed too much the discretion of the whole Board as to the constitution of the Committee. He would propose to leave out "of whom the Chairman of the Board shall be one," and insert "and of a Chairman, to be appointed by the Board."

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, he had a great objection to this clause. The Metropolitan Board was not elected directly by the ratepayers, but was elected from the vestries, and now it was proposed to give to a Committee of the Board very large powers. Supposing any person placed on this Committee did not do his duty, there were no means of removing him. It would be very likely that the best men would not be put on the Committee, and he hoped the clause would not be insisted on.

MR. STUART WORTLEY said, he should vote against the Amendment and the clause itself. The real objection to the clause was, that the Committee would be irremovable, and they would be able to act in spite of the general body.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he would assent to the general wish that the clause should be struck out of the Bill.

Amendment withdrawn.

Clause struck out, as was also Clause

Clauses 7 and 8 agreed to.

Clause 9 (The Treasury may guarantee payment of Moneys borrowed.)

MR. ROUPELL said, he would propose to add a proviso, to the effect that the works should be inspected by a Government officer before advancing the whole of the money.

Amendment proposed at the end of the clause to add—

"And no such payment of principal or interest shall be so guaranteed by the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury, except upon a certificate of such officer as they shall appoint, that the works from time to time constructed by the Metropolitan Board of Works for the purification of the Thames, and for the improvement of the drainage of the metropolis, have been in all respects designed and executed conformably to the provisions of this Act."

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, the proposal was a somewhat Irish one. Money was wanted to execute works, and the hon. Gentleman proposed to give the guarantee which would be required for raising that money after the works themselves had been completed.

MR. ROUPELL said, he would withdraw the proviso, but he thought that, as the money would not be advanced in one sum but in several, before the whole were expended there should be some security to Parliament that the money had been properly disposed of.

Amendment withdrawn.

MR. AKROYD said, he rose to move to omit the clause which seemed to him to introduce quite a principle in direct opposition to those on which their legislation had hitherto been founded. Other towns carried out necessary improvements without troubling Parliament, and he could not see why London, the wealthiest city in the world, should come there begging for the aid of a Government guarantee? But that was not all. Even conceding that there should be a guarantee, he objected to the amount. Before Parliament consented to mortgage the national resources to effect a local object, a clear and well-defined plan, according to which the scheme was to be carried out, ought to be before them. They had it in evidence that the deodorization of the metropolitan sewage might be effected for a far less sum than £3,000,000. Mr. Cooke, the Chairman of the Leicester Sewage Company, had deposed that the works required for a population of 100,000 would cost about £6,000, and that the plan might be applied to the metropolis. He (the hon. Member) was satisfied that not more than £200,000 was really required; why then should they guarantee £3,000,000? The evidence to which he referred was not yet before hon. Members. [The CHAIRMAN: Then it is quite irregular to refer to it.] He bowed to the authority of the right hon. Gentleman; but he protested against proceeding any further with the subject until the House was in possession of evidence of so much importance.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he was surprised that the hon. Gentleman should think the nation incurred any risk by the guarantee it was proposed to give. The annual rental of London was £14,000,000 and a threepenny rate upon that amount would produce £175,000 per annum, so that the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his calculation of £145,000 had left a very wide margin.

MR. G. A. HAMILTON said, the hon. Member for Huddersfield had argued as though it was something quite novel for the State to lend money or guarantee loans for municipal purposes, but the fact was that there was scarcely a municipality which had not received authority to borrow money from the Exchequer Loan Commissioners. The State could run no imaginable risk in giving the guarantee proposed by the Bill; for the rate proposed would be amply sufficient to cover the outlay. Indeed the only object of the guarantee was to enable the Metropolitan Board of Works to raise money on easier terms than they otherwise could do. There was a large amount of property in this country which could only be lent out upon Government securities, and it was to enable that money to be lent to the Metropolitan Board that the clause was intended.

Clause agreed to, as was also Clause 10. (Securities transferable by delivery).

Clause 11. (Money borrowed under this Act to be applied only to works under this Act).

MR. HEADLAM said, he rose to move the addition of a proviso enabling the Metropolitan Board of Works to expend a sum not exceeding £10,000, or any further sum, if authorized by the Treasury in experiments, in order to determine the most efficient means of carrying out the object of the Act. As the clause at present stood it would not be lawful for the Board to apply any portion of the £3,000,000 to any purpose except that of constructing works. Considering the great amount of expenditure and the doubts which existed as to the precise mode in which the object could be attained, it was most desirable that the Metropolitan Board should have the means of ascertaining beforehand what was the best mode. There had been evidence given before the Committee which conclusively proved the necessity for further examination. At Leicester a considerable sum was expended in preliminary experiments, which certainly had not been without good effects. He thought the proviso which he suggested would be of equal benefit in the case of the metropolis.

Amendment proposed at the end of Clause 11 to add the words :—

"Provided always, that it shall be lawful for the said Metropolitan Board of Works to expend a sum not exceeding ten thousand pounds in experiments, with the object of determining the most efficient means for carrying into execution the objects of this Act, or any further sum, with the sanction of the Commissioners of the Treasury; and in making any such experiments it shall be lawful for the said Board to use powers conferred upon them for the purposes of this Act."

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, he hoped the Committee would not assent to the proposition of the hon. and learned Gentleman. Where the honey was there were sure to be flies, and if it were known that the Metropolitan Board had £10,000 to expend on experiments, he wished them joy of the task they would have in testing the number of schemes that would be submitted to them.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he thought the Amendment unnecessary, inasmuch as by the 25th clause the Metropolitan Board of Works were authorized to expend such sums as might be necessary for preserving the health of the inhabitants during the construction of the necessary works.

MR. BUTLER expressed a hope that the Amendment would be pressed.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 12 (Appointment of Inspecting Engineers).

SIR BENJAMIN HALL moved the omission of words, and the insertion of others, the effect of which was to limit the functions of the engineers only to inspecting and reporting on the works.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. D. GRIFFITH said, he thought it desirable that the Government should have some control over the expenditure of the money. Things might go wrong under the management of the Metropolitan Board, and it was absolutely essential that Government should have the power of interfering. He would move a proviso to that effect.

Amendment proposed at the end of Clause 12 to add :—

"And should such report, so laid before them by such inspecting engineer cause the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury to entertain serious doubts as to the eligibility of the course taken by the Metropolitan Board of Works to effect such drainage, it shall be lawful for the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury to suspend the further issue of bonds, debentures, and other securities, on the part of the Metropolitan Board of Works, until the opinion of Parliament shall have been taken on the points at issue."

MR. G. A. HAMILTON said, he was of opinion that such a proviso would be likely seriously to interfere with the working of the Bill, and therefore he should object to it. The object of the clause was simply to provide that a statement of accounts should be regularly placed before the Treasury. At the same time he must object to any further responsibility being thrown upon the Government. The very principle of the Bill was to give the whole power to the Metropolitan Board.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 13 (Metropolitan Board of Works to levy a rate of three pence in the pound on the property in the metropolis) agreed to.

Clause 14. (Such rate to be called the Metropolis Main Drainage Rate.)

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, that if the rating was to be based upon the existing poor rate it would create great inequality of rating, there being a difference of as much as 57 per cent in the assessment of different parishes. It was desirable that the assessment should be on the county rate. The amount of the assessment for county rate was nearly a million more than that for the poor rate in Middlesex.

SIR BENJAMIN HALL said, that the Board of Works were authorised to issue their precept for the rate, and the basis on which they assessed was that of the county rate.

SIR DENHAM NORREYS said, that by certain words in the clause it would appear that the rate was to be levied on the poor rate assessment. In his opinion, however, the county rate represented the value much more than the poor-rate assessment.

MR. HENLEY said, the object of the Government was to place the assessment upon a fair tenement value.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he would promise that on bringing up the Report the clause would be so shaped as to provide, according to the desire of the House, that the assessment should be according to the county rate valuation.

MR. JOHN LOCKE considered that the clause as it stood was unobjectionable, provided it was understood that the rate was to be levied on the county rate assessment.

MR. W. WILLIAMS expressed an opinion that as this was a permanent work, the ground landlord should bear the burden of it.

Clause agreed to, as were also Clauses 15 and 16.

Clause 17 (Rates to be made by Metropolitan Board on default of Vestries, &c., in payment of precepts).

SIR DENHAM NORREYS asked, on what assessment the rates were to be levied under the Act, according to the poor rate or the county rate?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER apprehended thot there was only one assessment, which served both for the county and the poor rate?

SIR BENJAMIN HALL said, that for the county rate the magistrates in quarter sessions determined what was the value of the property of the different parishes, and a parish that was thus valued at £500,000 would probably be assessed at £300,000 for the poor rate.

MR. HENLEY said, that care should be taken that the gross amount was paid under the poor rate system in the same way as under the county rate assessment.

MR. G. A. HAMILTON explained that the assessment would be according to the county rate, and the distribution according to the poor rate.

MR. TITE said, that the city of London, for the purpose of putting an end to unequal assessments, had recently been entirely re-assessed on the net rental, and suggested that the same principle should be applied to the whole of the metropolitan districts

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, that he had promised to alter the 13th clause, with a view to levy the rate on the county rate assessment. If it was found necessary to alter this clause to effect the same object he would do so on the Report.

Clause agreed to, as were also Clauses from 18 to 25 inclusive.

Clause 26 (Board not to create a nuisance),

GENERAL CODRINGTON said, he would move an addition to the clause, the object of which was to protect places which had spent a great deal of money on their own drainage and might have to fight the Metropolitan Board for creating a nuisance near them. Woolwich had spent £20,000 on its own drainage, and ought, therefore, to be protected against the Metropolitan Board.

Amendment proposed at the end of Clause 26 to add

"That the Metropolitan Board, for all works to be carried on under this Act, shall first obtain a certificate in writing from the Board of Trade stating that in the opinion of such lastmentioned Board the works proposed to be carried into effect by the said Metropolitan Board are not likely to be or to create a nuisance."

MR. HENLEY opposed the Amendment. It would give a veto over the whole proceedings of the Metropolitan Board of Works. He did not think that the constituents of the gallant General had a right to complain, for they had just spent £20,000 and turned their sewage into the river. And as we were told that the metropolis suffered most from the sewage on the influx of the tide, he thought that this complaint of being poisoned came with a bad grace from the representative of that borough. If there was any reason to apprehend the creation of a nuisance the Court of Chancery had the power to prevent it.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, it was not very consolatory to tell those who might be annoyed by the Works of the Metropolitan Board that they could go to the Court of Chancery for a remedy. He thought the Secretary of State for the Home Department was the proper authority to decide questions of this sort. Why should not the Government undertake to prevent drainage nuisances in the same manner as under the Smoke Prevention Act they prevented the carrying on of offensive trades? Deodorization was surely a trade of that class.

MR. HENLEY said, the Smoke Prevention Act was against common right, and therefore a power was vested in the Secretary of State for the protection of manufacturers against the institution of vexatious actions.

SIR BENJAMIN HALL said, he thought that the Government should consider the matter, for persons would not risk proceedings at law, but a simple suggestion from a Secretary of State might stop a nuisance which otherwise would not be abated without spending hundreds or thousands of pounds. He spoke from his experience at the Board of Health during the time of the cholera.

MR. AYRTON thought the clause was sufficient as it stood to put down nuisances.

MR. COX said, he believed that this was another attempt to introduce the system of having a veto on the proceedings of the Board of Works. He thought that the clause should stand as it was.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, if there were a nuisance it would be against a locality, and it would not be an individual merely who would have to take proceedings. The suggestion made, however, was worthy of consideration, and he would look into the matter.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he thought that the towns on the banks of the Thames up the river should be compelled to deodorize their sewage before it went into the Thames.

SIR BENJAMIN HALL said, he would suggest that the clause should give the local authorities power to interfere, and if they did not do so, then that power should be reserved to the Secretary of State to direct proceedings.

GENERAL CODRINGTON said, he would withdraw his Amendment, but he hoped the Government would consider the suggestions just made. As to Woolwich, that town had suffered considerably from the sewage of London being forced into the river.

Amendment withdrawn.

Clause agreed to, as were also the remaining Clauses.

On the bringing up of a clause, reserving the rights of the Lord High Admiral,

MR. AYRTON said, he must object to the reception of the clause. The whole bed and soil of the river were vested in the Board of Conservancy, and that the Admiralty had nothing whatever to do with the Thames; but that they were in the habit constantly of thrusting in arbitrary clauses in cases where they were in no way concerned.

GENERAL CODRINGTON said, that the Admiralty had a veto on the proceedings of the Conservators according to an existing Act of Parliament.

LORD JOHN MANNERS explained that the clause had been copied from the Conservancy Bill.

MR. AYRTON said, he believed that the clause would give the Admiralty an absolute veto on the whole works.

MR. COX remarked, that it would be better to let the clause pass at present, as they would be in a better position to discuss it when the Bill should be reprinted. It appeared to him, however, as he understood the clause, that it would place the Metropolitan Board in a worse position than ever; for instead of having to obtain the consent of one Board only, they would now have to get the sanction both of the Admiralty and of the Conservancy.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, he did not think that it would be necessary to have the Bill reprinted, and suggested that a new clause should be brought up on the Report.

MR. COWPER said, the Admiralty's powers extended only to the navigation.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he would adopt the suggestion made, and withdraw the clause for the present.

Clause withdrawn.

GENERAL CODRINGTON moved to insert after clause 3 the following:—

"That the plans of the intended works shall be opened to public inspection for one calendar month before the commencement of the works at some convenient place within the metropolis; and public notice shall be given by the said Metropolitan Board of the time and place were such plans can be so inspected.

LORD JOHN MANNERS objected to the clause, which, he said, would serve no good purpose, and might lead to great confusion.

GENERAL CODRINGTON said, that as the Government had intimated their intention of considering the propriety of giving the Secretary of State a power of interference, he would not press the clause.

Clause negatived.

MR. ROUPELL moved the following clause:—

"The Metropolitan Board of Works shall, in the month of June in every year, make a Report of all their proceedings in relation to the main drainage of the Metropolis, and shall, in the said month, send a copy thereof, together with an account, in detail, of all sums expended during the preceding year in execution of the works authorised by this Act, to one of Her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, which shall be laid before both Houses of Parliament within one month after the receipt thereof, if Parliament be sitting, or if Parliament be not then sitting, then within one month after the next meeting of Parliament."

SIR BENJAMIN HALL said, that what this clause sought to effect was already provided for by the Act of 1855.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, there was no objection to the production of such a Report; and that, as the right hon. Gentleman (Sir B. Hall) had remarked, was already provided for.

Clause by leave withdrawn.

MR. AYRTON said, he would propose a clause enacting that if the Metropolitan Board should raise and pay the money borrowed under the Act from any other sources of revenue which might be at their disposal for the purpose it should not be necessary to make or raise the metropolitan main drainage rate. On a former occasion he had made a statement respecting the taxation of the metropolis, and had indicated that there were several sources of revenue, wholly independent of this rate, sufficient to meet the annual demand on the metropolis; but if the Bill was passed without such a provision as he proposed he might be told hereafter that it was not open to him to raise the question, as the matter was settled by the present measure.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, that the clause had the appearance of weakening the security provided by the Bill, as no permanent revenue was indicated by it.

Clause negatived.

MR. D. GRIFFITH proposed a clause, empowering the Board to elect one of its members as deputy chairman, and to grant him a salary of £500 a year. He thought that onerous duties should not be thrown on any one without adequate remuneration.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he did not see any necessity for the clause, as the general members of the Board had hitherto willingly rendered their services gratuitously.

MR. WILLIAMS said, he knew most of the Board, and he knew that they would reject the proposal with contempt.

Clause negatived.

Bill reported; as amended to be considered To-morrow.

The House resumed.

JUDGMENTS (IRELAND) ACT AMENDMENT BILL.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

Clause 1.

MR. WHITESIDE moved the addition of the following proviso at the end of Clause 1:—

"That nothing in this Act contained shall in any manner extend or apply to any case in which any such question as aforesaid was raised before the 1st of July, 1858."

MR. P. O'BRIEN said, he must object to the proviso, as it would have the effect of prejudicing the creditors of the Tipperary Bank by protecting a judgment for £10,000 registered by Mrs. Sadleir, the wife of the unfortunate Mr. James Sadleir, who put an end to his existence on Hampstead Heath.

MR. WYLD expressed a hope that an exception would be made in the present case.

MR. WHITESIDE said, he thought that the creditors of the bank had been most shamefully plundered, but that it was unusual and unadvisable to correct a particular mischief by legislation.

MR. J. D. FITZGERALD said, he must complain that up to the present time the House had not had an opportunity of discussing the principles of the Bill. It was in fact a retrospective measure, and affected private interests to the extent of a million and a half, and the parties so affected had no means of defending their rights. He would therefore urge the Committee to pause before it sanctioned the principle of the Bill,

MR. WHITESIDE said, he would admit the Act was retrospective. But where there was a general mischief it was the habit and practice of the House to remedy the mischief with reference to particular cases. He might refer as an instance to the case of an Act passed a few years ago to amend the Wills Act. Up to that time the law had been that a will was not valid unless the signature was after the last clause. That led to much injustice, which an Act was passed to remedy, and that Act had reference to the general principle, not being framed for any individual case, but it was retrospective in its operation. However, it would not apply to any case in which the point had been already raised, and a clause to the same effect was in the present Bill. He could also refer to other examples of legislation under analogous circumstances. The right hon. and learned Gentleman said that parties had acquired rights, but he denied it; they had acquired no rights.

MR. P. O'BRIEN said, it was impossible to reconcile the statement of the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Whiteside) and that of the right hon. and learned Member for Ennis (Mr. FitzGerald). He therefore hoped that some protection would be given to the unfortunate sufferers by the Tipperary Bank.

MR. MALINS said, he should support the clause, as he held that any other course would promote not the cause of justice, but would promote the cause of chicanery and fraud. A general error had been committed in Ireland. It was said there a question of a million and a half of money. No doubt that was so. A judgment had been registered in the usual form against Mr. James Sadleir, but his last residence was not mentioned. However, he was described as a Member of Parliament, and there was only one James Sadleir a Member of Parliament. Would any one say that creditors had been deceived? The fact was, as stated by the Attorney General for Ireland, that the Bill was to remedy a general evil. In all cases where common error had been committed, the Legislature were bound to intercede and set things right. It was a grievous thing if the creditors of the Tipperary Bank were to be deprived of the property of that man Sadleir, to which on every principle of right they were entitled, in consequence of a voluntary settlement. But he felt, as the Attorney General for Ireland had said, that it was very difficult for the Legislature to interfere to reverse a judicial decision. However, he felt sure that the decision would be reversed on the appeal.

MR. DE VERE said, the Act was introduced in order to remedy a certain class of wrongs, and the only case of the kind they had ever heard of was expressly excepted by the proviso. It would be very unfair to the parties concerned that a Bill affecting the case should be passed while the matter was sub judice.

MR. ROEBUCK asked what possible harm could arise from the omission of the proviso? If any right were acquired, he could understand that an injury would arise. But no rights had been acquired, as the matter was sub judice.

MR. WHITESIDE said, he would yield to the general sense of the House, and agree to withdraw the proviso.

MR. J. D. FITZGERALD said, he would throw the responsibility of the Bill upon the Government, and would not offer any further opposition.

Proviso withdrawn. Clause agreed to.

The other Clauses were agreed to.

Clauses added.

House resumed; Bill reported, as amended, to be considered To-morrow.

MILITIA (SERVICE ABROAD) ACT CONTINUANCE BILL.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

MR. VERNON SMITH said, as the Bill had been introduced without any statement on the part of the Government, he, without intending to offer any opposition, wished to ask, what were the reasons for renewing powers which ceased at the termination of the Russian war. The Bill differed from an ordinary Continuance Bill, as it was for the purpose of reviving an Act which was considered to have expired. He did not doubt that the state of affairs in India had induced the Government to introduce the Bill; but in order to afford an opportunity for some explanation, he would ask whether it was intended to increase the number of European troops serving in India.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he would allow that the Bill was not properly a continuance Bill, but one to revive the law enacted in 1854. When he introduced the Bill he mentioned that fact, but it being at a very late hour he did not make any lengthened statement, nor was any particular statement necessary. It had been introduced for a very simple reason. The recruiting for the army had been continued with great spirit, and during the last two months with greater success than could have been expected, but it would readily be understood that it was undesirable to send out raw levies to India. They all knew the danger, if not the certain consequence of sending out green youths to India, and therefore it was highly expedient that the Government should have the power of availing themselves of seasoned troops, some of whom were still in this country, and others serving in our colonial possessions. For that reason the Government deemed it their duty to ask Parliament to give them the power of employing, if necessary, a portion of the militia in relief of those veteran soldiers, until the new levies should be fit to undertake the duties. That was the only reason for introducing the Bill, and he hoped Parliament would not refuse to grant the powers asked for, and which might, under certain circumstances, be most important for the efficient conduct of the war in India.

MR. VERNON SMITH said, the right hon. Gentleman had not mentioned whether it was intended to send additional troops to India beyond the complement of Europeans now in that country.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the number of troops in India would not be increased by the Bill. When he introduced it there was no intention of sending out additional troops, but the Government of course reserved the right and duty of sending additional troops, if necessary. That was a question quite apart from the Bill, which, however, would greatly facilitate such action on the part of the Government. He did not wish Parliament to infer from anything he said that the Government did not intend to send additional troops to India.

Clause 1.

COLONEL GILPIN said, he objected to the continuance of some of the provisions of the former Act. By Clause 7 it was enacted that no officer of the militia while out of the united kingdom should rank with officers of the regular army higher than the grade of lieutenant colonel. That regulation operated unfairly towards colonels of militia, and imposed upon them certain duties from which they had a right to be exempted. The origin of that clause dated as far back as 1813, when an Act was passed to enable militia regiments to volunteer for active service, and it was thought that colonels of militia in the field ought not to be permitted to hold the rank of brigadier in command. The intention now was to employ the militia in garrison duties, and he could not see what difference there could be between those duties performed at Malta, or Gibraltar, and those performed at Portsmouth. A militia colonel was not likely to be in the command of the garrison, because besides the governor there was always a full colonel of artillery and one of engineers, but even should such an event happen for a few days there need be no fear that the dependency would be lost, for the only duty of the colonel would be to receive official letters. He did not mean to say all militia colonels were equally good; neither were the colonels of the line. Some colonels are civilians, some military; but had we no civilian colonels in the Peninsular war? As examples of civilian officers he might refer to the Marquess of Anglesey and Lord Lynedoch; and he never heard it was necessary, even in the early part of their brilliant and successful career, to put dry-nurses over their heads. The Duke of Richmond also was in the militia; and was a young officer in the line to be put over his head, suppose he were with his men in Malta or Gibraltar? Nothing in his opinion could more tend to damp the ardour of the militia regiments than the abrupt dismissal of some of the regiments a short time ago, and he could not help thinking that it was unfair to require of them to go beyond the sphere of their constitutional duties, and then to alter the Queen's regulations to their prejudice.

GENERAL PEEL said, the clause was by no means a new one, but was to be found incorporated in every Act of Parliament upon the subject. Nothing could be further from his intention than to say one word which could bear the construction of being disparaging to the colonels of militia. There were many of them quite capable, no doubt, but, upon the other hand, there were several who were not fit to perform the duties of commanders of garrisons. What he was anxious to guard against was the entrusting the command to such places as Malta, for instance, to militia colonels who happened to have little or no military experience. He would not, however, hesitate to meet the objections of the hon. and gallant Gentleman so far as not to call upon those officers to do duties abroad which they would not be called upon to do in garrison here. He would bring up a clause with that object on the Report.

MR. ROEBUCK said, he wished to call the attention of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman to the fact that the question of promotion in the milita appeared to be entirely in the hands of the Lord Lieutenants of counties, and that the impression prevailed that favouritism to a great extent was the consequence. Militia officers would feel much more confidence in the justice of the system if promotion were given upon the responsibility of a military authority such as the right hon. and gallant Gentleman himself.

GENERAL PEEL said, there was a Commission now sitting whose duty it was to inquire into the whole question of the organization of the militia, and that the point to which the hon. and learned Gentleman referred would no doubt form one of the subjects of investigation.

GENERAL CODRINGTON said, he thought that a matter well worthy of the consideration of the Secretary for War was the youth of the recruits who were at present enlisted in the service. Many of them were so young as to render it much more likely that they would have to be sent to hospital than to the head-quarters of their regiment upon their arrival in India.

MR. BLACK said, he wished to call attention to the inconvenience to which the billeting system gave rise in small towns in Scotland.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he must remind the hon. Gentleman that the Bill under discussion was one the object of which was to send the militia out of England.

Clause agreed to, as were also the remaining Clauses.

House resumed.

Bill reported, as amended, to be considered To-morrow, at Twelve o'Clock.

CORRUPT PRACTICES PREVENTION ACT CONTINUANCE BILL.

CONSIDERATION.

Order for Consideration read.

MR. WALPOLE said, that this was merely a continuance Bill, and although it contained amendments of the law on three points, they by no means affected the general character of the measure.

MR. ROEBUCK said, he should move the omission of the first clause. He had no doubt the right hon. Gentleman had the same object as he himself, namely, to render the mode of election less corrupt; but the clause enabled a candidate to pay the travelling expenses of voters, and a more mischievous proposal could scarcely have been made to the House. Once let that principle be legalized and candidates at a contested election would no longer stand on an equality. The election would then simply turn on the question of which candidate had the longest purse. He had heard that at elections in this town cabmen even had been offered £1 for every voter they brought to the poll. Let the House imagine £1,000 spent in that way, and its effect upon a contested election. If this clause were omitted from the Bill he should move that candidates be recouped from the county rates the money expended by them in conveying voters to the poll. But he contended that it ought not to be paid at all. Voting was a public duty, for which one ought not to be paid. It would be the old story, "I have bought you, and I will sell you." A more mischievous Bill than this he had never seen, for it struck a deadly blow at all purity of election, by making a return to that House a mere matter of personal ambition and personal aggrandizement rather than of public duty.

MR. WALPOLE said, the hon. and learned Gentleman treated the matter as if the Bill went to introduce something new, but he would remind him that the payment of travelling expenses had never been declared illegal unless corruption could be connected with it. The case in which large sums were alleged to have been paid to cabmen at a metropolitan election had occurred under the existing law; and if corruption had been charged and proved against the candidate he would have been unseated.

MR. SPEAKER remarked, that an Amendment which was proposed in the clause must be discussed before the question of adoption of the clause itself could be entertained. And, moreover, before that could be done, the new clauses proposed to be added to the Bill must be considered.

MR. STAPLETON said, he would then move his Amendment, when

MR. SPEAKER said, notice had been given to bring up several clauses, and they must be brought up first.

MR. W. VANSITTART then rose to move the following new clause, namely:—

"That it shall not be lawful for the collector of rates and taxes of any borough, county, or city or his partner or agent, to act as agent, clerk, or canvasser for, or to be employed on behalf of, any candidate for such borough, county, or city; and any such person who shall so offend shall for his said offence be liable to forfeit the sum of £50 to any person who shall sue for the same, together with full costs of suits."

He meant to cast no reflection upon the collectors of rates and taxes in counties and boroughs by proposing this clause; nor did he wish to insinuate that as a class they were likely to be guilty of using any undue influence derivable from their office to coerce poor voters. But he thought it highly objectionable that tax collectors should act as agents for any candidate at an election; and such a practice must have a tendency to impair that purity and independence in political matters which they must all desire to preserve and encourage. The rate collector who went about to solicit votes with his canvassing book in one hand and his rate book in the other would naturally possess an unfair advantage over his rivals; and he ought, therefore, to be put in the same position as election auditors, police constables, and other local functionaries.

Clause brought up and read the first time.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That the said clause be now read a second time."

MR. CRAUFURD said, he would move that the House do now adjourn. The hour was too late to proceed with such a Bill, and if Government did not consent to the omission of the clause, allowing payment of expenses, they would meet with the most determined opposition from that side of the House.

MR. WALPOLE said, that the House had had ample opportunity of considering the Amendments. He would not, however, oppose the wish of the House, but would propose to consider the Amendments on Friday.

Debate adjourned till To-morrow at Twelve o'clock.

House resumed.

House adjourned at a Quarter before Two o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, July 23, 1858.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1ª Clerk of Petty Sessions (Ireland).

2ª Reformatory Schools (Ireland); Railway Cheap Trains, &c.; Herring Fisheries (Scotland).

3ª Government of India; Titles to Land (Scotland); Sale and Transfer of Land (Ireland).

ROYAL ASSENT.—Funded Debt; Hainault Forest (Allotment of Commons); Durham County Palatine Jurisdiction; New General Post Office (Edinburgh); Navigation Advances (Ireland); Prescription (Ireland); Municipal Franchise; Universities and College Estates; Militia Ballots Suspension; Churches, &c. (Ireland); Confirmation of Executors, &c.; Ecclesiastical Corporations Leasing; Nisi Prius Court, &c. (Ireland); Stanhope and Wolsingham Rectories; Law of False Pretences Amendment; Jews; Oaths; Marriages (Moscow, Tahiti, and Ningpo); Joint Stock Companies Act Amendment; Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction Continuance; Charitable Trusts Acts Continuance; Copyhold and Inclosure Commissions, &c.; Indemnity; Army Service.

ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH COMPANY'S BILL.

THIRD READING.

Bill read 3ª, with the Amendments.

THE EARL OF DERBY moved two Amendments in Clause 4. The first was to give the Company greater powers of raising money on mortgages and bonds; and the second was to place the British Government on the same footing with the United States Government in regard to the time guaranteed to the Company. In 1856 the United States Government passed an Act in Congress, guaranteeing to the Company the term of fifty years. In the present Bill the term proposed was twenty-five years; he wished to amend the Bill by extending the terms to fifty years, so as to equalize the term granted by both Governments.

LORD REDESDALE said, he did not think that the British Government ought to be influenced in this matter by the Act of the United States Government. It should be recollected that the process of laying down the cable commenced in this country, and it was to end in Newfoundland. In reference to another point, he begged leave to call attention to the second clause, in which the usual provision in all similar Bills was omitted—namely, that in cases of emergency the Crown might take possession of the telegraph. He thought such a provision should be inserted. It was his duty in all Private Bills to watch carefully over the interests of the Crown as well as those of the public. Having stated his objections he would leave the matter now in the hands of the House.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY thought it very questionable policy to allow the monopoly which this Bill gave, and to extend the term from twenty-five to fifty years. He was of opinion that the noble Earl at the head of the Government should have given the House notice of his Amendments.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, it was no part of his business to defend the agreement which had been entered into with the American Government, for it had been made under the sanction of the late Government; but the question was how far they were bound in fairness to this Company to sanction the agreement between them and the United States. In 1856 an Act of Congress was passed by which the American Government guaranteed the payment of 70,000 dollars a year for fifty years, and it was not until six months after that the Bill was introduced into Parliament which contained the clause giving the Crown the power of claiming the property at the end of twenty-five years. If the Amendment were not assented to it would be of most serious consequence to the Company. However, he had no objection to the postponement of the third reading until Monday for the purpose of re-examining the matter.

After a few words from Lord STANLEY of ALDERLEY and Lord REDESDALE,

First Amendment agreed to ; on second Amendment further Amendment adjourned to Monday next.

MARRIAGE LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

VISCOUNT GAGE, on rising to move the second reading of this Bill, said, that he found himself unexpectedly placed in a position which he had not thought of occupying ; but a variety of unfortunate circumstances having prevented other noble Peers from proposing the second reading, he, as a supporter of the Bill, had thought it to be his bounden duty to undertake the conduct of it rather than that it should fall through for want of a proposer. He had had no hand in the preparation of the Bill, and there were, he thought, omissions in it which it would have been well to remedy ; but certainly everything had been done to render it as little distasteful as possible to its opponents. As their Lordships were aware it was a measure intended to redress a great grievance, which was complained of by a considerable number of persons, and although, from the nature of the case, that number could not be great in proportion to the population of the country, yet the sufferers did indeed constitute a very numerous class. He believed that their Lordships would gladly redress the grievance even of an individual, provided there were no reason why they should not do so ; much more then would they listen to the complaints of the numbers who had petitioned upon this subject ; and if their grievances remained unredressed it could only be because their Lordships considered that there were good and sufficient reasons for refusing to relieve them. The first objection which was usually adduced against the proposition of this measure, to legalize marriage with the sister of a deceased wife was, that there existed a religious and spiritual prohibition; but when it was asked where that prohibition was to be found no one was able to refer that objection to any higher authority than a canon of the Church, and, with all the sincere respect which he professed and felt for the Church, he could not believe that a mere canon, unsupported by Scripture or reason, was a sufficient excuse for refusing relief to a great number of persons against a proved evil. This canon was supposed to be grounded upon the 18th chapter of Leviticus. The only verse in that chapter in which any mention was made of a wife's sister was the 18th ; there the prohibition clearly was, not against a man's marrying the sisters of his deceased wife, but against his marrying the sister in rivalry of the living wife. Indeed it seemed to him to amount to a permission to marry the sister after the wife's death. Another argument against such a marriage was founded upon an inference which was drawn from that very obscure and unfortunate phrase of which every one had heard so much ; and the 6th verse of the 18th chapter was now selected as implying a prohibition, that prohibition being dependent wholly and solely upon the one peculiar phrase to which he referred ; and which it was very doubtful whether it applied to marriage at all. He denied first, that the phrase in question bore the interpretation which was sought to be placed upon it ; and, secondly, that the prohibition contained therein—whatever it might be—extended to the deceased wife's sister. In all the other cases the degree of relationship was minutely specified, and it extended only to blood relations : whereas in this case it was all left open to doubt. The great mass of their Lordships probably were under the impression—as he had once been—that this was a translation of some Hebrew phrase corresponding with the Eastern phrase of unveiling the bride, loosening the zone, or some phrase of that kind. But it was nothing of the sort, for he assured their Lordships that it was neither more nor less than an awkard expression in old English, the word "nakedness" there having no other meaning than that in which it was used by Joseph, who asked his brethren if they had come into Egypt "to spy the nakedness of the land." There was no personal sense whatever—the phrase had no existence as we used it. If he were asked for his authority for this reading he should refer to the Septuagint and the Vulgate translations. He might be told that the Septuagint was considered to be very faulty, and that it could not be relied on ; but those who said that would not venture to include the first six books of the Old Testament in that condemnation, for there could be no doubt that it had been made by the most learned and capable men of the day at the time when Hebrew and Greek were living languages, and when a large proportion of persons were in the familiar habit of using both. The passage was there rendered, "You shall not reveal, uncover, or expose, the foibles, &c." He was altogether at a loss to discover how this phrase could be tortured into an application to marriage. Still further, he had inquired into the practice of the Jews themselves, who might be supposed to know their own law, and he found a strong argument against any prohibition being intended by those passages on the fact that the Jews themselves never regarded them in that light, and that they rather facilitated than opposed these marriages. Again, if their Lordships really thought that there was anything in Scripture prohibitory of these marriages, and if they regarded them as utterly subversive of the morality of social life, it was difficult to conceive how they could have sanctioned such a compromise of the matter as they had done in 1835. He could only say that there was no evidence whatever of such direful consequences as some persons appeared to dread having followed the relaxation in those countries in which it had taken place—and those countries included, he believed, all Protestant Europe and America, the Catholics being able everywhere to buy dispensations. They were frequently told that this was a woman's question, and that all the women were against the Bill. That all or anything like all of them were so he denied; but as for the mass of unthinking women who in the world, that knew anything about them, would ever have expected anything else? It would be just the same if at this moment the question had been whether they should relax some ancient prohibition against the husband making a second marriage at all; for the idea of being superseded where one had loved was not very pleasant, and it required some philosophy to combat it. It was objected also that the deceased's wife's sister, if she had children of her own, would be much more likely than any other woman to make a bad stepmother. The odds, he thought, were the other way — the wife's sister would be more likely than any other second wife to resist the temptation, if even she felt it, to treat the children of a former marriage unkindly. No doubt there were many weak women and many bad women in the world, but they were not more numerous among wives' sisters than any other class; and the special opportunities which a widower had had of associating with his wife's sister must have made him better acquainted with her character than with that of women in general. Such fanciful objections as these ought not to be allowed to stand in the way of this Bill passing into law. The canon of the Church on which this prohibition rested was made in an age in which every species of absurd asceticism was practised and praised, and when marriage itself was treated by the compilers of the Liturgy as a mere compromise with uneradicable incontinence. This Bill was sent up from the other House, backed by an increasing majority. The question was rapidly gaining ground in the country as the argument in favour of a change became known, and their Lordships would not long be able to resist the popular voice. A recent legal decision had extended the pressure of the prohibition beyond the bounds of this country, and it had thus placed in a stronger light than ever the injustice and hardship of the present law. The noble Lord concluded by moving the second reading of the Bill.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2ª.

LORD REDESDALE said, the noble Viscount had treated this question on two grounds, the religious ground and the social ground. As regarded the religious view of the subject, it was impossible to deny that the texts most referred to were open to various interpretations. But when difficulties arose, they should be guided by a consideration of the consequences which would naturally flow from a lax interpretation, and refer to other parts of the Scriptures for guidance; and in this view he thought no doubt whatever existed. The real question in this case was, "What is marriage—what is the relationship thereby established?" They were distinctly told in Scripture that the man and wife became "one flesh," and that being the case, the relations of the one necessarily became the relations of the other. Unless that simple principle were admitted and acted upon, society inevitably got involved in difficulties from which there was no escape, and would be driven to consequences from which every one would shrink with horror. It was argued that the prohibition referred only to blood relations; but the very same phrase was used in the clause which forbade the brother to marry his brother's wife. Whatever a man was forbidden to do in respect to his brother's wife he would also be forbidden to do in respect to his wife's sister; but there was no blood relationship in either case—merely affinity. The noble Viscount had asked, who could expect anything but objections to the Bill from women? In that view he entirely concurred. This was purely a man's Bill. The man did not come forward and propose that the woman should have the right to marry her husband's brother, but he came forward with his own lustful purposes and said, "Let me marry my wife's sister,"—the two standing in precisely the same position as regarded affinity. If this Bill passed, why should they not go further? Why should not a man be allowed to marry his step-daughter? There was no blood relationship in that case. Or why should not a step-son marry his step-mother—his father's widow? From such things as these the minds of all men naturally shrunk; and yet they might be justified on the same principle on which this Bill was justified if you once got rid of the deductions arising from the fact of man and wife being one flesh. What was a man to call his wife's sister if this Bill passed? Was he still to call her sister, or was he to call her cousin? If she were his sister during his wife's life, she was also his sister after her death—the relationship created by the marriage bond could not be got rid of. The canon which prohibited these marriages was almost as old as the Church itself, and was by no means, as it had been represented to be, an innovation of the time of the Reformation. As to the Bill of 1835, that Bill did not alter the law on the subject any further than this, that whereas before the marriage was voidable if anybody chose to object to it it was then made void from the beginning. As regarded the social grounds which formed arguments in respect to this measure, it appeared to him that the greatest possible injury would be done in families if the near and close relationship which existed between persons connected by marriage were interfered with, as it necessarily would be by this Bill. It was said that there had always been a great number of persons who had evaded the restriction, and that this was a reason for altering the law. If they were merely to consider how many persons gratified their sensual appetites without the sanction of the law, there were a number of other things to which this argument would apply. He feared that if they went amongst the narrow confined dwellings in which the lower orders were forced to herd, they would find in many quarters connections existing which no one would think of sanctioning by law. No one was ignorant of what the law had been for the last twenty-three years; yet now their Lordships were asked to sanction marriages which were positively prohibited by law, and to declare the issue legitimate. In all the attempts which had been made to alter the law difficulties had arisen from the nature of the connection between a man and his wife's sister. In the first Bill which was introduced for that purpose after the passing of the Bill of 1835, there was a clause providing that the marriage should not be allowed if there had been any adulterous connection between the parties during the lifetime of the deceased. Thus a deceased wife's sister was placed on a different footing from other women. In the present Bill, the second clause provided that a past marriage should not be valid if either of the parties to it had contracted a subsequent marriage with another person; so that if a man had by his own wicked act repudiated a marriage into which he had led his deceased wife's sister, she was not to be restored to her position by this Bill; the children of the woman who had supplanted her were to be legitimate, and her children were to be illegitimate. That was a clause which would give rise to great difficulty. The Bill confined the right to any dignity, title, or honour, to those to whom it was vested before the passing of the Act. A very curious question might arise out of that clause taken in connection with the 5th. By the latter, Ireland and Scotland were excluded from the operation of the Bill, not only as regarded dignities, titles, and honours, but also as regarded property; and as there were many Members of that House who held titles in the three kingdoms, the result might be that one set of children would be legitimate as regarded one set of titles, and another set of children as regarded another set of titles. The measure appeared to him to be both imperfect in itself and highly objectionable in principle; he believed that social evils of the gravest character would arise from the passing of it; he believed it to be contrary to the law of God; and, entertaining these views, he felt bound to move that it be read a second time that day six months.

Amendment moved, to leave out ("now"), and insert "this day Three Months."

LORD LYNDHURST: My Lords, I do not rise to address your Lordships upon the general subject under discussion, but, as my noble Friend has alluded to the Bill which passes under my name I am desirous of giving a history, in a very few words, of that measure. I believe it is now upwards of twenty years since that Bill was introduced. Several of your Lordships who are now Members of the House were not Members of it at that period, and, after so long an interval, probably what passed is not very fresh in your Lordships' recollection. My attention was called by a circumstance, to which I shall presently refer, to the state of the law with respect to voidable marriages. Marriages which were voidable might be annulled at any time during the joint lives of the two parties. The consequence of this was that the children of those marriages, as to their status, stood in an uncertain condition for a great number of years—possibly for ten, twenty, thirty, or even fifty years. A person might be brought up as heir to his parents, as a legitimate child expecting to succeed in the ordinary way to family estates under a settlement, and all at once, after he had married, after he had become the father of children, proceedings might be instituted for the purpose of annulling the marriage of his parents; he would be bastardized, and the whole property would pass in a different direction. I considered that a very inconvenient and cruel state of the law, and my object in bringing in the Bill was to correct it. The Bill which I brought in had nothing to do with annulling marriages. It was merely to protect the legitimacy of children. My proposition was this, — that if the marriages were not annulled within a certain period, as far as related to the children, their legitimacy should not be questioned; and when I brought in the Bill I proposed that, unless the marriages were annulled within a period of two years, the legitimacy of the children should never be questioned—I said nothing whatever as to annulling the marriages, or as to what should take place with respect to the parents. My proposition and my Bill were confined solely to the children. I happen to have a copy of the Bill as originally laid upon your Lordships' table, and I will read what is the nature of the Bill and its provisions. The title of the Bill runs thus :—

"An Act to limit the time for commencing suits in the Ecclesiastical Courts, so far as they may affect the children of parents married within prohibited degrees."

The Bill related only to the children—not to the parents. It is endorsed, "Presented by Lord Lyndhurst, and ordered to be printed the 1st of June, 1835." There was but one enacting clause, which was in these terms :—

"Whereas the children of parents married within prohibited degrees are by law legitimate unless such marriages be declared void by sentence of the Ecclesiastical Courts during the lifetime of the parents, and it being unreasonable and unjust that the state and condition of the children born under such circumstances should remain unsettled for so long a period, be it therefore enacted that the children of parents, married as aforesaid, shall be and continue legitimate unless a suit be duly instituted for annulling the marriage of their parents within two years."

Such was the provision of that Bill. The circumstance to which I alluded which led me to introduce this Bill was the marriage of a noble Lord of high rank in this House. My attention was drawn to the position of the children, to the succession of the eldest son to a seat in this House, and the result was, as happens in many other cases, that a particular instance of hardship led to a general alleviation in the state of the law. The Bill was read a first time without opposition; it was generally approved by your Lordships; but between the first and second readings of the Bill a right rev. Prelate, for whose memory I entertain the greatest possible respect, who possessed great authority, great influence, and great weight in your Lordships' House from his position, his talents, and his masterly eloquence, consulted me and a noble and learned Friend of mine who was interested in the question, and said, "I disapprove of the Bill. I agree with you entirely as to the mischief of voidable marriages. Parties knowing they are breaking the law break it with their eyes open, imagining they can do so with impunity. I think that voidable marriages ought to be declared void, that the parties may see at once the consequence of their act, and if they commit the offence with their eyes open they must take the consequence." The consequence was, that in Committee the whole character of the Bill was entirely changed. I have got the Bill as it passed through Committee. The history of the measure is quite curious. I listened with great respect to the arguments of the right rev. Prelate. I knew his influence in this House. By whom the Amendments were moved I do not recollect; but the Bill was entirely changed, and took this shape. First, with respect to the title, the new title of the Bill was, "An Act to render certain marriages valid, and to alter the law with respect to certain voidable marriages." The preamble was retained. Then, it went on thus:—

"And it is fitting that all marriages which may hereafter be celebrated between persons within such prohibited degrees shall be de facto void and not voidable."

And with respect to past marriages, it was declared that, unless proceedings were instituted for the purpose of annulling such marriages before the passing of the Bill, no proceedings should afterwards be instituted. It does not in point of fact declare those marriages valid, but, as to suits to annul them, instead of during the lives of the parties the period is curtailed within which they must be instituted. That is the history of the Bill. Your Lordships are aware of its original form. I have told your Lordships of the consultation which led to the change—consultation with the right rev. Prelate of great talents, extraordinary influence, great eloquence—and whether the Amendments were moved by the right rev. Prelate or by myself I do not recollect, and I have no means of ascertaining. I said in rising that it was not my intention to enter into the general discussion, and I mean to abstain from doing so. My Lords, I am acquainted with a circumstance that has some bearing on this question, and I will state it. I am intimately acquainted with the state of society in a district in New England. I refer to the state of Massachusetts, of which Boston is the capital. I have several very near connections there, and I will undertake to say that in no civilized part of the world is there to be found a more moral and intelligent people, especially in regard to the intercourse of the sexes, than are the people of that State; and yet, my Lords, in that State the marriages which my noble Friend condemns are consistent with the law. They are not only legal, but they are of constant occurrence. I do not mean to say that a law which has no ill effects in one State of society may not produce a contrary result in another state of society in which different habits and manners prevail; but I state as a witness the facts to which I have referred, and leave it to noble Lords who may take part in this debate to draw an inference from that which I have stated. I hope your Lordships will think I have not done amiss in directing your attention to the circumstances attending the passing of this Bill, which, considering the material part taken in it by the right rev. Prelate, who was, in fact, the author of the Bill, ought to have great weight with your Lordships in the discussion of this measure.

EARL NELSON said, he could not allow the arguments of the noble Viscount (Viscount Gage) to pass without observation. He thought it was impossible for any one, who had studied the 18th chapter of the Book of Leviticus, not to see that the whole of our prohibited degrees were defined by the rules there laid down and the analogies to be derived from them. Besides, it was clear that the rules there laid down pertained to the moral and not to the Levitical law, because it was said that these were the views of the Egyptians and Canaanites, who had made the land to stink in the sight of God. If their Lordships looked into the matter, they would see that, if they were not prepared to read Scripture by reference to analogy, they would err in its construction and fall into great absurdities. For instance, there was no law against a father marrying his own daughter, although there was a law against a son marrying his mother. Again, if they did not read Scripture by analogy, the Tenth Commandment, which said a man should not covet his neighbour's wife, would not prevent a woman coveting her neighbour's husband. The question in this case depended, in a great measure, upon whether our Bible was a correct translation of the original in Hebrew; and they knew Hebrew scholars differed very much as to the true construction of the original. With regard to the Roman Catholics, it suited many of that body in this country to throw over the opinions of the early Church, and to say that these marriages were not contrary to God's law. Protestant Germany had gone much further than the Roman Catholics, and having once departed from the only true standing ground, had made many other relaxations. But what their Lordships had to consider was, how far the Old Testament was to be interpreted by the New, without any reference to what the Jews might say. As to the social ground, he agreed with the promoters of the Bill, that so far there could not be a better person to look after a deceased wife's children than her sister. But at what time would she be most required and be most useful? Why, during the first few months after the death of her sister—the very period when her assistance would be forbidden by the new law. As to the moral ground, it only came to this—that there were many persons living a life of wickedness, and it was desirable that the law should be altered that they might be purged of that wickedness. He did not believe this Bill was what it was represented to be—a poor man's question, but one more applicable to the middle classes; and this was borne out by statements which he had received from persons of great experience. It was a Bill in fact, to legitimatize children that were now illegitimate; and the lower classes having very little property, cared very little about the matter. He would not be a party to increase the severity of the laws of the Church, but he would ask whether it was not worth while to consider this fact—that if they neglected the only standard of truth which they had, they would be left to the individual opinions of those persons who would be anxious to satisfy them that their own views of marriage were best, and were based upon Scripture; and the Mormons and other sects might say that upon social, moral, and religious grounds they ought to have the benefit of every relaxation, and that every style of living which they pleased to adopt was founded upon Scripture. It was a serious question to consider whether sufficient grounds had been shown for altering the present law. An agitation had been got up by a clique—a few people who had spent much money to carry out this object. Of the religious bodies, the Baptists were the only persuasion who petitioned in any numbers in favour of the Bill; the Presbyterians of Scotland and of Ireland, and the Roman Catholics of the latter country, were so opposed to it, that they were exempted from its operation. He hoped their Lordships would reject the measure.

VISCOUNT DUNGANNON said, he could not give a silent vote on this occasion, for he believed that the effect of passing this Bill would be to destroy the peace of families, by sowing distrust where confidence and affection now prevailed. At the present moment the sister of a deceased wife frequently lived in the house of her widowed brother-in-law and took the charge of the children till he might again marry. This she could now do with every regard to her reputation; but if the class of marriages dealt with in this Bill were legalized that would be no longer possible. He ought to mention to their Lordships that he had had the honour of presenting two petitions against the Bill, signed chiefly by females, who knew that if the present Act were repealed it would cause great misery and heartburning in England. Surely the female sex was more especially interested in such a matter.

Earl Nelson

He was not prepared to say that marriages of this description were directly prohibited in Scripture; he took it up in a social point of view, and he repeated his belief that if such marriages were legalized the peace of many a happy home in England would be destroyed. He hoped, therefore, their Lordships would reject the Bill. He hoped they would hear something from the right rev. Bench on this very important subject. It ill behoved the Bishops of England to record a silent vote upon such a question, one which so deeply affected our social interests. He could not believe that the right rev. Prelate who presided over the diocese of Oxford, and who had so ably opposed this measure in a former year, would not raise his powerful voice against it on the present occasion. That right rev. Prelate, he well remembered, had called upon their Lordships to reject this measure in the name of God; he had called upon them to do so in the name of the unity of our Church; he had called upon them to do so in the name and for the sake of those ten thousand happy homes of England, the barriers to whose peace and domestic comfort would be annihilated by the passing of a measure like this. Would he now record a silent vote? Surely not. He called upon their Lordships to reject a measure which could not fail, if passed into a law, to prove detrimental to our best and dearest interests in social life.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY: My Lords, I had only intended to give a silent vote upon a subject on which I have frequently declared my opinion, but after the appeal of the noble Viscount who has just sat down (Viscount Dungannon) I feel it necessary to trouble your Lordships with a very few words. I must adhere to the opinion which I have formerly expressed in this House that the marriage which it is the purpose of this Bill to legalize is forbidden in Scripture. The noble Viscount who opened the debate (Viscount Gage) made no allusion to the passage which is clear upon that point. The brother is there prohibited from approaching his brother's widow. She is his sister in law. It must surely follow that the sister cannot marry her sister's widower. He is her brother in law. In the long list of prohibitions, which, it should be remembered, is the only rule of divine authority on the subject of marriage, one sex is almost uniformly specified, while the other is included. My Lords, it appears to me that this prohibition bears evidence in itself of the source from which it emanates. For, in connections of this kind, there would be an end to all confidence if parties were led to suppose that there could ever be any union between them closer and more tender than that of affinity. Thrown together as they necessarily are in social life, it is essential to all domestic comfort that they should regard each other as sisters and brothers. And, no doubt, it is from a feeling of this kind that we uniformly find the women of England most averse to the passing of this Bill. Their sentiments have been underrated by the noble Viscount; but they are sensitive upon matters which so greatly affect the interests of their own sex, and if their suffrages could be generally taken I believe that they would be found unanimous in the opinion that the comfort of the married life, as well as the consolation of the widower whose married life had been unhappily interrupted, mainly depends upon the maintenance of the existing law. This has been strongly represented to me in a letter which I have received from a Dissenting minister of much respectability, and long known to me, who begins by expressing his regret that this "should be made by some a Dissenting question." He believes "that there are many Dissenters who think with himself that the restriction is one of social importance." And he adduces his own case:—"In very early life I was left," he says, "a widower with three young children, the youngest not a fortnight old. My deceased wife had single sisters who were amiable and kind, and who came to my relief in turn as they could. Now, had not the law placed them in the position of sisters—and I regarded them as my own sisters—how could I have asked them or they have consented to live in my house? The protection of the law afforded me their invaluable consolation and care of my babes without suspicion. I therefore plead for the widower and his children in wishing the law to stand." My Lords, I trust that this protection of the law will be continued to the people of this land, and on the double ground of what I believe to be the purport of Scripture and what I believe to be desirable for the social welfare of the community I must adhere to the vote which I have formerly given, and I trust the proposition will receive no better support than on former occasions in your Lordships' House.

LORD CRANWORTH wished to state very briefly, and at the same time very temperately, the grounds on which he had arrived at the conclusion that this measure, if adopted, would be mischievous in its effects. On the religious branch of the subject he had not sufficient confidence in his own judgment to express any opinion; he would, therefore, regard the question as if it were one on which Scripture was wholly silent, and which must be determined by considerations of social convenience alone. Looking to the class of society to which their Lordships belonged, surely there was nothing in married life which ought to be more carefully cultivated than the freest intercourse between the wife's relations and her husband's domestic circle. The husband was necessarily often withdrawn from home, and it was of the utmost importance to the social and domestic happiness of the wife that her sisters should be her most familiar companions. But if the suspicion were allowed to cross her mind that she was encouraging those who in the event of her death might supply her place in her husband's affections, it would be impossible for her, disguise it as she might, to receive them with the same cordiality and freedom as heretofore. It had been said that no one would make so good a stepmother to the children as the sister of the deceased wife. He might doubt that, but if this Bill passed how was the sister to take charge of the children without creating suspicion and giving occasion to remark? Whether he looked to the interests of society before or after the wife's death, he thought this measure would tend to impair those interests. But it was said that what might be a desirable state of the law for the higher ranks of society might be very unsuited to the comfort of the lower. If that were really so, it would be their Lordships' duty to strike as fair a balance as they could, and then decide impartially according to the preponderance of good or evil incident to either side of the question; and in making such an estimate they ought to be specially on their guard that they did not legislate for that class of society to which they themselves belonged. To his judgment, however, it was very difficult to discover any sufficient ground for believing that the interests and feelings of the lower classes on this subject differed in any material degree from those above them in the social scale. The fact that Scotland and Ireland were excepted from this Bill disproved the existence, even among the humbler classes, of any general, not to say universal, sentiment in its favour. It was notorious also that in the rural districts of England such a measure was not desired; and though, indeed, it was alleged that it was demanded by persons in the populous towns and manufacturing districts it would be found that in those localities, where the poor had contracted relationships to which it was now proposed to give legislative sanction, bigamy itself was almost of daily occurrence, and it would be hard to show that the arguments used for legalizing marriage with a deceased wife's sister would not equally apply to the legalization of bigamy. He had no doubt that his noble and learned Friend had truly described the state of morals in Massachussets; but whatever might be the state of society on the other side of the Atlantic, where a law like that now under discussion was in operation, there was little doubt that in passing this measure their Lordships would do violence to the feelings of the great mass of the English community. For these reasons he must oppose the second reading of the Bill.

Lord WODEHOUSE said, that some of the speakers who had taken part in the debate had based their argument on social grounds, and others on religious grounds. The noble and learned Lord who spoke last had rested his opposition solely on the social part of the question. He (Lord Wodehouse) confessed he had no confidence in his own interpretation of the obscure passages in Scripture upon which the opponents to the Bill originally based their principal opposition; but he might be allowed to remark that the passage in the text of Leviticus was not the ground upon which they now chiefly relied — he meant the passage prohibiting a man from taking his wife's sister in her lifetime to vex her. The most rev. Prelate opposite (the Archbishop of Canterbury) had, however, taken another ground. He said that there was a prohibition of two brothers marrying the same woman, and that, therefore, by analogy, it might be inferred that two sisters ought not to marry the same man. The plausibility of that argument he was not disposed to deny; but it could be met thus —if it were true that the marriage of a woman with the brother of her deceased husband was prohibited by the Levitical law in such a manner as to render it incestuous, how was it that in certain cases a man was strictly enjoined by that law to marry the widow of his deceased brother? It was monstrous to suppose that the Divine Lawgiver could give a positive order to do that in special cases which in general cases would make a marriage incestuous. With regard to the social ground on which this Bill was on the one side opposed and on the other supported, he admitted that every man had a right to his own opinion. Some persons might think these marriages undesirable; but he agreed with the noble Lord (Viscount Gage) that, looking to all the facts, it was better the law should be relaxed. What were the facts connected with the question in this and in other countries? These marriages, as their Lordships had already heard, were frequent in Boston, and yet they were not attended with any of those horrible consequences to which a noble Lord had referred. In most of the countries of Europe they were permitted, either directly or indirectly—as in Catholic countries through dispensation—and they were contracted by the Protestant communities of Germany. Now, a great deal of stress had been laid on the argument that to relax the law here would lead in many cases to domestic unhappiness; he could only say that if the Utopian felicity which had been described really existed, it would be a strong argument in favour of not interfering. It did not, however, exist; and it was impossible to deny that the law, as it now stood, affected injuriously very many persons who had already contracted marriages of the kind, or who, as amongst the lower classes, did what was worse, by living without marriage with their deceased wife's sister. Upon all the grounds he had stated, he would therefore support the proposed alteration in the state of the law.

The Bishop of OXFORD: My Lords, having already been most indulgently listened to by your Lordships on a former occasion, when I ventured at considerable length to argue what I considered was the true view of this question, I had no thought of troubling your Lordships with any remarks of mine to-night, further than such as I might make in endeavouring to answer any new objections that might be urged by any noble Lord, to what I believe to be the true view of this subject. One or two remarks of the noble Lord who has just sat down seem to me to come under that category, and I think I should be doing wrong if I did not answer them. But I will not enter again into the whole width of this subject, having already done so. Adhering entirely to the opinions I then ventured to express, and to the arguments I then ventured to use, I will not weary your Lordships by going into the whole matter again; but there are one or two points which, if left unanswered, out of doors at least, if not in this House, great injury would, in my opinion, be done to the cause of truth on this subject. The noble Lord who has just sat down has drawn an argument in favour of this Bill from a particular injunction under certain given circumstances to a brother to marry the widow of his deceased brother. Now, in the first place that argument is really worth nothing—but if it be worth anything, it seems to me to prove too much—too much for this reason. No one urges that it could be consistent with the purity of Christian life, that a man should marry the widow of his own brother. That is not advanced by any one—that is not asked for—it is admitted that the common moral sense of Christendom would regard such a marriage as intolerable. That argument, therefore, proves too much. To give a clear answer to the noble Lord would take us upon delicate ground upon which I had rather not enter; but I think it is necessary to answer the noble Lord's argument. The noble Lord said, that marriage with a deceased wife's sister could not be incestuous, else you would make the Great Author of mankind Himself, under certain circumstances, prescribe incest. Incest itself, my Lords, you must remember, is not a sin against nature, but is a sin against a positive enactment. By the Divine appointment itself, the origin of the human race was the fruit of a marriage which we should now regard with horror as the worst form of incest—the marriage of brother and sister. Therefore you must see that incest is not a thing like a sin against nature, which is written broad as evil by the hand of God upon the nature of the thing itself; but that it is a prohibition of His wisdom and of His love to the race of man, in order to draw through this prohibition blessings upon the race at large, which except for this prohibition would not be drawn. Well, then, if that is the real view which we ought to form of incest, this at once follows from it—that it is in the power of the Supreme Lawgiver for any sufficient advantage, at any particular time, to enact that which is contrary to His ordinary loving enactment for the race, in order to produce at that particular time some particular result which he sees to be for the good of the race. The noble Lord made a slight but important error in speaking of this being an enactment of the Book of Leviticus. It is an enactment of the Book of Deuteronomy, and at the closing part of that book, to make a special provision for the special transmission of the property and name of a race which was essential for the Divine purposes—for the very object for which the Jewish race was separated from all others—the keeping clear the pedigree from which the Messiah was to be born. And, so far from this special enactment admitting the principle that a man might ordinarily marry the widow of his deceased brother—so far from its being the national law which was laid down by that special enactment — it provided that the brother who, in this way, contracted what was called a prescribed inviolate marriage should represent, as it were, his deceased brother, and should upon his marriage with the widow succeed, not to his own inheritance, but to the inheritance of his deceased brother. It was a special enactment to raise up seed to the dead brother. Therefore this special enactment was a supercession by the Supreme Lawgiver, for certain manifest purposes, of the general law which He was pleased to lay down for the general welfare of His creatures. The noble Lord further stated that it seemed to be a very general opinion among the opponents of this Bill that the religious argument was very uncertain. I am bound to say, so far as I am concerned—and I believe I may say the same on behalf of my right rev. Friends on this bench—that there is no uncertainty whatever. We do heartily and ex animo take the declaration of our Church that such marriages as these are contrary to God's law, incestuous, and therefore void from the beginning; and we ground this not only upon that chapter of the Book of Leviticus which has been so often referred to, but we ground it also upon the New Testament legislation on this subject. My noble Friend said, that the opponents of this measure mainly relied upon the 18th verse of the 18th chapter of Leviticus; but so far as I remember the debates in this House, that verse has always been used by the advocates for a change in the law, as being a text which shook the rest of the Scriptural argument. The main Scriptural argument, so far as the Old Testament was concerned, was always made by the opponents of the Bill to rest exclusively upon the early part of that chapter—from the 6th to the 17th verses. The noble Viscount who moved the second reading attempted to answer that argument by stating that it was very doubtful whether there was any allusion in all those verses to marriage or the mixture of the sexes at all. He thought that it referred to vexing or disturbing the temper of the wife, and he grounded that view upon the interpretation of one word in the Vulgate and the Septuagint. Now, I appeal to your Lordships whether the best way of ascertaining the meaning of this passage in the Vulgate is not to ask the interpretation which those commentators of the Church who drew up the Vulgate placed upon it? There is not one of them who puts upon it the sense that the noble Viscount does. Universally the interpretation put upon it by them was, that this was a prohibition of marriage, and of intercourse between those who were closely connected by the ties of blood and affinity. The Septuagint version also uses a word which has always been taken in the Eastern Church to mean the mixture of those who either by blood or marriage were connected in close relationship. But we may go from the Septuagint and the Vulgate up to a higher authority—the Hebrew text; and there is not the slightest shadow of a doubt as to the word there used, the English translation being the most direct and literal and positive that could by possibility be given of it—"Thou shalt not draw near to the nakedness of those of kin; God hath said it." This being so, the argument remains as it was urged by the noble Earl (Earl Nelson), that whether related by blood or by parallel degrees of affinity these marriages were distinctly forbidden to the Jews by the Old Testament. But it seems to me, that we argue the matter on far too narrow a basis when we thus wrangle over particular texts in which the law was laid down for the people of God of old. Can any reasonable man doubt that the whole course of God's legislation on this subject has been to introduce new measures of strictness instead of new relaxations in dealing with the married life? Just so far as He has intended to raise a people in the scale of civilization and morality, just so far as He has increased to them His religious gifts and assistance, just so far as He strengthened the law in those things which have reference to the intercourse between the sexes. Every one can see a reasonable ground for this—it is in order that there may be increased and multiplied such a state of society as He desires shall exist in His Christian Church—that men and women may meet together with a degree of freedom and safety, and mutual affection, which could only be secured by the strengthening of those laws which restrain direct sexual intercourse. Every one of us sees that it must be so; but in Egypt of old, where the detestable doctrine of the worshippers of Isis prevailed, that brother and sister might, without any degradation or stain, contract these marriages, could any family, when the brother and sister reached the age of puberty, allow that free and social intercourse which is allowed in every family in every Christian land, because that most beneficial restraint of the law of God has substituted a higher family affection for that lower animal affection which is to bind together man and wife? But, when our Lord lays down the principle that man and wife become one flesh, He solves all those difficult questions as to whether this or that particular thing is prohibited; and taking that in conjunction with the general declaration of the old law, that the God of purity would not have those who were near akin to join in marriage, we have in our blessed Lord's interpretation, and in the application of it, a law which at once and for ever settles this question for those who receive His revelation. This is that which the whole of Christendom, down to this time, has adopted. This is that which the Church in the East and the Church in the West have ever held. And do not let me be told that the Roman Catholic Church allows dispensations for these marriages. What, I ask, does she not allow dispensations for? The noble Viscount spoke rather slightingly of the canons of the Church, and stated that they were the composition of Pharisaical minds. My Lords, on behalf of that Reformed Church of England to which it is my happiness and glory to belong, I must declare that such were not the notions of marriage which were held by the Reformers of the English Church. It is one of our great blessings that we were brought back by them from a system of dispensations and of casuistry to what had been held in primitive times as the undoubted word of the Lord our God. They rested that prohibition on the declaration that that was God's word, as it had been always understood in the primitive time. And who was the particular Roman Pontiff that introduced the change? Was there that virtue, was there that wisdom, was there that authority in things sacred about him that—though he was a Pope—we should be disposed to accept his dictates? It was the infamous Borgia—the man who, himself under vows of celibacy and sanctity, was more than suspected to have been living in the most shameless incest—who granted that dispensation under the most colourable pretext, claiming for the first time for the Roman See a power which it had never claimed before, of dispensing in this matter with the law of God. I think, therefore, that the argument of dispensation goes for nothing. We have, then, I say, the voice of the Western Church; we have the voice of the Eastern Church; we have the unbroken witness of the early Church, that this is the true interpretation of the word of God and that the word of God prohibits these mixtures. Therefore I must declare to your Lordships that it is with no hesitating voice that I, and those who think with me, assert the religious and scriptural argument that these marriages are incestuous, and contrary to the law of God. Much has been said as to the social question. I will not trouble your Lordships at length. The noble Viscount has admitted that the great body of educated women are opposed to this change, endeavouring to account for their feeling on the ground of what he called the "constitutional jealousy" of the female mind. As I rejected the imputation which he cast upon the English Reformers, I must reject also this imputation against English women. I deny that they are constitutionally jealous; and, so far from its being true that women have a horror of their husbands contracting second marriages, I believe that that is a rare feeling among Christian women in England, and that they desire, if their husband be left a widower, that he should provide himself with a suitable helpmate, and his offspring with a fitting protector. I believe that just where there is the strongest affection there is the strongest objection to this measure on the part of women. I hold in my hand a letter from a lady whose name would immediately command the respect and attention of your Lordships if I were to mention it to you, in which she says:—

The Bishop of Oxford

"A friend of mine in Parliament said to me that he thought the objection to such marriages did not exist where family affection was comparatively weak; that my sisters and I might abhor the idea, but that was because we are very closely bound together in love. Perhaps so; but what an admission! What a testimony to the value of the objection—to the title to consideration of the objectors!"

Yes, my Lords; so far from its being any constitutional jealousy in English women, I believe that the real reason is this:—God has given to the two sexes different intellectual powers and qualities—to us, the sterner and harder power of arriving at the truth chiefly by argument, by induction, and the like; while to her He has given that which, after all, is a higher attribute—the power of intuition, of perceiving what is true, what is pure, and what is noble, and without the tardy process of a long-considered logic, of coming by that power with which He has endowed her heart at the truest and the best conclusion. Therefore, so far from thinking that the general feeling of the women of England can be set aside, I consider it to be a great argument against any measure affecting social and married life when the advocates of it admit that the great mass of the educated women of England are unanimously opposed to it. I come next to the argument that this alteration is desired by the poorer classes. I deny that altogether. I once took the trouble to get all the clergymen in the three counties which form my diocese to make me a report of the number of cases in which these marriages had taken place among the poorer classes. There were but three cases in the whole of those three counties. Where the evil existed it was in the middle classes, where the argument of the poverty of the widower could not for a moment apply. I grieve to say that I believe if you lower down the standard of your marriage law to the requirements of those who have offended against God's law you must go much below this Bill. Keep, therefore, I beseech you, the purity of your English home. Make it well understood that you never will, on moral grounds, relax this prohibition. It has been said that the present law is cruel to those who desire to contract these marriages; but are there no others to whom such an alteration of the law as is now asked for would be cruel? Would it not be cruel to the sisters who, in many cases, are enabled to live with their married sisters solely by reason of the impossibility of these alliances? Would it not be cruel to the widower, whose sister-in-law can now come to his house at the moment of his bereavement to take charge of his motherless children, whose whole domestic happiness for the future depends on the impossibility of any such alliance as this being possible? Are we to sweep away from this man that which God's ordinance has made the alleviation of his grief, in order to gratify the lawless desires of those who wish to take to themselves this particular forbidden woman? On the mere ground of humanity, therefore, I ask your Lordships to reject this Bill. If there be the slightest shadow of a doubt as to whether God's blessing will rest on these unions, is it not the part of wisdom and humanity, as well as of faith, for us as legislators to refuse to sanction them? Before sitting down, my Lords, I feel it right to admit the good feeling of those who have framed this Bill in such a shape as not to violate the principles of the Church of England. As the Bill stands, this marriage is not in any sense one which members of the Church of England can have recourse to. If it had been possible for me as a legislator to give my assent to making the law of the land and the law of God differ on this matter of incest I would gladly have met the promoters of this Bill half way. But God's law is positive, and those who take God's law for a guide can have no hesitation in saying to the advocates of these marriages, "We refuse you a fatal privilege, which may bring down God's curse upon you."

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I think the noble Lord behind me (Lord Wodehouse) may find a precedent in the speech of my noble and learned Friend (Lord Cranworth) for the line of argument he has taken, and which has been so severely commented upon by the right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of Oxford). As the right rev. Prelate has spoken strongly on this point, there is one thing I should like to know—whether, if it be true, as the right rev. Prelate says, that incest be a sin, not against nature, but against positive enactment, I should like him to explain how it was that the Canaanites were punished for doing that which was not a sin against nature, but condemned by the Book of Leviticus — a command which could not possibly be known to them? Or, if it be so clearly opposed to the law of God, I ask how your Lordships could consent, by a previous Act, to legalize all existing marriages of this description? I must take leave to doubt, too, that the right rev. Prelate speaks in this matter the united voice of the Episcopal Bench.

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD: What I said was, that I and my right rev. Brethren who agree with me on this question are unanimous in thinking that there was no doubt whatever on the Scriptural part of the argument.

EARL GRANVILLE: I thought there must have been some mistake, because, having consulted the Bishop of my own diocese (the Bishop of Lichfield), he wrote to me a day or two ago, stating in the most distinct manner that he was quite convinced, as far as the Scriptural part of the argument went, that it all rested on one text, which, in his opinion, was more in favour of our view than the other. It has been said, and with great truth, that this House ought not to be guided in this matter by the feeling of the society in which we move, but that we ought to look to what was desired by the community at large. I do not think it necessary to enter into any minute details as to the feeling of the upper classes of society with respect to this change—there are many circumstances connected with the question which make it undesirable to do so—but I have no hesitation in admitting that the feeling of that particular class is against this Bill. With regard, however, to the middle and lower classes, I have no doubt whatever that public opinion is in favour of the change. I deny altogether, too, that the feeling of the women of this country is against the Bill. I have conversed myself with many who had a very strong feeling the other way. I believe that in the middle classes, even in religious society, there is no unwillingness shown to receive and mix with persons who have contracted these illegal marriages, and that of itself is a strong proof of the feeling of the middle classes on the matter. I received a letter the other day from a gentleman in Yorkshire, in which he mentions that the head of a girls' school in his neighbourhood had married the widower of her sister, and that not a single scholar had been taken away from her school in consequence of that act. With regard to the poorer classes we know that in towns these marriages do take place among them. Mr. Denham, the rector of a parish in the Strand, stated that the cases were most numerous, that the marriages had an immense moral effect upon the poorer classes, and that he had never seen any disadvantage from connections of the sort. The question has been so often debated that I will not weary your Lordships by going over it again. It is sufficient to say that none of the difficulties which are anticipated from a change of the law obtained in the United States, where these marriages are permitted; that these marriages hold good in all the Protestant communities in Europe; and, as has been already said, that if the Roman Catholics are much stricter they possess a power of dispensation which relaxes the general principle. When the noble Lord (Lord Redesdale) refers to the ancient Apostolical canon he forgets that there is also a canon which forbids the marriage of priests altogether. It is clearly inapplicable to the state of the law of which we now complain, and which has only held good since the year 1835. In conclusion, I will only express my sincere and ardent wish that your Lordships will on this occasion gratify the conscientious desire of immense classes of the community by giving a second reading to this measure.

THE BISHOP OF RIPON claimed to say a few words, because he happened to differ from many, though he was happy to say, not from all, of his right rev. Brethren. In the first place he thought there was no direct Scriptural prohibition of the marriage of a man with his diseased wife's sister. If there were any direct Scriptural prohibition it was almost unnecessary for him to observe that no consideration should ever induce him to advocate an enactment which would have the effect of making such marriages legal. The arguments attempted to be drawn from Scripture by the opponents of the measure were arguments by inferences ; and, considering the conflict of opinion among eminent divines of this and other Christian communities on this subject, and that at best arguments by inference were of a doubtful character, he thought they might well leave the resolution of the doubt to the conscience of each individual. But, believing as he did, that Scripture, so far from prohibiting, sanctioned these marriages, it was a grievance of which the people might justly complain that the law of the land was out of harmony with the revealed law of God. These were the considerations which influenced him, so far as the Scriptural argument was concerned. As regarded the social part of the question, he believed that great evils were connected with the existing state of the law; and when it was said that this measure would lead to the social evils which had been described, he asked why those evils had not been produced in those countries where marriage with a deceased wife's sister was the law of the land? It was said that the feeling of this country was against these marriages ; but he believed facts did not bear out that statement. The petitions presented to the other House against the Bill were 300, signed by 10,000 persons, and the petitions in its favour were 1,047, having 125,539 signatures, and no one denied that marriages of this description were very numerous throughout the country. It had been found impossible to enforce the law as it at present stood, and believing that Scripture sanctioned these marriages he should cordially support the second reading.

THE BISHOP OF EXETER said, the right rev. Prelate who had just sat down had almost overpowered him, and rendered it scarcely possible for him to address their Lordships. The right rev. Prelate said that Scripture expressly sanctioned these marriages. Up to the last few minutes he would not have believed it possible that a Bishop of the Church of England could have made such a declaration. Did their Lordships recollect that the Church which had the right rev. Prelate for one of its Bishops declared, in one of its most solemn canons, that a marriage of this kind was incestuous, that it was contrary to the law of God, that it should be dissolved from the first, that it should be utterly null and void? That was the law of the Church. The right rev. Prelate spurned the law of the Church. The right rev. Prelate said, "I care not for your Church of England, and what the Church of England declares to be forbidden by the law of God I declare to be sanctioned by the law of God." That was what they had heard to-night. He was amazed. If any clergyman in any place which was not privileged dared to say what the right rev. Prelate had said he would, if he were in the diocese of a faithful Bishop, be brought to account for his words. But it was said that the canon was drawn up in ancient and ascetic times. It was the time of James I., and if he were to look back to any age for a state of profligacy and anything but asceticism on the part of the clergy it would be to that very period. They were told that these canons were drawn up also in very early times, when they were all ignorant of these things. But that was the very reason that they were of force. The Church of England claimed it to be its law and doctrine, because it was the law of the early Church. If it were not so, the Church of England would not be what it was ; it would not be a Catholic Church, and it would not have its own Bishops sitting there, except the right rev. Prelate who claimed to be a Bishop of the Church of England. The right rev. Prelate claimed to be a Bishop of the Catholic Church, purified from the corruptions of Rome, and yet declared that her canons were to be of none effect. The Bill to which the right rev. Prelate gave his very extraordinary support distinctly said, "provided that nothing herein contained shall invalidate, alter, or affect any canon or constitution ecclesiastical of the United Church of England and Ireland now in force." Did the right rev. Prelate mean then to say that the passing of this Bill would not affect the canons of the Church of England? And to show the absurdity and ludicrous inconsistency of the Bill it would come to this, that should the Bill pass—a supposition which he could not insult the common sense of their Lordships by suggesting as possible—the law of the land, in the same statute, would declare that a person might contract legally a marriage before a registrar, and yet might have that marriage declared contrary to God's law, and therefore null and void from the beginning, by the canon which was not to be affected by the Act. So far as the Bill was concerned a marriage of this kind would carry with it all the effect of a legal marriage; but, although these persons might marry under this Bill, they could never be admitted to the Holy Communion by a faithful minister, for he would be bound to tell them that they were living in a state of sin, that they were offending the congregation by living in a state of sin, and that he could not and would not violate his functions by administering to them that sacrament, which, as a faithful minister of Christ, he would at the same time be bound to tell them was necessary to salvation. All the blessings, all the promises, of that sacrament must be abandoned by those who, if this wretched Bill passed, should contract these marriages.

Lord OVERSTONE said, he had heard what had fallen from the right rev. Prelate with the greatest dismay, for if every supporter of this measure was to be debarred from the sacrament of holy communion, he himself stood before their Lordships as a man who could not by a faithful minister of Christ be admitted to that solemn rite.

The Bishop of EXETER interposed by saying that the noble Lord had misunderstood what he had said. He did not say that persons who supported this Bill would be excluded, but that it would be the duty of a faithful minister to exclude those who might contract marriages under it.

Lord OVERSTONE said, he was glad he had misunderstood the right rev. Prelate, the tone of whose speech, however, still remained subject to just and very grave censure. He thought that if no right rev. Prelate essayed the task, it was the duty of some of the lay members of their Lordships' House to endeavour to do justice between the right rev. Prelates who had spoken, and to allay the somewhat unseemly asperity which has been displayed. He could not help thinking that the remarks of the right rev. Prelate who had last spoken were unreasonable and unjust. He had condemned another right. rev. Prelate in the strongest terms for stating that, in his opinion, Holy Scriptures did not condemn, but sanctioned, these marriages. But what had been the explanation offered to the House that night by the noble and learned Lord (Lord Lyndhurst)? That a right rev. Prelate of great authority, who was not now a Member of their Lordships' House, was responsible for the passing of an Act which put an end to the power of voiding these marriages. ["No!"] As he understood the Act, the power of making previous marriages void had ceased under this Bill, unless proceedings were taken before a certain time. An Act though indirectly countenancing those marriages could not have received the countenance of Prelates who hold those to be condemned by the express word of God. Their Lordships had been told that these marriages were directly incestuous and contrary to the law of God. Now, among the vast number of petitions which he had presented in favour of this Bill, there was one signed by 500 clergymen. He had also divided with right rev. Prelates in favour of a similar measure. He had presented petitions in favour of the Bill signed by the municipal authorities and by all classes in the City of London. On that evening he had presented a petition in favour of the measure signed by nineteen out of twenty-six Aldermen, by Directors of the East India Company and the Bank of England, by Bankers of the City of London, by merchants and solicitors. In the manufacturing districts the opinion in favour of this Bill was almost universal. A similar measure had been repeatedly sent up to their Lordships from the other House, which was supposed more especially to represent the feelings and the deliberate judgment of the people, and although the Members who had voted in favour of these Bills had been sent back to their constituents, they had been again returned, and had sent up subsequent Bills by increasing majorities. He had not given his support to this measure lightly and unadvisedly. The condemnation of these marriages, if intended by the will of God, would have been written with the finger of fire and not have been left as a doubtful and forced inference from such dark and ambiguous passages as had been quoted. He thought that any legislation was unwarrantable which interfered with man's free agency in a matter so important as that of marriage. He believed also that the present state of the law caused the most serious moral evils, and he feared that, if they rejected this Bill, their Lordships would inflict upon the community an act of injustice, and would greatly disturb the harmony and morality of society. He could not help regretting the violent and uncharitable language which had fallen from the episcopal bench, which was in his opinion, injudicious, unwise, and not sanctioned by the letter or spirit of that Holy Scripture to which they appealed.

THE BISHOP OF LINCOLN said, he very much regretted that the noble and learned Lord who had so lucidly explained the history of his Marriage Bill to their Lordships had left the House; but what had fallen from that noble and learned Lord might, he thought, bear this interpretation. At the time when the House was asked to legislate on this subject, these marriages were not void, but voidable; the children were not illegitimate, but they might be made so. In this very inconvenient and unjust state of things the noble and learned Lord introduced a Bill enacting that, unless a suit were instituted in the Ecclesiastical Court within two years, the children should be legitimate. The right rev. Prelate, now no more (Bishop Blomfield) here interposed, and at his suggestion it was enacted that voidable marriages should be thenceforth void ab initio; and inasmuch as this would be obviously unjust to the children of existing marriages of this kind, their legitimacy was not to be questioned. He contended that it was impossible to draw from this the authority of the right rev. Prelate, now departed, in favour of this Bill. He (the Bishop of Lincoln) would say nothing whatever as to the religious aspect of this Bill. He must say he regretted to find a member of the episcopal bench saying that he believed these marriages were not only not forbidden, but were sanctioned by the law of God. The right rev. Prelate was alone in his opinion; but he was at least to be commended for his boldness in stating his opinion. The noble Lord opposite (Lord Overstone) had laid great stress on the fact that there had been a large number of petitions in favour of this Bill; but from his own experience, both of a large metropolitan parish and of the agricultural districts of England, he doubted whether the majority of the people were in its favour. The number of petitions presented on this subject showed the low state of public morality on this question; but it was not to be wondered at, if when the people saw a number of noblemen and gentlemen, year by year, advocating this measure, and bringing it forward in Parliament, they should think perhaps they were mistaken as to its character, and that there was no great harm in it after all. Suppose polygamy were advocated through the country by an active body of men, and discussed in pamphlets and in newspapers, and that a Bill were yearly introduced into either House by a gentleman or nobleman of influence for the purpose of legalising it, would not many be found to petition for a repeal of the law, and some be encouraged to infringe it? It would be the same in that case as it was in this. He denied that the opinions of the women of this country generally were in favour of this measure; on the contrary, their instinctive feelings, which were a far better guide on such a subject as this than the reasoning of men, made them dread the passing of this Bill. It was, therefore, in their behalf and in that of the peace and happiness of the countless homes in this country, and in the name of purity of their families, that he entreated their Lordships not to read this Bill a second time.

On Question that ("now") stand part of the Motion? their Lordships divided:—Contents 22; Not-Contents 46:—Majority 24.

CONTENTS.

Cleveland, D.	Saint Germans, E.
Albemarle, E.	Sommers, E.
Essex, E.	Torrington, V.
Granville, E.	Ripon, Bp.
Leven and Melville, E.
Minto, E.	Belper, L.
Portsmouth, E.	Ebury, L.

Farnham, L.
Foley, L. [Teller.]
Gage, L. (V. Gage.)
Glenelg, L.
Overstone, L.
Southampton, L.
Stanley of Alderley, L.
Wodehouse, L.
Wrottesley, L.

NOT-CONTENTS.

Canterbury, Archbp.
Chelmsford, L. (L. Chancellor.)
Bath, M. [Teller.]
Salisbury, M.
Amherst, E.
Beauchamp, E.
Carnarvon, E.
De La Warr, E.
Derby, E.
Doncaster, E. (D. of Buccleuch & Queensberry.)
Effingham, E.
Graham, E. (D. Montrose.)
Hardwicke, E.
Harrington, E.
Mansfield, E.
Nelson, E.
Romney, E.
Shaftesbury, E.
Shrewsbury and Talbot, E.
Stradbroke, E,
Wilton, E.
Clancarty, V. (E. Clancarty.)
Dungannon, V.
Hardinge, V.
Melville, V.
Strathallan, V.
Exeter, Bp.
Hereford, Bp.
Lincoln, Bp.
Oxford, Bp.
Rochester, Bp.
Salisbury, Bp.
Brodrick, L. (V. Middleton.)
Colchester, L.
Congleton, L.
Cranworth, L.
Crofton, L.
Dinevor, L.
Dunsandle and Clanconal, L.
Ker, L. (M. Lothian.)
Lovell and Holland, L. (E. Egmont.)
Melros, L. (E. Haddington.)
Monteagle of Brandon, L.
Redesdale, L. [Teller.]
Sondes. L.
Wynford, L.

Resolved in the Negative.

Ordered that the said Bill be read a Second Time on this Day Three Months.

REFORMATORY SCHOOLS (IRELAND) BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order of the day for the Second Reading read.

Lord MONTEAGLE, in moving the second reading of this Bill, explained the object of the measure to be to extend to Ireland a principle which had frequently been brought before the attention of Parliament since the year 1854, and which in its practical application to England had been attended with the greatest advantage.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2ª.

The Earl of CLANCARTY: My Lords, considering the importance of the subject of the Bill to which my noble Friend has asked your Lordships to give a second reading, I am surprised that he should have made so meagre a statement of its object and provisions. I regret, my Lords, to feel it my duty to object to my noble Friend's Motion. It is not that I am opposed to the principle of reformatories for Ireland, far from it; I believe nothing would more tend to the moral improvement of the country, than to subject the juvenile offender to such discipline, training, and instruction in a reformatory school as might nip vice, as it were, in the bud, and enable him, when arrived at maturer years, to return to society endued with good moral principles of conduct; for it is well known that it is in youth more commonly than in manhood that the career of crime commences, and that if vicious habits are not formed in youth they are much less likely to be formed later in life. The important question, however, is, in what manner can the youthful offenders be best reclaimed? and how should the experiment be tried in Ireland with the best probability of success? My Lords, this is a question to which it is impossible Her Majesty's present Government could have as yet turned their attention. The measure before you is that of an individual member of the other House, animated, I have no doubt, with the best intentions, but unaided by any of those sources of knowledge at the command of a Government, and in no degree responsible for what he recommends to you; and your Lordships, upon whom the responsibility of passing the Bill is to be cast, certainly have not in the present Session sufficient time to make any inquiry whatever into the subject. The provisions of the Bill appear to be ill-suited for the circumstances of Ireland, to which they alone apply. Your Lordships are aware that it is the unhappy lot of the poor to be the most exposed to the temptation of crime. Juvenile offenders are commonly the children of the poor; they are ill-educated in general in the country schools; in the workhouse schools, where they are brought more under discipline and regulated instruction, they derive far greater benefit; but under the poor law regulations the parent cannot give his child the benefit of the workhouse school, without himself becoming an inmate of the workhouse. If, then, a far better and really effective education be provided in the reformatories—if food, lodging, clothing, and medical care, together with instruction, secular, and religious, and such discipline and training as may be most conducive to the eradication of vice, and the laying of a good foundation for moral conduct, are therein gratuitously provided for the child, upon the sole condition of his having committed some offence for which he may have incurred the penalty of a fortnight's imprisonment, the temptation will be very great for the poor parent to have his child somehow brought within the grasp of the criminal law, in order to obtain for him a really good education, and at the same time to rid himself of the expense of his support. Another reason for which the proposed plan of reformatory schools is unsuited to the circumstances of Ireland, is the disparity of numbers as between Protestants and Roman Catholics, especially in the west and south; it is variously estimated at from one-fourth to one-sixth; but in the statistics of crime given in the report of the Inspector General of Prisons the disparity is far greater. There the proportion is about one Protestant to ten Roman Catholics; it is therefore probable that as each reformatory school must be under the exclusive management of persons of the same religious persuasion as that of the parents or guardians of the children sent thereto, there will be no reformatories except for Roman Catholics, and an advantage will thus be given to the members of one communion over those of another. I am far from grudging to the Roman Catholic body any advantage that may legitimately accrue to them from their preponderance in numbers, but the endeavour of the Legislature should be to place the members of all religious denominations as far as possible upon a footing of perfect equality with respect to the advantages derivable from the expenditure of public money. The proposed plan would operate unequally. A much better plan would be to adhere in reformatory as in workhouse schools to the principle so much lauded for the last thirty years, of united education of Protestant and Romanist in the same schoolroom—a system which, though a total failure, and not acceptable to any denomination of Christians in the country schools, is not unsuited to public institutions, where children of different creeds are necessarily thrown together, and where, under the superintendence of paid and responsible officers, the rules of the National Board regarding united, secular, and separate religious instruction, can be enforced and carried out. If there is any truth in the vaunted excellence of the national system, the religious interests of the pupils would be well secured where its principles were sure of being strictly applied. I am persuaded, at all events, that reformatories, conducted under the superintendence of public and responsible officers, would be much more beneficial to their inmates, of every religious persuasion, than if subjected to the sole and exclusive control and management of persons of the same religious persuasion as that of the parents whose children were committed to them. The principle, moreover, of instituting schools of an exclusively denominational character, exclusive alike in the management and in the admission of pupils, is not alone inconsistent with the existing system, but altogether novel in Ireland, except in the College of Maynooth. The experiment in the case of reformatories was only recognized in England by the Act of the last Session; it is as yet untried. Such an experiment, surely, should not be applied to Ireland—a country to which such opposite principles of government have generally been applied—without the most careful consideration of the subject by a responsible Cabinet.

I would further venture to observe that the present is a peculiarly inopportune season for applying it to the case of Irish reformatory schools. Your Lordships are aware that the words in the Bill which require a reformatory school to be under the exclusive management of persons of the same religious persuasion as that of the juvenile offenders to be committed to it, will, so far as they relate to Roman Catholics, practically subject those schools to a superintendence and management exclusively ecclesiastical. I would ask your Lordships, then, whether we should be justified at the present moment in confiding so great a trust as the moral reformation of nine-tenths of the juvenile offenders in Ireland to such hands, after the evidence recently taken before the Committee of the House of Commons on the alleged destitution in Gweedore, so directly inculpating the entire body of the priests in that district. I will not more particularly allude to that inquiry than to observe that, both in its lengthened progress and in the Report to which the Committee ultimately came upon it, it has been much before the public in Ireland, and has left an impression very far from favourable to the Roman Catholic priests as moral instructors of the Irish population. I should be sorry to infer from a single case, although it included, I believe, the whole of the clergy of the district, an opinion unfavourable to all the rest of the Roman Catholic clergy. Such an inference would be neither just nor, I am sure, correct; but it is not exactly at the moment when such a case has been brought under public notice, that without any inquiry reformatories should be established upon a principle which would practically give to that body the sole and uncontrolled conduct of the education and training of any class whatever of Her Majesty's subjects. Before I sit down, my Lords, I would beg to call your attention to some of the provisions of the Bill. My noble Friend, in introducing this measure to your notice, stated that the reformatory school would be under public supervision and regular inspection. I do not find, my Lords, any provision for this, except that the Inspector General of Prisons is to report to the Lord Lieutenant upon the condition and regulations of schools proposed to be licensed as reformatories, and that upon his report such licence may be afterwards withdrawn; but I find no clause requiring such inspection. By the 3rd clause I find that the grand juries may present money in aid of reformatories, and by the 5th clause may appoint a Committee to enter into an agreement with the directors or managers of any reformatory school for the reception and keeping of offenders under sentence; but by the same clause it is provided, that the expenses hereby incurred shall be presented without any previous application to a presentment sessions. By this means the ratepayers are excluded from any control over, or any examination into, the charges they are required to defray. Although the managers of reformatories are thus secured against loss, your Lordships will find that the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury are, also, under the 13th clause of the Bill, to defray either the whole or such part of the cost of the care and maintenance of any juvenile offender as the Chief Secretary may recommend. Now, my Lords, I wish to know whether the managers of these reformatories are to be paid both by grand jury and Treasury for the same object, and if not, to which quarter the expense is to be charged? Again, by the 15th clause the parents of the juvenile offenders may be required to pay respectively 5*s.* a week for each child—it may not be easy to obtain from poor parents so large a contribution, if any, indeed, could be exacted from them; but if it is paid, who is to reap the benefit? The grand jury, or the Treasury? Or is it to go to swell the funds of the reformatory? The Bill is silent upon the subject. I believe that practically nothing would be obtained under this clause, as it does not mention by whom the parents may be sued, or in whose behalf. But I would beg to call the attention of the noble Earl at the head of the Government to the 20th and 21st lines of the clause, which, if enacted as they at present stand, would alter the existing constitution of the Petty Sessions Court. The words are, "and it shall be lawful for any two justices of the peace, or any stipendiary magistrate sitting in petty sessions for the district," &c., to constitute the tribunal before which parents may be sued for the weekly payments for the support of their children in reformatory schools. It is thus, for the first time, either cunningly or accidentally proposed to establish a difference between the jurisdiction of the local and of the stipendiary magistracy. Hitherto they have been upon a precisely equal footing, and have worked harmoniously together; but, by the words I have quoted from the Bill, it would henceforth require the presence of two local magistrates to do at petty sessions what a single stipendiary magistrate might do. I trust my noble Friend opposite, in commending this Bill to the acceptance of the House, did not intend thus to degrade the order of the Irish magistracy to which he belongs. The next remark I would make upon the provisions of the Bill is, that by the 8th and 9th clauses it is made optional with the managers of reformatories to receive, or refuse to receive, such juvenile offenders as may be sent to them. What, my Lords, I would like to know, is to become of the child so rejected? He might be a very bad boy, one whom the managers did not like to undertake for; but because he may be a bad case, he is only, therefore, I conceive, the more in need of the reformatory treatment for which this Bill purports to make provision; but by these clauses it is placed in the power of the managers to frustrate the proper operation of the Act where most it was required. I will only trouble your Lordships by noticing one more clause, which is the 7th. It fixes the age of sixteen, as that up to which juvenile offenders may be ordered, after a certain term of imprisonment, to be sent to a reformatory school, and detained there for any period not exceeding five years; thus, a lad under sixteen may be forcibly detained and trained in religious principles up to the age of twenty-one years, from which his convictions may dissent. This is not consistent with religious liberty. The same clause gives an appeal to a juvenile offender, or his parent or guardian, against any order of the justice's sentencing to detention in a reformatory school. What, my Lords, is to become of the offender pending such appeal? The Bill makes no provision for such a case; it appears to have been most loosely contrived from beginning to end—to be a specimen of most clumsy House of Commons legislation, unaided by the experience and unchecked by the responsibility of the Government. I would earnestly entreat my noble Friend at the head of the Government, who, I am sure, can have no object in view but the public good, not to give his sanction to this measure. It is one for which there exists no urgent necessity. Crime has much diminished, and especially in the class of juvenile offenders. This may be partly owing to education. I believe it is chiefly owing to the absence of distress, to the fuller employment of the poor, and to the beneficial effect of the summary jurisdiction entrusted to magistrates at petty sessions in dealing with juveniles. The intent of this Bill I believe to be good and creditable to the hon. Gentleman who introduced and carried it through the House of Commons. I do not ask your Lordships to reject it, but to defer its consideration to another Session—to dismiss it without prejudice. The important questions involved in it could then be deliberately examined into by the Government during the recess. My noble Friend, on assuming the reins of Government, and his colleague in the other House, held out the promise of a modification of the system of National education, by which the Bible, now for so many years banished from the general school-room, might in some cases be restored. I believe that nothing would more tend to the advancement of education, and to the proper moral training of youth, than such a measure; I regret that this promise has not received its fulfilment. With regret I have also observed, that most important Bills have, in the present Session, been allowed to pass at the sole recommendation of individual Members of Parliament—the Jew Bill and the Property Qualification Repeal Bill—measures affecting the constitution of the Legislature—ought not, I conceive, to have received the sanction of the Government without having been introduced with Ministerial responsibility. Let me hope, that while that which ought to have been done has been left undone, the passing of this Bill may not be added to the list of things done that ought not to have been done.

The Earl of Clancarty

THE EARL OF DERBY said, that it was quite true that this was not originally a Government Bill, having been introduced into the House of Commons by a private Member; but the Government had sanctioned its principle by adopting it, and had given to its details the most careful consideration. The whole of the arguments of the noble Earl against it were founded on the assumption that what had proved extremely beneficial to England would be no good to Ireland. Undoubtedly, the introduction of the system into England had been attended with the most beneficial consequences, and he was unable to understand what there was in the composition of the Irish character which should render it less useful in that country. For his part he thought it of very great importance to establish juvenile reformatories in Ireland. The noble Earl had said that if there were good workhouse schools, and good reformatory schools, the poor people would be tempted to induce their children to commit crime to be sent there in order to get an education which they could get nowhere else in Ireland. He denied that the education of the people in Ireland generally was badly cared for; on the contrary, they were in a far better position in that respect than was the mass of the population in England. As to Roman Catholic, having the management of the schools, he thought considering that nine-tenths of the juvenile criminals would also be Roman Catholics there was no great grievance in that. It was not true, however, that there would be no machinery of inspection and reporting, because the very first clause contained a provision for the visitation of Her Majesty's inspectors of prisons. One very pertinent question had been asked, and that was as to the power of appeal. That clause would have to be considered in Committee. At present it was proposed to give the child a power of appealing against being sent to a reformatory after spending fourteen days in prison; that appeal was to be within fifteen days, but if the Session was sitting or at hand it was to be to the next Session. It was a very serious question what was to be done with the juvenile offender between the expiration of the sentence and the hearing of the appeal. Without discussing, then, the clauses of the Bill, which would undergo a strict examination in Committee, he should only say that, as this was an attempt to extend to the sister country a plan for the moral reformation of juvenile offenders which had been found to answer well in England, he should give his support to the second reading of the Bill, hoping that it would receive such prompt and ample consideration as would enable it to become law in the course of the present Session.

THE EARL OF CARLISLE, after the very satisfactory observations of the noble Earl opposite, would not detain their Lordships further than to inform the noble Earl (the Earl of Clancarty) that this measure had met with general support from the more moderate of both the Roman Catholic and Protestant communities in Ireland, though it had had to struggle against the detraction of the more violent of both communions. In his opinion it well deserved the attention of their Lordships. The noble Earl (the Earl of Clancarty) so well performed his duties as a magistrate in Ireland that any Amendment suggested by him would receive their most serious attention. He would add, that though in the matter of adult reformatories Ireland had very much the start of England, she was yet unfurnished with juvenile reformatories, and he hoped their Lordships would give a speedy passage to this Bill, which was intended to remedy that defect. He defended placing the schools under Roman Catholic management, and observed that though mixed education could be well and properly applied to the general bulk of the population, yet it was necessary that exclusively religious education should be given to the juvenile criminal to bring him back to the paths of honesty and virtue.

VISCOUNT DUNGANNON expressed his gratification that this Bill had been introduced, considering that juvenile reformatories were much wanted in Ireland. There were some matters of detail in the Bill to which he objected, but he should not think of throwing any impediment in the way of the second reading, and only regretted that it had been brought in at so late a period of the Session as not to admit of due consideration being given to its details.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read 2ª accordingly.

GOVERNMENT OF INDIA BILL.

THIRD READING.

Bill read 3ª (according to order), with the Amendments.

LORD WROTTESLEY moved the omission of the words, in page 4, line 17, which provide that the Councillors who are required to have served or resided for a certain time in India shall not have last left India more than ten years next preceding the date of their appointment. The noble Lord said those words had been introduced as an Amendment, on the bringing up of the Report on the Bill, and in his opinion they would operate injuriously, by disqualifying for the office of Councillors men who might be peculiarly well fitted for the discharge of its duties. He objected, moreover, to all restrictions upon the freedom of election.

THE EARL OF ALBEMARLE also thought that those words ought to be omitted from the Bill.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said, he should insist on the retention of those words. They would ensure the advantage of recent experience in the Council, and it should be remembered that they would only apply to nine out of the fifteen councillors. The remaining six members of that body could be selected without any reference to such a povision. He thought they might as well omit the clause altogether as adopt the Amendment.

Amendment negatived.

Clause 29.

THE EARL OF DERBY moved the omission of the words, "with the concurrence of a majority of the Council," in the clause relating to the appointment of the members of Council in India. The effect of that Amendment would be that the selection in that case would be left to the Secretary of State, uncontrolled by his Council.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said, he believed that greater unity and vigour of Administration would be secured by leaving the appointment of the members of Council in India in the hands of the Governor General.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 55, enacting that, except for preventing or repelling actual invasion, the revenues of India shall not "without the consent of Parliament," be applicable to defray the expenses of any military operation carried on beyond the frontiers.

LORD CRANWORTH wished to remind the noble Earl that "the consent of Parliament" meant an Act of Parliament; while the consent of "both Houses of Parliament" would be inferred by Addresses to the Crown.

EARL GRANVILLE had asked more than once what was meant by the words "consent of Parliament," but he never received an answer. He should like to hear from the noble Earl opposite what was meant by the term.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, the consent of Parliament might mean either an Act of Parliament or a Resolution passed by both Houses.

EARL GRANVILLE thought it should be distinctly stated in the Bill what was meant by the words.

THE EARL OF DERBY proposed a clause to follow the 62nd, the object of which was to enable any person provisionally appointed Governor General to exercise his powers before taking his seat in Council. It was to provide for the case of a person who at the time of his appointment might not be at Calcutta, and to render it unnecessary that he should proceed thither before proceeding to discharge his duties. The clause was as follows:—

"In case the person who shall be entitled under any provisional appointment to succeed to the office of Governor General of India upon a vacancy therein, or who shall be appointed absolutely to assume that office, shall be in India upon or after the happening of the vacancy, or upon or after the receipt of such absolute appointment, as the case may require, but shall be absent from Fort William in Bengal, or from the place where the Council of the Governor General of India may then be, and it shall appear to him necessary to exercise the powers of Governor General before he shall have taken his seat in Council, it shall be lawful for him to make known by Proclamation his appointment, and his intention to assume the said office of Governor General, and after such Proclamation, and thenceforth until he shall repair to Fort William or the place where the Council may assemble, it shall be lawful for him to exercise alone all or any of the powers which might be exercised by the Governor General in Council, except the power of making Laws and Regulations; and all acts done in the exercise of the said powers, except as aforesaid, shall be of the same force and effect as if they had been done by the Governor General in Council: Provided that all acts done in the said Council after the date of such Proclamation, but before the communication thereof to such Council, shall be valid, subject nevertheless to revocation or alteration by the person who shall have so assumed the said office of Governor General; and when the office of Governor General is assumed under the foregoing provision, if there be at any time before the Governor General takes his seat in Council no Vice-President of the Council authorized to preside at meetings for making Laws and Regulations (as provided by Section Twenty-two of the Act of the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Years of Her Majesty), the senior ordinary Member of Council then present shall preside therein, with the same powers as if a Vice President had been appointed, and were absent."

Motion agreed to. Clause added.

THE EARL OF DERBY then moved the insertion of the following clauses after Clause 67:—

"After the commencement of this Act, such of the Directors as have been elected by the General Court of the said Company, or who shall from time to time be so elected, shall be the Directors of the said Company, and the major part of such Directors for the time being shall form a Court of Directors; and where the presence, signature, consent, or concurrence of Ten Directors is now requisite, the presence, signature, consent, or concurrence of the major part of the Directors for the time being shall be sufficient; and to the intent that the number of Directors may be reduced to Six, Two Directors only shall be elected by the General Court of the said Company at each biennial election to fill the vacancies occasioned by the expiration of the term of office of Directors; and so much of the said Act of the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Years of Her Majesty as requires any of the Directors to be persons who have resided Ten Years in India shall be repealed, and in the oath to be taken by a Director of the said Company, under Section Thirteen of the said Act, the words 'in the administration of the Government of India in trust for the Crown' shall be omitted.

"It shall no longer be obligatory on the Directors to summon Four General Quarterly Courts in every year as heretofore.

"Except claims of mortgagees of the Security Fund hereinbefore mentioned, the said Company shall not, after the passing of this Act, be liable in respect of any claim, demand, or liability which has arisen, or may hereafter arise, out of any treaty, covenant, contract, grant, engagement, or fiduciary obligation made, incurred, or entered into by the said Company before the passing of this Act, whether the said Company would, but for this Act, have been bound to satisfy such claim, demand, or liability out of the revenues of India, or in any other manner whatsoever."

Motion agreed to. Clauses added.

Further Amendments made.

On Motion, That the Bill do pass,

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY: My Lords, before this Bill leaves I wish to address a few words to your Lordships on a subject which, though not making any part of the Bill, is closely connected with the government of our Indian empire; but to which, nevertheless, very little allusion has been made in the course of the discussions—I mean the subject of religion, and the singular and responsible position which England holds as a Christian nation ruling over a nation of heathens. My Lords, I make no complaint that the Bill is silent on this important subject. It could not be otherwise. The purpose of the Bill is to frame a government, not to declare how that government is to be administered—to create a machinery which is to be worked elsewhere. I also agree in the principle that has been so often laid down, that India must be governed in India, and not not from England. Still, my Lords, the subject to which I allude is one on which strong and conscientious convictions are entertained by a very large portion of the community, who deeply feel the anomalous and responsible position in which we are placed as a Christian nation ruling over a vast population of idolaters. My Lords, we are as far as possible from desiring any open attempt on the part of Government either to overthrow the false religion with which, unhappily, we have to deal, or to establish that which we know to be true. So far are we from desiring any such interference that we should think nothing gained by the conversion of the whole peninsula, supposing that it could possibly be effected through bribery or compulsion. But, while we grant to the religion of the Natives complete toleration, it is not necessary to conceal or compromise our own, or to let it appear to be a matter of indifference to us whether the Natives become converts to truth or not. And undoubtedly there is in this country a strong opinion prevailing that the course which has hitherto been pursued may wisely and safely be modified. My Lords I venture to specify a few points which I trust will be hereafter observed in the administration of affairs in India. First, that no distinction of caste be any longer recognized. Secondly, that in all schools to which aid is given by the Government the Bible shall be read—not commented upon for its doctrines, but read for its facts. Thirdly, that all connection on the part of the Government with the rites and customs of an idolatrous religion be entirely abolished, even if the object of such connection be simply the preservation of order; that those lands which have hitherto been employed for idolatrons purposes, and of which I believe the Company have become trustees, should be made over entirely to the Natives themselves, so that this nation may be altogether released from any participation in things which are detestable in themselves, and scandalous to the reputation of a Christian country. Fourthly, that Native converts to Christianity should be admitted to all employments the duties of which they can adequately fulfil. In measures like these there is nothing that ought to excite the suspicion of the Natives, nothing contrary to the most perfect toleration, nothing savouring of proselytism—it is merely an acknowledgment of the religion we ourselves profess. And surely, my Lords, we ought to look forward to the time when, under the providence of God, India shall form no exception to the multitude of countries in which truth has prevailed against falsehood, and the Gospel has triumphed over idolatry and superstition, so that in the end it may appear why a remote country like England should have been allowed to have dominion over the vast territory of India.

The Archbishop of Canterbury

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, after what has fallen from the most rev. Prelate, I may be permitted to observe, that while I think that due protection ought to be given to the professors of all religions in India, and nothing should be done to discourage the efforts of Christian missionaries in that country; on the other hand, I am quite certain that it is essential to the interests, the peace, and the well-being of India, if not also to the very existence of our empire in India, that the Government should carefully abstain from doing anything except to give indiscriminate and impartial protection to all sects and all creeds; and that nothing could be more inconvenient or more dangerous on the part of the State than any open and active assistance to any, or any attempt to convert the Native population from their own religions, however false and superstitious. My Lords, I hope I misunderstood the most rev. Prelate when he said that he should recommend the Government not in the slightest degree to recognize the distinction of caste. On that subject I will say, as far as the interest of the public service is concerned, it is not desirable that the same indulgence and punctilious deference for the caste of the Natives entering that service as was previously observed should be continued for the future; but to say that you will not recognize caste at all in India is to say that you will not recognize that which is intimately interwoven with all the cherished feelings, habits, associations, and most vital principles of the people. Therefore, my Lords, while in the public service I certainly would not allow prejudices of caste to interfere with the discharge of the duties which any person may voluntarily take upon himself, I say it is the bounden duty of the Government to pay that attention to caste which even in this country we pay, though not in the same degree, to the different ranks of society, and which any Government must, more or less, respect, if it would not be brought into constant collision with all classes of its subjects. There was one topic touched upon by the most rev. Prelate in his observations with which I entirely concur. Wherever property in land or in any other form has been assigned to religious purposes, however repugnant to our feelings, provided they do not violate every principle of morality and decency, I think that that property ought to continue to be scrupulously applied to the ends to which it was dedicated. But I agree with the most rev. Prelate that it is most desirable that the Government and its officials should, as far as possible, separate themselves from any active interference in the detailed management of the property devoted to the support of idolatrous ceremonies in India. When I had the honour to hold the seals of the Colonial Department I introduced this principle into Ceylon, and required the arrangements under which the Government officials in that island had previously acted in regard to the Native rites and ceremonies to be modified, while the management of the funds applicable to such purposes was handed over to those with whose opinions they better accorded. I think the Government did its duty with credit then, as it will do its duty with credit now, by withdrawing as much as possible from any active participation in the detailed management of property of this description, while it at the same time strictly maintains the existing application of the endowments.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY: I wish, my Lords, to explain that in speaking of caste I entirely referred to the public services.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY: My Lords, I think it due to the feelings of the country, which though recently silent, has by no means been asleep on this subject, that some expression of opinion should be given by your Lordships before the Bill to regulate the future government of India leaves this House. To nothing which has just fallen from the noble Earl can any exception be reasonably taken. I am exceedingly gratified, and I believe the public will also be gratified, with the sentiments which he has enunciated. Those sentiments are very much in accordance with the petition which I had the honour to present to your Lordships signed by the representatives of all the bodies in this country engaged in the diffusion of Christian knowledge and in the encouragement of missionary operations. In that petition there is nothing violent, nothing fanatical. The demand of the petitioners is confined to what is strictly moderate and reasonable. What they require is the assertion of the most unbounded religious liberty in India; that the professors of all religions without distinction, should be put upon a footing of perfect equality. They say that in that country in the eye of the law the professors of all religions must be placed on a footing of equality; and they maintain that in the selection of candidates for the public service, there must be no rule but that of fitness for the public service. No man must be chosen or rejected simply because he is a Hindoo, a Parsee, a Mahommedan, or a Christian: all must have an equal claim to serve the State. I believe it would be prejudicial rather than otherwise if the Government were to come forward and give any direct assistance to the propagation of Christianity. What the petitioners ask is that the Government should neither promote that faith by active measures, nor in any way retard it—that it should neither be a favourer nor an opponent of Christianity. They expect that reasonable protection shall be given to all sects who conduct themselves with propriety. They hope the Government will not be ashamed to avow by its acts and in its official documents that it is a Christian Government; that it looks upon Christianity as the best form of religion and the best basis of all civilization; but that, neither directly nor indirectly—by force, bribery, or any other such inducement, great or small—will it endeavour to turn any Native from the religion to which he belongs. And this was the concluding prayer of the petitioners:—

"That all existing lets and hindrances being removed, and no new ones being opposed, free scope and action be given to the diffusion of Christianity through Her Majesty's territories in the East Indies."

My Lords, it is said that the neck of the rebellion is broken, and many of the guerrilla bands which disturb the peace of India are composed of persons who were not engaged in the original mutiny. I have seen letters from India from persons of the highest authority, expressing the opinion that something in the nature of an amnesty might now be proclaimed, so as to avoid the risk of driving large masses of men to desperation. There is another point to which I would call your Lordships' attention, and the attention of Her Majesty's Government. One of the brightest traits in the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Ellenborough's) administration of India was the invariable deference and respect he evinced for the feelings of the people, and the noble and generous manner in which he extended over them the shield of his protection. I regret to find from letters I have recently received that there has recently been growing up a strong antipathy between the Europeans and the Natives in India. The older civilians and military men, indeed, know their duty too well to give way to such a feeling; but the young officers who go to that country imbibe the worst prejudices, and I am told that the common language in which they speak of the Natives is, "vile and detestable niggers." I fear it will be long before the confidence which formerly prevailed between European and Native will be again restored; perhaps half a century may elapse before an Englishman will be able to settle down in security in the interior provinces of India. But I wish, my Lords, to read an extract from a letter just received from Benares, which shows that a state of things now exists in that country which demands the most vigorous interposition of the Government. It is as follows:—

"Benares is very quiet, and, as usual, with few troops; but we are better without them. The other day the sons of the Rajah of —— got a horsewhipping from some officers for not salaaming; and I expect we shall have many such scenes. There is a great dislike and contempt of the Natives among the newly arrived portion of the European forces. It will be well if it goes no further."

The writer continues:—

"I know the young men; they are very quiet and gentlemanlike, with a taste for drawing and mechanics, and could not have been guilty of intentional insolence. There is a very bad spirit growing up among the Europeans towards the Natives, the most faithful among whom must become utterly disgusted if we do not take care."

My Lords, I believe that the Asiatics will submit to much—to rapine, violence, spoliation, and oppression—but submit to insult they will not; and I know of no one single thing that is more likely to retard the civilization of that country and endanger the peace and security of our empire than the continuance of such a state of things. A great many preach the Gospel with their mouths and others preach it by their lives. I am glad to see the Gospel advanced by both these means; but I am quite sure that no one single thing will more tend to advance civilization, even more than the exertions of the missionaries themselves, than that the language and conduct of all persons should be in harmony with the Gospel. The noble Earl will excuse me for having brought forward this subject, but I felt that a continuance of the present state of things would produce such serious results that I could not help expressing a hope that he will direct his atttention to the subject.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH: My Lords, I perfectly agree with the noble Earl that in the present state of India one of the most alarming circumstances is the great and constantly increasing animosity between the Natives and the Europeans. I greatly regret that I am compelled to admit that that animosity is, in a very great measure, owing to the extreme severity of the punishment which has been inflicted upon the Natives. I do trust that the example set by Sir John Lawrence with respect to punishment will be followed throughout the entire country. Sir John Lawrence has with great propriety introduced a regulation by which it is required that no man's life shall be taken away (if that should be necessary) without the concurrence of three persons, and I hope the same course will be adopted generally as long as hostilities last. But the Government of India last year thought fit to pass a law to restrict the press of India. That law has been very naturally carried into effect for the protection of the Government from hostile comment and observation. I wish I could say that the protection of the Government had been extended to the people. It has not. Every one of those editors whose mouths have been closed against the Government has been permitted to use from day to day language most exasperating to the whole people of India. They are described as contaminated by every vice. From day to day the regiments which have been disarmed are threatened with extermination in a manner that is likely to produce the most terrible effects. If it is necessary to prevent the press from libelling the Government, a restriction should also be imposed upon the press to prevent it from libelling the people of India. I am satisfied that if the press of India be not thus restricted the results will be most dangerous. If we allow the press thus to libel the people it is idle to expect that young officers arriving in India will not have their minds poisoned by the stories which they read day by day in the newspapers. With regard to a most important matter—that of the future policy of the Government with respect to religion in India—I ask your Lordships to permit me to read a few sentences from the last authoritative exposition of their policy, dated only on the 13th of April last, in a letter from the Court of Directors to the Governor General, published for the information of your Lordships. In that letter are these words :—

"The Government will adhere with good faith to its ancient policy of perfect neutrality in matters affecting the religion of the people of India; and we most earnestly caution all those in authority under it not to afford by their conduct the least colour to the suspicion that that policy has undergone or will undergo any change. It is perilous for men in authority to do as individuals that which they officially condemn. The real intention of the Government will be inferred from their acts, and they may unwittingly expose it to the greatest of all dangers, that of being regarded with general distrust by the people. We rely upon the honourable feelings which have ever distinguished our service for the furtherance of the views which we express. When the Government of India makes a promise to the people there must not be afforded to them grounds for a doubt as to its fidelity to its word."

VISCOUNT MELVILLE thought, that as long as they employed a Native army it would not be easy to abstain from giving some countenance to the religious ceremonies of the Natives.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON: Before your Lordships pass this Bill I hope I may be permitted to make one or two remarks. I understand that the point to which my most rev. Brother alluded was the practice that has existed for some years, of the Government taking into its own hands the management of the lands by which the heathen temples are supported. That practice has not as yet altogether ceased, and the result is, that these lands are kept in a far better state, and the heathen temples are, therefore, much better maintained than if the lands were under the control of those who would squander the proceeds and use them to their own advantage. The Government ought no longer to be responsible for the maintenance of that religion in any way. This is a matter of some importance, and we know that, notwithstanding what we have often heard, some change in this respect is desirable. The ancient traditional policy and management in India, as to religion, is not, indeed, likely to be altered; but there is a deep feeling in the hearts of religious people in this country that in that policy for many years back there has been some mistake. I do not mean to say that exaggerated statements were not from time to time made upon this subject during the pressure of the calamities of last year. But I think that when all allowance is made for exaggeration it will still be found that there is a deep-seated feeling in the hearts of Englishmen that we do require some change in some of these matters, and I think the speech of the noble Earl at the head of the Government shows that we really are disposed to look this matter fairly in the face. It would not, I think, satisfy the feeling of the English nation if this year were to pass over without our future administration of India bearing upon it the shadow of that great event which has so deeply afflicted the nation, and which we cannot but regard as being in some degree a visitation from God. No doubt, my Lords, we ought to exercise the utmost impartiality towards our heathen fellow-subjects. No doubt we ought to show the greatest forbearance to them. No doubt the Church of England and the Christian religion itself can never be advanced by a policy of mere force and power on the part of the Government. But we ought to show to the people of India that we wish to give them, not only Christian justice and Christian civilization, but, above all, ultimately the inheritance of Christian truth.

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD: I think, my Lords, that we can have very little doubt what the conduct of a Christian Government ought to be; but I confess that I heard with some misgivings the extract which was read by the noble Earl below me (the Earl of Shaftesbury), especially when accompanied with the emphasis which the noble Earl threw upon certain expressions which are well capable of being understood in two different ways. If by the "neutrality" which was referred to nothing more was meant than that there should be no attempt on the part of the Government as a Government, directly or indirectly to interfere with the religious belief of its heathen subjects, I for one cannot object to that word being taken in its fullest sense. But if by "neutrality" is secretly meant that there shall be stamped on the English Government and their representatives in India an aspect of entire indifference as to whether this religion or that is to prosper and abide—if by "neutrality" is meant that their characters are to exhibit that happy indifference as to Christianity which shall impress on the heathen mind the conviction that they care not whether they are Christians or heathens, then I believe that such neutrality would be fatal and false to the religion we profess, and that ultimately it would destroy the empire that has been entrusted to us. It seems to me that the distinction is plain and intelligible between making the Indian people feel that we do not by force and fraud, by policy or by violence, interfere with their religious belief, because our own religion teaches us that such interference would be wrong, and impressing them with the conviction that we withhold our interference because we have ourselves no distinct preference for our own faith. One seems to me to be the line of Christian truth, and the other to be the line of a wicked neutrality; and I am only most anxious that nothing should go forth to mar the impression that we do not mean the English Government in India to be ashamed of its Christianity; but that we wish it to make due provision for the supply of the Christian necessities of its own troops and civil servants, because it believes Christianity to be true, and is not afraid in the face of its heathen subjects to show that it believes it to be true, and that it builds its own expectations of its continued prosperity upon the blessing of that God whom it professes to serve. I trust that that is the only sense in which neutrality as to the Christian religion is to be admitted into the future Government of India; and I think it the more important to declare this, because I cannot but feel that there have been in times past many instances in which neutrality was understood to mean carelessness about the truth of Christianity and a fear to avow in the face of heathendom that we were ourselves firm believers in the Christian revelation.

EARL GRANVILLE: I think that the meaning of the words quoted by the noble Earl is very obvious—that the Government is not to interfere in any manner with the religion of its subjects in India; that it is not in its official capacity to use either force or corruption for the purposes of proselytism. I may say that it gave me great pleasure to hear the declaration which was made by the noble Earl at the head of the Government. I think that it was most useful and important—most useful with regard to the influence which it will produce upon the opinions of people in this country, and most important not only with respect to the temporal interests of the government in India, but as indicating the most advantageous system for the gradual spread of Christianity in that large kingdom. With regard to the policy of mercy which has been advocated this evening, I feel no distrust of Her Majesty's Government in that respect, and I am quite sure that there need be no fear of Lord Canning. It gives me great satisfaction to find the general concurrence which is now expressed by all in regard to that discrimination of punishment and to those principles of mercy for which the noble Lord made himself so very conspicuous last autumn, and then subjected himself to so much rebuke.

The Bishop of Oxford

On Question, Resolved, in the Affirmative.

Bill passed accordingly and sent to the Commons.

"Dissentient,—

"1. Because the Bill establishes a Home Administration for India at once inefficient, unconstitutional, and expensive.

"2. Because the Council it gives to the Secretary of State is too numerous for either deliberation or action, while the parties composing it consist mainly of the very individuals who were engaged in conducting that form of Government which the Bill itself condemns and supersedes.

"3. Because the Measure provides that a moiety of the Council shall be chosen on the vicious and long-condemned principle of self-election.

"4. Because the Members for Council are virtually appointed for life; and besides being endowed with large salaries and ample pensions, are moreover paid by a great patronage, for the dispensation of which they are wholly irresponsible.

"5. Because the Government provided by this Bill, partaking largely of the character and composition of its condemned predecessor, holds out little hope that the misgovernment which has driven the people of India into rebellion will be abandoned.

"6. Because the Members constituting the Council of India, while drawing large salaries and enjoying extensive patronage, are, contrary to Parliamentary precedent and sound principle, not prohibited from holding other offices of emolument, or engaging in commercial transactions; thus interfering with their efficiency as Public Servants, and exposing them to the suspicion of jobbing and corruption.

"7. Because the Council constituted by the Bill, cumbrous, expensive, and inefficient, can have no other effect than either to thwart the Secretary of State, or to screen him from Parliamentary responsibility, while efficient and experienced Under Secretaries would have afforded more effectual and constitutional advice and assistance in the discharge of his duties.

"ALBEMARLE."

House adjourned at a quarter to Twelve o'clock, to Monday next, Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, July 23, 1858.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1° International Patent Right.

2° Probates and Letters of Administration Act Amendment; Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Act Amendment.

3° Civil Bills, &c. (Ireland) Act Amendment; Militia Pay.

CORRUPT PRACTICES PREVENTION BILL.—CONSIDERATION.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order for Consideration read.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [22nd July]—

"That the Clause, ('That it shall not be lawful for the collector of rates and taxes of any borough, county, or city, or his partner or agent, to act as agent, clerk, or canvasser for, or to be employed on behalf of, any candidate for such borough, county, or city; and any such person who shall so offend shall, for his said offence, be liable to forfeit the sum of fifty pounds to any person who shall sue for the same, together with full costs of suit,') be now read a second time."

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

MR. BASS said, he wished for an opportunity of more deliberately considering this subject, and hoped that the right hon. Gentleman opposite, the Secretary of State for the Home Department, would be satisfied with a mere continuance Bill during the present Session. He believed that the provisions of this Bill would either be found unworkable or would lead to corruption.

MR. P. O'BRIEN said, he thought that nothing could be more objectionable than the practice of a tax collector, with his rate-book in his hand, walking into a voter's house to solicit his vote in aid of any particular candidate. He hoped the hon. Member for Windsor (Mr. Vansittart) would press his Motion.

MR. WALPOLE said, that the proposition was entirely new. It was that, for the first time, the collector of rates should not act as agent for a candidate. Hitherto the Legislature had left the candidates to select whom they pleased as their agents; and if once they began to say that certain persons should not be allowed to be agents he did not know where they should stop. They must go much further certainly than this clause went. He did not think that the clause had any bearing upon the points sought to be remedied by this Bill, but that it would raise question after question as to who is entitled to be an agent. He was quite prepared to consider this clause at a future time, in connection with the general subject of election law.

SIR FREDERICK SMITH observed, that the clause would be a mere trap to the honest candidate. How could he know who was the partner of a rate collector?

MR. ROEBUCK said, he did not think much advantage would be gained by the clause. He agreed with the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department that this was not the time for a general revision of the electoral law. But that argument applied to the Bill altogether. He hoped, therefore, that the right hon. Gentleman would be satisfied with a mere continuance Bill, and would not attempt to carry out this patchwork piece of legislation.

MR. WARREN said, he could not support the clause in its entirety. He would suggest the omission of the words "partner or agent." If that alteration were made he should then be inclined to support it.

MR. GREER hoped the hon. Gentleman would persevere with the clause. Collectors of rates and taxes had a great influence in reference to the registration of voters; and in Belfast that influence had been exercised in a most extraordinary degree. In any district the collectors of taxes might abstain from calling upon voters for their taxes until after the time when they should be paid to enable them to vote, and thus persons really solvent, and willing to pay their rates when asked for them, found themselves disfranchised when the revising barrister came round.

MR. JOHN LOCKE said, the clause either went too far or not far enough. It singled out one particular class of persons, but tax collectors were not the only persons who had an undue influence over electors. Let them take, for example, the steward of a nobleman who had a large estate, and who could knock 10 or 15 per cent off the rent if it would in any way suit his employer's purpose. The tax collector was a public servant, and any candidate might avail himself of his services. The tax collector could not remit taxes, and it was not to his interest to remit them, but the steward of an estate could remit any amount his employer might choose to allow. The clause aimed at one particular class of individuals, while they knew that there were hundreds of others who were equally open to objection. He objected to legislation of this piecemeal kind being introduced into the Bill, which he considered should be merely a continuance Bill. If it were necessary to legislate on the ground of intimidation, it should be done fairly and honestly.

MR. M'CANN said, if they could not get a large measure of Reform they must be content to take it piecemeal. There was something more than intimidation in the action of a tax-gatherer. That functionary had a power which a landlord or a steward did not possess, and it was quite right, therefore, that he should be excluded from acting as an agent in contested elections.

Mr. BAINES said, that the best thing in the face of so many difficulties would be to make the Bill a mere Continuance Bill of the Act of last Session. He felt favourable to the principle of the clause, which was directed to check illegitimate influence of a very well defined kind. He did not think it was a reason for doing nothing that they could not prevent the exertion of all kinds of illegitimate influence. The words "partner or agent" ought, however, to be omitted, and the clause ought to be amended so as to make it apply to the collector of poor rates of any parish situated in a borough. At present it only applied to a collector of the borough, city, or county rates.

Mr. BONHAM-CARTER said, he thought they ought to avoid partial legislation on the large subject of election law. He could not understand why they should single out municipal officers not recognized by the Act. It was opening the door to a course in which they might find it difficult to stop.

Mr. BYNG said, he considered that the clause contained a very sound principle, and he should vote for it, subject to the Amendment suggested by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Leeds (Mr. Baines).

Mr. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN said, he did not think the Home Secretary was justly open to the charge of attempting to make the Bill more than a mere continuance measure. He had only sought to clear up some doubts which had arisen in the working of the existing Act. For himself, he did not like homœopathic doses of reform, and he should, therefore, oppose the clause.

Mr. CRAUFURD said, he thought it unreasonable that a Bill of this kind should have been introduced at this late period of the Session, and that they were wasting time in discussing it. He should vote against the clause, because he desired that the Bill should be merely a continuance Bill. He wished they would take an example from Scotland, where there was no such absurd regulation that a man should pay his taxes before he was qualified to vote. He objected to the clause for another reason, that they ought not in such a case to pick out one class of society rather than another. If they excluded tax collectors, they should exclude solicitors and members of the legal profession from being agents, for he held that they were a much more dangerous class in this respect than tax collectors. He said that in his capacity of a member of the legal profession himself.

Mr. W. VANSITTART said, he should be happy to adopt the Amendments suggested by the hon. and learned Member for Midhurst (Mr. Warren), and the right hon. Member for Leeds (Mr. Baines).

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 53; Noes 66: Majority 13.

Mr. NICOLL rose to move the following clause:—

"Every candidate at any election for any county, city, or borough, shall be required to make and sign the following statutory declaration, and present, or cause to be presented, a copy of such declaration to the election auditor on or before the day appointed for the audit of bills, charges, or claims:—'I [A. B.], a candidate at the election of a [ ] to represent the [ ] in Parliament, do hereby solemnly and sincerely declare that I have not knowingly made, authorised, or sanctioned, and that I will not knowingly make, authorise, or sanction any payment, or make any gift of money or other valuable consideration, directly or indirectly, by way of private gratuity to any solicitor, agent, or canvasser, acting for me on account of the said election, otherwise than is described by the bills, charges, and claims rendered to the election auditors, save as excepted and allowed by the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, 1854.' And every candidate who shall neglect to make and send in to the election auditor a copy of the declaration as aforesaid on or before the day appointed by the election auditor, shall be liable to the penalty of £20, and to a further penalty of £10 for every subsequent week of wilful default or neglect in making or sending in such declaration, to be recovered by any person who will sue for the same, together with full cost of suit. Provided always, that in case any such candidate shall be absent from the United Kingdom at the time of such election, he shall send in to the election auditor a copy of the declaration as aforesaid within one month after his return to the United Kingdom, which shall be of the same force and effect as if the same had been sent in as herein provided."

Clause brought up, and read the first time.

Mr. WALPOLE said, that he individually, had no objection to a declaration being made by the candidate either at the polling booth or the table of the House to the effect contained in the clause. On the contrary, he thought it might become one of the most effective modes of obtaining the end they had in view; but this was one of those clauses which in the discussion which took place when the existing Act was introduced some years ago, had elicted more controversy than almost any other. It was necessary to confine the operation of the Bill to the cases contained in its provisions. Other cases might come under consideration in a permanent measure which could not be delayed beyond the next Session of Parliament. The House had signified its approval of the course he had taken of making this as nearly as possible a continuance Bill, merely being so far declaratory as to render the measure more intelligible. The course he had taken had nothing at all unusual in it. He hoped the House would dispose of the proposed Amendments. If any of the clauses provoked opposition, let the elimination of the clauses objected to be distinctly proposed. If the feeling of the House were declared against him he was ready to make this merely a continuance Bill, otherwise it would be a dereliction of duty in him to desist.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, the clause was a good one.

MR. GREER said, that such a clause was absolutely necessary.

MR. P. O'BRIEN said, he did not think the clause would meet the evil complained of.

MR. CRAUFURD said, that he could not assent to the clause. Unless they could trust to the honour of Members of that House not to deal in corruption, no declaration that could be framed would prevent hon. Members evading the law. The clause only imposed upon a Member a declaration that he had not paid other money than that returned to the election auditor, but hundreds of thousands of pounds might have been paid on his behalf by others.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE remarked, that it would be impossible to get through the Bill as it stood. If it were not made a mere continuance Bill he would move the omission of all the new clauses.

MR. WALPOLE repeated, that if a majority of the House were against him, he would make the Bill a continuance Bill the next day. That question might be tried on the first clause.

MR. ROEBUCK said, he should support the clause, although he admitted it would not meet all the evil. He did not believe the House wanted to put down bribery, because he had noticed that, whenever an effective measure was brought forward it was sure to be opposed on both sides.

Motion made and Question put—"That the said clause be now put a second time."

The House divided:—Ayes 52; Noes 83; Majority 31.

The clause was therefore lost.

MR. GREER then moved the following clause:—

"And whereas it is expedient to provide for increasing the number of polling places, and for altering polling districts in Ireland, Be it therefore enacted, That it shall be lawful for the Lord Lieutenant or other Chief Governor or Governors of Ireland, by and with the advice of the Privy Council in Ireland, from time to time hereafter, on Petition from the Justices of any county or riding in Ireland, in quarter sessions assembled, or from one or more of the Representatives in Parliament for the said county or riding, or from at least one hundred of the registered electors for the said county or riding, representing that the number of polling places for such county or riding is insufficient, and praying that the place or places mentioned in the said Petition, may be a polling place or polling places for the county or riding within which such place or places is or are situate, and that a district or districts in said Petition mentioned and described by the barony or baronies, half barony or half baronies, or by the parish or parishes, and townlands contained therein respectively, may constitute a district or districts for polling at such polling place or polling places respectively, or praying that any polling district or polling districts may be altered, and that any barony or half barony, parish or parishes, or townlands, may be detached from any such polling district, and be annexed to any other polling district, as the case may be, to declare that any place or places mentioned in the said Petition, shall be a polling place or polling places for that county or riding, and that the district or districts in such Petition mentioned, or with such alterations thereof as may be deemed suitable and convenient, shall constitute a district or districts for polling at such polling place or polling places respectively; and that the other polling districts of the said county or riding shall be altered accordingly; and every such Declaration or Order for creating additional polling places, and the polling districts for the same, or for altering any polling district or districts, shall be certified under the hand of the Clerk of the said Privy Council, and when so certified shall be published in the Dublin Gazette, and shall be of the same force and effect as if the same had been made by the authority of Parliament: Provided always, That if the said Petition be from registered Electors or from a Representative or Representatives of the said county or riding, proof must be given of the publication of the said Petition in two newspapers, circulating within the said county or riding, at least ten days before such declaration or order shall be made.

"And at the next Registration of Voters for the said county or riding, after such declaration or order shall have been made, separate alphabetical lists shall be made of the Electors entitled to vote in each polling place, according to the baronies or to the parishes, or portions of parishes, constituting the said polling districts respectively."

Clause brought up, and read the first time.

LORD NAAS objected that as this clause had nothing to do with corrupt practices, it did not come within the scope of this Bill. More than this, no practical inconveniences arose from the existing state of the law. At present the registered electors on consultation with the magistrates at quarter sessions could apply for additional polling places, and he had never known a case in which such joint application had been refused. There could not, in his opinion, be any fairer arrangement.

MR. WHITE said, he rose to support the Amendment, and would frankly avow that he did so in order to protract the debate. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had on a former occasion told the House that a combination of twenty Members would any time, by availing themselves of the forms of the House, upset the British constitution. He (Mr. White) did not accept the right hon. Gentleman as a very great constitutional authority, but taking his dictum for as much as it was worth—he would then announce his determination to oppose this Bill in every stage; and would fain hope, that some score of other Members at least, would co-operate with him, and, if possible, prevent this pernicious Bill, as now presented to the House, becoming the law of the land. Moreover, he would assert that the Government, in introducing the declaratory clause (the payment of voter's expenses) had wholly misread or perverted a great constitutional principle. By the clause in question they went on the palpably unconstitutional assumption that an elector, in voting, was not performing a public duty, but was conferring a private favour on a candidate. On the introduction of the Bill he had opposed it, and then declared his invincible repugnance to the clauses foisted therein, and, whilst he was not then inclined, and never had been, to give a factious opposition to the Government, still he (Mr. White) would persevere in his opposition to this Bill unless it was reduced to its proper proportions—namely, as a simple continuance Bill, as it ought to have been and none other, at this fag-end of the Session. He would add no more, but reiterate what he had said on a former occasion, to wit, that the title of this Bill was a misnomer, and that, instead of being called a "Corrupt Practices Prevention Act," it was neither more nor less than a Corrupt Practices Protection Act.

MR. P. O'BRIEN said, he concurred with the noble Lord the Member for Cockermouth (Lord Naas) that this clause was unnecessary, and would, if adopted, only tend to increase expenses.

MR. J. D. FITZGERALD said, he thought the arguments advanced by the noble Lord against the clause perfectly satisfactory, and indeed unanswerable. He hoped the hon. Member for Londonderry would withdraw it. Ample power was already possessed for the end aimed at. The Privy Council in Ireland had considered whether the power so constantly granted should not be exercised more sparingly.

MR. COX said, he should support the clause. He looked upon the Bill as one to legalize bribery and increase the expenses of candidates. That being so, he thought that they should provide that the candidates' funds should be spared as far as possible, and he should therefore move that the expense of providing polling places should be paid by the county or borough.

MR. SPEAKER said, that the hon. Member could not move the Amendment at that stage. The Bill must be recommitted for the purpose.

MR. ROEBUCK said, that if the first clause of the Bill were retained, he would move the recommittal of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the said clause be now read a second time."

The House divided:—Ayes 26; Noes 112: Majority 86.

MR. GRIFFITH then moved the following clause:—

"The admission and payment, on behalf of any candidate at an election, of any claim or demand in respect to such election, by the election auditor, in accordance with the provisions of the 17 & 18 Vict., c. 102, shall be sufficient protection to such candidate against any action or suit at law in respect to the legality of any such payment; and it shall be the duty of the election auditor to refuse to pay any claim or demand on behalf of such candidate which is not in accordance with the provisions of the above-mentioned Act of the 17 & 18 Vict., c. 102."

The adoption of this clause would make the election auditor a real check upon corrupt expenditure, instead of, as he was, a trap and a sham.

Clause brought up, and read the first time.

MR. ROEBUCK said, that if they agreed to this clause, they would at each election have 350 courts of law. He thought that was sufficient argument against the clause.

Motion made, and Question "That the said clause be now read a second time," put, and negatived.

MR. STAPLETON said, he then rose to move that the words "within such voter's county or borough, and seven miles from the boundary thereof," should be inserted in Clause 1, line 17, after the word "voter." His object was to limit the expenditure for bringing voters to the poll by merely allowing the word candidate to bring to the poll those who lived within a restricted district. He could not conceive any principle on which the House could sanction the bringing of voters from remote parts of the kingdom.

MR. JOHN LOCKE expressed his intention to support the Amendment. The conveyance of voters to the poll was carried to a ridiculous extent, and the expenses incurred fell heavily upon the candidate.

MR. M'CANN said, he should support the clause, as he thought the system of bringing voters from great distances entirely wrong

MR. ROEBUCK expressed himself strongly against the present system, the result of which was that entire constituencies had to be brought to the poll in cabs. His intention was to move the rejection of the entire clause, but to provide against all contingencies, he would in the meantime support this Amendment, which would at any rate improve the clause. A more mischievous clause was never introduced into any Bill.

MR. GARNETT said, he would support the Amendment, but some provision would be necessary to meet the case of the Universities.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN said, he should vote for the Amendment. He thought in the case of the Universities the voting might be conducted by letter.

MR. GREER said, the words "county" and "borough" were those used in the Amendment, which would not include the case of the Universities.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY said, that he thought the Amendment of the hon. Member for Berwick a very proper one, and should therefore give it his support. However, in his opinion, the only efficient way to prevent bribery at elections would be to introduce the system of vote by ballot.

MR. CRAWFURD said, he thought they ought to restrict these expenses, which were often very extravagant.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The House divided:—Ayes 75; Noes 78: Majority 3.

MR. CRAUFURD said, he would move an Amendment, with the view of preventing the provision of conveyances for any other purpose than that of bringing voters to the poll.

MR. WALPOLE assented to the Amendment, which was agreed to.

MR. ROEBUCK said, he rose to oppose the introduction of the clause into the Bill before the House. The Home Secretary said that this was simply a continuance Bill, with the exception of removing a doubt with respect to the payment of travelling expenses. But a doubt might be removed by settling the law. To render the payment of travelling expenses legal, was in truth to render it imperative; for every voter would think himself treated with contempt if he was not conveyed to the poll. It could not be said that a borough voter would be disfranchised if this clause was not agreed to, for he could walk to the poll; and in the case of counties it would favour the rich candidate at the expense of the poor one. He regretted that the proposition embodied in the clause had come from his own side of the House. He believed that its author had done more to render corruption effective than any other man who had ever attempted to legislate on the subject.

Question proposed, "That Clause 1 stand part of the Bill."

MR. BRADY opposed the clause, and commented strongly upon the unusual silence of the author of the clause in its present shape (Mr. Ayrton) throughout the debate. He could only ascribe that unusual circumstance to the consciousness that he had done wrong.

MR. VERNON SMITH said, he would again suggest that this should be a mere continuance Bill. If the Home Secretary had originally assented to this, he might have saved himself great inconvenience, and he must have observed that there was a diminishing majority on each occasion. This Bill seemed to involve two things—that they believed that the voters of this country disregarded their right of voting, and the other, that none but a rich man should become a candidate.

MR. WALPOLE said, that this Act of Parliament having always been a temporary Act, he thought that the time had come for a permanent measure. He intended to redeem his pledge to introduce such a measure in the next Session of Parliament. This measure had been discussed at three morning sittings, and on every occasion when this clause had been discussed it had been supported by considerable majorities. That was a sufficient justification for the course which he had taken in introducing a clause to settle the law on the subject. This clause was not introduced to purify elections. He believed that the Act would have that tendency, but the purpose of this clause was to settle the law. If the clause was struck out, gentlemen would just as before pay the expense of providing conveyances for bringing voters to the poll. And if there was no corrupting influence on the mind of the voter, a candidate, who provided conveyances for bringing him to the poll, was simply enabling him in a fair manner to exercise his constitutional privileges. If, this clause was not passed, neither the candidates nor the Committees up stairs would know what was the state of the law on this subject. Was that a state of things which should be allowed to continue? They might, it is true, forbid the payment of travelling expenses altogether, but he did not believe that public opinion would go along with them in such an enactment.

General THOMPSON said, he wished to know, if hon. candidates paid for bringing voters to the poll, and the said voters voted against them, did the Bill provide proper means of recovering the cab-hire. All flesh was not the same flesh; and so of bribery—there were different kinds. The provision for the conveyance of electors was gross bribery, neither more nor less.

Mr. WARREN said, he thought the clause should be allowed to stand.

Mr. T. DUNCOMBE said, that the object of the Bill was merely to legalize bribery and thus give the Conservatives the advantage of bribery as they had never done before at the general election, which was expected to take place next year. He complained of the introduction of new matter in what had been declared to be a mere continuance Bill. A society had been established called the Conservative Land Society, by which more votes had been manufactured than by the whole Liberal party. The members of that society might have votes in five or six counties, and under the Bill as it stood they might be carried about in any manner they most preferred.

Mr. Walpole

And it being ten minutes before four of the clock, Mr. Speaker adjourned the debate till this day.

THE COMMISSIONER OF THE MANCHESTER COURT OF BANKRUPTCY.

PETITIONS.

Mr. TURNER said, he rose to present two petitions, one from certain legal practitioners of Manchester, the other from the Manchester Chamber of Commerce, complaining of certain irregular practices on the part of Mr. Jemmett, the Commissioner of the Manchester Court of Bankruptcy, tending to prejudice the true administration of justice in that court. At the same time he wished to give notice of a Motion for printing the petition.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that in his opinion these petitions ought not to have been communicated to the House without some notice; that would have enabled justice to be done to the gentleman whose name was mentioned. He (the Attorney General) should not at present trespass on the House further than to observe that he had received a communication from Mr. Jemmett, who expressed his anxiety to come forward and meet the charges against him; and if the hon. Member (Mr. Turner) took another opportunity during the present Session of bringing the case under the consideration of the House Mr. Jemmett was anxious to come before the House, and court the fullest and most scrutinizing investigation.

REINFORCEMENTS FOR INDIA.

QUESTION.

Mr. W. EWART said, he would beg to ask the President of the Board of Control what reinforcements are going, or preparing to be sent out, to India?

Lord STANLEY said, he had no doubt the House would be glad to learn that between last January and the present time nearly 17,000 troops had been despatched from this country to India. With regard to the future it would probably be enough for him to state that Her Majesty's Government were well aware of the great importance of striking a decisive, and if possible, a final blow in the course of the approaching cold season, and that they were prepared to take measures with that object.

THE OYSTER FISHERIES.

QUESTION.

Sir GEORGE PECHELL said, he would beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade what progress has been made in the inquiry he has instituted respecting the complaints made by the parties interested in the Deep Sea Oyster Fisheries of the operation of the Act 18 & 19 Vict., which imposed very injurious restrictions on their Trade, and which they consider were not contemplated by the Convention with the Government of France of August, 1839?

MR. HENLEY said, the inquiry to which the hon. and gallant Admiral referred was instituted before he had the honour of holding the office which he now possessed. He might state that that inquiry was still going on, and he could assure his hon. and gallant Friend the Government had not lost sight of the question.

On the Motion that the House at its rising should adjourn to Monday,

THE SLAVE TRADE.—RIGHT OF SEARCH.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, he rose, pursuant to notice, to call the attention of the House to the present position of the question of the right of visiting ships suspected of Slave Trading, and to ask what course the Government has taken upon that subject.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I must venture to ask the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. C. Fortescue) whether he really considers the question that he is now going to introduce is one that may fairly be brought forward on the Motion for adjournment. I know that by a severe exercise of his privilege the hon. Member may do so; but really to discuss such a question under ordinary circumstances would require a whole evening. Now, this objection to the Motion of the hon. Gentleman is irrespective of that general consideration which the language of the notice gives rise to. The language of that notice is—

> "To call the attention of the House to the present position of the question of the right of visiting ships suspected of slave trading, and to ask what course the Government has taken upon that subject."

Now, Sir, the hon. Gentleman must be aware that at this moment communications are going on between the Government of England and that of the United States, which certainly would not be assisted by any discussion in this House. But my appeal to the hon. Gentleman is based on the broad ground that the question is one of such magnitude and interest that it would be hardly fair to enter upon it on the Motion for adjournment? I am sure that the hon. Gentleman's motive in his setting down his Motion as one to be moved on the adjournment was an impartial one; for I find that an hon. Friend of mine (Sir J. Elphinstone) has proposed, under the same machinery, to call the attention of the House to the Resolution of "the East India (transport of troops) Committee." This, too, is a question of such magnitude this it is impossible it can be fairly discussed without taking a very considerable period of time. Each of these subjects would afford materials for a night's debate; and both are questions which ought not to be introduced unless they are fairly discussed. I therefore put it to both hon. Gentlemen whether they do not think it will be rather an abuse of a privilege, the legitimate use of which I have always advocated, if they bring forward, on the Motion for the adjournment of the House, topics of this nature.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, that in putting this Motion on the paper he was not aware that he was taking any unreasonable course. He thought it was quite reasonable before they broke up for the Session, that the Government should be asked to state their intentions on this important subject. The intentions of the Government had not been announced to the House in that clear and satisfactory manner which might have been expected, and he thought it very natural that some Member of the House should make inquiries on that subject. He had intended, in introducing the question, to make but a very short statement, showing the present position of the question as left to the present Government by their predecessors, a point in connection with the subject which he thought had not met with the attention it deserved. The Government appeared to have ignored the acts of their predecessors, and he wanted them to tell the House whether they departed from or adhered to the policy of the late Administration. The Minister of the United States stated at a recent meeting in this country, that our policy had been changed, and that some great concessions had been made on points for which every Government of this country had hitherto contended, and against which the country he represented had as long struggled. He thought it a perfectly legitimate question to ask whether that statement was true? The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs explained on a previous evening that negotiations were in progress for bringing about a convention with the United States for regulating not the right of searching each other's ships, but for conferring the right of mutually verifying the use of the national flag. That was all very well; but the language used by the Government on the occurrence of those unfortunate events in the Cuban waters was such as appeared to him to concede everything for which this country and the predecessors of the present Government had always contended. What he wished to ask was, whether they intended to adhere to the policy of the Earl of Aberdeen, or to sanction the principle that by hoisting a foreign flag, no matter of what nation, it should be in the power of any vessel to stop all further proceedings on the part of our cruisers, and render such vessel sacred and inviolable, whatever might be her character? Because, if so, we had better withdraw our squadron from the waters of Africa and of Cuba. For his own part, he protested against thus imperilling the position of England as the first maritime Power of the world.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD: Sir, I am sure the House will not expect me to enter into any lengthened statement in reply to the observations of the hon. Gentleman. I think that in reference to this question there has been a general feeling in the House and in the country that we could not be too cautious. Certainly the circumstances which have taken place within a short time in the Cuban waters are not such as, in my opinion, to make it desirable that we should on this occasion enter on any discussion. Sir, I stated on a former occasion we had the assurance of the United States Government that they would consider not only with care, but with a desire to do justice to the question, any proposition that we had to make to the United States. Our propositions have not been made. They are still under the consideration of the Government; and it is impossible, therefore, for me to give the House any further information on the subject. I think the hon. Gentleman can scarcely be serious when he asks the Government to state what our policy will be in the event of such communication as is not yet made being unfavourably received by the United States Government. I certainly have every hope that this matter will be brought to a satisfactory termination; and the language of the United States Government and of the United States Minister in this country is such as to perfectly confirm Her Majesty's Government in that anticipation.

AGGRAVATED ASSAULTS.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. DILLWYN said, he rose to call the attention of the Secretary of State for the Home Department to the prevalence of aggravated assaults upon women and children, and to urge upon his consideration the necessity of making some alteration in the law relating to such offences. The recent Assaults' Act had done much good, but he could not think it had altogether worked well. By imprisoning the offender, it too often deprived the wife of her means of support and obliged her to go to the workhouse, so that the victim was punished as much as the brutal assailant. In 1856 and 1857 he submitted proposals for inflicting shorter terms of imprisonment and corporal punishment. On those occasions he was met by the objections that the new Act had not yet had a fair trial, and that corporal punishment was not the proper mode of dealing with this or with any other offence. His own belief was, that corporal punishment would very materially check these assaults; but he was not now advocating his own nostrum. All he wished to impress on the Home Secretary was, that the law in its present state did not operate so satisfactorily as could be wished. In 1854 and 1855 there were in this metropolis alone 878 of these crimes, or 439 per year; In 1856 the number was 377; and last year it was 421. From these figures, it appeared that assaults of this kind were on the increase, and that there was an average of more than one a day of those offences. He believed it to be a libel on the English character to say that the minimum could not be brought below that. He earnestly hoped that during the recess the Home Secretary would give his attention to this subject, and would, if he found that these unmanly assaults were not reduced, bring forward next Session a measure to check a crime the frequency and atrocity of which were a disgrace to the country.

LUNACY COMMISSION (IRELAND).

QUESTION.

MR. J. D. FITZGERALD said, that he understood that the Commissioners to inquire into the subject of Lunacy in Ireland had made their Report, but that one of the Commissioners dissented from the others, and had given his reasons in a Report of his own. He wished to ask the Home Secretary if that Report would be laid on the table?

MR. WALPOLE said, that with reference to the question of the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. J. D. FitzGerald), he really wished that when Commissions were issued the Commissioners would agree upon their Report. It was not fair to the majority who concurred in a Report that an individual Commissioner should afterwards send in a separate Report which his colleagues, perhaps, had no opportunity of seeing. He had received the Report of Dr. Corrigan, and the question it involved was so important, that he would undertake to lay it on the table of the House. With reference to the subject commented on by the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn), he agreed with him that the subject to which he had alluded was one requiring the strictest attention of the Home Secretary. The statement made by the hon. Gentleman was quite correct. The aggravated assaults of which he had made mention were less numerous this year than they were in 1854 and 1855, but somewhat more numerous than they were in 1857; but it was desirable to analyse these offences before drawing any general conclusion. A great many of them were assaults not upon women, but upon children, and an immense number of them were assaults by women, and not by men. Another circumstance to be borne in mind was, that in many districts, even in the last year for which he had returns, there was a great diminution of these offences, while in others there was an increase. As far as he had been able to form an opinion from the information with which he had been furnished, he had reason to think that the present Act, which he believed was introduced by the noble Viscount opposite (Viscount Palmerston), had worked well, and if it required any addition, he would be prepared, after inquiry, to state in what respect he thought it should be amended. In the meantime, however, his attention would be strictly turned to the subject, but he owned that he should not like, unless constrained to do so by the strongest reasons, to have recourse to corporal punishment.

REINFORCEMENTS FOR INDIA.

OBSERVATIONS.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, that after what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he did not think it would be possible to go into the question which he (Sir J. Elphinstone) had given notice of his intention to bring before the House, for undoubtedly that question was a long one. The order of reference to the Committee on the transport of troops to the East Indies was divided into two portions. The first was, as to the conduct of the Government in sending out troops. The second, as to the most advantageous route by which troops could be sent. From the beginning he had considered the latter the more important question. He trusted that the matter would be fully discussed and finally decided next year; but in the meantime it was necessary for him to put himself and the other Members of the Committee right before the country, by stating that they were distinctly of opinion that it was the duty of the Government to, in the meantime, lose no means in their power to perfect the overland route to India as a means of transporting our troops. He was quite sure, from the information he had received, that they could be conveyed cheaper by that route than round the Cape; and on a fitting occasion he, and those who thought with him, would be ready to prove that the fact was so.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, he should be glad if the hon. Baronet obtained another opportunity of bringing on this question, when the whole of the evidence was before the House. He was one of the Members of the Committee whose conduct had been animadverted on by the hon. and gallant Member for Westminster (Sir De Lacy Evans) for rejecting his Report. He was content then, as he was now, that the House should on a future occasion, when they had had an opportunity of reading the evidence, judge itself of the weight and importance of the circumstances connected with this question.

THE STATE OF INDIA.

MR. VERNON SMITH said, he wished to take this opportunity of putting a question to the noble Lord the President of the Board of Control respecting the condition of affairs in India. It had been the custom of late years at the close of the Session, for the Minister for India to make a general statement to the House relative to the affairs of India. He was not, however, about to express any wish that the noble Lord should bring forward an Indian budget, as the noble Lord could make the same excuse as he (Mr. V. Smith) had made last year, namely, that the finances of India were in such a state of confusion that it was impossible to make any accurate statement with regard to them. But though nominally a budget, that statement was accustomed to contain a review of the affairs of India. The House was about to separate for five months; they were giving great powers to the Government with regard to India, and it was advisable that the noble Lord should make a general statement with regard to the exact position in which we were placed. The noble Lord had stated, in answer to the hon. Member for Dumfries, that 17,000 additional troops had been sent out to India. He (Mr. V. Smith) had asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer last night, but had not received an answer, whether the troops were really to be regarded as an addition to the ordinary establishment of Queen's troops already stationed there, or were to be looked upon merely in the light of reliefs. Judging from the number of men who were being sent out, he should be inclined to believe that the Government had the former object in view; but then it would appear from the newspapers, which constituted the only source of information open to him, that, owing to disease, and other causes, the diminution in the number of our soldiers in India had been so great that it was necessary to send out very considerable reinforcements. It was, he thought, desirable under these circumstances, that the House should have some information as to the end which the Government proposed to themselves in sending out the troops to which he had referred. The noble Lord, in answer to a question put by him (Mr. V. Smith), when he asked if he would lay the papers relating to the Military Commission on the India army on the table, said he would take an opportunity of making a statement on the subject. He saw that the noble Lord had omitted the civil part of the Commission; the reason for that, and the objects of the military Commission, ought to be stated. Moreover, under existing circumstances, something ought to be told them with regard to the probable financial resources of India. A Bill had passed last year to enable the East India Company to borrow £8,000,000, which was to last them till next December. Perhaps, as the loan in India had been taken up better than was expected, it ought to be stated how much the East India Company had borrowed, and whether what they had would last them to December, or whether it would be necessary to call Parliament together in the winter, in order to give them new powers. There was a third point on which he wished information, and that was, whether it was intended as soon as the Act providing for the future government of India had been passed into a law, to issue a general proclamation announcing the assumption of the authority of the Queen in India? Every one seemed to think that this would have a great effect, and would be likely to put an end to the mutinies, but such a step must be taken with caution. There was also another and a delicate point, and that was whether a Proclamation should be issued, having reference to the condition of the Natives of India, and giving an assurance that their religions and customs would be duly respected. He made these observations with no wish to embarrass the Government or the public service. He had the greatest confidence in the noble Lord, and believed that he would act with judgment and vigour, but it was well that Parliament should be acquainted with the present condition of India, what was to be done to put down the mutiny, and what course the Government proposed to pursue in the six ensuing months.

Lord STANLEY: I have to thank the right hon. Gentleman for the courteous manner in which he has put the series of questions he has just addressed to me. At the same time, I must observe that of no one of these questions had he given me notice, except that which relates to his intention to ask me whether I intended to make any statement as to the financial affairs of India in the course of the present year. Upon that point I can answer him distinctly. Looking at the present state of affairs in India, the varying character of the circumstances occurring there, and to the fact that any statement which I might make now would not represent the actual state of Indian finance, I do not think that it would be of any public advantage to enter into a detailed statement with regard to Indian finance at the present moment. As to the military operations which are passing there, the right hon. Gentleman, as well as every other hon. Member, has the means of acquiring all the information he can desire upon that subject. With respect to the question whether any proclamation is to be made of Her Majesty's authority in India, I think it will be right, when the transfer of the government from the Company to the Crown has taken place, that some formal announcement of that transfer should be made to the people of India. In what form it should be made, or what should be the nature of the announcement, is a matter which the Government will require some time to consider; and they will have that time, because I may remind the House that the Act does not come into force until thirty days after its passing into a law. I have said that I do not intend to make any general statement to the House with regard to India; but, if upon any specific point information is asked by hon. Members, I shall be glad to furnish it so far as it may be consistent with the requirements of the public service.

SIR DE LACY EVANS was understood to express his regret that the Committee on the transport of troops to India had not had an opportunity of stating their opinions, and to say that he had therefore no alternative but to postpone the discussion of the question to next Session. In reference to the force of 17,000 men to which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Northampton had alluded as being about to be sent out to India, that it was extremely desirable the House should know whether that force was composed of really efficient men or of mere raw recruits. He also concurred with the right hon. Gentleman in thinking that it was most expedient the House should be furnished with some information with respect to the objects and constitution of the Commission which had been appointed to inquire into the organization of the Indian army. He saw no good reason for excluding civilians from it. The last news from India showed how great were the exertions that we had still to make. The victory obtained by Sir H. Rose was not gained without a corresponding loss, and the hot weather must materially affect our forces. Oude was still unconquered, and the British could not say a foot of ground belonged to them in that province except what was occupied by our forces. He had a letter from a gentleman who was fully competent to speak upon the subject, in which it was stated :—

"You will understand that, although the great events of the war are at an end, the difficulties of it are by no means so. We are committed to a very long contest, of which I suspect we have as yet seen only the beginning. I trust I may be in error. The insurgents are very easily dispersed; but then, on the other hand, they gather together as easily. I am very desirous to see Government step forward and lend a hand to us by judicious proclamations of amnesty. There has been too much blood already, and by denying mercy altogether, as we now do, to the vast mutinous masses, we perpetuate the civil war, and by our own act retain a large army for the insurgent nobles of the various provinces. Until an effort is made to detach these two interests from one another the struggle will grow in intensity. As soon as we succeed in dissolving the alliance it will die out, but not till then. This might have been done some time ago; now it would not be so easy. At any rate, in considering the subject, we must always look at the Sepoy mutiny as one side of a great national insurrection, and I think, for freedom."

Now, if those opinions were sound, as he believed them to be, it was clearly the duty of the Government to adopt the shortest route for the despatch of troops to India. Troops could be sent from Plymouth to Bombay in thirty-five days, and to Calcutta in forty-five days, and he hoped during the recess the Government would give their earnest attention to that means of expediting the reinforcement of our army in India.

STAMPED LETTER PAPER.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. MAGUIRE said, he had intended to make some observations at length in calling attention to the advantage and convenience of the use of stamped letter paper and the necessity for its speedy issue by the Board of Inland Revenue; but he thought he should satisfy his object by asking the Secretary to the Treasury to explain how the matter stood. He did not wish for a compulsory use of stamped letter paper, but it was of importance in commercial transactions that instead of using a sheet of paper enclosed in an envelope, which might be lost, that letters should be written on stamped sheets of paper. An envelope was no proof that it contained a particular letter, and frauds were often committed by the substitution of envelopes; in proof of which he could refer to cases which had come before the Judges of Assize and the Bankruptcy Court in Ireland. He thought it would be a great advantage if stamped letter paper could be used.

MR. G. A. HAMILTON said, that arrangements were made for putting stamps on sheets of paper by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, who stamped all sheets of paper that were sent to them. The demand was not great, but they were always ready to stamp the paper sent to them.

PROMOTION IN THE ARMY.
QUESTION.

COLONEL KNOX said, he wished to ask the Secretary for War when the Report of the Royal Commission on Promotion in the Army would be laid on the table?

GENERAL PEEL said, that on the same day that he received the Report of the Commissioners appointed to inquire into the subject of promotion in the army, he forwarded it to Her Majesty for her approval, and as soon as it was returned to him he would, with Her Majesty's permission, lay it on the table of the House.

THE WELLINGTON TESTIMONIAL.
QUESTION.

MR. STUART WORTLEY said, he wished to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he would be willing to give him time on Monday next for the discussion upon the Wellington testimonial.

INDIA AND AMERICA.—OBSERVATIONS.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, before the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer answers the questions which have been put to him, I should wish, in the first place, to say a few words as to what fell from my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Westminster (Sir De Lacy Evans) concerning the transport of troops to the East Indies. In my opinion, if you send anything more than small bodies of men to India, I think it is far better to send them by sea than on the overland route across Egypt. It is not a matter of sound policy that this country should make her military communication with India dependent upon a passage through a territory belonging to another Power. I think it is far better to keep the means of communication in your own hands so as to be able to send troops when you like, and as you like. It has been stated by the noble Lord that a Commission has been appointed to consider the best method of reorganizing the Native army of India. That course I do not presume to criticise. I do not condemn the reasons which have led the Government to appoint such Commission in England; but certainly the late Government thought that that inquiry could be best and most usefully conducted in India by military men who had recent experience of the value on the one hand, and on the other of the dangers of the peculiar component parts, of the local Native forces. It may be that the continuation of hostilities in India has led to the dispersion of military men whose judgment would be of importance in such an inquiry—men whom it would be difficult to assemble at present, or even at an early period; but this, at all events, must be clear to the House, that if the Commission consist of men in this country,—not even the future members of the new Indian Council—can be equally competent to give a sound opinion as to the best method of composing and reorganizing the Indian local army as those persons who have mixed in recent transactions in that country—who know the tendencies of the army, the difference of races, the influence of castes, and in what manner, with the greatest safety to the public interests, such an army can be composed. The noble Lord said that he did not intend to make any general statement this Session upon Indian affairs, but that he was willing to answer any questions on particular points. The noble Lord forgot to answer one or two points to which my right hon. Friend (Mr. Vernon Smith) directed his attention. My right hon. Friend asked him, especially with regard to the Indian loan, whether the amount which has been authorized by Parliament will be sufficient for the service of the Indian Government until the beginning of next year? I think when the noble Lord looks back to see what were the questions put to him by my right hon. Friend he will think that, without entering into any general statement of Indian affairs, he might be able to give an answer to some of those questions on Monday next. I must say the statements which have been made by the hon. Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, in regard to the question put to him by my hon. Friend the Member for Louth (Mr. C. Fortescue), were to me anything but satisfactory. I think my hon. Friend the Member for Louth was perfectly justified, in the present state of things, in not allowing the Session to close without asking some definite information from the Government upon the point to which he directed the attention of the House. I wish the House to remember a little the state of this matter. Unfortunately there have been differences between this Government and the Government of the United States in regard to transactions in the waters of Cuba. The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs told us two months ago that certain concessions had been made to the British Government. The public has since then been informed by the Minister of the United States, who stated with great parade, and in a manner which his assembled fellow countrymen received with shouts of triumph, that great concessions had been made by this Government to the Government of the United States—that this Government had abandoned some rights, or pretended rights, for which preceding Governments of England had always contended. Of course I am quite ready to admit—and no man has more urgently asserted the doctrine than I have—that it is inexpedient to make inquiries pending negotiations; and therefore my hon. Friend the Member for Louth was right in saying that he did not propose to ask what was the nature of the convention which we propose to the United States. I thought with him, from what fell from the hon. Under Secretary on a former occasion, that some proposal had been made to the United States. It appears now that none has yet been made, though it is a matter of great public interest and some urgent importance, and I quite agree with my hon. Friend that he was quite right in not asking the Government to state in any degree what was the nature of the proposal that was made. But although this House properly abstains from making inquiries with regard to pending negotiations, I think it is right that it should be informed as to completed facts; and if I am to judge by the statement reported to have been made by the Minister of the United States, there is some completed transaction between the two Governments in regard to our maritime rights, real or pretended. Now, what I wish the right hon. Gentleman to state is simply this—Is it that we have given up a pretension which we never made—that we have disclaimed a right which the Americans thought we pretended to, but which former Governments of this country never asserted? Is that the nature of the transaction which has taken place, or is it that we have abandoned a right which former Governments have claimed and insisted upon? In the one case, I ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer to state, if we have given up any pretension to the American Government, what that pretension is? On the other hand, if a right which we formerly claimed and insisted on has been abandoned, I wish to know what that right is which has been so conceded? I think that is a perfectly fair question. It has no reference to anything at present in a state of negotiation, for the statement of the American Minister was that the matter was complete. As no doubt, according to their system of government, every person in the United States is by this time made aware of what the transaction is, I think this House and the people of this country naturally interested in our maritime prosperity have a right to be put on an equal footing with the people of the United States. I therefore hope the right hon. Gentleman will explain what the pretension or the right we have abandoned is.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER:—Sir, it is not for me to inform the House what may have been the pretensions advanced by the late Government. All I can say is, that when this misunderstanding—I cannot call it an interruption of friendly relations—took place in consequence of what had occurred in the waters of Cuba, several controverted points were brought into discussion between the two Governments. We consulted the law officers of the Crown, and upon their opinion of the legality or illegality of our conduct we acted. The communications which took place between the two Governments in consequence were of a friendly nature; but the result was that all claims were left in abeyance. Nothing has been decided upon beyond that settlement which may be described as in a state of abeyance, during which the Government of the United States, having made to us a friendly overture that we should offer to them a plan for their consideration which should accomplish the object that both Governments have in view—namely, to put down as much as they possibly can, the Slave Trade, without producing those misunderstandings which have occurred, we accepted the offer, and we have under our consideration a plan which we think will be satisfactory to both countries. That plan will be shortly submitted to the Government of the United States, and we have sanguine expectations that it will meet the wishes and necessities of both parties, prevent in future the repetition of misunderstandings between the two countries, and at the same time obtain that which the Government of this country sincerely desire, and which we believe the Government of the United States also desire—namely, the discouragement of the Slave Trade. In reply to the right hon. Member for Bute (Mr. Stuart Wortley), he did not think it likely that the discussion on the Wellington monument would take place on Monday, but thought it might come on on Tuesday or Wednesday.

MR. G. A. HAMILTON said, since the Motion for the adjournment of the House at its rising until Monday had been made he had found it necessary that the House should meet to-morrow (this day), for the purpose of advancing certain Bills a stage; and he begged, therefore, to withdraw the Motion for the adjournment until Monday.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

CIVIL BILLS (IRELAND) ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

MR. J. D. FITZGERALD said, that, regarding the measure as an infringement upon a constitutional principle, the independence of the Judges, who, if it passed into a law, would be removeable in case of infirmity, by order of the Privy Council, he should meet the Motion with a direct negative, and ask the House to divide on the question.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Bill be now read the Third Time."

The House divided:—Ayes 83; Noes 54: Majority 29.

Bill read 3°, and passed.

METROPOLIS LOCAL MANAGEMENT ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

CONSIDERATION.

Order for Consideration read.

LORD JOHN MANNERS brought up the two following clauses:—

"No works upon the bed or shores of the said River Thames below high-water mark shall at any time be commenced or executed, under the provisions of this Act, without the same having been previously approved of by the Lord High Admiral, or the Commissioners for executing the office of Lord High Admiral; such approval to be from time to time specified in writing under the hand of the Secretary to the Admiralty."

Clause brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the said Clause be now read a second time."

MR. AYRTON said, he objected to the first of these clauses, on the ground that as all the works would be done below high-water mark, it would follow that nothing would be done without the consent of the Admiralty. He would suggest an Amendment, giving them power to interfere only with those works which interfered with the navigation of the river.

Amendment proposed, after the words "high-water mark," to insert the words "which shall interfere with the navigation of the river."

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he thought the suggestion of the hon. Member a very proper one.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, read a second time, and added to the Bill.

LORD JOHN MANNERS moved the following clause:—

"That it may be lawful for the Secretary of State for the Home Department, at his discretion, on representation or complaint made to him of any nuisance committed in execution of any works, or in deodorizing any sewage, or in disposing of any sewage or refuse from sewers, or in any other manner under this Act, to cause inquiry to be made into the matter represented or complained of to him, and to direct such prosecution or prosecutions, or to take such other proceedings as he may think fit, in order to ensure the prevention or abatement of such nuisance as aforesaid."

Clause agreed to, and added to the Bill.

MR. STUART WORTLEY said, he rose to propose a clause, the effect of which was that in case the metropolis should afterwards be divided into municipal districts, with one central Board representing them all, nothing in this Act should preclude these works from being handed over to such central municipal body. He made this proposition because he was not satisfied with the composition of the present Metropolitan Board, and he thought it was desirable, by some such clause as this, to protest against its being supposed that their powers were to be continued to them for ever.

Clause,

"That in the event of the whole Metropolis being at any time hereafter brought under the government of one or more municipal bodies, and any new Metropolitan Board of Works being hereafter created, composed in whole or in part of members deputed from the council or councils of such municipal body or bodies, nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent the transfer of the powers granted by this Act to such new Board," brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That the said Clause be now read a second time."

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he could not agree to the clause. The object of the Bill was, by showing confidence in the Metropolitan Board, to fix upon them responsibility. But the clause went far to destroy all confidence in them by contemplating their untimely death. He hoped, therefore, his right hon. and learned Friend would not press the clause.

SIR BENJAMIN HALL said, he also hoped the right hon. and learned Gentleman would not press the clause, for which there was no necessity, as if any such change as he contemplated were made, there would be nothing then to prevent the transfer. But he was very glad the right hon. Gentleman had made the proposition, as it showed what was going on in his mind, and that when the Bill for the reform of the Corporation came before them, the right hon. Gentleman would be prepared to hold that the tolls and metage dues, and other funds belonging to the Corporation, and which were given to the Corporation at a time when the City was the metropolis, should no longer be confined to one small locality, but should be applied in executing works that benefited the whole metropolis.

MR. GILPIN said, he was glad that the Government did not assent to the clause, which he hoped would not be pressed. He hoped Parliament would at least reserve the power of knowing what sort of Board was likely to be appointed.

MR. STUART WORTLEY said, he would not give the Committee the trouble of dividing, his object being to elicit the opinion of the House that there was nothing in the Bill to prevent such a transfer as he contemplated taking place.

Motion and Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. PULLER said, he wished to propose an addition to the first clause, providing that the sewage should not be discharged into the river at such an outlet as would allow it to be brought back within the metropolitan limit by the action of the tide. His object was not to fetter the Metropolitan Board as to the means by which they were to accomplish their object, but to explain clearly to them what was the object which the House of Commons expected them to undertake. In the Report of the Committee of the House upon the subject it was stated that no plan ought to be regarded for the sewage of the metropolis which did not provide for one of two things—either that it should be taken down the river so far from the metropolis that it could not be brought back by the action of the tide; or else that it should be deodorized, and only the purified liquid part of it discharged into the river. By the clause as it stood at present there was nothing to prevent the Board passing the sewage, undeodorized, immediately below the boundary of the metropolis. Besides, it was the more important to prevent the sewage being brought back by tidal action, because it had been found that the removal of such a quantity of water out of the river for household purposes caused the tide to flow much higher up the river than it formerly used to do, and this was also the probable cause why the nuisance of the smell was always greater at high than at low water, contrary to what might be expected.

Amendment proposed,—

In page 1, line 17, to add at the end of Clause 1 the words, "or from being brought within the boundaries of the Metropolis by the action of the tide."

SIR FREDERICK SMITH said, he hoped the noble Lord would not agree to the Amendment, but would give the Board credit for some little common sense. It was not to be supposed that any body of gentlemen would lay out £3,000,000 of money to remove the sewage out of London, and then allow it to be brought back again. Such a clause would only stultify the Board of Works.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, it would not only stultify the Board of Works, but the House of Commons as well, for the House would see that this was only a roundabout way of coming back to the point they had agreed to abandon that of fixing the points of outfall. He hoped the hon. Gentleman would not press his Amendment; if he did he must divide against it.

GENERAL CODRINGTON said, he could not see that this was a question of trusting to the common sense of the Board at all; if they were to do that they might as well give up making Acts of Parliament altogether. Under the Bill as it at present stood there was nothing to prevent the discharge of the sewage at Blackwall or opposite Woolwich at any stage of the tide, and might from thence be carried back into the centre of the town. He could not see the objection to the Amendment. It fixed no points of outfall; it only declared that it should not be discharged at such a point where it would be brought back again within the metropolitan limits by the action of the tide; and surely it was necessary at least to make that point clear in the Bill.

MR. GILPIN said, he believed that the Metropolitan Board of Works were as sensible as this House was that it would not be right to bring back the sewage within the metropolitan boundaries; and he hoped, therefore, that the whole work would be left in the hands of men who, he believed, were sincerely anxious, and quite competent, to discharge their duties.

MR. D. GRIFFITH said, the proposed clause raised again the question which they disposed of two days ago, when they determined not to interfere with the plans of the Board.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, the objection to the Amendment would be good if the Bill was intended to leave the Board of Works to discharge the sewage where they pleased. But that was not the Bill, which declared that the outfall should not be within the limits of the metropolis, unless the sewage was deodorized. [Several hon. MEMBERS: That clause is withdrawn]. Withdrawn is it? Then I must say this Amendment is all the more necessary. He understood the whole meaning and scope of the Bill to be that the metropolis should not be annoyed with the sewage floating about within its limits. Now, to secure that they ought, without prescribing any plan, to say that the outfall ought not to be at any point where the sewage would be brought back to the metropolis.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, it was unfortunate the noble Lord had been absent from their discussions yesterday morning, as he would have known that the second clause was omitted, as well as the reasons why it was omitted. It was originally inserted with a view to conciliate the opponents of the measure, but the Government were from the first aware that it was opposed to the principle of the Bill, which was that the Board of Works should be left absolutely unfettered as to the measures on which they might decide. After a good deal of discussion yesterday the Committee unanimously agreed to omit the clause, and it appeared to him that the Amendment of the hon. Member for Hertfordshire (Mr. Puller) was only going back to the ground that all wished it was expedient to abandon, because it would to a certain degree fix upon Parliament the responsibility of the works that might be undertaken, and would lay the foundation for the Board of Works turning round upon them hereafter, if the works should prove a failure, and say, You restricted us in our plans, and therefore you must be visited wit a portion of the blame. He wished the whole of the operations to rest with the Board of Works, and he trusted that the House would not by a side wind seek to diminish that responsibility, or to bring the Government into any relations with the Board of Works except those strictly of a financial character.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE said, he thought the proposal was a very good one, but he did not consider it necessary, because he was quite sure the Board of Works would do all that was requisite to be done.

Question, "That those words be there added," put, and negatived.

MR. ALDERMAN CUBITT said, he would suggest an Amendment in Clause 13, agreed to yesterday, which would have the effect of imposing the rate in relation to this measure upon the assessments adopted in regard to the ordinary sewer rate.

Amendment proposed,—

At the end of Clause 13 to add the words, "but in the City of London the said rate shall be made upon the assessment adopted in making the Sewer Rate in the said City."

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendments made.

Bill to be read 3° To-morrow.

DRAFTS ON BANKERS LAW AMENDMENT BILL.—CONSIDERATION.

Order for Consideration read.

MR. HANKEY said, he would take that occasion to state that he had been absent when the Bill had been under consideration upon the previous evening, simply because he was under the impression that, owing to the assurance which had been given some time since by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, to the effect that no opposed business should be taken after twelve o'clock, the measure would not be proceeded with after that hour. For his own part, he regarded the Bill as anything but satisfactory. It had originally consisted of two clauses, one of which provided that the crossing upon a cheque should be held to be a material part of the cheque, if the crossing were put on at the time of issue; the second clause giving to any person receiving a cheque the right of putting on the crossing, provided it was done by the lawful holder thereof. Now, he had opposed the Bill in that shape, because he believed it to be really impossible that any banker could carry on business if he were obliged to examine every cheque, and to ascertain in the first place whether it had been crossed at all at the time of issue, or at any subsequent time, by the lawful holder. He looked upon the measure as imposing difficulties in the way of the due discharge of business which were not at all justifiable. The bankers of London—forty-three out of forty-five of whom had signed a petition against this Bill—had no wish to throw any obstacle in the way of crossing cheques, but merely to simplify the operation. Therefore, as an Amendment, moved by the hon. and learned Member for Guildford (Mr. Bovill), had relieved the bankers from much of the dilemma in which they were placed, he would offer no opposition to the passing of the Bill, though it was still far from being satisfactory.

MR. MALINS said, he wished to draw the attention of the House to a suggestion which had been made by a gentleman named Chorley, a solicitor, who proposed that at the end of the cheque next the counterfoil there should be printed the words "uncrossed cheque," and that it should be enacted that no cheque without these words should be paid, except through a banker. Any person, whether drawer or holder, desiring it to be treated as a crossed cheque, would simply have to tear off those words. That suggestion had been most favourably received by many bankers, and appeared likely to meet all the difficulties attaching to this subject.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he regretted the misapprehension which had arisen should have led to the absence of any hon. Members on the occasion of the second reading, but he had suggested that any Amendment which might be proposed in the Bill should be made on the third reading. He would take the opportunity of saying a few words on the object of the Bill. It was well known by every man who had a banker that for nearly a quarter of a century a custom had prevailed in London of crossing cheques, with a view to prevent any loss from the cheque being lost or stolen. It was thought that the crossing of the cheque afforded a protection, but it turned out some few years ago that this pratice was unavailable, for a cheque which had been crossed with the name of a banker, and the name of another banker substituted being presented at Coutts and Co's, the question arose and was tried at law, and it was decided that the crossing of the cheque was not a binding part of the instrument, and that it was lawful for a banker, whether the cheque was crossed or not, to pay it across the counter. Of course the whole benefit of the system was then lost. Under these circumstances a Bill was brought in by Mr. Apsley Pellatt to legalize the system, and to provide that no crossed cheque should be paid except through the banker to whom it was crossed. But some little time after that Bill had been passed a cheque, the crossing of which had been obliterated by chemical means, was presented and paid. An action was brought, and the question arose whether the banker was liable, and it was found that the Bill was not entirely effectual. Under these circumstances he had brought forward this Bill at the request of a great many mercantile men of the City of London, and when the hon. Member (Mr. Hankey) said that forty-three bankers had petitioned against the Bill, he was bound to say that he (the Attorney General) had presented a petition signed by 1,300 persons in favour of it. This Bill made the crossing a cheque a material part of the cheque itself, and made it forgery to obliterate the crossing, and hereafter it would be compulsory when a cheque was crossed with the name of a banker to pay the cheque to the banker with whose name it was crossed and to no other person. The only point was as to whether they could provide for the case of paying a cheque the crossing of which had been forged or obliterated. That was a case which did not happen once in fifty years, and therefore did not seem to require legislation; but the House had thought fit to admit a clause, on the Motion of the hon. and learned Member for Guildford, (Mr. Bovill) providing that if the obliteration was such that the banker could not reasonably be expected to detect it he should not be liable. The object of the hon. Member therefore had been obtained.

MR. ROEBUCK said, he regretted that the Amendment had been agreed to. He would have preferred that it should have been made imperative upon bankers to print their cheques upon paper on which no obliteration could be effected without being detected. There was such paper.

MR. INGRAM suggested, that obliteration would be impossible if cheques were printed upon paper bearing a water-mark.

MR. PULLER remarked, that cheques were often drawn upon pieces of plain paper, backs of letters, &c.

Bill to be read 3° To-morrow.

PROBATE AND LETTERS OF ADMINISTRATION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said, that it was hardly to be expected that in an Act like the Probate Act, which introduced an entirely new process, there should not be some defects. The object of the present measure was to amend those defects, and the alterations were principally of a mere technical character. Thus, there was a provision that the Judge of the Admiralty might sit in relief of the Judge of the Probate Court, and vice versa, but the Judge might sit in chambers; and clerks who had served their time to proctors might become attorneys, and the like. He proposed to go into Committee on the Bill the next day; but if there were any clauses which excited difference of opinion, he would postpone them till the next Session.

MR. MALINS said, as it was now determined to proceed with the measure, he hoped that the Bill would be considered in Committee on Monday.

LORD HOTHAM said, he had an objection to the 24th Clause, as he thought it would have an injurious effect upon country practitioners. Did the hon. and learned Gentleman intend to insist on that clause?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he intended to propose the clause, but he would leave it wholly to the Committee.

MR. WARREN said, he would beg to remind the hon. and learned Gentleman of two Amendments of which he had given notice—namely, to throw open the non-contentious business to the Bar, and the Court of Admiralty to the legal profession generally. It was his intention to persevere with those Amendments.

MR. HADFIELD said, that in reference to the question alluded to by the hon. and learned Member for Midhurst (Mr. Warren), he would remind the House that it was in consequence of the other House having struck out a clause from the Bill of last Session that the non-contentious business was not thrown open to the Bar generally.

Bill read 2° and committed for To-morrow.

INCUMBERED ESTATES (WEST INDIES) ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

CONSIDERATION.

Order for Consideration read.

MR. HANKEY said, he had given notice of a clause to extend to the West Indies the principle contained in the Irish Act, according to which facilities were given to obtain a declaration of indefensible title; but as he understood the introduction of such a clause might cause some difficulty in passing the Bill, which he considered a very useful measure, during the present Session, he should not press the clause, but he trusted the Attorney General would consider the question during the recess.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he concurred in the spirit of his hon. Friend's Amendments, but at that late period the introduction of these Amendments might be fatal to the passing of the Bill during the present Session. The country was very much indebted to his right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland for the Landed Estates Bill, which he had introduced, and which had been passed for Ireland during the present Session. He (the Attorney General) hoped to be able, at an early period next Session, to submit a large and comprehensive measure to extend the principle of that Bill not only to the entire of the West India colonies, but to this country and other parts of the British dominions.

Bill to be read 2° To-morrow.

DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL, in moving the second reading said that he only wished to insist on those clauses which remedied certain intolerable evils in the working of the law, as for instance the necessity of bringing up witnesses from the most distant parts of the kingdom, for the simple purpose of swearing an affidavit before the Court. It was not his intention to insist on the clause which had caused so much, but unnecessary, alarm, namely, that which extended the powers of the Court to persons domiciled abroad or in the colonies.

MR. HADFIELD said, he would suggest that they should go into Committee pro formâ, and reprint the Bill as amended.

Bill read 2° and committed for To-morrow.

CORRUPT PRACTICES PREVENTION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

CONSIDERATION.—ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order for Consideration read.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned

Debate on Question [this day], "That Clause 1 stand part of the Bill."

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

MR. T. S. DUNCOMBE said, the question the House had to consider was, merely whether the Bill should be simply a continuance Bill? The right hon. Gentleman opposite said he was willing to take that view of it; and he (Mr. Duncombe) hoped that the House would likewise do so. This was an open question, and the first clause, instead of being a Government clause, was the child of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the Tower Hamlets, and he hoped the House would not dirty their hands with it. If they struck it out, they would get rid of other bad clauses, as for instance the fourth, which he considered abridged the constitutional rights of the electors. He thought the best course would be to make this a mere—what it pretended to be—a mere continuance Bill, leaving the Attorney General, who had bestowed so much attention upon the subject, to prepare a more comprehensive measure during the recess, and he would, therefore, support the Motion of the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield.

MR. LYGON said, he did not consider the first clause perfect, but thought it was a considerable improvement of the law. He denied that there was any ground for the invidious language which had been lavished on the clause. He did not think it undesirable to expect a candidate or his friends to make some sacrifice. He was quite prepared to admit that the average cost of conveying voters in counties was a considerable sum; namely, £1,600; but he did not think that by adopting this clause they would be establishing a new form of bribery. He was far from desiring to exclude poor men from that House, but unless candidates for seats in Parliament possessed the confidence of their supporters to such an extent that they were ready to provide funds for the payment of the travelling expenses of voters, he thought such Members could not possess that feeling of independence which had hitherto been the boast of the Commons of England.

MR. HEADLAM said, that although there were inconveniences on both sides, he thought it the best policy to put a stop entirely to the practice of paying the travelling expenses of voters. The clause was clearly a step in the wrong direction. It was said that by disallowing these expenses you would be practically disfranchising a large number of voters. Now, if conveyance to the poll was a part of the franchise conferred on every voter, he admitted the force of that argument; but the fact being that conveyance to the poll was not a part of the voter's vested right, he could not admit that this could in the proper sense of the term be called disfranchisement. The number of voters might, indeed, be diminished, but the same result was no doubt produced by prohibiting bribery, and would be produced by prohibiting paid canvassers, and yet no one could consider either of these measures as measures of disfranchisement. With respect to boroughs no hardship whatever would be inflicted by compelling voters to walk to the poll, and though perhaps some inconvenience might arise in counties, he thought on the whole it would be best to prohibit the payment of these travelling expenses. He was also induced to think that voters would value the franchise more if its exercise were attended with some trifling difficulty.

MR. MALINS said, he thought that this was not a case on which the House should be theorising. Let them come to practice, and they would find that out of the general body of voters, there was a large number who could not afford to pay for a conveyance to go some six, eight, or ten miles to vote. On what principle should such electors be disenfranchised? What, he might ask, were they to do in the case of a man who was sick? Would the House impose on such a person the chance of endangering his life or disenfranchisement? He contended, first of all, that it was right that they should provide a conveyance; and secondly, if it were not right, that human nature was so constituted people would still do it. Did the hon. and learned Member for Newcastle mean to say that any Gentleman would lose his election rather than provide a conveyance for his voters? Would the hon. and learned Gentleman himself, in case of a tie with his opponent, lose his election rather than send a carriage for a voter? The thing was nonsense; and any one who believed it would have a greater amount of credulity than he had ever been possessed of. Without intending, then, to advocate anything like corruption, let them make that the law which they knew would be the practice. The House already knew that it was not illegal to provide carriages for voters, and therefore it was unnecessary to discuss that question now. Did not every hon. Member at the last general election consult anxiously with their committees whether they should or should not provide means for a poor voter who could not provide means himself, or an opportunity to record his vote? The law was, however, at present a snare and a difficulty. He was for removing difficulties and uncertainties. Let them either pass an Act distinctly declaring the payment of expenses to be illegal, or agree to the clause now proposed. He heartily rejoiced that the House was about explicitly to declare that a conveyance might be provided.

MR. DODSON said, he fully agreed that in principle it would be well to abolish expenses of every kind, but that would be most unfair to the voters until greater facilities were afforded to them for recording their votes. He saw no reason why they should not be allowed to send their votes through the post, without coming up to the poll. The franchise to a man who could not afford to go up to the poll to record it was practically no franchise at all.

MR. GILPIN said, he thought all the observations of the hon. and learned Member for Wallingford (Mr. Malins), as regarded the expenses of poor voters, would be equally applicable to the whole system of bribery. Indeed he (Mr. Gilpin) thought the Bill might more appropriately be called a Bribery Enactment Bill than be designated under its present title, if the clause under discussion were passed into a law. He trusted the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Home Department would make the measure simply a continuance Bill. For his own part, he should feel it to be his duty to oppose its passing at every stage if the clause were inserted. It was said it was unfair to expect that a poor man should go a particular distance to record his vote without having his expenses paid, but the manner in which any such inconvenience ought to be remedied was by multiplying the number of polling places. Be that as it might, however, believing, as he did, that the clause would open the door to an untold amount of bribery, and that its operation would not be limited simply to the payment of travelling expenses, he deemed it to be his duty to oppose it by every means in his power.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he was of opinion that the passing of the first clause, to which so much objection had been taken, instead of encouraging bribery, would render it much easier to put it down. Whatever they might say about its being right or wrong to pay the expenses of a voter who went to the poll, hon. Gentlemen would admit there was a great and material difference between the reimbursement of the voter's actual expenses, and, under cover of paying his expenses, giving him money for his vote. If they thought they could put an end altogether to the payment of expenses in any form they might be consistent in endeavouring to do so. In a county election last year, at which he was one of three candidates, there was a mutual agreement that the travelling expenses of voters from a distance should be paid, not by the candidate for whom he polled, but from a common fund contributed to by all the candidates. There was nothing corrupt in that arrangement, but there could be no doubt that it might be held to be an infringement of the law. The alternative, however, now presented to the House was either to pass the clause or simply enact a continuance Bill, and leave the law in its present unsettled state. In the latter case they might find that travelling expenses were paid where parties had no intention of bribing at all; and unless they were able to put down the system of paying travelling expenses altogether they ought to place the matter on such a footing that they could distinguish between what was corrupt and what was not, and he believed the clause referred to would enable them to make that distinction. Therefore, with no intention whatever to screen the briber, but wishing to put down bribery, he should support the clause.

MR. M'CANN said, he would remind the House that although provision might be made for conveying the poor voter to the poll there was none for conveying him back to his home.

MR. FOX said, he considered that the real object of the Bill was to assist, if not to extend, the power of the purse at elections. To that he would always give his hearty opposition. The less money considerations entered into elections the better it would be for all the parties concerned. The poor voter should be provided for either by additional polling places, or by relieving him from any travelling expenses, but these expenses should not be paid by the candidate. He had gone through five elections, at three of which there was a fierce contest, and they had not cost him

5s. From first to last the electors had acted on the principle that if a Member bought them, he would be liable to sell them. They returned him (Mr. Fox) on independent grounds, and they expected he would not compromise their independence by receiving favours from any party, or act otherwise than according to his conscience. And he had such faith in human nature that he thought such would be the conduct of constituencies throughout the country if they were only left to themselves. If the Ballot were adopted, and elections made really appeals to opinion, and not to fear or hope, much would be done towards the purification of that House, and the exaltation of its character.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, there is much to be said on both sides of this question; but, on the whole, I am inclined to think that the clause as it stands is one that ought to be adopted. It is, no doubt, desirable to do away, as far as we can, with all unnecessary expenses at elections. I think it was quite right to prohibit bands and colours, and those other things which do not contribute in any way to the exercise of the franchise, and only afford a screen for bribery; but I do not myself see how furnishing conveyances for voters can be called a mode of bribery. If you are to give a voter money to pay his expenses, then you may give him double or three times the amount he has spent in travelling, and you will open a door for almost unlimited bribery; but if you are restricted to providing a conveyance for him, I do not see how that can amount in any case to bribery, because you only give a ticket for conveyance to the voter who has promised you his vote beforehand. No candidate would bring up to the poll an elector about whose vote he was uncertain, because in doing so he would expose himself to considerable danger; but if he brings up a voter who has promised his vote, I do not see that he will thereby exercise an improper influence on his mind. It is said the difficulty may be overcome by providing additional polling places. No doubt the multiplication of polling places would give additional facilities to voters, but that would not accomplish the purpose in counties. We cannot in counties have polling places in every village, or within walking distance of every voter. Multiply them as much as you will, you can only put them in towns; and then there will be a great number of voters who will be shut out from voting, unless the candidate for whom they have previously promised to vote is enabled to bring them up to the poll. If you prohibit conveyances, you will disfranchise a large majority of voters for Universities. I had the honour of sitting for a great many years for the University of Cambridge; I experienced three contests, and if the candidates on those occasions had not been allowed to provide conveyances for the voters, the contest would have been decided simply by the resident members, who form a very inconsiderable part of the voters. In that case a great number of the voters for the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge would be disfranchised. I think there can be no greater evil than leaving a point of this sort undecided. As far as I understand the matter, no one can tell distinctly whether a candidate who provides conveyances is or is not liable to the penalty attaching to bribery. That is a great evil, and I would much rather that the Committee came to a wrong decision upon the question than that it come to none at all. I think the candidates ought to be allowed to provide conveyances; but however that may be, I entreat the Committee to declare what the state of the law is. If an election were to take place before August of next year, see what a state of peril the electors would be placed in from the present uncertainty. I shall give my support to the clause.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE said, he was sorry to differ from his noble Friend on any point, but he must say his noble Friend's success at elections had been so great that he could not be said to have had the experience of contested elections which had fallen to the lot of many other Members of that House. [Viscount PALMERSTON: Well, I don't know; I have stood six of them.] He thought he had always seen that his noble Friend had been returned by acclamation wherever he had presented himself as a candidate. When, therefore, his noble Friend asked how it could be bribery to pay for the conveyance of a voter to the poll, he (Mr. Osborne) could acquit him of having had much knowledge of the practices at a contested election; but the truth was, that the system of conveying voters to the poll had a direct tendency to bribe a whole host of livery-stable keepers, stage-coach proprietors, and the like, at every contested election, and the electors generally, whatever their political opinions might be. He did not hesitate to say that if the House legalized travelling expenses, the outlay of candidates at elections would be increased three-fold. The result would be to present a bad example to the electoral body throughout the country, for it would be doubted whether the House was sincere in its desire to obtain purity of election. It was plain that they still wanted to maintain the influence of the purse, and that, though they had removed the property qualification, still they were determined to take care that no poor man should contest a seat. The hon. Gentleman who had just been returned to that House (Sir Stafford Northcote) talked of a joint-stock purse having been provided by the candidates, of whom the hon. Gentleman was one, to defray the expense of conveying the voters to the poll at a contested election for Devonshire a few years ago. He believed the expense at that election was such that it nearly ruined the hon. Gentleman, so much so that he had been obliged to fall back on a borough where there was no need of the services of stage-coach proprietors and livery stable-keepers at elections. It was merely hypocrisy in that House to say that they wished to put down bribery. His (Mr. Osborne's) opinion was, that the prevalent desire in that House was to admit none but men of large property within its walls, and this Bill would be one of the instruments by which that would be attained. He held that the whole tendency of the measure would be to demoralise the constituencies, and therefore he should vote with his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sheffield.

Mr. GREER said, he thought if they were to sanction the expenses of conveying voters to the poll, the clause under consideration was the most convenient form in which they could do it; but he could not conceal from himself that its tendency would be more or less in the direction of bribery. He wished, also, to call the attention of the House to the fact, that this clause, if it passed, would very seriously enhance the cost of elections. At present, in the uncertain state of the law, and while the legality of conveyances was doubtful, their cost at an election was admitted to be tenfold what it was on ordinary occasions. But if this clause passed, they might be sure that everybody would be conveyed to the poll, and they might reckon that the cost would be at least double what it was now.

Mr. BRADY said, persons were compelled to attend the assizes at the county towns of England and Ireland, and why should not ratepayers do so, not once or twice a year, but once in four or five years? He would call this Bill the Tower Hamlets Patent Safety Corruption Bill. He would give the measure all the opposition in his power.

Colonel NORTH said, he believed that every hon. Member who had been unseated for bribery or intimidation during the present Parliament sat on the opposite side of the House.

Mr. AYRTON said, he wished to make an observation in reply to certain personal remarks which had been made on him by the hon. and learned Members for Southwark and Sheffield, and especially by the former (Mr. John Locke), who suggested that the clause suited him. Now, at his election he began by proposing that no conveyances should be provided at all, but that was declined by the other candidates, and he was obliged to employ them; but that item of his expenses was smaller than those of the hon. and learned Member for Southwark, though his constituency was much larger than that of the hon. and learned Gentleman. He could not claim the merit of having invented the clause. It only occurred to his mind as a means of giving a practical exposition of the law as it had been recently defined. In the returns of the election auditors he found that almost every candidate had an item for carriage hire. This showed that whatever the law might be the practice of conveying voters to the poll was all but universal. Then he found that the law did not declare the conveyance of voters to the poll illegal; it only condemned the payment of conveyance expenses with corrupt intent, and his clause was in harmony with that declaration of the law. The law was, however, in an unsatisfactory state, and this House could not leave it as it stood. They were bound to declare either that the conveyance of voters was legal or illegal. He had thought that if no conveyance were provided, the effect would be to throw the elections more than ever into the hands of the rich. There was nothing to prevent the rich from taking voters to the poll in their own carriages, and at elections all the rich friends of a candidate might place their carriages at his disposal. He wished to provide for the poor voter, and he thought that this was a provision in the interest of the poor voter. Was he, who was in favour of extending the franchise, to say that the people were so base and miserable as to be bribed by the offer of conveyance to the poll. A poor man forfeited his wages if he did not get to the poll and back within a short time. Affording facilities to the poor voter to go to the poll enabled him to exercise the franchise. The House was bound to settle the law, which was now unsettled.

MR. CRAUFURD said, he wished the hon. Gentleman had only carried his argument one step further. If the poor man was to be carried to the poll, lest he should lose his wages, why not authorise the candidate to pay him for the wages he lost. But the hon. and learned Gentleman said this was a mere declaration of the existing law. If so, what need was there for a declaration of the law at all? The declaration would introduce not clearness, but confusion. Besides, it was not a declaration of the law, but an alteration. According to the hon. and learned Gentleman, the law said that the voters' conveyance expenses might be paid. This clause said no; the expenses shall not be paid, but the conveyances may be furnished. He wished that this question had been made an open one. If the Government had not adopted this measure he ventured to say that there would be a large majority against this clause. It appeared to him most marvellous that the Government should press a clause like this. There must be some reason which did not meet the eye. He trusted, if they went to a division, they would be able to expunge one of the most objectionable pieces of legislation ever attempted.

MR. HOLLAND declared, from practical experience, that the greatest advantage had been gained by the measure which increased the number of polling places, and he considered that the adoption of the present clause would still further benefit the country.

Question put,

The House divided:—Ayes 94; Noes 66: Majority 28.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 3.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN moved an Amendment to the effect that persons who are candidates at an election shall be exempt from penalties or expenses if he did not go to the poll.

MR. WALPOLE said, he must object to the Amendment as a material alteration of the clause. The object of the clause was that every person who offered himself as a candidate, and incurred expenses—or at least should put his opponent to expenses—should be liable for his expenses. He hoped his hon. Friend would not press his Amendment.

Amendment negatived, and the clause agreed to.

MR. WARREN said, he would propose to add at the end of Clause 3 a proviso that nothing contained in the Act should be construed to impose any liability on any person nominated without his consent.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 4.

MR. WALPOLE said, he had explained on previous occasions his intention that the Act should be both a declaratory and a continuance Act. It had been objected that this clause effected neither one nor the other of those objects, and, feeling the force of this objection, he thought, as the clause had not been introduced by himself, that it had better form part of the permanent measure which would be introduced next Session. He proposed, therefore, to omit this section from the Bill.

Clause struck out.

MR. ROEBUCK said, he would then move that the Bill be recommitted. The House had determined to keep in the first clause, and to allow the travelling expenses of voters, the whole of which would therefore fall upon the candidate. In taking this course, he understood the intention of the Government to be, that the poorer voters should be saved from expense, and from being disfranchised. Now, he took this to be a public object, and in that case he thought the public ought to pay for it. He did not hold that the position of a Member of Parliament was a personal object to attain. He had to perform responsible and onerous duties, and ought not to be called upon to pay any expense. He should move that the Bill be recommitted, in order that he might have the opportunity of adding at the end of the clause that any candidate having paid expenses to bring voters to the poll should be reimbursed from the county rates.

Motion made and Question proposed,—

"That the Bill be read the third time upon Monday next, at Twelve of the clock."

Amendment proposed,—

To leave out from the word "Bill" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "be re-committed," instead thereof.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 92; Noes 46: Majority 46.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

MR. ROEBUCK said he would appeal to the Government not to put the third reading for a morning sitting.

MR. WALPOLE said, he must remind the hon. and learned Gentleman that the question had been debated and decided three or four times, and, considering the period of the Session, and that an important question would be raised on Monday evening, he hoped there would be no objection to proceeding at twelve o'clock on Monday.

MR. CONINGHAM said, that after the explanation of the right hon. Gentleman, he thought there was no ground to object to the early sitting.

Bill to be read 3° on Monday next at Twelve o'clock.

House adjourned at Twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Saturday, July 24, 1858.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1ª Administration of Oaths by Committees; Leases and Sales of Settled Estates Act Amendment (1856).

3° Consolidated Fund (Appropriation); Metropolis Local Management Act Amendment; Drafts on Bankers Law Amendment; Militia (Service Abroad) Act Continuance; Militia Act Continuance (No. 2).

PROBATE AND LETTERS OF ADMINISTRATION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

LORD HOTHAM said, he wished to ask for a distinct statement of the course which the Government intended to pursue with respect to this Bill. It had been stated that the Government intended to proceed only with those portions of the Bill which related to procedure, and would strike out those clauses about which there was any difference of opinion. But the Attorney General had not on that occasion confirmed this statement. The Attorney General must be aware that there were strong objections to several parts of the Bill by the Incorporated Law Society and others, and the long list of Amendments to it upon the paper was sufficient to show that it was not a measure that ought to be taken on a Saturday. The Secretary to the Treasury, moreover, stated last night that no Bills respecting which difference of opinion was likely to arise would be taken that day, and it would be a violation of the understanding if the present Bill should be now proceeded with, unless the Attorney General was prepared to assent to the various Amendments of which notice had been given, or abandon the clauses to which objections had been taken. He should, therefore, move that the House should resolve itself into Committee on Monday next.

MR. WARREN seconded the Motion. He had an important Amendment on the paper, throwing open the Admiralty Court to the legal profession, and he also intended to move another, admitting the bar and the attorneys to a participation in non-contentious business in the Court of Probate. He appealed to the Home Secretary to let them know what they were to do; for if he did not pledge himself that these and other Amendments which were placed on the paper should be conceded, he (Mr. Warren) must support the Amendment, in order that these and other subjects should receive a full consideration on Monday next.

Amendment proposed,—

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words, "this House will, upon Monday next, resolve itself into the said Committee," instead thereof.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he did not complain of his noble Friend having given him an opportunity of stating the circumstances under which these Bills were necessarily submitted to their attention, and the part which the Government felt it their duty to take in the management and carrying of them through the House. Both in the Probate Act and in the Divorce Act of last Session omissions and defects had been ascertained to exist which rendered it difficult to administer justice satisfactorily in those courts. Under these circumstances, Lord Cranworth, the Chancellor of the late Government, introduced the present Bill and the Divorce Act Amendment Bill. These Bills were submitted to a Select Committee of the House of Lords, and were minutely considered in that assembly. They came down to that House about a month ago. As these Bills emanated from the late Government it was thought fitting that a member of the late Government should undertake the conduct of these Bills through the House. His hon. and learned Friend the Member for Aylesbury (Sir R. Bethell) had undertaken to do this; but he found that such was the pressure of public business that, notwithstanding the offer of every assistance on the part of the Government, it was impossible for him to conduct the Bills through the House. Accordingly, he (the Attorney General) had undertaken to conduct them, because he felt that if these measures were not passed, great inconvenience would result to suitors in those courts. These Bills were introduced to remedy practical defects in the previous Acts; but both in that and in the other House important Amendments had been suggested in such a way that if they were to enter upon their discussion the whole of the following week—in which they hoped to close their labours—would not suffice for the disposal of the Bill. Under these circumstances he would abandon the clauses which were not of urgent necessity, and were likely to lead to considerable discussion, as he had notified some days ago. Had he not been prepared to do so, he should not have proposed to meet that day in order to pass both these Bills through Committee. He did not, however, see that he was called upon to take the unusual course of stating before they went into Committee whether he would or would not assent to each of the Amendments put down on the paper. More especially did he say this, since the hon. and learned Member for Midhurst (Mr. Warren) had given notice of Amendments which might endanger the passing of the Act during the present Session. As to the 24th Clause, in respect to which several notices of Amendments had been given he was prepared to state the intentions of the Government. Under the Probate Act of last Session registrars were appointed in country districts to act in the grant of probates and letters of administration. It was thought that these officers should be allowed to grant probates of letters of administration to persons applying for them without the intervention of a solicitor. No powers were, however, given in the Act of last Session to enable the registrars to do this. The 24th Clause was introduced that registrars, for such fees as the Judge should think to specify, might be enabled in non-contentious business to transact the whole business themselves, and relieve the suitor from the necessity of resorting to a solicitor. Now, the noble Lord (Lord Hotham), the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield, and many others, overwhelmed him with objections to that clause. That being the case, and seeing no chance of carrying it within the brief time that remained, he would withdraw that part of the Bill. Having done so, he must press the hon. and learned Member for Midhurst to withdraw the clauses which he intended to propose. They must encounter considerable opposition, including that of the Government; for, from the late period of the Session at which they have been proposed, he had not been able to communicate with Dr. Lushington with respect to the one relating to the Court of Admiralty, and that with respect to the non-contentious business of the Court of Probate would require more consideration than could then be given to it. If those clauses were given up, he (the Attorney General) would, between that and the next Session of Parliament, consider both matters, and whatever course should be thought most consistent with public convenience and justice should be adopted. As he would give up the 5th clause of the Divorce Bill, and the superannuation clauses in both Bills, he did not think there was anything remaining that should be the subject of discussion.

MR. HADFIELD said, he thought it would have been more convenient if the Attorney General had stated his intentions with respect to this Bill on the previous evening. He hoped that the noble Lord would divide the House unless they had a distinct understanding that the Amendments to the Bill—which had been assented to by the Solicitor General, but were now opposed by the Attorney General—would be agreed to on the part of the Government.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he would have made a statement on the previous evening with respect to the clauses which he proposed to abandon, but he did not like to do so without previous communication with the Judge of the Court of Probate. He had since done so, and had obtained his assent to the withdrawal of the clause.

MR. WARREN said, that nothing he had heard from the Attorney General had altered his determination to press the clauses of which he had given notice, and on which he should, unless the Government yielded, take the sense of the House. On a former occasion, during the present Session, he had called the attention of the House to the state of the question as to throwing open to the Bar at large the non-contentious business of the Probate Court, and the whole practice of the Admiralty Court to the whole legal profession. He did not, therefore, propose again to go into details on the subject, but he was willing to make a proposal to his learned Friend the Attorney General. He had just had a conversation with a gentleman entitled to the highest consideration, who had intimated to him that he thought it was hardly courteous or respectful to so distinguished a person as the present Judge of the Admiralty Court (Dr. Lushington), to effect so great a change in his Court as that proposed, merely by way of a clause tacked to a Bill brought in with another object. It was suggested that if the Admiralty Court were to be thrown open to the whole profession, it ought to be by a separate Bill; and in that view he (Mr. Warren) was disposed to concur. If, therefore, the Government would assent to the clause admitting the Bar at large to practise in the non-contentious business of the Probate Court, he would withdraw those clauses relating to the Court of Admiralty. This was a matter of real importance to the Bar and the public, as the House would feel when it knew that while the contentious business averaged from thirteen or fourteen hundred causes annually, the non-contentious cases actually averaged 30,000 annually. Why was all this large field of practice to be studiously confined to the Advocates? They were made free of all the Courts of Common Law and Equity, and why ought not Barristers to be made free of the whole field of business in the new Probate Court? He (Mr. Warren) neither saw, nor had heard, any real reason for preserving so unjust and invidious a distinction, and one which he could hardly believe the Advocates themselves would insist on preserving. Recollecting what had passed in the last Session, he did not choose to place himself in a similar predicament during the present; and, therefore, begged to repeat that if the Government did not concede his clause he should, undoubtedly, take the sense of the House upon it.

MR. WALPOLE said, he must appeal to the noble Lord not to press the Amendment. The objectionable clauses could be struck out in Committee.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 42; Noes 17: Majority 25.

Main Question put and agreed to.

House in Committee.

Clauses 1 to 4 were agreed to.

Clause 5.

MR. G. A. HAMILTON said, that although a fourth registrar might be appointed, yet, in consequence of the adoption of a new scale, the salaries of the four registrars would not, after the deaths of the present holders of these offices, amount to a larger sum than was now paid to the three registrars of the Court.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL stated, that the three registrars appointed under the Act of last Session were so overburdened with work that it was absolutely necessary, in order to dispose of the business of the Court, that a fourth officer of that nature should be appointed.

MR. AYRTON said, he would withdraw the Amendment in this clause of which he had given notice.

MR. HADFIELD moved the insertion in the clause of a provision that the registrars should not accept any other office, or be engaged in any profession or business whatever, except as registrars.

Amendment proposed—

"At the end of Clause 5, to add the words 'That the registrars shall not accept or continue in any other office, or be concerned in any profession or business except as registrar.'"

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that none of the registrars, except the chief registrar, had any other employment. But the insertion of these words would inconvenience the chief registrar, who held the office of chancellor of a diocese, which had never interfered with the discharge of his duties in the Court of Probate, and which he believed that Dr. Bayford was prepared to resign. He should not object to the Amendment if its application were made prospective.

MR. STUART WORTLEY said, he thought that these words could not be applied to the present holders of these offices. On the other hand, he did not think that it would be advisable to insert words prospectively forbidding the holding of other offices, because that would give the present registrars an implied sanction to combine other duties with the offices, which he thought should not be the case. He wished to suggest that a person who was now receiving compensation should be appointed fourth registrar, in order that that compensation might be saved.

MR. AYRTON contended that Dr. Bayford ought to resign the office of diocesan chancellor. He found that the Judge of the Court of Probate had, with one or two necessary exceptions, appointed to offices in the Court persons who would otherwise be receiving compensation.

MR. WALPOLE said, that the Amendment proposed by the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Hadfield) was quite unnecessary. The best security the House could have, that proper persons would be appointed as registrars was, that if an improper appointment was made, attention might be called to it in that House.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to; as were also Clauses 6 and 7.

Clause 8.

MR. AYRTON said, he would suggest that persons who had been managing clerks to proctors for seven years before the passing of the Probate Act should be allowed to practise in this Court.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he would take into consideration before the Report the suggestion of the hon. Member.

Clause agreed to, as were also Clauses 9 to 23 inclusive.

Clause 24.

MR. AYRTON said, that with reference to the Amendment of which he had given notice, he wished to explain that his object was not to compel suitors to employ an attorney or solicitor to transact business in reference to probate and letters of administration, but to prevent the officers appointed under the Act from entering into competition with solicitors and attorneys for the practice of these Courts. When the Report came up he would move to introduce words to carry out his object.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he had already stated that he would withdraw the clause in question, as one calculated to lead to discussion. He concurred in the object of the hon. and learned Member, and should have no objection to cooperate with in him devising means to carry it into effect.

Clause struck out.

MR. WARREN said, he wished to move a clause enabling all serjeants and barristers at law to practise in the Court of Probate. This would place them on the same footing in regard to non-contentious as to contentious business. He did not intend to press the clause in reference to the Court of Admiralty.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he must oppose the introduction of the clause, which would have the effect of reversing the decision of both Houses of Parliament in last Session—namely, that it was inexpedient to do away altogether with that sort of exclusive practice which had so long existed in the Ecclesiastical Courts with regard to non-contentious business. He did no say that he approved that decision himself, but as it affected personal interests it ought not to be disturbed in a House containing less than forty Members.

MR. AYRTON said, he should support the clause.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL intimated his willingness to agree to it, with the view of obviating discussion.

Clause agreed to.

House resumed.

Bill reported, with Amendments as amended, to be considered on Monday, at Twelve o'clock.

METROPOLIS LOCAL MANAGEMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

MR. CONINGHAM said, he rose not for the purpose of opposing the Bill, but in order to protest for the last time against the drainage of the metropolis being handed over to a body in whom the public had no confidence. He entered his protest also against the plan of drainage by intercepting sewers which was about to be carried out. The English people hailed with the greatest satisfaction the discovery of any new guano islands, and sent ships thousands of miles for a substance the elements of which it now proposed to throw away as useless and valueless. He protested against the wasteful and extravagant system of throwing away what had been justly called a "mine of wealth," and adopting at the same time a system of gigantic tunnels, which could only be beneficial to the engineer, while they would be most costly to the community and injurious to the public interest, and which would be setting a miserable example of incapacity to the whole civilized world.

MR. STUART WORTLEY said, he could not refrain from expressing his opinion of the very unsatisfactory organization of the Board of Works. It was most desirable, if this Bill were passed, that they should look forward to the time when the Board would be of greater weight, and would include among its members some with greater capability for carrying on the great work, and possessing in a higher degree the confidence of the country. As at present composed, the Board consisted, with few exceptions, of persons with no peculiar qualification whatever for the duties entrusted to them. He wished to give notice that next year, if the Government did not take up the subject of the local government of the metropolis, he should feel it his duty to bring the question before the House. He wished also to correct an erroneous opinion which had been entertained of what he had said during the previous debate on this Bill. On that occasion he by no means intended to express an opinion favourable to taking the City funds and distributing them over the large area of the metropolis; what he had stated was that it would be desirable the districts formed under this Act should be converted into separate municipalities, and that from each of these a delegate should be sent to the general Board of Works which might eventually be formed for the management of the metropolis.

MR. WARREN said, that now that the Board was about to be entrusted with great and important duties he hoped they would talk less and do a great deal more than they had hitherto done.

VISCOUNT EBRINGTON remarked, that this Bill had been forced upon the Government by a panic rather than with dignity, and that it had been prepared with haste rather than with due consideration. He approved of that principle of the Bill which imposed upon the Board of Works the duty of carrying out these works without any restriction, for had it been otherwise the House would have been involved in the blame which must have resulted from the failure of the work over which they claimed to exercise supervision. He believed that notwithstanding the great array of engineering authorities in its favour the intercepting system would be found both costly and inefficient, and would, in addition, lead to the waste of a most valuable element of fertilization, and the expenditure of large sums of money upon works which would actually become obsolete before they were completed. He regretted that the existing Act had not received greater attention in the late Parliament. The present engineering advisers of the Board of Works would not, in his opinion, propose any scheme which would not be a most disastrous failure, and he earnestly hoped that the ratepayers of the metropolis, who were alone represented in the Board, would look very sharply after the conduct of their representatives.

SIR CHARLES BURRELL observed, that in dealing with the metropolitan sewage they had begun altogether at the wrong end. He believed that the old system of carting away the sewage from the cesspools at night might have been continued without inconvenience to the public, and would have avoided the wasteful throwing of the sewage into the river.

Bill read 3° and passed.

DRAFTS ON BANKERS LAW AMENDMENT BILL—THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."

MR. NICOLL said, that he regretted the introduction of the 4th clause into the Bill, as he believed that its effect would be to render the measure perfectly useless, except for the lawyers, for whom it would produce a plentiful crop of litigation. If this clause were allowed to stand part of the Bill, no security could be obtained for crossed cheques, and he hoped the Government would consent to withdraw the Bill; but rather than allow it to pass with this clause, he would move that the Bill be read a third time that day three months.

MR. CONINGHAM seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that he did not hesitate to say he very much disapproved of the clause, but had been compelled against his own judgment to insert it in consequence of the late period of the Session. He hoped, however, that the hon. Gentleman would withdraw his Amendment and allow the Bill to pass, as it was really one which, in his opinion, would be extremely useful to the commercial and mercantile interests of the country.

MR. JOHN LOCKE said, he would suggest that the Amendment should be withdrawn, on the understanding that steps should be taken for having the clause expunged in its progress through the other House.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he would not lose sight of the suggestion of the hon. and learned Member, and would do all in his power to obtain the withdrawal of the clause.

MR. HANKEY said, that the clause was one of great value, and he hoped that the House would not rashly come to the opinion that any pledge would be given by the Attorney General to use his exertions to prevent the clause remaining part of the Bill.

MR. STUART WORTLEY said, he wished to express his opinion that the clause should be expunged.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read 3°, and passed.

House adjourned at a Quarter after Three o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, July 26, 1858.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1ª Militia Pay; Consolidated Fund (Appropriation); Metropolis Local Management Act Amendment; Drafts on Bankers Law Amendment; Militia (Service Abroad) Act Continuance; Militia Act Continuance (No. 2); Corrupt Practices Prevention Act Continuance; Civil Bills, &c. (Ireland) Act Amendment; Judgments (Ireland) Act Amendment; New Writs.

2ª Cornwall Submarine Mines; Friendly Societies Act Amendment; Government of New Caledonia; Clerk of Petty Sessions (Ireland).

3ª Four Courts (Dublin) Extension; Inclosure of Lands; Sheep, &c., Contagious Diseases Prevention; Turnpike Acts Continuance; Vaccination (Ireland); Police (Scotland) Act Amendment; Medical Practitioners; Public Health.

ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH COMPANY BILL.

THIRD READING. DEBATE RESUMED.

Further Debate, on Amendment moved on Third Reading, resumed (according to Order).

THE EARL OF DERBY begged to remind their Lordships that on Friday last he had proposed an Amendment, extending the time at which the Government would be entitled to take possession of the wires from twenty-five to fifty years; but that in consequence of some objection by Lord Redesdale the matter was postponed until to-day. He had since made inquiries and had found that the alteration to be necessary in order to enable the arrangement between the United States Government and the Company to be carried into effect. He would therefore move, to agree to the said Amendment.

Lord REDESDALE and Lord STANLEY of ALDERLEY repeated their objections to the arrangement.

Motion agreed to with an Amendment; Bill passed, and sent to the Commons.

CORNWALL SUBMARINE MINES BILL.

SECOND READING.

Standing Order No. 179. Section 4, considered (according to Order) and dispensed with.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE moved the second reading of this Bill, the object of which was to carry into effect an arbitration of Sir John Patteson, which defines the respective rights of the Crown and of the Duchy of Cornwall to the lands between high and low-water mark.

LORD WYNFORD hoped that some guarantee would be given that, in any claim hereafter on the part of the Crown to land between high and low-water mark, this arbitration should not be referred to as a precedent.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE said, he could give no such guarantee on behalf either of the present or any future Government. All he could say was there was nothing in the Bill to affect the rights of anybody as to property out of the county of Cornwall. Two parties had claimed certain rights as to minerals on the shore, the Crown and the Duchy of Cornwall, and this Bill would vest the rights in question in the Duchy of Cornwall. As to third parties, if anybody claimed rights adverse to those two, the Bill pointed out whom he was to sue.

LORD CRANWORTH said, it amounted merely to a private arrangement between the Crown and the Duchy of Cornwall, and the Bill clearly saved the rights of all other parties.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2ª accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the whole House To-morrow.

RIGHT OF VISITATION.—QUESTION.

LORD LYNDHURST, in rising to put the Question of which he had given notice to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs with respect to the right of visit, said, your Lordships, no doubt, have most of you read a speech which was made by Mr. Dallas, the American Minister, a short time since, at a meeting of his fellow-subjects, to celebrate the anniversary of American Independence. On that occasion the hon. Gentleman stated that the question of the right of visiting American vessels in time of peace on the high seas had been finally settled. This is a subject, my Lords, of so much importance and such deep interest that it is material that we should receive a distinct and precise account of the terms on which that settlement is based; and I have therefore given notice of a question which I intend to propose to my noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, in order that he may give us some explanation on the subject to which I have referred. Many persons—perhaps I ought not to say "many persons," but several persons, and those in a high political position—appear to think that that proceeding was not justified, and that in point of fact we have surrendered a most valuable and important right. The answer which I make to that is, that we have surrendered no right, for that, in point of fact, no such right as that which is contended for has ever existed. We have, my Lords, abandoned the assumption of a right, and in doing so we have, I think, acted justly, prudently, and wisely. Now, my Lords, with your permission, I shall proceed to make a few observations upon the general question, and to refer to some of the most eminent authorities on the subject; but I assure you that I should not have troubled you were it not that I think it is of great importance that this question should be distinctly and finally understood and settled. The first proposition which I state is this:—That in no writer on international law has that right ever been asserted; and, in the next place, that there is no decision of any court of justice having jurisdiction to decide such questions in which that right has been admitted. I wish, in making this assertion, to fortify myself by some authorities; and I cannot quote a higher or a better English authority than that of Lord Stowell, who states distinctly, in the words which I am about to read—in conformity with what I have stated—that no such right has ever been asserted by any competent authority. His words are these:—

"I can find no authority that gives the right of interruption to the navigation of States in amity upon the high seas excepting that which the rights of war give to both belligerents against neutrals."

That is a distinct statement made by that noble and learned Lord. In addition, I beg leave to refer to Wheaton, the eminent American authority on international law, who states the proposition in these terms:—

"It is impossible to show a single passage in any institutional writer on public law, or the judgment of any court by which that law is administered, which will justify the exercise of such a right on the high seas in time of peace, independent of special compact."

So that your Lordships perceive that both on this side of the water and in America, by the best authorities and by the highest jurists, that right, in the passages to which I have referred, is controverted instead of being admitted. It has been agitated long between this country on the one side and America on the other. The eminent jurist on the other side of the water makes his statement and assertion; our corresponding authority on this side of the water makes his assertion; and those assertions directly and distinctly agree. For myself, my Lords, I have never been able to discover any principle of law or reason on which that right could be supported. I will refer again to the same high English authority—Lord Stowell—upon this subject, and you shall hear what he emphatically states with respect to it. That distinguished jurist says:—

"No nation can exercise the right of visitation and search on the high seas except on the belligerent claim. No such right has ever been claimed, nor can it be exercised, without the oppression of interrupting and harassing the real and lawful navigation of other countries, for the right, when it exists at all, is universal, and will extend to all countries. If I were to press the consideration further, it would be by stating the gigantic mischiefs which such a claim is likely to produce."

I may add, that another very high authority—the American Judge Storey—in the well known case of the Marianne and the Flora, expressed the same opinion in almost the same terms and in language as emphatic. So here again is a coincidence of authority between the two parties agitating the question—the authority on this side of the water corresponding exactly with the authority on the other. But I do not think it necessary to refer to any cases in support of the question I am considering; I will refer only to the principle on which the question rests. What is the rule with respect to the high seas and to the navigation of the high seas? All nations are equal upon the high seas? Whether they be strong and powerful, or weak and imbecile, all are on a footing of perfect equality. What is the position of a merchant ship on the high seas? A ship is part of the dominion of the country to which she belongs, and what right has the ship of one nation to interfere with the ship of any other nation, where the rights of both parties are equal? The principle is so clear and so distinct that it will not admit of the smallest doubt. I am unwilling on a question of this kind to refer to any arguments of my own, or to any authority which I can possess on the subject; but hear what is said by Lord Stowell with respect to the navigation of the high seas. His language is this:—

"All nations being equal all have an equal right to the uninterrupted use of the unappropriated parts of the ocean for their navigation. In places where no local authority exists, where the subjects of all States meet on a footing of entire equality and independence, no one State or any of its subjects has a right to assume or exercise authority over the subjects of another."

That is a confirmation of the doctrine which I have stated, that the principle on which this question is to be decided is the equality of all nations on the high seas. Admitting this principle, how can it be asserted that the ships of one nation can interfere in any way with the vessels of another? Then, having laid down this principle, the consideration next occurs that difficulties may arise out of frauds which may be practised on the high seas; and it is said that the flag of America may be assumed by another Power to cover the basest of purposes. But how can the act of a third power, or of the subjects of a third Power, by possibility affect any right existing on the part of the United States? Take this case:—By our treaty with Spain we have a right to visit and search Spanish vessels with a view to prevent the slave trade. But how can that agreement between us and Spain by any possibility affect the rights of America? Clearly in no way at all. But, then, what are our cruisers to do? They are placed in a most difficult position, because it is quite clear and plain, if one of our cruisers see a vessel bearing the American flag, and have reason to believe that that flag is assumed, he must examine and inquire into her right to carry that flag as best he can. If the result should be to give him a strong suspicion that the vessel has no right to the flag that she bears, he may certainly visit her and have an examination of her papers, and if he then find that his suspicions are correct he may deal with her in the manner in which he would be justified in dealing with her according to the relations existing between England and the country to which she belongs. The American Government has no right to interfere in this case. The matter is entirely between the English cruiser and the vessel seized. But, if it should turn out that the vessel is an American, and has a right to use the flag suspected, the situation is this,—he must of course apologize for his acts and make ample compensation for any injury done. That is exactly the position in which the two countries are placed. The American Minister for Foreign Affairs thus states the case of the United States. He says:—

"If a police magistrate gives a warrant to a police officer to seize a particular person, the officer, if he does not know the person, will make inquiries before he ventures to execute the warrant, and should the result of his inquiries satisfy him as to the identity of the individual he will execute the warrant. If his information turn out correct his proceedings are correct also; but if it turn out that he has made a mistake and arrested the wrong man he must make ample compensation for the injury which he has done."

The two cases seem to me to be perfectly analogous. A distinction has been attempted to be drawn—for which I think there is no foundation—between the right of visit and the right of search. Visit and search are two words which are always placed together in our vocabulary of international law, but they express what is conveyed by a single term in foreign vocabularies "le droit de visite." What is the use of visiting if you can do nothing? How can a mere visit convey the information which you desire to obtain?—and the moment you call for an examination of the papers—the moment you ask a single question the visit becomes a search—so that the visit to a particular vessel for the purpose of inquiry, is in effect the exercise of a right comprehended in the words droit de visite. But suppose a party visits only in the strict sense of the word, what right, I ask, has any person to go on board a vessel to visit it without the consent of the master? The same principle applies that I have just laid down. Treaties have been entered into between England and foreign countries giving the right of visit. But why enter into such treaties if the right of visiting is a national right founded on international law? What took place in the year 1815 after the Treaty of Vienna? Lord Castlereagh applied to the French Government to establish some mutual system by which cruisers could visit the vessels of either country; but the Duc de Richelieu replied, that France never would consent to a maritime police being established over her own subjects, except by persons belonging to her own country. I think I have now gone far enough to establish the position with which I started—that there is, in truth, no such thing as the right of visit. Whatever arrangement may have been made with the American Government, we have renounced no right that we ever possessed. It would be material, if possible, to adopt some plan by mutual understanding for verifying the flag, yet maintaining the integrity of the rights of both countries. I am told that some negotiation and some correspondence is going on for that end. It is a difficult question, and I hope it may be brought to a favourable termination. I conclude with what I stated at the beginning, that Her Majesty's Government were wise, prudent, and just in the course which they have pursued. To prosecute a claim which you cannot enforce consistently with law, or to make an attempt to enforce it which must lead to resistance, and which may afterwards lead to war, would be a most unwise and imprudent mode of proceeding. No war is so deplorable as a war founded on injustice. Before sitting down I must, in justice to the hon. Gentleman to whose statement I referred before, read to your Lordships the concluding words of his speech, because it is in complete accordance with the high character which he has always borne both in America and in this country where he acts as her representative. The hon. Gentleman said:—

"While I am able to announce to you this gratifying fact, I think it should be accompanied also by the assurance that the termination of that for which we have struggled for nearly half a century has been brought about with a degree of honourable candour and fair dealing on the part of the British Government deserving of every acknowledgment on our part."

That statement is in perfect unison with the excellent character of the hon. Gentleman to whom I have referred. My Lords, I thought it my duty to make these observations, and to bring this matter clearly before you, accompanied by the quotations which I have read—with which, no doubt, many of your Lordships are perfectly familiar—in order to afford an opportunity to any noble Lord to refute the positions which I have laid down if they are capable of refutation. The question which I wish to put to my noble Friend the Foreign Secretary is this,—whether he is prepared to lay on the table of the House the correspondence with the American Government with respect to the Right of Visitation?

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY:—My Lords, I have to thank my noble and learned Friend for having come forward, and, as I may say, made the occasion himself whereby he has given us an opportunity of hearing his opinion upon this very important subject. I think, my Lords, that that opinion must be of immense consequence and value both in Europe and in America, when it becomes fully known. Indeed, I feel I may say that that opinion must finally settle the disputed point; and that if ever a similar question should be again mooted, the opinion just expressed by my noble and learned Friend must be quoted with as great weight as my noble and learned Friend has quoted the authority of his great predecessor, Lord Stowell. It is with great pleasure that we have heard the views of my noble and learned Friend on this important subject, because they conform precisely to the opinion of the law officers of the Crown, whom we thought it our duty to consult before we sent any answer to the communications we received from the American Government. When we received General Cass's communication, which was addressed to Her Majesty's Government, we immediately consulted the law officers of the Crown, and they unanimously asserted that the international law in relation to this question was precisely as it has been just described by my noble and learned Friend. Upon that opinion Her Majesty's Government at once acted, and we frankly confessed that we have no legal claim to the right of visit and of search which has hitherto been assumed. Her Majesty's Government therefore abandoned both those claims; but at the same time they placed before the American Government the paramount necessity of agreeing upon the adoption of some instructions, perfectly identical in character, to be placed in the hands of the officers of both Governments,—and, indeed, in the hands of the officers of all maritime nations—by which all Powers should be ruled—so as for the future to avoid all obstruction to commerce; while at the same time the fraudulent use of national flags may be prevented. At all events, such instruction as would have the effect of saving us from quarrels arising out of the assertion of an assumed right. The negotiations have gone on thus far. Having given up, as I have said, the right of visit and of search, the American Government on their part have received our communications with equal frankness, and have stated to Her Majesty's Government they are ready to listen to and to consider any suggestions we may make to them with the view to the verification of the international flags. We have, my Lords, gone further than that; for we have made the same suggestions and offer to the Government of France. That Government has answered us in the same spirit, and in a manner which showed that they entirely appreciated the great importance of the question. My Lords, the Government of France have agreed to consider any proposition we shall make on the subject, and to suggest upon their part any proposition which they may consider to be useful or conducive to the ends we have all in view. Considering the enormous dimensions that commerce generally has assumed throughout the world at the present time—seeing as we do the sea covered with the ships of all nations—I say, my Lords, I do not think there can be any doubt of the necessity of establishing some sort of security against the fraudulent use of the national flags. Further than this our negotiations have not proceeded. Although it is most unusual, in the midst of negotiations to produce any of the correspondence on the subject, nevertheless Her Majesty's Government have no objection whatever to place in your Lordships' hands the correspondence that has taken place as far as it goes. Your Lordships will understand that we have gone no further than this—that we have abandoned the right of search and visit; and that the American Government have agreed to entertain and to consider any suggestion we may make to give security against the fraudulent use of the flags of either nation; and that the French Government are ready and anxious to assist us in our endeavours to attain the same object.

THE EARL OF ABERDEEN: My Lords, it happened to me, when formerly at the Foreign Office, to have to write a great many despatches upon this subject—more I hope than will ever fall to the lot of the noble Earl (the Earl of Malmesbury). But the correspondence which then took place left the question, as I supposed, completely settled, and, therefore, it was with great astonishment I heard of anything which could give rise to complaint on the part of the American Government. It was in the years 1842 and 1843 that a long correspondence took place between the American Minister of that time—Mr. Webster—and myself, and Mr. Webster declared over and over again to the late Lord Ashburton, that the matter was perfectly and satisfactorily settled. The noble Earl talks of referring to the Law Officers of the Crown as if this were a new question. The instructions under which our officers acted—and I suppose they are the same instructions now—were drawn up under the supervision of Dr. Lushington, Sir George Cockburn, and the Admiralty authorities of the day. They were communicated to Mr. Everett, the American Minister, and I never heard a word intimated against them. I was therefore astonished to hear my noble and learned Friend (Lord Lyndhurst) quote the statement of the highly respected American Minister who is now in this country, to the effect that we had given up frankly and finally the right of visit and search. Twenty years ago the Government of that day repudiated the assertion of any such right, and therefore, what the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs can have given up I am at a loss to understand. Any such right was given up then as frankly and finally as it possibly can be given up at this moment. After my noble and learned Friend's quoting the high authority of Lord Stowell, it may appear ludicrous in me to quote myself. At the same time, in order to show how the matter stood twenty years ago, I will just quote a note of my own. Though an humble authority, still I was speaking the language of the British Government, and that language was received by the American Government with acquiescence and satisfaction. My words were these:—

"The undersigned resigns all pretensions on the part of the British Government to visit and search American vessels in time of peace; nor is it as American vessels that such vessels are ever visited. But it has been the invariable practice of the British navy, and, the undersigned believes, of all navies in the world, to ascertain by visit the real nationality of merchant vessels met on the high seas, if there were good reason to apprehend their illegal character. In certain latitudes, and for particular objects, vessels are visited not as American, but either as British vessels engaged in an unlawful traffic and assuming the American flag for criminal purposes, or as belonging to States which have by treaty conceded to Great Britain the right of search, and which right it is attempted to defeat by fraudulently bearing the protective flag of the Union; or, finally, they are visited as piratical outlaws, having not the least title to any flag or any nationality whatever."

Under those three categories we have exercised the right to visit vessels so suspected. But, if our officers knew that an American vessel was full of slaves, they would have no right whatever to visit or arrest her, unless they had good ground to suspect that she was not an American vessel. No doubt the flag is primâ facie evidence of nationality; but the flag alone is not sufficient evidence, and is not sufficient to outweigh information to the contrary received from any quarter, or any other grounds of reasonable suspicion. No doubt our cruisers may commit a mistake and overhaul an American vessel, believing her to be a Spaniard or a pirate. But it has been found over and over again that instant and ample reparation has been offered for such an involuntary error, and that is all that can be expected between two nations acting in good faith with each other.

I saw, some time ago, an extract from a despatch of General Cass, which appeared to me to state the case with perfect fairness, and they are the very words which I used myself. As I have said already, I have written more upon this subject than I hope it will ever be necessary for the noble Earl to write, and the result of that writing has been perfect content and tranquillity for sixteen or eighteen years, until this year, when we hear for the first time of British outrages. I believe it has arisen from the zeal of our cruisers. The addition of a squadron on the coast of Cuba, instead of operations being confined to the coast of Africa, has led to a more frequent exercise of the right of visit, and I am afraid the zeal of our cruisers has converted into a rule that which was only intended to be an exception. Without any ground of suspicion, the American flag is sufficient evidence of nationality, and it is only when there are grounds of suspicion that the British cruiser is entitled to see whether the suspected vessel is American or not. That is all that ever was asserted by us; and when the American Minister declares Her Majesty's Government have given up, frankly and finally, the right of visit—a declaration which is received with great enthusiasm by his countrymen—I am at a loss to understand what is given up. Twenty years ago we repudiated the existence of such a right. We never made assertion of any such right, and therefore we cannot give it up. But the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs added, that it is important some mode should be taken to verify the nationality of any vessel on the ocean, without which we can have no security whatever. The instructions to which I have referred were framed in the most careful and cautious manner, and we had the advantage of the assistance of the noble Earl now at the head of the Government. If the noble Earl the Secretary of State can make any regulations, or issue any instructions, which shall be more effectually and more carefully guarded, I shall be very glad to see them; but, notwithstanding the desirableness of the object, I doubt whether he will find it practicable. I do not complain of the noble Earl, because the subject was probably new to him, but those who advised him ought to have recollected that this subject occupied, during many months, a great deal of care and attention. At the time to which I allude, the question was at its height. It excited much more interest than it does now, and it assumed a much more serious character. I will not follow this subject further, but I will read an extract from the last despatch I wrote on this matter:—

"I have no intention to renew the discussion, and it is the less necessary because my last note has remained for more than four years without an answer, and the Secretary of State has declared to the British Plenipotentiary at Washington, that the explanations given were entirely satisfactory. The President is assured and believes that Great Britain will always respect the just claims of the United States. We have no pretensions to interfere in any manner, either by detention, visitation, or search, with vessels of the United States, known or believed to be such. But we still maintain and will exercise the right and necessity of ascertaining the genuineness of any flag that suspected vessels may carry. If, in the exercise of this right, any involuntary error should be made; if, in spite of every precaution, any loss or injury should be sustained, prompt reparation will be afforded; but that we should abandon the right itself is quite impossible."

That is the footing of common sense and common justice on which the question stands at this moment, and I was much pleased to see from the despatch of General Cass that he adopted the same opinion, and that he made the same statement and used the words which I myself employed. The exercise of our right, if it be cautiously and prudently asserted, as it has been for the last sixteen or eighteen years, will not leave us in a very bad position if no change is made. If, however, the noble Earl can improve the system which has prevailed during that time I can have no objection.

EARL GRANVILLE: I never heard that the state of the law as laid down by my noble and learned Friend had been questioned, nor am I aware that any complaint was made against the late Government for the instructions issued by them. No alterations in these instructions was made by the late Government, and I wish to know whether it is the intention of the noble Earl to abide by the instructions which have heretofore been acted upon until the communications with the American Government on this subject have been concluded. The case to be provided for is that of a vessel belonging to a nation which has conceded the right of search to Great Britain by treaty assuming the American flag for fraudulent purposes; and I wish to know whether the Government intend to maintain the existing instructions.

The Earl of Aberdeen

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY: The noble Earl (the Earl of Aberdeen) omitted to mention one very important matter. No doubt the noble Earl and the ministry with which he was connected assumed that the law was such as it has been laid down by my noble and learned Friend; but he did not say that the American Government invariably went further, and asserted that they had a right to maintain their own police, and that whatever might be on board a vessel, if the American flag were flying, we had no right to visit it. They said that they constantly carried out a visitation by their own police, and that they would not be meddled with by any other country. Then came the question of discretion. I admit that lately — I know not by whose orders—there has appeared to be an increased activity exhibited by our cruisers in searching American vessels. There can be no doubt that the accounts given to the American Government have been immensely exaggerated, and I may state that after a careful examination I have not found any instance in which our cruisers have behaved even with incivility to the officers of any American vessel which they have boarded; but at the same time I must admit that in the exercise of that discretion which is given to them under the instructions of the noble Earl there has been a want of judgment in some cases, and that our officers have visited vessels which there was no fair reason to suppose were engaged in the slave trade. The noble Earl has asked me whether I have altered those instructions. I have not done so. They remain precisely as they were. But I do not think they are so safely worded as they might be, and I think they might be improved so as not to expose our officers to the risk of making mistakes which amount to an infraction of international law, and which place them in an unfair position such as no officers, and especially young officers, ought to occupy. Pending the arrangement which I have sketched out, that English cruisers should search suspected English vessels, that Americans should search suspected American vessels, and that French cruisers should search suspected French vessels, without actually altering the instructions heretofore acted upon, we have thought it right to suspend them until the negotiations have proceeded further. We have also ordered our cruisers on that coast to respect the American flag under any circumstances. The Americans, on their part have added a considerable number of cruisers on the coast, and have promised, during this period of inactivity on our part, which, I trust, may be but short, to use all the activity they can in order that the American flag, which I fear has been several times used by slavers, may not be prostituted to the purposes of the slave trade.

LAW OF COPYRIGHT.—PETITIONS.

LORD LYNDHURST: I beg now to call your Lordships' attention to a very different subject. I rise to present petitions from the Society of Arts, from the Royal Institute of British Architects, and from a great number of painters, sculptors, architects, engravers, photographers, publishers, and others interested in the production of works of Fine Art, signed, among others, by the President of the Royal Academy, the President of the Water Colour Society, and many members of the Royal Academy, praying for an amendment and extension of the law of copyright. For a long period of years the law has recognized the principle of granting protection to works of the mind when they assume a material and useful form. Ever since the time of Queen Anne copyright has been granted to authors for the protection of their works. If a painter, not being satisfied with the remuneration for his works, should determine to engrave them, that engraving would be protected by the law of copyright. The protection of a copyright was even extended to works of design applied to manufactures. But it is a strange circumstance that to painting, the most delightful of all the arts, no protection by copyright has ever been given: and yet, by the same principle, it is an invention of the mind assuming a useful and beneficial form. In practice the effect of the present state of the law is a very extensive circulation of spurious copies of good paintings which is most injurious to artists of reputation, and which operates injuriously in many ways. The artist has lost the copyright in his works, and has been injured in reputation in consequence of their being copied by inferior artists. The public has been injured by the frauds committed. The extent of those frauds is most surprising. I have had laid before me a mass of evidence which is most extraordinary, with which I need not detain your Lordships, but which may very properly be referred to a Select Committee.

In making spurious copies, the greatest pains are taken to deceive and mislead the public. They are generally the same size as the original, are painted on similar canvass, and are subscribed with the name or peculiar mark of the artist to whom they are to be attributed. There are regular dealers in these spurious copies, who employ artists of an inferior character for the purpose of carrying on the fraud. The copies are disposed of sometimes at private sales, at others at public auctions in London, or, more generally, in large commercial cities, such as Liverpool, Manchester. &c. It is not easy for the artist to reserve the copyright, because pictures frequently change hands, and there are no means of preventing these spurious copies getting into circulation. Sometimes lawyers are consulted as to the means of remedying this state of things, and they speak with uncertainty about injunctions from Chancery and actions of law; but it is quite out of question to expect that an artist will leave his studio and involve himself in the meshes of the Court of Chancery. A lady of very large fortune, who is remarkable for the admirable manner in which she applies it, purchased a picture from an artist for £600, on the understanding that it should not be copied; and she was very much astonished on going to the Manchester Exhibition a few years afterwards to find there a painting which, with the exception of some of the subordinate details, was an exact copy of her own. One gentleman, with whom I have communicated upon the subject, says that he has known as many as seventeen copies made from one picture. A noble Marquess purchased from the Exhibition a picture of some merit, called "Second Class—The Departure," for which he paid a considerable sum. He was asked to allow it to be engraved, and with his usual kindness and fondness for the arts he consented. Some time afterwards he found that while it had been in the hands of the engraver it had been copied, and the copy sold as the original at a sale in London. At that sale it was described as a very popular work, and the evidence of its popularity was that it had actually been engraved. The painter, Morland, made a contract with a dealer to go to his shop every morning at a certain time, and work for a certain number of hours each day till he had completed two or three pictures. At the same time the dealer engaged two inferior artists, who, as soon as Morland left, assumed his place, and copied the work which had been done during the day; so that when the pictures were completed, instead of two or three, five or six came into circulation. Another story is of this description:—A naval officer, whose novels and writings of that sort are very popular, sent two pictures to be lined. They were detained a long time, and when he went to inquire after them, the man to whom he had entrusted them said that his workshop was not there—it was at a place some miles off. The officer went to this workshop, but he did not find his pictures. The servant there said that they were at another place a mile or two off; but, seeing a ladder slung under a trap-door, he ran up it, opened the door, and in the loft to which it gave access found his pictures, surrounded by copies, three or four of which were completed, and two or three more still in progress. I think I have now said enough to induce your Lordships to consent to the appointment of a Select Committee to consider this subject and to devise some means by which copyright may be extended to works of design generally, but particularly to pictures. I have mentioned engravers. I do not think that they are sufficiently protected. An engraver cannot by law copy an engraving, but he can copy the picture from which it was engraved or an exact copy of it. An eminent architect mentioned this case to me:—Eight or ten persons sent in designs competing for the construction of a certain very important work. None of them were employed to execute it; but when it was completed, it was found to be made up of parts taken from all these competing designs. In 1836, a Committee of the House of Commons investigated this subject, but owing to the close of the Session, it was obliged to make a hasty Report, recommending its reappointment in the following Session. That Committee never was reappointed, and I therefore propose that a Committee of your Lordships shall be appointed to pursue the inquiry, and to report what remedy can be applied to the relief of these petitioners. I am quite aware that nothing can be done during the present Session, but I wish to have a vote for a Committee to appoint its members, in order that they may, during the recess, direct their attention to the subject, which is rather a complicated one, and may next Session come to their work fully informed upon it, and prepared speedily to apply a remedy to the grievances complained of. I therefore move that a Committee be appointed, and that its members be now named.

Lord Lyndhurst

Petition read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Then it was moved, That the said petitions be referred to a Select Committee to examine the statements contained therein; and to report thereon to the House.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE was fully sensible of the importance of this question, and should offer no opposition to the course which the noble and learned Lord proposed to pursue with regard to it.

Motion agreed to.

Committee named.

CHURCH OF ENGLAND SPECIAL SERVICES BILL.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF WICKLOW said, that he had intended to ask the most rev. Prelate the Archbishop of Canterbury whether the Church of England Special Services Bill, which was introduced by him into that House, and passed on the 22nd of March, had been withdrawn from the House of Commons with his approbation, and whether such withdrawal was in consequence of his having found that the law was such as not to require the passing of this Bill. He had in writing informed the most rev. Prelate of his intention to put these questions to him, and had received an answer from his Grace, telling him that having left town it would be most inconvenient for him to return, but giving specific answers to his inquiries. His Grace informed him that it was with his concurrence that the Bill was withdrawn, and explaining that that course had been adopted because the hon. Member to whose care it was intrusted found upon inquiry that the House of Commons would not pass the Bill, because it gave to the Bishops a power which that House would never sanction. That power was a power to prevent vicars and rectors from interfering with special services introduced into their own parishes without their license. In the course of last year a committee of pious gentlemen, wishing to open religious services for the working classes in Exeter Hall, applied to the Rev. Mr. Edouart, the rector of the parish, for his permission. That rev. gentleman, apprehending that more evil than good might arise from such a system, expressed his doubts of the wisdom and propriety of the proceeding; and, after some time, conceiving his anticipations to have been unfortunately realized, he announced his determination to withdraw his sanction of these services in Exeter Hall. The committee who had originated the movement fully acquiesced in his right, and entirely admitted Mr. Edouart's power to take such a course. The consequence, however, was that the object of the parties in seeking to establish special services for the working classes was completely attained, because Westminster Abbey and other churches in that city were opened for that purpose, though Exeter Hall was closed. Early in the present Session a noble Earl who was at the head of the religious society in question (the Earl of Shaftesbury), brought in a Bill to deprive Mr. Edouart and other clergymen in the same position of the rights which the law gave them. The form of that Bill was objected to by members of the Episcopal Bench, and the most rev. Prelate introduced a modified measure on the same subject, which superseded the first, and having been ultimately agreed to by their Lordships, went down to the other House. In the other House, however, the Bill had since been withdrawn, and the committee of gentlemen to whom he had referred then determined, in spite of Mr. Edouart's remonstrance, and in violation of the existing law, to reopen Exeter Hall for religious services to be performed by clergymen of the Church of England, and which were announced to have received the sanction of the Bishop of the diocese. Mr. Edouart, thereupon, wrote to the Bishop, calling upon the right rev. Prelate to protect his rights and those of the Church from invasion. In his reply the Bishop declined in any way to interfere, but signified his intention to wait and see what legal decision was given in the case in the event of the question being tried in a court of law. Surely it was most unjust towards Mr. Edouart, whose rights were invaded, thus to refuse him any aid, and to stand idly by while the whole burden and brunt of a legal contest were cast upon him. True, this committee of gentlemen declared that they were acting under an Act of the 18 & 19 Vict., and it appeared that the right rev. Prelate had allowed himself to be persuaded that under the authority of this statute these services might be carried on. The Act of the 18 & 19 Vict., however, was merely an Act for the opening of conventicles, and was exclusively intended to authorize Roman Catholics, Jews, and other Dissenters to open places of worship, and had no reference to Church of England services. These gentlemen, therefore, stood in this position, that they were either acting as Dissenters or were violating the law. The right rev. Prelate, indeed, might say that he was no party to this proceeding; but there could be no doubt that nine-tenths of the persons who attended Exeter Hall supposed that the services there had his sanction as Bishop of the diocese. The closing of Exeter Hall last year was followed by the opening of Westminster Abbey, and it seemed that this year the opening of Exeter Hall would be followed by the closing of Westminster Abbey. He trusted the right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of London) would afford some explanation of his conduct, and state why he had not taken measures to disabuse the public of the impression that these services had been commenced under his sanction.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, he felt some difficulty in replying to the question of the noble Earl. He really did not feel himself capable of stating what took place in the other House of Parliament; he knew nothing about it except that a Bill, to which he, together with their Lordships, gave a most cordial assent, had disappeared from the House of Commons because it was believed that it would not receive the sanction of that House. Before the noble Earl applied the words "unjust and unfair" to the conduct of any Member of their Lordships' House, he ought to be extremely sure of the facts. He believed that the only fact that bore any very distinct reference to his conduct in this matter was the statement that these services were commenced with his sanction. Now, as he believed the noble Earl held in his hands the printed correspondence to which he referred, which was very short so far as he (the Bishop of London) was concerned, and which contained distinctly these words—"these services are not with my sanction"—it would have been as well if he had read that before he stated that they were with his sanction. It was the first time he had heard it stated anywhere that these services were with his sanction. He had in the most public manner stated that they had not his sanction. He understood that the Bill referred to was opposed in the other House and by many out of the House, on the ground that it was unnecessary, because it was already lawful to do that in another form which that Bill gave an opportunity of doing in the particular form in which it passed their Lordships' House. As soon as the services to which the noble Earl alluded were, he believed, intended to be reopened, he received an intimation from certain gentlemen that they had satisfied themselves that they had the law on their side, and were determined to open these services. His answer to those gentlemen was, that he would not pretend to pronounce an opinion on the question of law. He then received an intimation from some other gentlemen that they felt that the law was equally certain on the other side. He simply referred them to another tribunal. When there was a disputed point of law, a Bishop, he thought, ought not to use private influence to prevent it from being settled. If the law was as stated by the noble Earl, the question was capable of being settled in the Bishop's court. He was convinced that any private interference of his in this matter would have merely done harm. Any one who was acquainted with this diocese knew that there was great room for such services. Their Lordships had, by a considerable majority, affirmed that there was room for such services; and if it should turn out that they were lawful, he for one should not object.

VISCOUNT DUNGANNON thought the noble Earl was perfectly justified in advocating the cause of a greatly oppressed and persecuted clergyman, who he believed had acted entirely within the law. It might be perfectly right in Dissenting ministers to perform these services in Exeter Hall, but he thought it highly irregular that clergymen of the Church of England should be brought, in defiance of the positive injunction of the incumbent, to perform these; and to perform them, moreover, in a wholly irregular manner, No use whatever was made of the Liturgy; there was extempore prayer, a hymn was sung, and then a discourse was delivered. Some of these clergymen, he believed, were incumbents in the diocese of the right rev. Prelate. He wished to know whether this was a regular mode of proceeding on the part of clergymen of the Established Church. Was it a regular course of proceeding for one clergyman to force his way into the parish of another against his positive injunction, to interfere with his spiritual influence over his flock, and to perform an irregular mode of service? [Cries of Order!] The noble Earl had put a question of very great importance, to which he thought a very unsatisfactory answer had been given, and he considered he had a right to offer some remarks upon the question, but if he were out of order, he would, of course, desist.

The Earl of Wicklow

THE EARL OF WICKLOW said, he had asked a question to which he had not received an answer. He wished to know whether it was true that Westminster Abbey was about to be closed.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON :—Westminster Abbey is not within my jurisdiction, although locally situate in my diocese. The Dean and Chapter act entirely on their own responsibility. These services close about this time of the year, and will commence again, with my most hearty wishes for their success, when the season again arrives. There is no connection whatsoever between them and Exeter Hall.

GOVERNMENT OF NEW CALEDONIA BILL.—SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON, in asking their Lordships to give a second reading to this Bill, said, that those who happened to be familiar with the very graphic accounts which had appeared in the newspapers with regard to the discovery of gold in the north-western part of British America, would feel, probably, that little justification was required for the introduction of the present measure. A complete revolution had recently taken place in that country, which was bounded on the west by the Pacific, on the east by the Rocky Mountains, on the south by the territory of the United States, and on the north by a chain of hills, lakes, and rivers, and which embraced an extent of about 400,000 square miles. That district, but a short time since tenanted only by wild beasts and still wilder savages, with here and there a hunter, had suddenly become the scene of gold discoveries, and was already the theatre of action, enterprise, and adventure. It was late in July, 1856, that information first reached this country of there being a suspicion of gold in those parts. At long intervals, and by occasional mails, some confirmation of that suspicion was brought from time to time; but it was not till March of this year that full and complete assurance was received. We then learned for the first time that emigrants were departing in crowds from the gold mines of San Francisco and were proceeding to this new El Dorado in the British territory. The account of that immigration was only to be compared to that which had taken place in former years to San Francisco itself. The hardy adventurers sailed up hundreds of miles by sea, they pierced the frontier, they found roads for themselves along the valleys, they launched their frail canoes upon the river, which was full of hidden rocks and not less dangerous eddies and currents; and though many lost their lives, were drowned in the river, or wandered from the road, or died from destitution, the great majority at length reached the scene of action—the haven of their ambition. It was to enable us to establish something like law and order, to frame something like a nucleus of civilization round which future laws and institutions might gather themselves, that he asked their Lordships to give this Bill a second reading. It might be perhaps argued that the Government had been rather precipitate in entering upon this step; but any one who was acquainted with the history of the gold colony of California must admit that in such a case it was far better to anticipate than to find ourselves in the rear. There were, moreover, certain circumstances which gave peculiar embarrassment and anxiety to this question, and which at the same time appeared to call for immediate action on the part of the Government. In the first place it must be borne in mind that the whole of this territory was at present in the main, though not actually, subject to an exclusive license to trade with the Indians which the Hudson's Bay Company had for many years enjoyed. It was true that that license expired next year; it was also true that the Government had no intention of renewing that license, and that it would, therefore, in point of law become entirely inoperative; yet the effects which it would leave behind it, and the influences which it had sown would exist, and might easily lead to complications and to serious embarrassments unless provision were at once made for some effectual machinery of government. It must also be borne in mind that we had not to deal with an exclusively white population. There was a population of native Indians there, considerably outnumbering the whites, and those savages naturally looked with distaste and aversion upon those who, as all experience taught them, must in the end deprive them of their inheritance. These were some of the elements of difficulty and danger which it was necessary to provide against, and the Bill which was introduced for that purpose was very simple. It first proposed to give power to the Crown to make laws and ordinances for the new colony. It then assigned a limit of four years' duration to the operation of the Bill itself. It then proposed to establish a Governor, who should hold the reins of office provisionally for that period; but who should be entrusted with very full and absolute powers. At the same time it provided that the Crown, whenever it saw fit, should establish a freer Government and a more liberal system of institutions. And, finally, power was given to the Crown at any time, upon the joint address of the two Houses of Assembly of Vancouver's Island to annex that island to the new colony. It had been objected to this Bill in some quarters that we were establishing a Governor with absolute and arbitrary power, that we were departing from the path of free institutions, and adopting a narrow and retrograde policy; and it had been argued that we ought either to give complete freedom and independence to the new colony, or to prescribe in the first instance the particular form of government which we wished to see established, and to appoint a provisional Governor, holding the reins of power simply until the new system could be introduced. The advantage of giving free institutions to our colonies was undeniable, but in this case there were at present no materials for carrying them into operation; and it must be borne in mind that the settlers who resorted to the colony were not likely at first to be permanent. At present, therefore, he thought that free institutions would be a useless gift; but he should be glad if, within four years, the Government of that day should be able to announce that the materials for a freer Government existed. Of course that matter would soon be settled, if the gold was found in sufficient quantity to attract to and retain people in the colony; but he must say that the amount of gold found was not sufficient to afford a very satisfactory criterion for the future. Objection had been made to the name of the new colony; but New Caledonia was the name found on the old maps, and by that name it was designated by the distinguished philosopher Humboldt. The objection, however, was not without foundation, for there was already the colony of Nova Scotia, which was pretty much the same as New Caledonia, and, moreover, there was a New Caledonia amongst the New Hebrides. Her Majesty had, therefore, been pleased to order that the name by which the new colony should be called in future should be British Columbia and not New Caledonia. He hoped that this colony, though the newest, might prove to be one of the most loyal and devoted of those which paid allegiance to Her Most gracious Majesty.

Moved that the Bill be now read 2ª.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE said, that though no opposition had been offered to the principles of the Bill in the other House, considerable doubts were entertained out of doors, by persons well acquainted with colonial matters, as to the propriety of creating a Government for this territory at this particular time. It was thought that, considering that Vancouver's Island was about to lapse to the Crown next year, and that the license of the Hudson's Bay Company would also expire very soon, it would have been better to await the course of events. He did not share, however, in those doubts. The Government, he thought, had adopted the right course in endeavouring to establish a Government of some kind for this territory. No one had advocated responsible government for the Colonies more strenuously than he; but such governments were only applicable to colonists of the English race. In this colony there were but few English settlers, except here and there a trapper of the Hudson's Bay Company. The great want in such a society was a strong Executive, and that want would be supplied by some such measure as that which their Lordships were then considering. He should, however, add that he had considerable doubt as to the expediency of their adopting the third clause of the Bill. That clause would give Her Majesty the power to grant free institutions to the colony by charter, if she should think fit. Now that was a right which Her Majesty would possess without such a provision, and he feared that, considering the Government provided by the Bill was to last only for four years, by its express insertion in an Act of Parliament unreasonable and dangerous expectations might be excited. The very unfortunate name of "New Caledonia," which had been given to the colony was, it appeared, to be altered. He was glad that such a change was to be made, although he certainly did not think that the new name of "British Columbia" was either very felicitous or very original. Very great difficulties, and dangers, and doubts were at issue in connection with the government they were about to form, arising from the peculiar circumstances of the country, and the extreme difficulty that there was in introducing any form of settled government. But there were greater facilities for the furtherance of a good system of colonization and for future prosperity than the mere irruption of gangs of gold diggers. These could not be adopted too soon. Vancouver's Island was not like some of the other gold producing districts, of an inhospitable and rocky nature, but rather of an opposite character. He believed it to be a singularly fine country for all the purposes of colonization, quite apart from discoveries of gold, and nothing would have prevented its earlier colonization except the distance at which it was located. He understood that it had magnificent wood, and that some of the finest timber for ship building was to be found in the country; that its fisheries were exceedingly abundant; that it had excellent fuel and coal of a nature to generate steam most admirably; in short, all those conveniences and elements that were calculated to render a colony prosperous. Could not, therefore, some means be taken at once for a settlement of the colony, and to induce persons to go out, not merely for the purpose of searching for gold, but to avail themselves of the advantages of a permanent settlement? Steps should be taken to lay out a town, and to adapt the lands to agricultural pursuits, and prevent the colony from becoming the receptacle for ruffians; steps should be taken to introduce habits of decency and order, to establish a certain amount of force, such as would keep the inhabitants in decency and good order, and thereby obviate the difficulties that attached to the first days of a colony of this description. There was another point to which he wished to call the attention of Her Majesty's Government. There was about the spot where the gold was discovered, and where it probably extended, a considerable number of Indians of a warlike and somewhat savage nature; and it was an undoubted fact that, whether from their communications with the Hudson's Bay Company, or from other causes, they were by no means unfriendly to the English—though they had a great dread of the Americans, who would, no doubt, come over from California, and people a large portion of these lands; and it would be one of the first duties of the Government to intervene for the protection of these aborigines. He did not mean to sentimentalize on a matter of this kind. Wherever the white man and civilization extended the red man fled before them, and eventually perished from the face of the country. This appeared to be one of the laws of God which the efforts of civilization and humanity could not prevent; and it was one of the paramount duties of a good Government, in carrying out colonization, to interfere as far as possible to prevent those cruelties and horrors that had been perpetrated in the early days of our Colonies where there were a number of aborigines, and which, unfortunately, prevailed to a great extent in the western portions of the United States. The third point to which he thought the attention of the Government ought to be directed was with reference to the military force in that country. If they established a government for the purpose of maintaining law and order among the population, they must of course have a force of that nature. Now, this was a difficult question, and it would be the business of statesmen to look to the future, as well as to mitigate and to provide for present emergencies. Now, if they sent soldiers out, they must find accommodation for them there which did not at present exist—as well in winter, which he believed was not severe, as in summer, which was not unfriendly to the English constitution. Provisions would also have to be procured, and all provisions for maintaining the required force must be carried up the country and kept in constant supply. This, owing to the distance of the colony from England, would be a matter of considerable difficulty. Another question also presented itself, as to whether they were to send organized regiments or some other kind of force, bearing in mind that, apart from this, there was another question looming in the distance—that of provision to be taken in the Bill for the eventual addition of Vancouver's Island to this colony, if the Legislature of that island desired it. It had been stated by the noble Lord the Under Secretary for the Colonies that the new colony was not so far distant from the mother country as appeared upon the map, and that the Government had had overtures from Cunard to establish a line of steamers that would bring the colony within thirty-five days' sail of this country. He did not attach any value to such a speculation, for it could not be maintained unless it paid; but whether it did or not, they must bear in mind that the communication could only exist in time and for the purposes of peace; he did not apprehend that they could transport soldiers or relieve garrisons with facility even in times of peace, but unquestionably not in times of war; so that, practically, as far as the advance of this colony was concerned in time of war, the Government could only reinforce and strengthen any garrison via Cape Horn. The question was one that ought to be well and carefully weighed; and he would exhort the Government, in any military arrangements they might make, to look to the future, and to bear in mind that any military force they would be placing in New Caledonia would be in a totally different position to that of any military force they had hitherto had in any of our Colonies. It would probably not be thought desirable to maintain so expensive an establishment as at Gibraltar, Malta, or Corfu; but it must be borne in mind that this colony was not like Australia or New Zealand, as remote from great Powers as from England—it was near to great Powers, but remote from us. In conclusion, the noble Duke referred to his efforts in the House of Commons to give Vancouver's Island a constitution, when it was proposed to hand it over to the Hudson's Bay Company, and expressed a hope that now, when that event was about to take place, the Government would, in all their arrangements, look upon it as certain that the people of Vancouver's Island would avail themselves of the provisions of this Bill, and at an early date declare in favour of a junction with the new colony.

LORD WODEHOUSE believed that Nature had given us one of the finest positions in the North Pacific, and it behoved the Government to consider seriously how to take advantage of it. They ought also to take into account the position of the Russians on the Amoor river, and of the Americans in California and Oregon, and the difficulty that might arise from those circumstances in the event of a war in those parts.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read 2ª accordingly; and committed to a Committee of the whole House To-morrow.

WRECK OF THE CANDACE.—QUESTION.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY, in rising to put a question to the Vice President of the Board of Trade respecting the wreck of the Candace, African steam-packet, and to ask whether it is the intention of the Board of Trade to institute an inquiry, under the provisions of the 432nd section of the Merchant Shipping Act, into the circumstances attending the loss of that vessel, said the Candace at the time the accident happened was on her return voyage from the coast of Africa. In the middle of the night she came into collision with a Dutch ship, whereby the Candace was lost with the whole of her cargo. By this accident, moreover, seven lives were lost. A lieutenant of the Royal Navy and other persons competent to judge were on board, and they were of opinion that there had been great misconduct, or at least negligence, on the part either of the officers of the Candace or the company to which she belonged. It appeared that the vessel at the time of the accident was entrusted to the care of an officer who was not properly certificated; that the master and mate were below, and that the vessel was entrusted entirely to the boatswain. When a question was put in the other House to the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Board of Trade, he replied that legal proceedings would probably be instituted, which would ensure a better inquiry than could be obtained by means of the Board of Trade. It was desirable that an inquiry should be instituted into the loss of all passenger vessels, particularly where lives were sacrificed. Since the passing of the Act empowering these inquiries he did not know a single case in which, where lives had been lost, an inquiry had not been instituted. If ever such an inquiry ought to be prosecuted it was in a case like the present, and as he understood no criminal proceedings had been instituted, he trusted that the Government would yet direct an inquiry to be made into all the circumstances of the case.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE said, from inquiry, it appeared that the Candace was on her usual voyage; that she had been inspected before starting, and that it had been reported to the Admiralty that in all respects the vessel was fit and the crew fit. All the requirements of the law had been complied with. On the return voyage, not as had been said, on a bright night, but on rather a dark night and with a heavy sea, the vessel came in collision with a Dutch collier. Both the captain and the first mate had certificates, and the second mate had held a position in the navy; the crew had been shipped at Liverpool, at the best shipping office in the United Kingdom. On the return voyage the second mate was ill and was not able to attend to the ship, and the ship was in charge of the boatswain, but he was a man who had been eighteen years at sea, and had been boatswain on board one of the Cunard steamers. The master was called up the moment the collision happened. The collision was with a Dutch collier, and any one who knew anything of the sea knew the careless mode in which those vessels were navigated. He believed that the accident had been entirely caused by the carelessness of the crew of the collier. The Candace had all her lights properly placed. The captain of the Candace had been since drowned, and therefore, as far as he was concerned, an inquiry was useless. Then where were they to get further evidence? How could they get the evidence of the Dutch crew? The only person who had applied for an inquiry was a lieutenant in the navy, and who stated in his communication that it was his intention to take proceedings at law against the company. What was to be got by inquiry? They had satisfied themselves that the owners of the vessel had done everything necessary, and that the captain and the mate were proper persons. He might perhaps have fished out materials for an action against the company, but that was a position in which the Government should not stand.

Lord STANLEY of ALDERLEY said, that if grounds such as those alleged by the noble Earl were to be sufficient to justify the Board of Trade in making no inquiry in a case in which a ship had been lost, no such inquiry would in future ever be held, and the valuable provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act would become a dead letter.

House adjourned at Nine o'clock, till To-morrow, half-past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, July 26, 1858.

Minutes.] Public Bills.—2° International Patent Right; Administration of Oaths by Committees; Leases and Sales of Settled Estates Act Amendment (1856).

3° Corrupt Practices Prevention Act Continuance; Judgments (Ireland) Act Amendment; New Writs; Probates and Letters of Administration Act Amendment; Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Act Amendment.

ADMISSION OF BARON DE ROTHSCHILD.

Mr. SPEAKER: Any hon. Member who desires to take his seat will please come to the table to be sworn.

Baron Lionel Nathan de Rothschild returned as one of the Members for the City of London, came to the table, and was about to take from the Clerk at the table a copy of the Oath prescribed by the 21 & 22 Vict., c. 48, passed this Session, when

Mr. WARREN rose and said: Mr. Speaker, I rise to order. I wish to ask you, Sir, whether notice was not necessary before—["Order! Chair!"] Sir, I rise to order—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order, order! The taking of his seat by an hon. Member is matter of privilege, and ought not to be interrupted by any discussion whatever.

The prescribed form of oath was again tendered to Baron de Rothschild by the Clerk,

Baron LIONEL DE ROTHSCHILD: Sir, I beg to state that, being a person professing the Jewish religion, I entertain a conscientious objection to take the oath which, by an Act passed in the present Session, has been substituted for the oaths of Allegiance, Supremacy, and Abjuration, in the form therein required.

Whereupon the Clerk reported the matter to Mr. Speaker, who desired Baron Lionel Nathan de Rothschild to withdraw; and he withdrew accordingly.

Lord JOHN RUSSELL: My object in rising, Sir, is to move a Resolution in conformity with an Act recently passed. (21 & 22 Vict. c. 49). It is as follows:—

"That it appears to this House that Baron Lionel Nathan de Rothschild, a person professing the Jewish Religion, being otherwise entitled to sit and vote in this House, is prevented from so sitting and voting by his conscientious objection to take the Oath which, by an Act passed in the present Session of Parliament, has been substituted for the Oaths of Allegiance, Supremacy, and Abjuration, in the form therein required."

Mr. J. A. SMITH seconded the Resolution.

Question proposed.

Mr. WARREN: Mr. Speaker, it is with great reluctance and regret, and contrary to my own previously-declared determination not to open my lips again on this question, that I rise to address a few observations to the House. It has now arrived at a very grave crisis in its constitutional history and that of the country, and a sense of duty will not allow me to remain silent. I have already, and very lately, as an humble member of the great Conservative party, entered my most solemn protest against the step which the Legislature was about to take in this matter, and have but little to say upon this momentous occasion. This House is about to consummate that great constitutional change in the character of the House which it has so lately been empowered to effect, and to take upon itself the entire responsibility of admitting into the representative branch of the Legislature a gentleman who has this moment declared that he cannot take—that he cannot be bound by an oath administered on the Holy Gospels—an oath which has been so long taken by all other Members of this House, with the exception of those who, though Christians by profession, were permitted, in deference to their religious scruples, to use a different form of oath or declaration. Sir, this is to me a most painful and distressing moment—but I cannot help myself; and, in accordance with what my conscience tells me is my most imperative duty, I am resolved to take the sense of the House upon the proposed Resolution. Lest, however, any one should do me the grievous injustice of supposing that I am, at a moment so painful, actuated by considerations of a personal nature with respect to either Baron Rothschild or the ancient race to which he belongs, I beg now most emphatically and truly to disclaim any such feelings. With reference to that gentleman, I must take this opportunity of declaring, that never in my life did I hear a whisper of even an insinuation against his character—of anything inconsistent with that reputation for purity, that spotlessness of character which Baron Rothschild enjoys. He occupies, deservedly, a high social position in this country; and I can only say again, that, while compelled to oppose the Resolution of the noble Lord opposite—to resist him to the last on this question—I have not in my heart one particle of animosity towards either the Jewish race or that representative of it now seeking admission into this Christian Legislature. If it be really the deliberate will of this House of Commons, as it has undoubtedly been declared the will of the Imperial Legislature that they may, if they think fit, exercise a privilege which I for one regard as so dangerous, I have nothing more to say; but in the meantime I beg, though I should go out alone into the lobby, to meet the Resolution of the noble Lord with a direct negative.

Mr. WALPOLE: I do not think my hon. and learned Friend could have caught correctly the terms of the noble Lord's Resolution. It is simply declaratory, in terms of the new Act, of a matter of fact which neither my hon. and learned Friend nor any one else will contest, and does not admit either Baron Rothschild or any other member of the Jewish persuasion to a seat in this House. I hope, therefore, that my hon. and learned Friend will not put the House to the trouble of dividing at the present stage of the proceedings.

Mr. WARREN: I am much obliged to my right hon. Friend, and shall not press for a division on this Resolution. I had not caught the exact words of it and was taken altogether by surprise by the whole proceedings of this morning. I therefore withdraw my Motion.

Resolved,—

That it appears to this House that Baron Lionel de Rothschild, a person professing the Jewish Religion, being otherwise entitled to sit and vote in this House, is prevented from so sitting and voting by his conscientious objection to take the Oath which, by an Act passed in the present Session of Parliament, has been substituted for the Oaths of Allegiance, Supremacy, and Abjuration, in the form therein required."

Lord JOHN RUSSELL: I now rise, Sir, to move a Resolution in pursuance of the Act which received the assent of Her Majesty on the 23rd instant, and which is entitled "An Act to provide for the relief of Her Majesty's subjects professing the Jewish religion." In order that the House may be fully in possession of the words of the Act I shall now read them. By the first clause it is enacted that—

"Where it shall appear to either House of Parliament that a person professing the Jewish religion, otherwise entitled to sit and vote in such House, is prevented from so sitting and voting by his conscientious objection to take the Oath which by an Act passed or to be passed in the present Session of Parliament has been or may be substituted for the Oaths of Allegiance, Supremacy, and Abjuration, in the form therein required, such House, if it think fit, may resolve that thenceforth any person professing the Jewish religion, in taking the said Oath to entitle him to sit and vote as aforesaid, may omit the words 'and I make this declaration upon the true faith of a Christian.'"

It is not necessary to read any further. I propose, in conformity with those words in the clause, "such House, if it think fit," to move a Resolution as nearly as possible in the terms of the Act itself. Of course, I shall not now raise any question as to whether a Jew should sit in this House. That question has been repeatedly argued, and it has now been decided by Parliament, at least to the extent of leaving it to either House to act as it may think fit. I therefore content myself with moving: "That any person professing the Jewish Religion may henceforth, in taking the Oath prescribed in an Act of the present Session of Parliament to entitle him to sit and vote in this House, omit the words 'and I make this declaration upon the true faith of a Christian.'"

MR. J. A. SMITH seconded the Resolution.

Motion made and Question put,

"That any person professing the Jewish Religion may henceforth, in taking the Oath prescribed in an Act of the present Session of Parliament to entitle him to sit and vote in this House, omit the words, 'and I make this declaration upon the true faith of a Christian.'"

MR. WARREN: Now, Sir, the time has arrived at which I may make my Motion, and state that I shall take the sense of the House upon it. It is, of course, not necessary for me to repeat any of the observations I have already offered, but must beg the House to regard them as having been offered in opposition to the noble Lord's present Resolution, which I now meet with a direct negative.

LORD HOTHAM: Sir, I do not intend to occupy the time of the House for more than one or two moments. My object is simply to explain the reasons of the Vote which I shall feel it my duty to give. I have always found myself conscientiously under the necessity of opposing the admission to Parliament of persons professing the Jewish religion. I have done so upon principle, and without the slightest particle of personal feeling. As Parliament, however, has decided against my views of this matter, I did not come down to the House to record any further vote on this question, but to take part in the discussion of other business; but, being here, I have to consider what course I ought to pursue. The part I have hitherto taken renders it impossible for me to concur in the Resolution of the noble Lord; while I cannot withdraw and abstain from giving any vote upon the question. I do not think it would be either an honest or a straightforward mode of proceeding, to shrink from expressing my opinion on a subject, with reference to which I think so strongly. I am therefore reduced to the necessity, without the slightest personal feeling towards Baron Rothschild, of going into the lobby with those who are resolved to meet the Resolution with a direct negative.

MR. HADFIELD said, he had never been able to account for the prejudice which influenced hon. Gentlemen opposite in their hostility to the Jews. In his opinion the world was more indebted to that particular family of the human race than any other nation or people that ever existed. Hon. Gentlemen talked of excluding the Jews as a matter of Christian principle. He would say, let them endeavour to Christianize themselves by following the example of Him they all reverenced as the great messenger of peace, charity, and toleration, and who directed that the Gospel should be preached to all men—but to the Jew first. He regretted that this prejudice towards that family of the human race, to whom we were so deeply indebted, should have so long continued, but rejoiced in the opportunity of taking part in the removal of the last of the disabilities which that prejudice had in this country inflicted upon them. He looked upon that occasion as a great triumph for the cause of religious liberty.

MR. WALPOLE: Sir, when first this question was brought before the House I expressed my opinion, and I have never shrunk from that opinion since, that it was a religious rather than a political question. I thought from the first that the Legislature of this country, being admittedly a Christian Legislature from the earliest time, was not a body into which a person professing the Jewish religion could properly or conscientiously be admitted. I merely mention that for the purpose of showing, that now that the time has come for this House to determine how it will act, it is impossible for me not to feel, while admitting that Parliament has given us the power to seat Baron Rothschild on our own responsibility, that considering the opinions I have always held, I cannot be a party to the proposed Resolution. One or two words more and I have done, for I do not wish to raise any controversy on this occasion. I cannot disguise from myself that the person whom the House is now about to seat has this very much in his favour—that throughout the whole of this controversy he has never attempted to act in a manner contrary to the law of the land or to the rules of this House. I think it due to Baron Rothschild that I should say so much. I agree in the observations made by my noble Friend (Lord Hotham) when stating the reasons which would compel him to vote against this Resolution, and I shall go into the lobby with my noble Friend. There is one other observation that I would make. The hon. Members who advocate the admission of the Jews think that they are now closing this matter; but in point of fact they are not. The course taken by Parliament in reference to this question is a course which in my opinion cannot be too much deprecated. I, for one, am extremely sorry that if Baron Rothschild, and those who like him, profess the Jewish religion, were to be admitted into the Legislature at all, they were not admitted frankly, plainly, and honestly, by a declaration made by Parliament in the form of an Act of the Legislature, instead of in a mode which I am afraid we shall hereafter find cause to regret.

MR. SPOONER: Sir, the hon. Member for Sheffield has charged those who oppose the admission of the Jews into Parliament as so acting in consequence of a prejudice against the Jewish people. I, for one, utterly deny that. The Jews are a most interesting nation—interesting, if we look to their past history, and more so if we contemplate their future destiny. No, Sir, we are not actuated by any prejudice against the Jewish people as a nation, or from personal objection to the respectable individual who now presents himself for admission. There cannot be a second opinion with regard to that gentleman personally. He has the respect and esteem of all who know him, and especially of those who possess his friendship. What does actuate those who oppose such admission is the full and decided conviction that a Christian assembly like this Legislature should be wholly Christian, if we expect what we pray for—the blessing of Almighty God on our exertions to properly direct the affairs of a free and Christian people. The hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Hadfield) who so much rejoices at the House of Lords having given their consent to the admission of Jews to this House by a simple Resolution, has not made one word of objection to the Reasons which came down from that House for having rejected that clause of the Bill which permitted the Jew to take his seat in this House—which Reasons declared, in emphatic terms, that the Jew was morally unfit to sit and legislate in a Christian Legislature. I beg to express my full concurrence in those Reasons, and therefore I cannot give my vote for admitting a person whom those Reasons declare to be totally unfit for admission into this House.

MR. NEWDEGATE: I confess, Sir, I was not aware, till a few minutes ago, that this Resolution was to be proposed to-day; and having had no notice that such a course would be taken, I arrived rather hastily. It is not my intention to detain the House by any lengthened observations; but I wish to say one or two words before the Resolution is put from the Chair, in reference to the conduct of the House of Lords, which I think has been very much misunderstood. What the House of Lords have done, Sir, is this:—They have placed this matter, which affects the constitution of this House, entirely in the hands of this House, at the same time retaining the strong conviction which that noble assembly has consistently and conscientiously acted on for eleven years. They have recorded the fact that their conscientious opinion on the subject of the admission of Jews was unchanged, at the same time that they thought it quite consistent with their duty and quite consistent with the constitution of the country to cease to interfere with what concerns the composition of this House alone. I think it due to the House of Lords that their conduct should not be considered as disrespectful to this House, when they thought fit to place the constitution of the House of Commons in the hands of its Members. With regard to my own course, deprecating as I do any attempt to admit the Jews into this House, I shall continue to act on those views which have hitherto influenced me, and record my vote against the Resolution.

MR. FOX remarked, that the well-merited acknowledgment of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary that Baron Rothschild had never throughout the whole of this controversy attempted to contravene the law, might with equal justice have been applied generally to the body to which he belonged, for it was a principle of the Jewish religion that, wherever they might be carried away captive, or in whatever country their lot was cast, they must respect the law as established, and pray for the peace and order of the country serving as their temporary home. To that rule they had always adhered. With regard to their moral unfitness he would remind the House of Lords, and those who used that argument, that the moral law of Judaism was the moral law of Christianity. For himself he would rather that this concession had been made upon the simple and broad ground of religious toleration instead of as a matter affecting the constitutional right of the House of Commons to make rules for the admission of its own Members. He concurred in the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Walpole) that the question was not closed. It must again come under consideration upon the direct ground of religious toleration. But in the meanwhile it was most absurd to talk of constitutional government while Her Majesty remained the ruler of 180,000,000 of people, not one of whom was qualified to raise his voice in that House to state the grievances of his fellow-countrymen. They talked of the Christian character of the Parliament. There were two different ways of showing their Christianity. One way was by their words and oaths, the other and better way was by their deeds; and he was satisfied that, whatever their professions, they would never act up to the spirit of a Christian Legislature until they were influenced by feelings of toleration and respect for the opinions of others.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: It is not my intention to detain the House, but the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State has made one or two observations which seem to call for some remark on my part. The right hon. Gentleman, in the first place, has objected to the mode in which this question has been settled by Parliament. I beg him and the House to recollect that that mode of settlement was not proposed by the advocates of the admission of Jews, by those who have rested the question upon the ground of civil and religious liberty, but by those who have hitherto been the chief opponents of the measure which has now happily proved successful. It was supposed—I know not for what reason—that it would prove more acceptable to those who still oppose the admission of Jews than any other mode that could be suggested; but, I repeat, it was not our choice, but the choice of the other House of Parliament. The right hon. Gentleman made another objection, which I should be sorry to think well founded. He said that this was not the end of the question. After the discussions that this subject has undergone—after so strong an expression of the opinion of the House of Commons as we have had during the present Session—I do trust none will hereafter attempt to deprive the Jews of the privilege which we are about to confer upon them. Undoubtedly it will be in the power of anybody to do so by moving to rescind this Resolution or by some other mode; but I trust that what we are now doing, being in conformity with the general wishes of this House as representing the country, there will be no change in the policy of Parliament upon this subject. I have nothing further to say. The right hon. Gentleman having frankly and truly acknowledged that Baron Rothschild has never attempted to infringe the law, I am bound to state, on the other hand, that those who have opposed the admission of Jews have done so from no personal or unworthy feeling, but simply in the discharge of a duty imposed upon upon them by their consciences. I rejoice at the success which has attended our efforts this question, and believe that the principle of religious liberty has made great progress.

Question put,

"That any person professing the Jewish Religion may henceforth, in taking the Oath prescribed in an Act of the present Session of Parliament to entitle him to sit and vote in this House, omit the words, 'and I make this declaration upon the true faith of a Christian.'"

The House divided: — Ayes 69; Noes 37; Majority 32.

List of the AYES.

Adair, H. E.
Akroyd, E.
Anderson, Sir J.
Ayrton, A. S.
Bagshaw, R. J.
Baines, rt. hon. M. T.
Baring, rt. hon. Sir F. T.
Bass, M. T.
Berkeley, hon. H. F.
Bonham-Carter, J.
Brady, J.
Buchanan, W.
Byng, hon. G.
Calcraft, J. H.
Calcutt, F. M.
Cardwell, rt. hon. E.
Clifford, Col.
Codrington, G.
Colebrooke, Sir T. E.
Cox, W.
Craufurd, E. H. J.
Crawford, R. W.
Cubitt, Mr. Alderman
Dalglish, R.
Davey, R.
Davie, Sir H. R. F.
Dillwyn, L. L.
Disraeli, rt. hon. B.
Duff, M. E. G.
Dunbar, Sir W.
Duncombe, T.
Dunlop, A. M.
Elphinstone, Sir J.
Forster, C.
Fox, W. J.
Greer, S. M'C.
Grey, R. W.
Hadfield, G.
Hamilton, L. C.
Hayter, rt. hon. Sir W. G.
Headlam, T. E.
Henniker, Lord
Hope, A. J. B. B.
Jervoise, Sir J. C.
Kelly, Sir F.
Kinglake, A. W.
Langton, H. G.
Lennox, Lord H. G.
M'Cann, J.
Melgund, Visct.
Osborne, R.
Rich, H.
Ridley, G.
Roebuck, J. A.
Russell, Lord J.
Russell, A.
Smith, rt. hon. R. V.
Smith, A.
Somerville, rt. hon. Sir W.
Stapleton, J.
Thompson, Gen.
Trelawny, Sir J. S.
Vane, Lord H.
Villiers, rt. hon. C. P.
Westhead, J. P. B.
White, J.
Wickham, H. W.
Williams, W.
Wilson, J.

TELLERS.

Smith, J. A.
Knatchbull-Hugessen.

List of the NOES.

Adderley, rt. hon. C. B.
Arbuthnott, hn. General
Bernard, hon. Colonel
Blackburn, P.
Bridges, Sir B. W.
Cairns, Sir Hugh M'C.
Cecil, Lord R.
Collins, T.
Cooper, E. J.
Cross, R. A.
Du Cane, C.
Du Pre, C. G.
East, Sir J. B.
Egerton, W. T.
Fellowes, E.
Gard, R. S.
Hamilton, G. A.
Hardy, G.
Hodgson, W. N.
Joliffe, Sir W. G. H.
Knatchbull, W. F.
Knightley, R.
Knox, Colonel
Manners, Lord J.
Miller, T. J.
Mills, A.
Mowbray, rt. hon. J. R.
Newdegate, C. N.
Nisbet, R. P.
Noel, hon. G. J.
Peel, rt. hon. General
Spooner, R.
Taylor, Colonel
Vance, J.
Walpole, rt. hon. S. H.
Whitmore, H.
Yorke, hon. E. T.

TELLERS.

Warren, S.
Hotham, Lord

Baron LIONEL NATHAN DE ROTHSCHILD being again come to the Table, desired to be sworn on the Old Testament, as being binding on his conscience :—Whereupon the Clerk reported the matter to Mr. Speaker, who then desired the Clerk to swear him upon the Old Testament.

Baron LIONEL NATHAN DE ROTHSCHILD was sworn accordingly, and subscribed the Oath at the Table.

CORRUPT PRACTICES PREVENTION ACT CONTINUANCE BILL.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."

MR. H. BERKELEY : The House might remember that early in the Session he had asked Her Majesty's Attorney General what he meant to do as regarded that Act then about to expire, and which had been deemed a failure, to which the Attorney General replied that he intended to submit it to a Select Committee ; but now at the eleventh hour taking advantage of a panic caused by a stench in the Thames, of hon. Members' own creating, the Government were, to their great delight, shuffling measures through the House at double quick time, and the Attorney General's pledge has been forfeited. Now, if that Select Committee had been moved for, he should have been enabled to lay a body of evidence before it, which at once would have shown that the Bill had been a dead failure, but he believed that it had done all it had ever been intended to do. And so thought the editor of The Times, who had published an admirable analysis of the Bill, when it first passed into a law, and pronounced it to be a "pompous profession meant to be inoperative." In 1854 he (Mr. Berkeley) had written to the late Mr. Coppock [ironical cheers]; aye, hon. Members might object to Mr. Coppock, but while they had no objection to his objectionable practices as applied to their own purposes, could they deny his great knowledge of the subject? That gentleman replies thus :—

"I have already fully given my opinion through the medium of the press as regards the Bill to which you call my attention. It is a mere tub for the whale, but you will find it greatly admired by the majority of the Members of your House, because it curtails all the legal expenses of candidates, facilitates bribery, and leaves intimidation just where it was."

Had Mr. Coppock lived, a Committee might have had that evidence, which he (Mr. Berkeley) now tendered. He would offer them the opinion of another election agent, a person of great experience and knowledge in all election matters, and registration law, well known in the west of England, Mr. Gilbert, Secretary to the Bristol Liberal Association, and the following was that person's opinion of the Corrupt Practices Bill :—

"I have carefully gone through the Corrupt Practices Prevention Bill as you have desired. Members have taken excellent care of themselves, and of candidates generally. This Bill very properly lowers the expenses of candidates, does away with banners, bands, and colours, and appoints an officer to assess the costs. All this is good, and seems to me to be a bit of sugar held out as a bait to tempt Members to stultify themselves—I must not, I suppose, use a stronger expression—by giving their sanction to clauses which have the direct effect of protecting candidates from the effects of bribery, and facilitating the sale of votes. Under this Bill there can be no difficulty in purchasing any borough open to sale. The intimidation clause is so much waste paper."

The opinion of Mr. Clabon, solicitor to charities for the Attorney General, of the firm of Fearon and Clabon, eminent Parliamentary agents, from a paper read before a law association, was to the following effect :—

"Parliament has from time to time set to work with much apparent zeal, to give a remedy for the growing evil, bribery. Acts to prevent bribery and treating have been followed by Acts to amend Acts to prevent bribery and treating ; and Parliament has done everything but one thing, but that one thing is the one thing needful. I am under the strong impression that the Members of the present Parliament presented themselves to the constituencies under the fear of consequences which were not likely to occur. The Corrupt Practices Prevention Act was a bugbear to them; but were their fears well founded? I think they were not well founded. I believe that a candidate intending to procure his return by all means, foul as well as fair, will not, now that the meaning of the Act is well known, be frightened by its provisions. In fact, what provisions are there to frighten him? What is there to prevent the candidate from sending the 'the man in the moon' with his bag of gold? What to deter the Ministerial or Opposition 'W. B.' from despatching his emissary from the Carlton or Reform with full pockets? The arrangements are made in secret at a distance. The 'man in the moon' returns to his distant home long before the day for petitions. The candidate takes good care to know nothing about the matter. Trusty friends only ask for his cheque at a remote day."

Mr. Whitehurst, the deputy chairman of the Ballot Society, said that the society had tested the opinions of agents and reliable persons in almost all the boroughs and counties which had lately been contested, and the result was as thus described. Mr. Whitehurst says :—

"You ask me if the clauses in the Corrupt

Practices Prevention Act against undue influence, as it is now called, have put down intimidation? My answer is brief but plain — Not in the least. Of course you do not expect me to give you in detail the proof of this, suffice it to say that our executive committee have carefully inquired into the intimidation practised at each election since 1854, and in no one case have we found that tenants, debtors, workmen, or other dependents, have voted more independently of their landlords, creditors, or employers, than before the Act. You of course have observed the utter failure of the remedy by legal proceedings against intimidators established by the Act. There have been three attempts to put the Act in force: one was an action—Thurston v. Sinkins—brought for the penalty for intimidating a voter at Frome: every species of intrigue was set on foot to prevent the action being tried, and successfully, for the record was withdrawn at the last moment, and what became of the action I could never make out. The Queen v. Barnwell, was an attempt to put the Act in force against a clergyman at Denbigh. There was hard swearing on both sides, and the Court of Queen's Bench refused to interfere. The last case was the Irish priests in Mayo, where in one case the jury were discharged without coming to a verdict, and in the other the Attorney General abandoned the prosecution. The Act has diminished the minor expenses of chairing, flags, music, &c., but has left untouched the greatest and most objectionable item of electioneering expenses, paid agents, especially lawyers, whose mischievous influence at elections Mr. Bright exposed in the last debate on your Motion for the ballot.

The permission to candidates to name their agents, and the provision that none others could affect their seats by bribery but those named, was directly facilitating bribery. Brown, Jones, and Robinson, might be the named agents, and of course would keep themselves clear of bribery, but Hopkins, Simkins, and Perkins, the agents without a name, would do all the bribery requisite, and if found out would suffer the penalty, but the candidate's seat would be safe nevertheless. As for attempts to so legislate as to make a man keep his butcher and baker against his will, or retain a tenant, it was too gross a farce. Such attempts must fail; all that was requisite would be caution; a customer or landlord would not be fool enough to say to his tradesman or tenant, 'I'll get rid of you because you voted against my orders:' but he would say, 'your articles don't please me, I found alum in your bread;' or, 'you are a bad farmer;' or it would be sufficient to say, 'you are an ugly man and a bad Christain; I have done with you;' or to say nothing, and then how can you prove that a man is discharged because of his vote? If you were to make it penal for a customer or landlord to ask a tradesman or a customer for his vote, even that would be evaded, he would ask through somebody else. Legislation of this kind is founded on a rotten principle, and the promoters were not in earnest in their desire to put down corrupt practices. This was a Bill "How not to do it." Hon. Members in truth had been caught, many of them, by the bait that they were to save their pockets. Bands, banners, cockades, were put down and an auditor appointed. All very good, but while they served themselves in this way they ran into a danger more concealed but of greater import. They handed themselves over to the "man in the moon," who would descend upon their boroughs with his money bag, bribe the electors, and either compel them to put their hands deeply into their pockets, or turn out of their seats. Let them remember that the next election would be a regular rugging and riving election of the old sort, the lords, lawyers, and squires, the outs trying to force themselves in. Ministers might be beaten at any moment, and then they might be sure that the truthful description of Dickens would be realized:—"My Lord Doodle would throw himself upon the country in the shape of sovereigns and beer," and the acts of the Doodles would be well emulated by those of the Foodles, the whole scenes of demoralization and debauchery would be renewed, for which this Bill would be their warrant — their Magna Charta. With agency by this Bill let loose, because defined, he cared not whether they legalized travelling expenses or not. They might be sure those expenses would be paid, whether legal or illegal—not by named agents, but by nameless agents—and the candidate for counties who did not bring in the out voters, would have a poor chance with the candidates who did. The Bill was a snare and a delusion, and he felt it to be his duty, even at the eleventh hour, to denounce it.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word 'now' and at the end of the Question to add the words, 'upon this day six weeks.'

MR. A. SMITH said, he wished to enter his protest against the Bill, as being a retrograde and reactionary measure, inasmuch as it sanctioned expenses by Act of Parliament which even before the passing of the Reform Bill were contrary to law. He believed there was a much higher feeling prevailing among the constituent body than formerly existed; they had a far more correct appreciation of their duty, and of the responsibility resting upon them as electors; and if the House of Commons, on their part, fostered that feeling by doing their duty when they were elected, and preserving the purity of election as Members of Parliament, they would do more to put down corrupt practices than any measure of this kind.

MR. WHITESIDE contended that the Bill introduced no new law, but made the existing law clear, while it limited election expenses and controlled the expenditure of money for election purposes. He could not understand, therefore, how such a measure could be said to increase corruption.

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, that it was easy to talk of the improved tone of electors ; but the fact was, that if the payment of travelling expenses were prohibited, it would in many counties be physically impossible for a large number of voters to go to the poll in consequence of the distance of the polling places from their dwellings. On the other hand, he would admit that the effect of the present Bill, legalizing the payment of those expenses, would be considerably to increase the expenditure for election purposes ; for he thought that henceforth the payment of travelling expenses would be exacted as a right by the voters. The whole of the evil arose out of a persistence in the antiquated plan of carrying the voter to the poll, instead of the poll to the voter. The latter result might be attained by collecting the votes at the houses of the electors by means of voting papers, due precautions being taken against fraud ; or by enormously multiplying the polling places, so that each elector should only have a limited distance to walk to the poll ; or by enabling magistrates and certain officials throughout the country at present holding appointments under the Court of Chancery to receive the votes. Such means as these, which he had just indicated, would constitute the only solution of the dilemma which was pressing upon them.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE remarked that the Bill would prove very prejudicial or at all events very expensive to candidates for large boroughs, and especially to candidates for counties. He anticipated that many country gentlemen would be ruined by the clause legalizing the payment of travelling expenses, and that the longest purse would henceforth carry the day in elections. It was said that without that clause the poor voter would be disfranchised, but that was a mere pretence, for the men whom it was difficult to get to the poll were not the poor voters, but those who were not allowed to vote conscientiously for the candidates of their own choice—namely, the £50 tenants at will. If the Bill became law the voters would require something more than the Bill gave them, and would say to the candidates, "As you have brought me all this way, you must give me something to eat." Thus the election expenditure would be still further increased. The clause he had referred to would throw the ballot back many years, because the candidates, who were compelled to convey voters to the poll, would naturally insist upon knowing how they voted. This was an important question, and there was no reason why it should not be deferred till next Session, a short continuance Bill being passed in the meantime. Just as the three branches of the Legislature were about to adjourn to Cherbourg, the Commons were going to send the present Bill up to the Lords ; but were the Lords to have no voice in the matter, and were they merely to register the decrees of the Commons, without discussion? He hoped and trusted that the Lords would understand that they could do nothing more agreeable to the country at large, or more calculated to promote the purity and freedom of election, than by rejecting the measure.

MR. KNIGHTLEY said, he wished to know why the fourth clause which, was a very important one, and had been carried in Committee by a majority of four to one, had been withdrawn. The right hon. Member for Cambridge University (Mr. Walpole) was reported to have withdrawn it because it was not introduced by himself, but that was hardly a valid reason for the withdrawal of the clause, which would have afforded relief to one class of the community hardly dealt with by recent legislation—namely, returning officers. They were obliged to provide polling booths, clerks, and the necessary paraphernalia of an election, and were enabled to recover the amount of the expense from the candidates. Formerly, when the candidates possessed property, the returning officers had something to fall back upon, but now that the property qualification was abolished it would be competent for any elector to propose a pauper in the workhouse or an insolvent debtor in gaol.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he was sorry that the Bill had reached its present stage in its present shape. He thought it would have been far better to have a mere continuance Bill than to have raised this question as to the conveyance of voters. He should object to a clause strictly prohibiting the conveyance of voters, because he thought that it would be evaded; but at the same he conceived that if the Bill had been sent to a Select Committee, several means might have been suggested by which the conveyance of voters would have been rendered almost unnecessary. He doubted whether there was any necessity in boroughs for the conveyance of voters at all; and with respect to counties, if there was, as the noble Lord opposite had suggested, a limited distance to each polling place, which the voter might walk, the providing conveyances for county voters would not be requisite. However, so long as there existed only the present limited number of polling places conveyance could not be strictly prohibited. He did not wish at the present stage of the Bill to throw an obstruction in the way of the continuance of the Corrupt Practices' Prevention Act, and therefore he should give his vote for the third reading of the Bill; but he wished the Government had confined themselves to the proposition of a simple continuance Bill for one year.

MR. ROEBUCK said, he understood that the Bill was intended not to extend the law but merely to remove certain doubts, and to continue the existing Act. That was the reason, he thought, for excluding the fourth clause, which went to add to the law. But would the Bill render the law more certain? If a voter were conveyed to the poll a distance of ten miles, he would, of course, wish to be conveyed home again; but under the Bill he could not be conveyed home again by the candidate. [Cries of "Yes!"] That question would be contested, and an uncertainty was created. It was alleged that the clause providing for the conveyance of voters was a provision in favour of poor electors, but it would increase election expenses to a fearful extent, and render it imperative upon every candidate who contested an election to carry up every voter to the poll. This would very much increase the difficulty of the poor man who aspired to a seat in that House. The hon. Member opposite (Mr. Knightley) was a rich man, that was evident. The hon. Member did not, perhaps, think that any poor man ought to sit in that House. [MR. KNIGHTLEY: No, no!] There were rich men in that House, but they were not its ornaments. If they excluded poor men they would exclude a great deal of common sense.

MR. RICH said, he trusted that the Government would give way to the objections made to the clause respecting the conveyance of voters, and substitute a simple continuance Bill for the present measure. He believed that the Bill, as it stood, would legalize treating. [Cries of "No, no!"] Conveyance was nothing but treating. It was treating the voters to a ride, and that might have the effect of gaining votes. He should, therefore, vote against the Bill in its present form.

MR. WALPOLE said, he omitted the fourth clause, not because it was not introduced by himself but because he was much pressed in debate not to introduce any material alterations in the law except such as might be absolutely necessary. He originally proposed the Bill as a continuance Bill, together with a declaration of the existing law, so that the law might not remain in uncertainty; but he added at the same time that the whole question must be brought under the consideration of the House very early next Session, and he should then be prepared to support such a clause as that which was now withdrawn, because he thought it an extremely good one. In reference to what had fallen from the noble Lord (Lord J. Russell) he had hoped to bring in a Bill on the whole subject in time to refer it to a Select Committee, but as the Session was drawing so near to a close he thought it better to defer doing so until next Session, when he would undertake to lay on the table a proposition for a permanent measure, and refer it to a Select Committee. The noble Lord the Member for the City of London wished that the present Bill was a mere continuance Bill; but it was not right that the law should remain uncertain, and, unless the law were made in conformity with public feeling, it would only be evaded. Therefore the only alternative left was to declare, under proper guards and restrictions, that those expenses which no one could contend would corrupt a voter, and those only, should be allowed. At the time the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act was passing the noble Lord himself proposed a very similar clause, which was carried in that House, but rejected by the House of Lords. This matter had now been amply discussed, and the sense of the House had been taken upon it in several divisions, and it would be disrespectful to the House rather than otherwise if he at the last moment declined to persevere in the course so sanctioned.

MR. ADAIR said, he wished to inquire whether the clause would be sufficient to allow the payment of the voter's expenses of conveyance from the polling place to his home as well from his home to the polling place?

MR. WALPOLE: I believe the words are quite sufficient for that purpose.

MR. STAPLETON said, he could not but object to the introduction of an important clause legalising expenses which were now contrary to law in what they were told was a mere continuance Bill.

Question put "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 93; Noes 60; Majority 33.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read 3°.

On Question "That the Bill do pass,"

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE said, he could not but express his surprise that the noble Lord the Member for London should have voted for the Bill after having objected to it. If the noble Lord thought the Government was in danger and wanted to save them, he might have recommended them to adopt Resolutions. He wished to state that the reason why the Opposition threw out the clause from the noble Lord's (Lord J. Russell) Bill in 1854 for legalising travelling expenses was that it was opposed to the opinion of all the great legal authorities of the Lords. Lord Mansfield had ruled that the payment of travelling expenses was bribery, and that ruling had had never been contravened. He could not understand why the Bill had been brought forward in its present shape. At an earlier period of the Session he had inaugurated an opposition to Her Majesty's Government, but since then that Government had done very great things. He was serious. He wished to give honour to those to whom honour was due. The right hon. Gentleman, the leader of that House, deserved the highest credit for the temperate, able, and judicious course he had pursued in office, and for the reforms which he had instituted since he had taken his seat on the Ministerial bench. He (Mr. B. Osborne) did not believe that the leader of the House would have allowed this conveyance clause to be inserted in the Bill if his attention had been called to it; because he did not think the right hon. Gentleman wished to legalise refreshments. He had observed the high spirit displayed by Her Majesty's Government on several occasions. They had passed many good measures; and he could not but have good feeling towards a Government which not only advocated, but what was much better, passed into law measures which he himself supported. He thought, however, that the present measure detracted, in some degree, from their merits. They were in this matter entering on a retrograde course, which he trusted the House would not sanction. At all events he would give the House another opportunity, by opposing the Motion for the passing the Bill, of expressing its opinion.

LORD HARRY VANE said, he could not agree with the hon. Member for Dover (Mr. B. Osborne) in the opinion he had expressed of the present Bill. He thought that unless travelling expenses were allowed they would, in effect, disfranchise the poor voters. He had voted, by mistake, in the last division with his hon. Friends near him, he should now have the opportunity of repairing his error, by voting against them.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY remarked, that they could not have a better test of the qualification of the voter than his going up to the poll without assistance. He recommended the consideration of this point to the Government in their promised Reform Bill.

MR. BASS said, he thought if the Bill had not been brought in at so late a period of the Session it would not have passed so readily. The Secretary of State had given an incontestable argument against the Bill when he admitted that the measure was incomplete, and that he intended next Session to deal with the whole question.

Motion made and Question put, "That the Bill do pass."

House divided:—Ayes 92; Noes 59: Majority 33.—Bill passed.

CORRUPT PRACTICES AT MUNICIPAL ELECTIONS.—QUESTION.

MR. CROSS said, he would beg to ask the Secretary for the Home Department whether, as he has stated that it is his intention to refer the whole question of Corrupt Practices at Elections to a Select Committee next Session, he will have any objection to state whether he will refer the subject of Corrupt Practices at Municipal Elections to the same Committee?

Mr. WALPOLE said, he wished that there should be no misunderstanding on this subject. What he had stated was, that a permanent measure dealing with the subject of Corrupt Practices at Elections would be brought in early next Session, and would be referred to a Select Committee. He did not use the words, "the whole question." Whether the Bill would include Corrupt Practices at Municipal Elections as well as at Parliamentary Elections, he could not now say; but his own opinion was, that the questions should be kept distinct.

THE WAR DEPARTMENT.—QUESTION.

COLONEL FRENCH said, he rose to ask whether Mr. Ramsay is still Superintendent of Clothing and Stores in the War Department, and retains his full salary and title; also, whether Mr. Webster, who was sent to Rencoi as Accomptant to the Hospital there, but who was sent back by the doctor, there not being anything for him to do, is still retained at a salary of £300 a year?

GENERAL PEEL replied, that Mr. Ramsay never held the office of Superintendent of Clothing and Stores, but he had been Assistant Director of Stores and Clothing. In consequence of some changes which had recently taken place, Mr. Ramsay had, for a time, been removed from the Department, but he still retained the office of Assistant Director of Stores at the same salary. With regard to Mr. Webster, he understood that on his return to England he was employed in examining certain accounts which were in arrear, that he was still so employed, and that whatever he might have had to do at Rencoi there was work enough in the office in which he was now engaged.

SIR JOHN LAWRENCE.—QUESTION.

MR. KINNAIRD said, he rose to ask whether it be the intention of Her Majesty's Government to recommend to Her Majesty the conferring of some signal mark of favour on Sir John Lawrence, in recognition of his long and distinguished services in India; and the more so, after his successful administration of the Provinces under his care, and the effectual aid which, by his instrumentality, was given to the capture of Delhi?

LORD STANLEY: It will, Sir, probably be remembered by the House that in November last Sir John Lawrence received the distinction of the Grand Cross of the Bath, and at the same time he received the thanks of Parliament by Resolution of both Houses. Since then a Despatch has been sent out by the Directors of the East India Company, directing that his salary of £7,200 a year as Chief Commissioner should be increased to the same amount as that of Lieutenant Governor—namely, £10,000 a year, and that its receipt should date from the 1st of January last. I mention these circumstances to show that the distinguished and invaluable services of Sir John Lawrence have not been overlooked by Her Majesty's Government. Whether any further recognition of his services should be conferred on Sir John Lawrence is a question at present under the consideration of the Government.

TROOPS FROM THE WEST INDIES. QUESTION.

MR. HANKEY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether it is true that orders have been sent out to the West Indies, or whether transports have been taken up in this country for the removal of the British Troops which are now remaining in those Colonies?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER; Sir, my right hon. Friend the Secretary for the Colonies is not present, but I can answer the question. It is not the intention of the Government to remove any Troops from the British Colonies in the West Indies.

ST. JAMES'S PARK.—QUESTION.

MR. GRIFFITH said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, whether, in any arrangement that may have been made for the sale or lease of Berkeley House to the Metropolitan Board of Works, care has been taken that sufficient space be reserved out of the premises to allow of a carriage entrance being made from Cockspur Street into the roadway surrounding St. James's Park.

MR. G. A. HAMILTON said, he was not aware that there was any intention of constructing a carriage road from Cockspur Street to St. James's Park, and no arrangement had been made on that subject with the Metropolitan Board of Works. The arrangements which had been made would, however, admit of the widening of the foot passage to about twenty-two feet, and if at any future period it should be deemed desirable to make a carriage road from Cockspur Street into the Park, such a road might be constructed to the eastward of the passage, where the property belonged to the Crown.

LAND TRANSPORT CORPS.—QUESTION.

LORD ADOLPHUS VANE-TEMPEST said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for War if the Report of the Committee of the Land Transport Corps has come under the consideration of Her Majesty's Government; and, if so, whether Her Majesty's Government are prepared to carry out the recommendation of the Committee, and to grant to the Officers of the Land Transport Corps the usual rate of half-pay of the ranks they held at the period of the disbandment of the Corps?

GENERAL PEEL said, the Report of the Land Transport Committee was under the consideration of the Government, but its recommendations would involve expenses which were not included in the estimate, and which it would be necessary to submit to the Treasury for their approval. He should be the last to keep any man out of the possession of what he might be fairly entitled to.

ECCLESIASTICAL COMMISSION BILL.

BILL PUT OFF.

MR. WALPOLE said, in reference to an Order of the Day which stood for twelve o'clock to-morrow, respecting the Ecclesiastical Commission Bill, he wished to say that, as his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer had fixed the India Bill for that time, and as he found there would be so much discussion on the measure, and as so many objections had been taken to the clauses, he did not think he could usefully press the Bill during the present Session, and he therefore proposed to move that the Order be discharged and the Bill withdrawn. He ought to intimate to an hon. Gentleman opposite, who was so much interested in the Bill, that he could give him an assurance that the principle recommended by the Committee of the House of Commons as to the renewal of leases for the benefit of the lessees would be preserved. He begged to move to discharge the Order for going into Committee on the Bill.

MR. INGHAM said, he was satisfied that if the provisions of the Bill had been more fully considered many of the objections which had been raised against it would have been withdrawn. It was a valuable Bill, though some portions might perhaps be questioned; but it contained principles which he trusted the right hon. Gentleman would in any future Bill take care to preserve.

Order read and discharged.

Committee put off till this day month.

Lord Adolphus Vane-Tempest

UNIVERSITIES (SCOTLAND) BILL.—LORDS' AMENDMENTS.

Order for Consideration read.

MR. DUNLOP said, that it was an unpleasant thing to be obliged to trouble the House again upon a subject which they had already so amply discussed, and which, being connected with a Scotch matter, was not likely to command any strong interest, though possibly, as the question now raised involved a general principle, it might prove an exception. But if the task were irksome to the House, how much more so must it be to himself? Being under the impression that, so far as the Government were concerned, no alteration would be made in the Bill in the House of Lords, he had gone down to Scotland with his mind perfectly at rest on the subject, when, to his surprise, he found not only that alterations had been made in this clause, which the Government having opposed in this House, they were equally entitled to oppose in the House of Lords, but that Clauses and Amendments which had been accepted by their own Lord Advocate, and agreed to unanimously by this House, had been rejected by the House of Lords upon the Motion of the noble Duke who had conducted the Bill through that House on the part of the Government. Now, with regard to these Clauses and Amendments—not the particular clause before the House—he thought that the Government having accepted them, and hon. Members having gone to Scotland relying on the good faith of the Government, it was not a proceeding that was calculated to ensure the confidence which was essential to carrying out the business of the House for the Government afterwards to consent to their omission. Reverting, however, to Clause 3, that clause, as it left this House, was as follows:—

"The Principals in the Universities of Glasgow, Aberdeen, and Edinburgh, appointed in time to come, shall not, as such, be or be deemed Professors of Divinity; nor shall it be a valid objection to any person appointed to the office of Principal in any of the said Universities that he is a layman; and no such office of Principal therein shall fall under or be included in the terms 'Chair of Theology' as used in an Act passed in the sixteenth and seventeenth years of the reign of Her Majesty Queen Victoria (chapter eighty-nine), intituled 'An Act to regulate Admission to the Lay Chairs in the Universities of Scotland.'"

The effect of this clause was that the Principals of the three Universities of Glasgow, Aberdeen, and Edinburgh, should not be required to sign a religious test, as holding the creed and profession of the Church of Scotland, and as Members of that Church; and what he now proposed was, that the House should disagree to the Lords' Amendments to that clause, and restore it to its original position in the Bill. In England the Universities were so essentially ecclesiastical, that English Members were apt to be carried away with the idea that the Scottish Universities were of the same character; but the Commissioners who were appointed under a Conservative Government, in 1826, who were men of very high standing, the most of them being Judges, noblemen, and persons held in great estimation, and whose tendencies and feelings were certainly not opposed to the Established Church, stated that the Scottish Universities were not then of an ecclesiastical character, or, in the ordinary sense and acceptation of the term, ecclesiastical corporations. It was true that the Scotch Universities were entitled to send a member to the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, which at first sight might appear to be the exercise of a function which was of an ecclesiastical character, but when he stated that that was a privilege enjoyed by the Town Council of any Royal Burgh in Scotland which had nothing ecclesiastical in its constitution, the House would at once see that that did not support the theory of the Scottish Universities being ecclesiastical institutions. The Commissioners also stated that the Universities of Scotland were not more connected with the Church of Scotland than any other profession; that they were intended for the general education of the people, and, in truth, possessed scarcely any ecclesiastical feature, except that they had a certain number of professors for the purpose of teaching theology in the same manner that the other sciences were taught. That being the character of the Universities in the year 1853, an Act was passed which relieved all the Professors of Divinity from taking the religious test which bound them to be members of the Church of Scotland, with the exception of the Principals of St. Leonard's, St. Andrew's, and Marischal Colleges, Aberdeen, but he presumed that it was never intended to bind the House for all time to come to maintain these Principalships as Chairs of Theology, provided circumstances rendered it right and proper to place them in a different position. He would now show the House why they should not be considered as Chairs of Theology. None of the Principals of the Scotish Universities had taught theology for two centuries, save in one single instance, in which it had been taught up to within a century and a half. They were nominal heads of Colleges. To be the Principal of Edinburgh, for instance, he was not required to be a clergyman; he was not a Professor of Theology at all. He held in his hand a Report of the College Committee of the Town Council of Edinburgh in 1847, when no question of test had arisen with regard to their powers in appointing laymen to the Principalship of the College of Edinburgh. The history of it was this, that in 1585 a gentleman was appointed as Principal of the College to teach philosophy, but not to teach theology, the appointment to which chair was an extra one; but in 1587, after giving a course of philosophy for two years, the Town Council gave him the additional appointment of lecturer on theology and an increase of salary. That continued until the year 1620, when they appointed a Professor of Theology and a Principal, who was Professor of Divinity, and this had been the practice ever since, the Principal having no charge in matters of theology and the Professor of Theology being the teacher of divinity. This was proved by the fact that in 1702 the Crown appointed an additional Professor of Theology, who, if the Principal were Primarius Professor of Divinity, would have been a third Professor of Theology. Again, at Aberdeen there were two Colleges,—that of Marischal College and King's College. In King's College, originally, the Principal was appointed to teach theology, but he had never done so until lately, when the present Principal was made Professor of Divinity. By this Bill King's College and Marischal College were to be united, and there would be only one Principal. The result would be that the Principal of the united College would be included in the term "Chair of Theology," as used in the Act of 1853, although by that Act, Marischal College and St. Leonards alone were included, and the Principals of all other Colleges, embracing King's College, were excluded. Then with regard to the Principal of the University of Glasgow, he (Mr. Dunlop) admitted that he was originally a Professor of Theology; but the Commissioners stated in their Report that, from the begining of the eighteenth century until now, he had not taught theology; but was merely the nominal head of the College, and not a Professor of Divinity at all. He submitted that the office of Principal ought to be open to men of eminence in any faculty, whether it were divinity, philosophy, medicine, or art. It was a high honour and dignity, and the more eminent the man the better was he entitled to the seat. When distinguished foreigners came into the country, they naturally communicated with the heads of colleges; and when they did so, they ought to find them the most eminent men the country can produce. Whilst, then, he would not exclude Professors of Theology from the office of Principal, he would throw it open and not keep it exclusively for Professors connected with the Church of Scotland. In conclusion he should therefore move that the Amendment of the Lords be disagreed to.

MR. BOUVERIE seconded the Motion.

MR. BLACKBURN said, the hon. Member for Greenock complained of having been put to the inconvenience of coming up from Scotland to oppose the Amendments made in the Bill by the House of Lords. Other hon. Members likewise, besides the hon. Member for Greenock, had been put to that inconvenience; but they had come up to support the Amendments of the House of Lords. The House, he was sure, would like to know what was the opinion of the high authorities who had already inquired into this matter, and the Commissioners who were appointed in the year 1826, who had inquired into the whole subject, and upon whose recommendation this Bill was founded, so far from thinking that the Principals of Colleges should not be attached to the Church of Scotland, strongly advised that they should be attached to that Church, and stated that it would be an evil if they were not. Previous to the year 1853, the Professors in the Universities of Scotland had been obliged to take the test of the Church of Scotland; but in that year an Act was passed setting free all the Chairs, except the Theological Chairs, from the necessity of taking that test. But the Principalship of the Universities had been always held to be a Theological Chair, and the matter had been so decided after having been debated in the Law Courts of Scotland. He was sorry that the hon. Member should raise this question now; for, in the Bill as it now stood, there was not a single question of a theological nature mooted; and the hon. Member for Greenock, who was himself one of the Commissioners under the Bill, would be able, if he could get his brother Commissioners to agree with him, to lay down the rules as to the way in which these very gentlemen should teach the different branches of divinity. It was true the hon. Gentleman had brought the matter before the House when the Bill was under discussion, and had carried his clause by a majority of 58; but there was no opportunity afforded for debating it. The right hon. Gentleman (the Lord Advocate) whose loss to this House they all so much regretted, spoke in reply; but it was not expected that there would be any debate, and hon. Members for Scotland were not prepared to speak. No opportunity was afforded for bringing forward any opposition to this clause till the Bill reached the House of Lords, and then the clause was struck out. He thought it would be most unadvisable that the House should lay down any absolute rule upon this matter without having full information on the subject. It would be much better to leave in the hands of the Commissioners, of whom the hon. Member for Greenock was one, to settle what should be the duties of the Principals, rather than to lay down any absolute law upon the subject. If the House should determine to replace the clause, it would be considered by the Church of Scotland, by whom the Principalship was looked upon as a theological office, as a blow aimed at her. It was agreed on all hands that the Bill was a most important one, and it would be a thousand pities if it were lost by a difference with the Lords on a subject with which the Bill in its original state, did not profess to deal. He hoped, therefore, that the House would agree to the Amendment of the Lords.

MR. CRUM EWING said, the Principals of Colleges were not Professors of Theology, or of any other science. They were the superintendents and heads of their respective colleges, and English Members would surely think it very absurd if it were made imperative that a clergyman of the Church of Scotland should superintend the teaching not only of divinity, but of Greek and Latin, of chemistry and mathematics, and even of midwifery. The fact was, it was never contended that the Principal should superintend any of these classes. The only reason why the Church of Scotland was so grasping in the matter was the mere selfish one of keeping the good places to themselves, to prevent them going to Dissenters, or even across the Border, where the patrons sometimes went to get persons who were not members of the Church of Scotland to fill important Chairs. He trusted that the English Members, whom the Scotch Members had assisted in resisting church rates—the Irish Members, whom the Scotch had assisted to remove many grievances, would now repay their obligations, and show that they were determined to put down this last act of intolerance.

LORD ELCHO said, he was anxious to say a few words on this question, as the terms of the Act of 1853 had been referred to, and because in the necessary absence of the Lord Advocate at that time, it was his duty, as a Member of the Government, to move the second reading of that Bill. That Bill rejected the religious test as applicable to all the chairs in the Scottish Universities except the theological chairs and the office of Principal; and, unquestionably, it was the understanding at that time that they agreed to the Bill in the light of a compromise. In proof of this, he would refer to what he said on moving the second reading of the Bill. The Bill was opposed by the late Sir Robert Inglis; but it happened that no Scotch Member opposed it, and he said he would promptly state to the House why it was not opposed by the Scotch Members. The truth was, that the measure was a compromise; and while it was opposed by the hon. Baronet, who held extreme opinions on one side, the measure was not very acceptable on the other to those hon. Gentlemen who desired the separation of Church and State. The present measure was a compromise between moderate men on both sides; and in proof that it was so, he might refer to the interpretation clause, which provided that the chairs, of which the Professors were still to take the test, would be the Chair of Divinity, Church History, Biblical Criticism, and Hebrew, and the office of Principal, with the exception of those that might at the time be held by laymen. Such was his explanation of the measure which passed in 1853. It therefore appeared to him that this clause would be a departure from what was generally admitted to be a compromise in 1853. He was still more confirmed in this when he remembered that in Committee on that measure his hon. Friend then attempted to force his views upon the House, and to open up the office of Principal to persons who were not members of the Church of Scotland, but he failed to succeed then. He was therefore disposed to resist the Motion of his hon. Friend, and to abide by the compromise agreed to in 1853.

MR. WALPOLE said, before going to a division, he wished to say a few words. He agreed with what had fallen from the noble Lord that in 1853 an alteration in the law took place with regard to the tests to be taken in the Scotch Universities. Before that the test was imposed upon all Principals and Professors without exception; but by the Bill of that year a new test was adopted and generally approved throughout Scotland, and was sanctioned by Parliament. The exceptions made were as to the Principals and Theological Professors; and if hon. Members would turn to the 5th clause they would find that the Theological Professorships were clearly defined to be the Chairs of Divinity, Church History, Biblical Criticism, and Hebrew, and the office of Principal; so that the Act of Parliament which settled the mode in which the tests were to be administered recognised the fact, which had always existed, that the Principals of the Universities were holders of Theological Chairs. The hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Dunlop) had made one observation which, with all deference to his superior knowledge, he thought was inaccurate. The hon. Gentleman said that the Principals were never practically teachers of divinity. Now, he had been told—and told on high authority—that the Principals of Edinburgh, Glasgow, and Aberdeen were at that moment teaching, and had long taught, classes in divinity. That he had been told; and he begged the House to notice that the effect of the Amendment would be this—that the Principals of Universities virtute officii would teach divinity no longer; and to that extent there would be a diminution in the teaching of divinity in the Universities of Scotland. For himself, he must frankly say that he did not see any great objection to a layman being Principal of a University. But when he found that a settlement of the whole question had been made by Parliament so late as 1853, he thought it was unadvisable to disturb that settlement now, and for that reason he was prepared to advocate—though he did no attach much importance to it—the continuance of the office of Principal as a theological office.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM said, he wished to say a few words on this question, which he found under discussion when he entered the House a few minutes before. He was bound to say that they were living in an age of progress. In 1846, when he was Secretary of State under Sir Robert Peel, it became his duty to resist a Motion for the repeal of these tests altogether, as regarded the Universities of Scotland. He did so to the best of his ability, urging those arguments which appeared to him the most forcible against the repeal. He had to struggle against the arguments urged on the other side by Lord Macaulay and the late Mr. Rutherfurd; and he was bound to state that he did not think the arguments he urged were the most cogent, though he carried his point by a small majority. In 1853, the compromise to which allusion had so often been made, was proposed when he was in the Earl of Aberdeen's Government, and the tests taken in the Scotch Universities were repealed with the full concurrence of the Government, excepting only those tests which were applicable to the divinity Professorships and the Principals. But he must frankly own he did not see on what grounds those tests could any longer be applied to Principals, or why laymen should not be Principals of the Universities of Scotland. He would not carry the discussion further. He felt bound to say that the Bill as it was sent up from the Commons to the Lords was right and defensible; he thought the alteration made in the Bill was imprudent and indefensible. He thought that Clause 3 should be restored, and he would therefore give his vote to disagree with the Lords' Amendments.

Mr. ROEBUCK said, the right hon. Gentleman said this was an age of progress. He would use another word which perhaps meant the same thing—it was a time of change. One of the greatest changes that had ever taken place in Scotland was the change that had there occurred with respect to ecclesiastical organization. A few years ago the large majority of its population were members of the Established Church. Now the Established Church of Scotland did not number more than one-third of the population. He maintained that the institutions of the country ought to change so as to be adapted to the change in the opinions of the inhabitants. He was prepared to support the application of that principle to the national Universities. No man need tell him at this time of day that they were bound to choose the Principals of those Universities from among the clergymen of the Church of Scotland, which was supported only by a third of the population. Such a proposition was absolutely absurd. It would shut out from presiding as Principals of the Universities many of the greatest names in Scotland, and the men most worthy of the office. He would therefore oppose to the uttermost this change in the Bill which had been made by the Lords.

Mr. DUNLOP observed, he had one word to say in explanation. The right hon. Secretary for the Home Department had stated, in contradiction to a remark of his, that the Principals of the Universities of Edinburgh, Glasgow, and Aberdeen, taught divinity classes. That was perfectly true, but it was because they held the office of Professors of Theology separate and distinct from that of Principal, and what he said was that the office of Principal did not bind them to teach theology.

Viscount PALMERSTON said, he did not like and could not admit this doctrine of compromise which had been laid down, founded upon transactions which took place several years ago. This Bill was brought forward on the principle of remodelling the whole system of the Universities of Scotland, and whatever might have been agreed to in former years, that agreement must share the fate of all the other arrangements, and they must consider every point of the system as equally open to discussion. Now the question had been well debated while the Bill was before the House. The Bill passed, and that clause which had been struck out by the Lords was affirmed by a majority of the House. He thought therefore the House ought to abide by the clause, and if the Lords found that this House was firm in asserting the principle contained in this clause, he had no doubt that they would not resist the opinion of this House.

Motion agreed to.

Lords' Amendment disagreed to.

Mr. DUNLOP said, there was another Amendment the Lords had made on a clause which was adopted in this House with the full consent of the Government. He did not know whether the Government meant now to stand by the alteration the Lords had made. It was a question which referred to the election of Lord Rector of the Universities. It was resolved that the Rector should be elected by the matriculated students. It was then proposed that the Professors should be joined with the students in the election, but it was objected that it was not desirable that the Professors should be joint electors—and often, perhaps, placed in opposition—with their students. The Government agreed that the Professors should not be joined with the students in the election, but the Professors had been re-inserted in the Lords. It was not a matter of great importance, one way or other, and he would not divide upon the question ; but he hoped the Government themselves would disagree with the Amendment, as he thought it was very undesirable that the Professors should be made co-electors with the young students.

Lords' Amendment disagreed to.

On Lords' Amendment, striking out Clause 26,

MR. WALPOLE said, he wished to say one word as to this clause. When it was first brought forward in this House, it was not opposed by the Lord Advocate, and as he did not think it right to oppose the clause on its first introduction to the House, he should think it was an act of bad taste if he were to act contrary to the opinion of his learned Friend.

MR. BLACKBURN said, he knew how difficult it was to object, but he was sure the House was not aware of what it was doing. The Crown had raised a question as to its right to dispose of certain property, to which Glasgow College also asserted its claim. The matter had been mooted more than 100 years ago, it was raised again in 1807, and it was before the Courts at the present moment ; and now the House was asked to decide in favour of the Crown a question which was actually at this moment a matter of litigation. He knew, however, it was in vain to divide upon the question, but he protested against the wrong that was done.

Amendment disagreed to.

Committee appointed,—

"To draw up Reasons to be assigned to the Lords for disagreeing to the Amendments to which this House hath disagreed :"—Mr. DUNLOP, Viscount PALMERSTON, Sir JAMES GRAHAM, Mr. ROEBUCK, Mr. BLACK, Mr. CRAUFURD, and Sir EDWARD COLEBROOKE.

To withdraw immediately; three to be the quorum.

LAW OF PROPERTY AMENDMENT BILL.

BILL PUT OFF.

Order for Consideration, as amended, read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now taken into consideration."

MR. ROLT said, the Bill contained thirty clauses. It was not founded on the Report of a Commission, it was not introduced by Government, and it had not received that degree of care and consideration which was usual in Bills of this sort. It was not because he thought that, if there were time for full consideration, the Bill ought to be rejected, but because he thought it ought not to be passed without careful consideration that he moved, as an Amendment, that the Bill be recommitted.

Amendment proposed,—

To leave out from the word "be," to the end of the Question, in order to add the word "recommitted," instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, among the many disappointments in matters of legislation to which he had been doomed to submit during the latter part of this Session, nothing had cost him more pain than the necessity he felt under of consenting, as he most reluctantly did, to the withdrawal of this Bill. The Bill had emanated from, he might almost say, the greatest lawyer of his time in respect to the subjects to which the Bill related. It underwent great discussion in the House of Lords, and it passed the Committee of that House at last with the entire assent of all the law Lords. It was calculated, he believed, to effect many and great improvements upon points on which every member of the community was deeply interested. But he was bound to admit that, as it now came down to this House at this late period of the Session, his hon. and learned Friend had by no means misrepresented the case when he said there had been no opportunity of discussing a single clause of the Bill in this House, and he did not think it would be respectful to the House to press the Bill forward now.

MR. MALINS expressed his satisfaction at the withdrawal of the Bill.

Amendment and Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Bill put off for a month.

ADMINISTRATION OF OATHS BY COMMITTEES BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. MOWBRAY, in moving the Second Reading of this Bill, said the object of it was to enable Committees, if they thought fit, to administer oaths to witnesses, and also to enable witnesses to be sworn before Committees of the House of Lords, instead of being sworn at the bar of the House.

Bill read 2°, and committed for To-morrow at Twelve o'clock.

HARBOURS OF REFUGE.

COMMISSION MOVED FOR.

Mr. WILSON said, he rose to call attention to the Report of the Select Committee upon Harbours of Refuge, and move an Address for the appointment of a Royal Commission, in order to the inquiry in the terms recommended in that Report. It was not necessary for him to detain the House at any length on the question, as he believed the Government were willing to grant the inquiry he had in view. The Committee, to whose Report his Motion referred, was appointed by the House, at the request of the late Government, under these circumstances. The House and the Government had been frequently applied to for the purpose of sanctioning the erection of harbours and the expenditure of public money on the different parts of the coast. The great objections that had been raised, not only by the Government, but by the House, had been that no inquiry had been made as to those parts of the coast where these improvements were required; and contentions had taken place as to which point of the coast the harbours should be erected at. In order to remedy those inconveniences, the late Government thought it wise and prudent that a Committee should be appointed. That Committee had been appointed early in 1857, and it had investigated the subject during that and a portion of the present Session. And if hon. Members would refer to their Report, they would find that the enormous losses of life and property which took place every year on our coast were such as to fully justify any Government in taking some decided step on a matter of such importance. In five years there were 5,128 casualties on our coast, of which 2,184 resulted in wrecks or total loss, and 2,944 in damages of smaller or greater degree. During the same period 4,148 persons lost their lives, or an average of 830 every year. Moreover the mere money value of these losses amounted, according to the evidence, to an average of £1,500,000 per annum. These two facts alone, he thought, should be a sufficient inducement for this House carefully to consider the subject, and try to remedy the crying evils which resulted from the present condition of our coast. These losses were contingent to a great degree on the crowded state of our waters, arising from the great increase which had of late taken place in our shipping. In 1843 the amount of tonnage of British shipping which entered or cleared from ports or harbours of the three kingdoms was 7,181,000 tons, and of foreign tonnage 2,643,000—making altogether 9,824,000 tons of shipping. That was fifteen years ago, while last year the amount of British tonnage was 13,694,000, and of foreign 9,484,000, making a total of 23,178,000 tons. Thus the increase within fifteen years had been more than 130 per cent, and this increase had not been caused by any sudden or momentary impulse; it had been gradual and steady, and even in 1857 was equal to that of any preceding year. There was, therefore, every reason to suppose that this great development would proceed at the same rapid rate as heretofore, and if the crowded state of our waters now led to such enormous loss of property and of life, it was reasonable to expect that that loss would increase proportionately with the increase in our trade unless means were taken to afford greater facilities to shipping upon our coast. Another proof of the rapid growth of our shipping was, that in 1843 the amount of tonnage built in this country was 83,000, while last year it was 250,000 tons. What, then, under such circumstances was the duty of the Government and of this House? As a general rule, the Committee over which he presided had confined their attention chiefly to the question of harbours of refuge, strictly so called, and they had examined upwards of sixty witnesses, among whom were Captain Washington and Captain Veitch, of the Admiralty, Captain Sullivan, of the Board of Trade, professional gentlemen of great eminence, and local engineers and practical men who navigated our coast. The labours of the Committee, he thought, entitled their Report to consideration from the House, and that Report was, he trusted, a fair statement of the facts and summary of the evidence adduced. Generally speaking, they found that the coasts of the United Kingdom were well studded with natural harbours. The attention of the Committee, however, had been concentrated upon a few important points. The first part of the coast which had come specially under notice was that lying between Pentland Frith and the Frith of Forth in Scotland, and in the case of that line of coast the recommendation of the Committee was, that the inquiry should be as large as possible. Of course, the precise spots at which harbours of refuge should be formed was a question upon which it was impossible for an up-stairs Committee to come to any precise conclusion; but they had indicated the locality at which it was desirable that as the coast contained no large natural harbours, harbours of refuge should be erected. The part of the coast which had come next under their consideration was that stretching from St. Abb's to Flamborough Head in Yorkshire, between which points, it appeared, there was no secure retreat for shipping. Now, this line of coast was an important one, including, as it did, Newcastle, Shields, Tynemouth, Sunderland, Hartlepool, and Whitby. In that case, also, the Committee had recommended that no precise locality should be fixed upon, but that the advantages which any portion of the coast possessed for the construction there of a harbour of refuge might form the subject of inquiry. With respect to the east coast of England, the Committee had come to the conclusion that, inasmuch as it was furnished with such places of refuge as the Wash, the Humber, Yarmouth-roads, and the Thames, it was amply well supplied in that particular, while the existence of the Harbour of Dovor—though not, he was ready to admit, so much a harbour of refuge as of defence—of the new harbour at Portland, which, when finished, would be one of the most magnificent places of refuge in the world, and of the natural harbours of Falmouth and Plymouth upon the south coast rendered it in the eyes of the Committee inexpedient that any expenditure of public money should be incurred in that quarter. Directing their attention, however, to the line of coast which lay between the Land's End and the Bristol Channel, the Committee had found that there was in that direction a great want of harbours of refuge. They had, therefore, advised the formation of a harbour at St. Ives or some other neighbouring place for coasting vessels, and another in the Bristol Channel for the foreign trade. The trade of South Wales in iron and coals was increasing so fast that the Channel would soon vie for its crowded condition with the north-east coast. With those exceptions, there was no point on the coast of Great Britain at which the Committee had deemed it necessary that expenditure should be incurred, especially when they took into account that a magnificent harbour at Holyhead was now rapidly progressing towards completion. Turning to Ireland, they had ascertained that there were three points at which it was desirable that something should be done with the view of affording greater security to shipping. One of those was Carlingford Bay, which simply required that a large sandbank at its entrance should be removed, in order to render it a magnificent harbour, capable of admitting the largest class of vessels. Then, there was Waterford Bay, to which a precisely similar observation applied; and, lastly, Portrush, on the north coast of Ireland, which, by means of natural rocks, called the Skerries, formed an almost natural harbour, but which, owing to the fact that the interstices between those rocks did not admit a sufficient amount of water to endanger vessels, would require that a sum of about £100,000 should be laid out upon it before it could be made thoroughly available as a harbour of refuge. By these means the northern route from Liverpool to America might be made as good as the southern one, which was becoming rapidly insufficient for the commerce of the Atlantic. Those to which he had adverted were the only points along the coasts of those islands which the Committee had recommended as the sites of public works; but in making that statement, he was by no means prepared to contend that the Commission which was about to be appointed might not extend beyond them the scope of its inquiry. He was at the same time of opinion that the Government should be extremely careful with respect to allowing an extension of the limits of the inquiry, because the result might be that the whole question would again be raised, and that works of urgent importance would not in the meantime be constructed with that expedition which was desirable. According to the estimates, the construction of harbours of refuge at the places pointed out would cost about £2,000,000; but if the amount should turn out to be £2,500,000 or even £3,000,000, they must remember, as he had stated, that the annual loss by shipwreck amounted in value to the sum of £1,500,000, which was the subtraction of so much money from the aggregate capital of the country, while the loss of life amounted annually to 800 persons. The evil which the House was called upon to remedy was not one of a merely speculative character, but one which either as involving considerations, of humanity, or of pounds, shillings, and pence, demanded the most serious attention. Of the expenditure which it would be necessary to incur in order to obviate that evil, it had been suggested that the shipping interest ought to bear a portion. In that view he had concurred, because he thought the advocates of the establishment of harbours of refuge would come to that House with a better chance of success if they could state that the classes more immediately interested in the question were prepared to contribute to the attainment of the object which they sought to accomplish. There were others, he was aware, who held a contrary opinion, and he, for one, should offer no opposition to the payment of the whole of the expenditure out of the public money, should that course be deemed the one which it was most expedient to adopt. He did not, however, think that it would be wise to discuss that question at present, deeming it more advisable that it should be left for the future consideration of the Government. The inexhaustible resources of our trade and commerce had been shown by the immense increase of our exports, but our shores were limited in extent and our ports limited in number. It was, therefore, our duty to provide as much accommodation and security for the ships which frequented our coasts as ingenuity and capital could provide. He thanked the Government for the readiness with which they had met his proposal for the appointment of a Commission, and hoped that its labours would result to the advantage of the country.

Mr. Mowbray

MR. LINDSAY said, he rose to second the Motion, and in doing so he would observe that he had never read a Report which contained more valuable information than that of the Committee on Harbours of Refuge. He rejoiced that the Government assented to the appointment of the Commission, but hoped that the inquiries of the Commissioners would be limited to the evidence that was adduced before the Committee, otherwise there would be a constant competition of corporations as to the best sites for Harbours of Refuge. He would recommend that the Commissioners should have a steamer placed at their disposal, a competent and unprejudiced engineer, that they should be furnished with the Report of the Select Committee, with the evidence given before it, and all other necessary documents; and, thus it was provided, that they should visit the various places indicated in that evidence, and, if necessary, take any additional evidence upon the spot, the capabilities of which they could examine for themselves. The Report pointed out that the main difficulty was the question of how the means were to be raised, and he was glad to find that the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Wilson) seemed to have arrived at the conclusion that the construction of harbours of refuge was a national object, and that their cost ought to be defrayed out of the Consolidated Fund. The system of passing tolls had, he thought, been universally condemned. It might seem a small thing to impose a tax of a penny a ton upon vessels passing these harbours; but while harbours of refuge would serve also for commercial harbours the result of the application of passing tolls would be that they would tax the ships of other ports to defray the cost of a harbour which would be a rival to them. He thought, therefore, that this should be treated as a national question, and that the Government would feel that, as a great maritime people, it was our duty to provide for the security, not only of the lives and properties of our fellow-subjects, but also of those foreigners who visited our coasts for the purposes of commerce.

Motion made and Question proposed,—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that Her Majesty will be graciously pleased to give directions for the appointment of a Royal Commission, to complete the inquiry in the terms recommended in the Report of the Select Committee of this House in the present Session on Harbours of Refuge."

LORD ADOLPHUS VANE-TEMPEST said, he could bear his cordial testimony to the ability and fairness with which the Chairman of the Committee had presided over its proceedings. He rose, however, for the purpose of remarking that one-half of the wrecks which took place on the coast of England took place on the north-east coast. He thought, therefore, that that coast had especial claim to the attention of the Commission, and he hoped he should receive from the First Lord of the Admiralty an assurance that this should be given. He also hoped to receive from the right hon. Baronet a pledge that he would see to the impartial constitution of the Commission, and that in every particular any engineer placed upon it should be free from local bias. He thought it was impossible to regard this as other than a national question, when they looked at the waste of life and property that took place annually on our coast from the want of harbours of refuge; and, therefore, he quite concurred in the propriety of constructing these works out of the public funds, although he would be willing that a small tax should be laid on the shipping interests rather than the works should be delayed.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: Sir, I have stated on a former occasion that it was the intention of the Government to grant this Commission. It is, therefore, quite unnecessary that I should detain the House by following either the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Wilson) or any of the other speakers in the remarks they have made. But I cannot help saying that I agree with the hon. Gentleman opposite that the Committee to whom this important inquiry was entrusted have done full justice to the interest and importance of the subject. I have read with great interest the able Report which has been presented to the House by the hon. Gentleman opposite, who was Chairman of the Committee, and I do think, and on behalf of the Government I am glad to be able to say, that I think the Report of that Committee fully justifies the recommendation it has given, and on that ground we have felt it to be our duty to concede the Commission which the Report recommended. The wish and intention of the Government will be to constitute a Commission both competent and impartial, and I hope that on the part of the House there will be no indisposition to provide the funds necessary to carry out a work that I believe to be extremely important for the protection of that shipping which has been increasing, and is increasing with such astonishing rapidity, and which is so closely connected with the welfare and prosperity of the country.

MR. DODSON said, that he did not wish to depreciate the value of the wreck chart appended to the Report of the Committee, but it afforded, after all, a very inadequate criterion of the real loss sustained on various parts of the coast. It indicated only the number of vessels lost, and not the comparative value of the property or the number of lives; whereas, he contended, that if the value of the shipping wrecked and the number of the lives lost were taken as the test, the southern coast would have an equal, if not greater, claim for consideration than the coast between Flamborough Head and St. Abb's Head, which had been described as the most dangerous. It appeared that in the five years from 1852 to 1856 inclusive 763 vessels were wrecked between Flamborough Head and St. Abbs, while between Portsmouth and Dovor only 177 vessels were wrecked in the same period. But he found, on referring to the registers kept at the Admiralty and the Board of Trade, that the 763 vessels wrecked between Flamborough Head and St. Abbs involved the loss of 260 lives, while the 177 vessels wrecked between Portsmouth and Dovor involved the loss of as many as 218 lives. It was, therefore, clear that even apart from military considerations, the claims of the south coast upon the attention of the Committee were very great indeed. The hon. Member for Teignmouth had spoken as if the Committee had come to a decision with reference to the mode of paying the expenses that might be incurred, but he did not understand that the Committee had made any distinct recommendation that the charge of these harbours should be defrayed by a passing toll upon shipping; they had only recommended that a portion of the charge should be defrayed by the shipping interest. And he did not think that they were pledged to any particular suggestion with respect to the mode of defraying the expense of these harbours.

SIR FREDERICK SMITH said, he thought the country were much indebted to the Government for the readiness with which they had consented to the appointment of a Commission, which he hoped would be immediately appointed and would consist of competent and impartial persons. As to the mode in which the construction of these harbours should be paid for, that was a matter for the subsequent consideration of Parliament. It was premature to discuss it then, for they did not even know what the cost of these works would be.

MR. CLAY said, that the Government had done a great national service in consenting to the appointment of a Commission, and that service would be increased if they should eventually decide that the cost of the construction of harbours of refuge should be defrayed out of the Consolidated Fund. The erection of such harbours was a national duty, and the advantage derived from them would not be confined to the shipping interest alone. He hoped the Government would not, in this case, fall into the error which had so much prevailed of late years, that particular classes of the community ought to pay for what were great national works. When the Commission reported, it would be time to consider the best mode of paying the expenses; but he hoped the fact would not be lost sight of, that these harbours of refuge would be for the benefit of the whole community, and not of the shipping interest only.

MR. M'CANN said, he agreed in all that had been said in praise of the Committee, but complained that they had overlooked an important part of the Irish coast, near Skerries, in the county of Dublin. He hoped that the attention of the Commissioners would be drawn to that harbour. For many years past petitions had been presented to that House, from Scotland as well as Ireland, in favour of a harbour of refuge at Skerries, which was easy of approach, and a good hauling ground. He would therefore move an addition to the Motion, directing the Commissioners to extend their inquiry to the harbour of Skerries, as regarded its capabilities and circumstances as a site for a harbour of refuge.

Amendment proposed,—

At the end of the Question to add the words, "and to extend their inquiries to the Harbour of Skerries, in the county of Dublin, as regards its capabilities and circumstances as a site for a Harbour of Refuge."

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

MR. INGHAM said, he had no doubt that, under the terms of their Commission, the Commissioners would have full power to institute the inquiry suggested by his hon. Friend. He hoped, however, that the whole body of Commissioners would not be expected to inquire into the four divisions of the question which had been recommended for consideration, but that the work would be distributed among them in such a manner that their inquiries might be brought to a simultaneous conclusion.

MR. YOUNG observed, that only one hon. Member connected with the ports on the eastern coast had been placed upon the Committee; but, as representing Yarmouth, he might state that his constituents regarded this subject with considerable interest. The harbour accommodation at Yarmouth was amply sufficient for the trade of the port; but, as the most easterly point on the coast, the place was in time of war a naval station of great importance, and an immense amount of shipping passed through the roads every year. He thought, therefore, that the attention of the Commissioners ought to be specially directed to that part of the coast. As many as 2,000 ships had been known to pass through Yarmouth Roads in a day; there were frequently from 1,000 to 1,400 vessels of various sizes at anchor in the roads, which comprised the space of water between the mainland and some sands which lay about two miles out at sea. He was sorry to add that there was scarcely ever a gale, especially from N.N.E. or S.S.W., in which loss of life did not occur. Efficient shelter for shipping might be provided by comparatively small expenditure, and he hoped the attention of the Commissioners would be directed to the subject.

MR. RIDLEY said, he wished to express his satisfaction at the statement of the hon. Member for Devonport, and his conviction that, if the Commissioners followed the course of inquiry suggested by the Committee, the result of their investigations would be most advantageous, not only to the maritime interests of Great Britain, but to those of the whole world.

MR. GRANT DUFF said, he wished to express his thanks to the right hon. Gentleman for having promised that the Commission should be both impartial and competent. He also wished to observe that the Committee did not receive any evidence as to the desirableness of constructing small tidal harbours of refuge. He wished to know whether there would be any opportunity of laying such evidence before the Commission. Many parts of the coast of Scotland required small harbours of refuge, and it was owing to the want of such that forty-two seamen lost their lives some months ago on the Banffshire coast.

MR. G. A. HAMILTON said, he was unable to explain why it was that no evidence had been taken before the Committee with regard to the harbour of Skerries; but he believed it was the opinion of nautical men who were competent judges, that there was no place on the eastern coast of Ireland the fitness of which as a harbour of refuge ought more to be inquired into. As he understood his hon. Friend (Mr. Wilson), he did not wish to exclude the Commission from inquiring into any particular locality within the four divisions which they might conceive to be fit and proper to convert into a harbour of refuge. And, of course, it would be an important question auxiliary to that to inquire how far the smaller harbours might be assisted. It would be the first duty of the Commissioners, however, to follow the line which was chalked out in the Report of the Committee, and direct their attention to such great harbours of refuge as were necessary for the protection of life and property along the coast. He felt that the utmost credit was due to his hon. Friend (Mr. Wilson) for the part he had taken in reference to this important subject. His hon. Friend had been instrumental in the first instance in promoting this great inquiry; and all he (Mr. Hamilton) would say on behalf of the Government was that in the selection of the members of the Commission the greatest possible judgment would be exercised, and those only appointed in whose experience, efficiency, and impartiality the public would have the greatest confidence.

MR. PHILIPPS observed, that it would be inexpedient to add any particular harbour to the Motion; for if that were done in one instance, hon. Members might wish to do it in others. At the same time he was anxious that the question of improving existing tidal harbours should not be neglected by the Commission.

MR. HATCHELL urged an inquiry into the necessity of establishing harbours of refuge on the coast of Wexford, the evidence taken by the Committee on that part of Ireland being very meagre and unsatisfactory.

LORD HARRY VANE said, he wished to express his gratification at the determination of the Government to appoint a Royal Commission to inquire into the best points for the construction of harbours of refuge along the coast, as the loss of life and property owing to the increase of commerce had greatly increased of late years. He anticipated the most gratifying results from the Commission, but he trusted that the inquiry which the Commission were to institute would embrace all the circumstances connected with the different localities.

ADMIRAL WALCOTT said, he thought that great praise was due to the Committee for the ability and judgment with which they had fulfilled their task. The formation of these harbours would unquestionably effect a great saving of life and property, and that was the duty of all Governments. He knew from his own experience that to avoid the payment of harbour dues ships had been wrecked and lives lost, and therefore he trusted that the Commission would direct their attention to those dues. He was confident that when the Commission made their Report the House would not be niggardly in the performance of its duty.

MR. WILSON said, he hoped that the hon. Member for Drogheda (Mr. M'Cann) would not persevere with his Amendment; because, although he did not deny the merits of Skerries Harbour, the authorities of the harbour had been exceedingly remiss in not bringing the case before the Committee. He had no doubt that it would not be overlooked by the Commissioners; but it was obvious that if the Motion went beyond the limit to which the Committee went in their Report, there would be no end to the inquiry.

MR. J. H. HAMILTON said, he also would recommend the hon. Member to withdraw his Amendment.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he did not think they ought to look forward to any part of the expense of the proposed harbour being met by passing tolls. The advantage of harbours of refuge would be greatly reduced if they were not thrown open freely to every flag and every vessel that passed our shores, and he for one would never consent to levy a passing toll upon shipping for their support; but he would be ready at any time to vote a large sum of money to be laid out for the purpose of averting that national scandal, the enormous loss of life which now annually took place along our shores.

CAPTAIN MANGLES said, that unless the Commission which was about to be appointed exercised a good deal of caution, a large amount of money would be wasted to very little purpose. The idea of harbours of refuge was remarkably popular with shore-going men, and with hon. Members who represented seaports—and no doubt it looked very pretty upon paper—but until both the foreign and the coasting trade should be carried on much more generally than it was at present by steamboats, harbours of refuge would be really vain and useless things. An experienced seaman navigating a sailing vessel always avoided the shore when a gale came on, and he did not think, therefore, that the advantages which kind and philanthropic people were apt to attribute to harbours of refuge were likely to result from their more general establishment. He cautioned the Government to be careful how they listened to representations from the county of Wexford and distant ports, the inhabitants of which were all anxious to have harbours, and not to be led away by the idea that the insurance upon vessels which had to pass harbours of refuge would be lessened in consequence. He pointed to the hardship imposed upon London shipowners in having to pay duties for passing Ramsgate Harbour, when it was notorious that ships of a certain burden could not enter it, and instead of multiplying the occasions for these imposts, he called upon the Government to diminish those which already existed.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Resolved,—

That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that Her Majesty will be graciously pleased to give directions for the appointment of a Royal Commission, to complete the inquiry in the terms recommended in the Report of the Select Committee of this House in the present Session on Harbours of Refuge.

House adjourned at Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, July 27, 1858.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—2ª Militia Pay; Consolidated Fund (Appropriation); Metropolis Local Management Act Amendment; Drafts on Bankers Law Amendment; Militia (Service Abroad) Act Continuance; Militia Act Continuance (No. 2); Corrupt Practices Prevention Act Continuance; Civil Bills, &c., (Ireland) Act Amendment; Judgments (Ireland) Act Amendment; New Writs.

3ª Local Government; Joint Stock Banking Companies; County Property Conveyance; Legitimacy Declaration; Chelsea Bridge Act Amendment; Returns to Secretary of State; Detached Parts of Counties; Lunatics (Scotland) Act Amendment; Herring Fisheries (Scotland); Copyhold Acts Amendment.

INDIA.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH, referring to the Correspondence which had been presented to the other House of Parliament, moved that there should be laid before their Lordships copies of a letter addressed by himself, as President of the Board of Control, to the Court of Directors, on the 28th of April last, and of a memorandum, written by Sir G. Clerk, Secretary of the India Board, on the subject referred to in that letter.

Ordered.

THE BANKRUPTCY COURT AT MANCHESTER.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY presented two petitions, one from the Directors of the Chamber of Commerce, and the other from the Law Association of Manchester, complaining of the conduct of William Thomas Jemmett, Esq., a Commissioner of the Court of Bankruptcy in Manchester, in contracting debts which he is not able to pay; and praying for the adoption of measures for the purpose of removing the said Thomas William Jemmett from the said office.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR was obliged to his noble Friend for having informed him of his intention to present these petitions and communicated to him their contents. It was with the greatest pain he had read the statements contained in them, more especially as the gentleman to whom they referred was one with whom he had been on terms of intimacy. As Lord Chancellor, however, he had no power to interfere in the matter, for although the appointment of Commissioners of Bankrupts rested with him, he could not remove them for misconduct.

VOTE OF THANKS TO GOVERNOR GENERAL OF INDIA, &c.

SIR JAMES OUTRAM AND MR. HALLIDAY.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR acquainted the House that he had received a letter from the Viscount Canning, Governor General of the British Possessions in the East Indies, inclosing letters from Major General Sir James Outram, G.C.B., and the Hon. Frederick James Halliday, Lieutenant Governor of Bengal, in return to the Thanks of this House and to the Resolutions of the 8th of February and 16th of March last, communicated to him in obedience to Orders of this House of the said 8th of February and 16th of March.

The said letters being read, were ordered to lie on the table, and to be entered on the Journals.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

Bill read 3ª (according to Order).

Amendments made.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON to add at the end of Clause 44—

"In any District where the provisions of the said Act for the Prevention of Smoke are not now in force in which the Local Board shall resolve that any one or more of such processes should be exempted from penalties for not consuming all Smoke for any time specified in such Resolution, not exceeding ten years, which may be annually renewed for a similar or any shorter period, if the Board shall think fit; and any Justice or Justices before whom any person shall be summoned may remit the Penalty in any Case within such District in which he or they shall be of opinion that such person has adopted the best known means for preventing any nuisance from smoke, and has carefully attended to the same, so as to consume as far as possible the smoke arising from any process so exempted during such time as any such resolution shall extend to, unless an order shall be issued by one of Her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State directing that such exemption shall no longer be continued in such district to such processes or any of them after a time specified in such order."

Captain Mangles

LORD REDESDALE opposed the Amendment, and drew attention to the provisions of the clause incorporated in the Bill the clauses of the Towns Improvement Act (1847) with respect to the prevention of smoke, subject to the qualification that they should not extend to any of the following processes—namely, the coking of coal, the calcining of ironstone or limestone, the making or burning of bricks, earthenware, quarries, tiles, or pipes, the raising of any mines or minerals, the smelting of iron ores, the refining, puddling, shingling, and rolling of iron or other metals, or to the melting and casting of iron into castings, or to the manufacture of glass. The noble Lord said that the effect of this qualification would be practically to repeal those beneficial clauses in the Towns Improvement Act which compelled a great variety of noxious trades to consume their own smoke. Because the great manufacturers who were engaged in these trades choose to say that they could not consume their smoke, they were to be exempted under this Bill without any sufficient cause being shown, and the result would be to bring the smoke nuisance into many places where it had not existed before. He remembered, when they first attempted to legislate upon this subject, that the potteries on the south side of the river declared that they would not be able to carry on their business if they were compelled to construct smoke-consuming furnaces; but experience had proved that there was really no practical ground for these exemptions. He moved that the whole of the qualification should be omitted from the clause.

THE EARL OF DERBY defended the clause, on the ground that if it were altered as proposed it would lead to a great interference with private rights.

LORD REDESDALE pressed his objection, and urged at all events that earthenware works should be excluded from the exemption.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON refused to alter the clause.

LORD REDESDALE: Then I warn your Lordships that this Bill is a mistake, and that it will throw the greatest obstacle in the way of the consumption of smoke that can well be devised. After the passing of this Bill we shall rapidly fall into every one of the old nuisances with regard to smoke from which, after many years of struggling, we have at length succeeded in emancipating ourselves.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE suggested that it would be prudent not to pass the Bill at present. It was all very well to say that private interests were concerned. No doubt they were; but they were concerned in bringing back a most objectionable nuisance. He reminded their Lordships that when they began to legislate upon this subject every trade without exception declared that it would be impossible to conduct its business if it were compelled to consume its own smoke. Step by step, however, trade after trade had been drawn within the meshes of the law, until at last all had found that they were able to do what the law required. He earnestly entreated the House not to take any retrograde step in this matter, and not to exempt any trade which was at present within the law for the prevention of smoke. If they did they would have all their work to do over again, and it might be years before they could pass an effectual Smoke Prevention Act. The difficulty in which they now found themselves involved afforded another illustration of the inconvenience of deferring important measures of this nature to so late a period of the Session.

THE DUKE OF BUCCLEUCH also expressed a hope that some Amendment would be made in this Bill to compel manufactories in large towns to consume their own smoke.

After some further conversation,

THE EARL OF DERBY suggested that the passing of the Bill should be postponed until to-morrow, in order that an Amendment might be agreed on which would carry out the object desired.

Further Debate adjourned till To-morrow.

METROPOLIS LOCAL MANAGEMENT ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, the Bill to which I now invite your Lordships to give a second reading is one of considerable importance, and, as those must admit who have recently experienced the state of the river, of great urgency. Fortunately, the manner in which it has been sent up by the other House does not involve the necessity on our part of entering into a discussion of all the various schemes which have been proposed for remedying that which is an undoubted nuisance. The first question to be considered in dealing with this great subject was, at whose expense the necessary works for the purification of the Thames and the better drainage of the metropolis ought to be carried on. It was contended, on the one hand, that it was merely a local work, affecting the metropolis alone, as similar works affected other great towns; while, on the other hand, it was argued that the metropolis stood in a position quite apart from all other towns—that it was the seat of the Legislature, of the courts of law, and of the various public offices, and that, consequently, there was a fair claim on the part of the metropolis that some portion of the expense should be borne by the general public. It was thought, and justly thought, by the House of Commons, however, that, although it is quite true that the metropolis is an object of general interest, yet that, inasmuch as the presence of all the great public Departments brings a great concourse of persons to the metropolis, and adds materially to its wealth, there is no ground for not applying to the metropolis the same principle in this respect which is applied to all other towns. I cannot but express my opinion that the importance of the step now to be taken can hardly be overrated, because it is an experiment upon a gigantic scale which certainly will serve either for an example or a warning to all the other great towns of the country. Not the Thames only, but all the other rivers in this country have become polluted to a degree which renders it absolutely necessary that some steps should be taken for their purification. On a small scale I believe that successful operations have been conducted with this view at Leicester, and that the inhabitants of Glasgow—much to their credit—are endeavouring to carry out important works of the same kind. If the metropolis, therefore, were to receive a certain portion of assistance from the public funds, I can hardly conceive on what grounds applications for similar assistance from Edinburgh, Dublin, and what I may term the "provincial metropolises" generally, could be refused. I confess that my own opinion is, that this is a work which should be performed by the metropolis for the benefit of the metropolis, and, considering the immense wealth of the immense population among whom the expense is to be divided, it does not seem to me to be beyond what might fairly be expected from the inhabitants of a great city like this. If, then, the principle be adopted that the inhabitants of the metropolis should pay for carrying into effect this great work, it seems to follow as a necessary consequence that the persons to whom its execution should be intrusted should be those who possess the confidence of the metropolis itself; and as there exists a Board elected by the ratepayers of the different districts only two or three years ago for carrying out great works of local improvement, it seemed to the House of Commons that that Board—so constituted and maintained by the payment of rates—should be the body to carry out the intentions of Parliament with regard to the purification of the river. That Board since its original establishment has certainly not been very effective or very operative; but it must be remembered that it never either had any absolute discretion as to the carrying out of works, or any funds for the execution of them. It is, therefore, not very surprising that the Board failed to accomplish any work of importance; for its powers were so limited as to be absolutely and entirely worthless. The House of Commons then determined that if you are to have a Board of that kind, it was necessary that you should intrust it with sufficient funds to execute the purposes which it had to perform, and that the responsibility which it owed to the ratepayers in the disposition of their funds should be interfered with as little as possible by extraneous authority. The House, therefore, resolved to delegate the absolute and entire trust of executing this great work to the Metropolitan Board, which has been elected by the ratepayers of London, out of whose funds the expenses are to be provided. It has been thought wise not to encumber the provisions of this Bill by precise limitations with regard to any particular scheme, to the exact point where the outfall is to take place, or to any precise regulations to be carried into effect; but to leave the utmost possible latitude to the Metropolitan Board of Works for abating, on their own responsibility, out of the funds of their constituents, that which has become an intolerable nuisance. There can be very little doubt that that nuisance has been very materially aggravated by the sanitary regulations of the last few years, by which we have purified the houses and the sewers of London, but have poured the whole collective filth into the river, and have thereby produced an amount of pollution which is now perfectly intolerable. The Board of Works, as I have already intimated, are by this Bill constituted the sole authority for executing the works which may be necessary for the purification of the river. It is generally understood—although there is no express provision in the Bill to that effect—that the modus operandi is to be by intercepting sewers whereby the sewage of the metropolis will not be allowed to be poured into the river until it shall have undergone at such place or places as may be determined on the process of deodorization. No doubt it would be a great object—and I think it is one to which science ought to be immediately and urgently directed—to ascertain whether it would be possible to reconcile the two great ends of deodorizing the sewage of great towns and of obtaining from it at the same time the valuable product of manure. I believe that all the experiments which have been hitherto tried have unfortunately failed to reconcile those two objects; for in proportion as you deodorize you deprive the sewage of those fertilizing qualities which it possesses, and thereby diminish the value of the manure. It certainly does seem to be an incredible fact that we should be paying enormous sums of money for the importation of manure from foreign countries at the same time that we are pouring into the river, to corrupt and pollute the stream, an immense amount of manure, the value of which can hardly be calculated or exaggerated. It is to be hoped that hereafter science will arrive at the means of reconciling these two objects. If it do we shall derive a vast pecuniary advantage coupled with the greatest possible benefit to the health and comfort of the metropolis. The provision by which the Board are to be enabled to undertake and carry out these works is that they shall be entitled to levy by rate upon the various districts of the metropolis a sum of £3,000,000, the interest upon which together with a sinking fund, it is proposed to raise by means of a rate of 3*d.* in the pound for forty years. Though the Government do not intend to grant any money from the Consolidated Fund in aid of this undertaking, yet considering the magnitude of the works, they have interposed to a certain extent the credit of the Government to enable the Board to borrow money at a more advantageous rate than would otherwise be in their power; and there is also a provision in the Bill enabling the Exchequer Loan Commissioners to lend money to the Board on the security of the rates. The provisions of the Bill, as I have described them, are such that it would be scarcely possible for your Lordships to make any material alteration in them; for the whole Bill, as it stands, is of a pecuniary character, making pecuniary arrangements for carrying these great works to completion. At the same time I do not anticipate that your Lordships will be disposed to interfere for the purpose of throwing any obstacle in the way of endeavouring to remedy a state of things which has grown to be unbearable. It must be admitted that this, to a certain extent, is an experiment; but the Board of Works have now had three or four years to consider the question, and they have had the advice and assistance of most experienced engineers. They have expressed their satisfaction with the powers which we are about to confer on them, and they are of opinion that they will now be able to restore the river to some portion at least of the purity which it formerly possessed, but which it has lost by the effects of our recent legislation.

Moved that the Bill be now read 2ª.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE said, that he did not think it at all likely that any opposition would be offered by their Lordships to the passing of the Bill. The noble Earl had told them that the Government had abstained from proposing any particular scheme; but he should remind the noble Earl, that although the Bill did not lay down any particular scheme of drainage, yet as it imposed the duty of carrying out the undertaking on a body which was pledged to one scheme, and therefore it did practically ask the assent of Parliament to that particular scheme. He had no intention of entering into any discussion as to the merits of the respective schemes proposed by the Board and by the Government referees. He had no doubt that they both had their defects as well as their merits. But he felt convinced that it was better to proceed at once with the matter, even at the risk of making a false step, than to continue in the present state of complete inaction; for the time was now come when something or other must be done to remedy the present state of things. He concurred with the noble Earl as to the wisdom of abstaining from giving assistance from the Consoldated Fund, for he had always been of opinion that the undertaking was one the cost of which ought to be borne by the metropolitan ratepayers; but when the noble Earl prided himself upon adopting the popular principle in this case he (the Duke of Newcastle) should observe that that principle was embodied in the constitution of the Metropolitan Board to the smallest possible extent? What was that Board? It was not a body, like the corporations of our great towns, elected by the ratepayers. It went through all manner of processes in order to divest itself of the principle of direct representation. The first process in its formation was an election not by the ratepayers, but by the vestries, which were not themselves, in all cases, chosen by the ratepayers, and which were formed not for municipal but parochial purposes. But the men elected by the vestries had to make another election for the purpose of filtering, and, as it were, deodorizing themselves from the taint of popular representation; the object of that second election being to obtain a body of forty-three gentlemen who formed the Board. He had thought it proper to state those plain facts with respect to the constitution of that body; but, at the same time, he was not prepared to complain of the proposal that to them, in the absence of any more popular body, should be committed the superintendence of that undertaking. He believed that one result of entrusting to the Board so great a work would be to revive the question of the propriety of creating one municipal body for the whole of the metropolis; and, for his part, he felt convinced that such a step must before long be taken. One of the great evils of the present Board was its numbers. It appeared to him that those forty-three gentlemen would form too large an executive body; and he feared that when they came to consider the details of that undertaking, discussions must arise among them which would justify the nick-name they had already received of "the Board of Words," instead of the "Board of Works." He understood that it had at first been proposed that those gentlemen should be enabled to form from among their own number a subcommittee of six, which should preside over the execution of those works; and he regretted to perceive that that provision had been removed from the Bill. Indeed, he should himself have preferred that the executive body in that case consisted not of six, but of three members. He was glad, however, to find that the clause giving the Government a power of inspection and control in the execution of the works had been struck out, for the less intrusive interference there was on the part of the Government with the Board the more likelihood there would be of some practical result being arrived at. He was also sorry to perceive that the present conservators of the river, of whom the Lord Mayor was at the head, were to have a power of controlling the action of the Board; but he could not feel much surprised at the introduction of clauses for effecting that object, after he had read in the newspapers the ominous announcement that the Conservators, with a party of their friends and supporters, the City Remembrancer, and all the paraphernalia of office, had paid a visit to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The natural result of that visit was the introduction of provisions into the Bill which would throw in the way of the Board impediments which it was, in his opinion, most desirable should not exist. Those provisions would give considerable control in that matter to the Lord Mayor and the Corporation of London. He remembered that the present Lord Mayor was reported to have said, not long since, that he had long and devoutly prayed that he should, in the capacity of chief magistrate of the City of London, have the honour of receiving at his feet the noble Earl opposite as the head of Her Majesty's Government. That prayer had been granted, and he did not grudge the Lord Mayor the great gratification to which its fulfilment must have given rise but he believed that even in the utmost paroxyism of his piety the Lord Mayor could never have contemplated the passing of a measure which would give the body of which he was the head the power of controlling an outlay of £3,000,000 and thwarting the execution of a great public work. He should say that he looked at the introduction of those clauses with great distrust and anxiety, and that he could see no reason for a special reservation of the rights of the Conservators of the Thames more than those of any other body upon such a subject as that which their Lordships were then considering. But, under all the circumstances of the case, he was glad that the present measure had been introduced, for he was convinced that unless some course of action was immediately adopted, we should run the risk of being exposed in some less salubrious season than the present to some frightful public calamity.

LORD CRANWORTH was glad that it was wholly left to the Board to find out the proper points at which the sewage should fall into the Thames, and that the words were omitted which indicated the place "not higher on the north side than Barking Creek, and not lower on the south side than Erith." He was the last to complain of relieving the metropolis from what was likely to be an increasing nuisance, but they ought not to discharge the whole of the sewage just opposite Erith, or any other village on the borders of the Thames, which suffered enough from the effects of the London sewage already. He was, therefore, glad also to see, that the Bill would enact that the Board should not do anything to create a nuisance. It was some sort of security, although he believed medical men were of opinion that deodorization would not remove the injurious and insalubrious effects of the sewage.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read 2ª accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the whole House To-morrow.

DRAFTS ON BANKERS LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said the necessity for it had arisen from defects in preceding legislation. To prevent dishonest persons making an improper use of cheques it was the practice to cross them with a banker's name, which was supposed to give the security that a cheque so crossed would only be paid through a banker. The matter, however, having been brought before the courts of law, it was decided that the crossing did not amount to a direction to the banker only to pay through another banker, but merely to excite his vigilance. Under those circumstances, what was supposed to be a security turned out to be no security whatever, and in 1856 an Act was passed which enacted that where any draft or cheque on a banker had an addition of the words "and Company," either in full or abbreviated, it should be considered as a direction to the banker only to pay through a banker. The Act was brought to the test at the latter end of last year. A person sent a crossed cheque through the post. The cheque was abstracted from the letter. The words crossed were obliterated; it was presented to the bankers having all the appearance of an uncrossed cheque, and the money was paid. An action was brought by the customer against the bankers, and the Court of Common Pleas first and the Court of Exchequer Chamber afterwards decided that the words of the Act of 1856, that the crossing should be a direction to the banker only to pay through a banker, were applicable not to the time of drawing, but to the time of presentment, and that the crossing was no material part of the cheque. Again, what was supposed to be a complete protection to the customer was found to be no security, and the intentions of the Legislature were frustrated. It therefore became necessary to introduce this measure, by which it was proposed to enact that the crossing of the cheque should be a material and essential part of the cheque, that it should amount to a direction, not from the time of presentment, but from the time of crossing, to pay through a banker, and that an erasure of the crossing should amount to a forgery. He believed there was no doubt as to the propriety of the measure, except as to the fourth clause, which provided that bankers paying a cheque which did not plainly appear to be crossed, or to have been obliterated, should not incur any liability. He understood there was some objection to giving bankers that protection. He had considered the point, and he could not help thinking that the clause was a very reasonable and a very proper one. It should always be borne in mind that a cheque which got into dishonest hands, got there through the negligence or fault of the person who drew it. It was either lost through negligence, or intrusted to a person unworthy of confidence, or stolen. In the great majority of cases the banker could not protect himself, but the customer could, and therefore it would be a most unfair thing if, when giving protection to crossed cheques, they withdrew the protection which bankers now possessed, in the event of a crossed cheque being presented to all appearance an uncrossed cheque, and in such a state as would defy any amount of vigilance to detect the fraud.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2ª.

LORD OVERSTONE was understood to express his approval of the Bill. He earnestly hoped that the Government would not yield to the representations that had been made to them against the protection which was given to bankers by the fourth clause of the Bill. The clause had been inserted with the consent of all the most eminent men engaged in banking, trade, and commerce, and was concurred in by the law officers of the Crown.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read 2ª accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the whole House To-morrow.

CORRUPT PRACTICES PREVENTION ACT CONTINUANCE BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE, in moving the second reading of this Bill said, its object was to give to those who had the franchise the power of enjoying it. Any one who had witnessed the contested elections in English counties since the Act was passed with reference to corrupt practices must have seen that if the old Acts of Parliament were religiously obeyed the poor voter could not enjoy his right. There was furthermore the temptation at every contested election to endeavour, either on the one side or the other, to convey surreptitiously the voter to the poll, and to charge the cost among the other expenses of the election. It therefore became a question what was to be done? Were they to deprive the electors, under the circumstances of the case, of the means of enjoying the elective franchise, by not providing them with the means of going to the poll, or would they enact some mode by which the candidate might, without committing any improper act, give them the opportunity of recording their votes? The Bill before the House effected that, and enabled the candidate to convey the voter to the poll. There were means also provided in the Bill for registering the votes, and for providing for the expense incurred. The Bill appeared to him to remedy a great difficulty that had heretofore occurred, and he thought that if it was adhered to by one party and the other no corruption or bribery could occur.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2ª

EARL GRANVILLE thought, that the noble Earl had not succeeded in giving their Lordships any very clear explanation of this measure. He wished to make an earnest appeal to the noble Earl at the head of the Government to reduce this to a mere continuance Bill. It was now a continuance Bill, but with one or two Amendments, and one Amendment was very important, its object being to enact that that which had been considered bribery for many years should no longer be such. Of course the matter would affect both sides equally, and therefore it ought to be treated without any party feeling at all. He well recollected that when a very similar clause was strenuously endeavoured to be introduced into a measure four or five years ago it was rejected on the Motion of the noble Duke (the Duke of Newcastle) by an overwhelming majority, and he thought it would not be wise in the absence of the two noble and learned Lords —Lords Brougham and Campbell — who took a prominent part in the discussion— and of Lord Lyndhurst, Lord Wensleydale, and Lord St. Leonards, who entirely concurred in their views—to settle a question which the House then refused to decide. This matter had been very much canvassed in the House of Commons, and it now came before their Lordships on the last day when it was possible that by the Standing Orders it could be read a second time, so as to be passed this Session. He did not wish to go much into the matter of the Amendment, but he would say that there was no doubt some advantages in conveying voters to the poll, especially in some constituencies, though there were, on the other hand, great disadvantages. He knew that there was a provision in the Bill intended to obviate some of the inconvenience by providing that the voter might be offered the means of conveyance, but not the money to pay for it. It was perfectly certain that under this Bill the expenses of elections would be enormously increased, if every voter thought that he had a legal right to be conveyed to the poll. Feeling that this was a subject which should be referred to a Select Committee, and as a Bill was to be introduced by the Government to deal with the whole question next Session, he trusted that the noble Earl would consent to make this a mere continuance Bill.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, he could not accede to the suggestion of the noble Earl on the subject of this Bill, which had for a considerable time engaged the attention of the House of Commons, and where a Bill of a much more extensive character than the present had been originally introduced and very much discussed. It was true that it was the intention of the Secretary of State for the Home Department, early next Session, to bring in a still more extensive measure; but it was absolutely necessary that a Bill should pass in the present Session, because the existing Act, being only a temporary measure, expired next month. But there were certain provisions introduced on which there were great differences of opinion, but which were ultimately decided by a majority; and amongst them the provision alluded to, which, although it might be said to introduce a new law, in point of fact it hardly went so far, because it was a point on which for a long time there had been very great doubt, and on which Election Committees had come to conflicting determinations and contradictory reports; and he believed that in the case of Slade, in the case of the Cambridge election, the decision had been reversed by one of the superior Courts. He considered that the settlement of the question in one way or another was a matter of considerable importance, and this Bill proceeded to settle it in the most equitable manner possible; and, although in certain cases the expense might be considerably increased, he did not think the payment of the travelling expenses of a voter was a point of such comparative importance as the enormous injustice of practical disfranchisement, which the present system inflicted on a large portion of the electoral population. The noble Earl had said that the Bill would virtually give the voter a legal claim to be conveyed to the poll; but that was not so, as there was no obligation on the part of the candidate to incur the expense, and his not doing so did not render him punishable. The measure did not involve the question of bribery, but provided that no money should pass into the hands of the voter; and although the candidate might provide the means of carriage for voters, he had to give a return of the expenditure to the auditors. He thought this was a question which it was most desirable to have settled, and that the House of Commons had settled it by their vote in a manner consistent with justice and sound policy; that being the case, he was unwilling to consent to abandon the clause sanctioned by the Commons.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE observed, that the noble Earl was incorrect in speaking of this as a settled question; for if he understood the matter rightly, the Secretary of State for the Home Department, having charge of this Bill in the Commons, had expressly stated that he considered it was no settlement of the question, and so little did he so consider it, that he intended next Session to introduce another Bill on the subject for the express purpose of referring the matter to a Committee of the Commons for a settlement of the question. He thought that at this period of the Session they could not do better than simply pass the Bill as a continuance Bill without any Amendments. It was said the Bill did not involve any question of bribery; but the fact was that a candidate with plenty of money would be able to take possession of all the carriages for conveyance at once, and thereby virtually commit an act of bribery, and destroy all his antagonists' facilities for bringing his voters to the poll. This Bill could not be a satisfactory adjustment of this question. It might, indeed, answer well enough as regarded those voters who lived in the immediate neighbourhood of the election, and who therefore did not really require to be carried at all. But in the case of the outlying voters, properly so called, the provision could not possibly work. How was the Middlesex voter living in Yorkshire to come up to the poll from so great a distance if he was not to be repaid the expense of his railway ticket. But the principle of legalizing travelling expenses in any shape was highly questionable. They might pass what laws against bribery they pleased, but they would never fully accomplish their object until they subjected the elector to those moral influences which would convince him that he was exercising a solemn trust, and that it was his duty to put himself to the trifling inconvenience of going to vote for the person whom he thought fittest to represent him. Under all the circumstances, it was most undesirable to pass at that period of the Session a measure on a subject which the Government proposed to submit early next year to a Select Committee, who would probably upset all that they were now doing. Under this Bill they were likely to see every voter in a borough insisting on being taken to the poll in a chaise-and-four; and thus they would have revived all the worst extravagances which marked elections in former days. He trusted, therefore, that the Bill would be passed as a mere continuance Bill.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET observed that it was the opinion of the Commons that it was undesirable to pay the conveyance expenses of the voter, and that before they settled the law either one way or the other, an inquiry should be instituted. It would be a great misfortune if they were to sanction a reversal of the course adopted for many yeary past in curtailing election expenses. They had done away with a great many expenses connected with elections, and pretexts for bribery such as colours and ribbons; but he thought that this system of conveying electors to the poll opened the door to greater bribery than any other. Suppose the case of a voter for an election at Plymouth desirous of being brought from York, and of taking the opportunity of seeing his friends, the candidate had no choice but to send for him and for all other out-voters similarly situated, and that would be the working of the measure. The voters would claim a legal right to be brought, and that was objectionable.

LORD EBURY earnestly joined in the appeal which had been addressed to Her Majesty's Government to make this a mere continuance Bill. The clause relating to travelling expenses was not originally proposed by the right hon. Gentleman who introduced the measure into the other House, but emanated from a private Member of Parliament. He had himself, when in the other House, used his best exertions to persuade that assembly to put down treating at elections, by disallowing refreshment to voters at the charge of the candidates. And though the gloomiest predictions had been uttered as to the result of such a step, he had succeeded in inducing the other House to adopt it. He had never been able to understand why a candidate should be saddled with the personal expenses of the voter, and, although he had asked the question repeatedly, he had never obtained a satisfactory answer to it. He reminded their Lordships that the clause with regard to travelling expenses had been rejected by that House four years ago, when it had been sent up by a much larger majority than that which had sanctioned it in the House of Commons upon the present occasion.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read 2ª accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Thursday next.

House adjourned at a quarter past Nine o'clock, till To-morrow, half past Four o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, July 27, 1858.

MINUTES.] NEW WRITS—for Devon (Southern Division), v. Sir John Yarde Buller, Bart., Steward of the Manor of Hempholme; for Chester County (Northern Division), v. William Tatton Egerton, Esq., Steward of the Manor of Northstead.

PUBLIC BILL.—3° Administration of Oaths by Committees.

PRIVATE BUSINESS—STANDING ORDERS. REPORT.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, he wished to call the attention of the House to the Report of the Committee appointed for the revision of the Standing Orders. It was unnecessary, however, for him to enter into the details as the Report was in the hands of hon. Members, but he wished to state that the recommendations of the Committee would have the effect of lessening the expense of private Bill legislation, and of shortening the time devoted to inquiries before private Bill Committees. He would not say but that the labours imposed upon hon. Members by the private business of the House were extremely severe and onerous. During the present Session they had amounted to a positive grievance, and the object of the Committee had been to provide a remedy for the future. They had altered almost every stage through which a private Bill had to pass, putting forward the preliminary stages a week, and shortening the period between the first and second readings, and between the second reading and the time for going into Committee. Private Committees would be appointed earlier in the Session, and the House of Lords had agreed to take a portion of the private business shortly after the meeting of Parliament in each year. It was proposed, also, to diminish the number of tribunals. The general opinion was, that the number of Committees on railway Bills ought not to exceed five, and he was glad to state that already three of their best Chairmen had expressed their willingness to devote themselves next Session to carrying out the recommendation of the Select Committee in this respect. The railway Committees had hitherto been so numerous that any uniformity of decisions was utterly impossible. The Committee, however, had not been able to carry out all that they had desired, having found in some matters insuperable difficulties. This was the case, for instance, in respect to the presentation of Reports from the public departments to Committees. The Reports of public departments did not frequently come before the Committee till they had almost concluded their business. He thought these Reports were highly important, and a Standing Order had been framed that every Committee that rejected a recommendation of a public department should report that circumstance with the reasons. They had, however, been unable to frame any Standing Order to meet the evil arising from the delay in presenting the Reports, from the extreme difficulty of doing so without trenching on the privileges of the Crown. It would, therefore, be necessary to bring the matter before the House next Session, and in effecting this and other requisite changes they hoped to receive the assistance of the Government, without whose concurrence they would be unable to do anything. He had only further to state that the Standing Order moved at the early part of this Session, that any Member taking his place at prayers should retain it through the sitting, would now be incorporated with the other Standing Orders. He moved that the House agree with the Report of the Committee, and that the several other Standing Orders relating to private Bills, as amended by the Committee, be agreed to.

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, he thought it was impossible to exaggerate the extreme onerousness of the labours which Committees on private Bills imposed upon hon. Members. He regretted that the Committee on Standing Orders had not proposed more sweeping changes in the present system of transacting private business, and recommended that hon. Members should be relieved from duties for which they were, for the most part, unfit. The objection stated by experienced witnesses was, not that private Bill Committees were too numerous, but that they were too fluctuating and too weak, rendering impossible anything like fixity or uniformity of decision; and this was only what was to be expected from tribunals composed of men who were in many cases totally inexperienced in the conduct of investigations, such as were carried on by Committees of that House. Litigation before a private Bill Committee was described by Mr. Hope Scott, the eminent counsel, as an absolute lottery. The Chairman of the Great Northern Railway Company recommended that the private Bill jurisdiction should be taken out of Parliament altogether, and, although Mr. Serjeant Wrangham and Mr. Scott did not go quite so far, they agreed in thinking that permanent Chairmen ought to be appointed. He regretted to say that a proposition to that effect was rejected by the Committee on Standing Orders. He did not believe that the proposal of the Committee to reduce the number of tribunals for the investigation of railway Bills to five would be found to answer the purpose intended. It would be necessary for five Chairmen to sit fifty days in every Session for four hours a day—an amount of work which Members could not be expected to perform gratuitously. Yet the Committee on Standing Orders had refused a proposition for the payment of Chairmen, though it was difficult to say why. The refusal was chiefly rested on the "constitutional objection," but for his part he wished that the "constitutional objection" was either better defined or else altogether laid aside. One evil to which the hon. and gallant Gentleman had not alluded was the double examination of witnesses before the two Houses. He was sorry that the Committee had declined to make any recommendation upon that subject. He felt convinced, upon the whole, that the alterations proposed by the Committee would not meet the case, and that it would be necessary three years hence to have another revision of the Standing Orders.

MR. D. GRIFFITH said, he hoped that in any change that might take place on this subject the enormous and extravagant remuneration paid to Members of the legal profession would be revised. The fees on consultation were the same each day as for the attendance, and both were fixed at a scale extravagantly high, and altogether disproportionate to the services rendered.

SIR DENHAM NORREYS said, it was a great hardship that an hon. Member who attended for a couple of hours at the most interesting part of the evening, and then went away to dinner, should be enabled to return at a later hour and turn out an hon. Member who had borne the whole brunt of the debate. He considered that Members who attended the whole of the evening should be secured in their seats to the end of the sitting, and he would propose to move a change in the Standing Orders to that effect next Session. He would also move certain alterations in the Standing Orders regulating the proceedings in Committee of Supply. He thought much of the private business which now came before the Committee on private Bills might be more satisfactorily and more economically transacted by county boards.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said he had objected to the Resolution of the noble Lord (Lord R. Cecil) in the Committee on the constitutional ground that he proposed to give to a certain number of permanent Chairmen—Members of that House—salaries of £1,000 a year each. One of the propositions of the Committee, which would much facilitate the business and lessen expense was, that the evidence taken before a Committee of the one House should be available in the Committee of the other House.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he was sure the House must be deeply sensible of the valuable labours of the Standing Orders Committee, and particularly of those of the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Chairman. The recommendations of that Committee were of an extensively remedial character, and he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) could not but believe they would in practice remove many of the objections urged by the noble Lord the Member for Stamford (Lord R. Cecil). The acuteness and attention to business of the Committees of that House had long been recognized, and as they advanced in experience many objections would disappear. The suggestions of the Standing Orders Committee with reference to the reports of public departments would receive the attention of Her Majesty's Government, and he thought he might assure the House that the inconvenience complained of by the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Colonel W. Patten) would not arise in future.

Report agreed to.

Resolved, That the several other Standing Orders relating to Private Bills, as amended by the Committee, be agreed to.

Resolved, That this House will not insist on its privileges with regard to any Clauses in Private Bills sent down from the House of Lords which refer to tolls and charges for services performed, and are not in the nature of a Tax.

To be a Standing Order.

GOVERNMENT OF INDIA (No. 3) BILL.
LORDS' AMENDMENTS.

Order for consideration of Lords' Amendments read.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That the said Amendments be now taken into consideration."

COLONEL SYKES: Sir, to put myself in order with respect to the observations which I shall address to the House upon the Lords' Amendments to the India Bill, I shall conclude with a Motion "That the Amendments be read this day three months." Sir, the acceptance of those Amendments would put the seal to the final extinction of that glorious Corporation, which ought to have secured the lasting gratitude of our country, by having added an empire to the Crown of England which would have excited the envy of Alexander the Great and Augustus Cæsar—and that, too, without the cost of a shilling to the Home Exchequer!—a Corporation, Sir, the narrative of the exploits of whose armies will constitute some of the brightest pages in our annals, and the names of whose servants, military and civil, will rank amongst the most illustrious of those of which our country is proud. Sir, the progress of the debates upon the several India Bills has only tended to strengthen and confirm the opinion I expressed to the House on the proposed introduction of the first India Bill by the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton, of the impolicy of any change in the Government of India until the existing lamentable mutiny and rebellion had been entirely crushed, and the country restored to complete tranquillity. Sir, this opinion was plainly in unison with that of Her Majesty's present Ministers and their supporters, as was evidenced by their having gone to a division, when in Opposition, upon the proposition of the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton. Sir, Her Majesty's Government are now promoters of a measure which, in its introduction, they vigorously opposed; but I do not attach blame to them for so doing, considering that the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton's Bill has been continually suspended over them like the sword of Damocles; they had no alternative but to produce their own measure, backed as the noble Lord's Bill had been by a large majority in a division—a majority produced, however, by some mendacious newspapers, which had misled Parliament into a belief that the popular voice was in favour of immediate legislation for India. Now, Sir, the British public are not slow to make their wishes known, nor to enforce those wishes by public demonstrations, and more particularly so, by addressing petitions to Parliament. The House must learn, therefore, with some surprise, that up to this day 481 petitions have been addressed to the House of Commons upon matters relating to India during the present Session; and out of that number, approaching to 500, only four petitions have asked that the Government of India should be transferred from the East India Company to the Crown! It was utterly untrue, therefore, as had been repeatedly asserted, that the popular feeling had been expressed in favour of either the India Bill of the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton or that of Her Majesty's present Government; and Liberal Members who support the Bill must bear in mind that they are not only destitute of popular support, but they are violating popular feeling, in crushing the old Saxon principle of representation, which is an essential element in the constitution of the East India Company. Moreover, those hon. Members who clamour for the ballot are, nevertheless, extinguishing the ballot, to which every member of the East India Company has a right in voting, whether in his capacity of an elector or while sitting at a Court of Directors. In closing, also, the Quarterly and Special Courts of Proprietors of the East India Company, the Princes and Natives of India who have hitherto made their wrongs, or supposed wrongs, known to the public through the medium of those Courts, will be driven to appeal to Parliament, to find their complaints neglected, from the constant pressure of public business, or only to be taken up for party purposes. Sir, the withdrawal of confidence from the East India Company, and the consequent introduction of the India Bills, is attributed by a party to a system of mismanagement which has resulted in the mutiny of the Bengal army; but for that atrocious outbreak the East India Company are no more responsible than they are for the rising at the "Sicilian Vespers," or the massacre on the eve of St. Bartholomew at Paris, under Charles IX. To the Court of Directors and the Governments in India the mutiny was an overwhelming surprise. It commenced in local circumstances, and its immediate cause was the refusal of some soldiers to obey orders which they considered as opposed to their religious convictions; and they preferred death to dishonour, and, unhappily, their spirit and example spread to the Bengal army at large. There is no justification, therefore, for fixing upon the Home Government the responsibility for the mutiny, and crushing the Company for events over which they had no control. Sir, if rumour be believed, there would not have been an India Bill at all, had the universally-expected Reform Bill been prepared, or even intended to be produced, and the occurrence of the mutiny in India permitted of public attention being diverted from a subject of intense interest at home to one of intense interest abroad. But, Sir, no circumstances justify the present measure; for in no point whatever has the East India Company failed in the efficient execution of their great duties. Although taken by surprise, no operation has failed in India, nor has any failed in the hands of the Home Government. Before reinforcements arrived in India, Delhi was stormed and won by a comparative handful of men; and since then the Court of Directors have transmitted from England reinforcements to the extent of 58,399 men, in fifty-five steamers and one hundred sailing vessels, without accident or loss, and with the greatest expedition; manifesting that the efficiency of the Company has continued to the last. Sir, I, who have passed the best years of my life in the military service of the East India Company, should despise myself did I not at the last moment of the existence of that body bear testimony to the uniform liberality and justice with which their servants have always been treated by the Court of Directors; and my position as a member of the Executive Home Government of India for the last eighteen years, enables me further to bear witness to the paternal, just, and forbearing views of the Court of Directors. That body has always been animated by a desire, as their despatches show, to discourage wars—their policy has been one of abstinence from aggression, and it ever has inculcated the maintenance of the rights of the people of India. Wars and annexations have been caused, not by the East India Company, but by successive Governor Generals, whose powers of self-action have always been too great and unchecked, and who, supported by the Board of Control, whose nominees they were, left the Court of Directors the only alternative of acquiescence or fruitless remonstrance, an acquiescence, however, which has exposed the Court during the debates upon the India Bill to the invectives of the hon. Members for Radnor (Mr. Cornwall Lewis), Birmingham (Mr. Bright), Kidderminster (Mr. Lowe), and to undeserved odium in England, and particularly on the Continent. Sir, what is the present state of India? There are no armies of rebels in the field to contend with, no fortresses to be besieged and taken; nevertheless, resistance springs up on all sides. In our conflicts we have crushed our opponents; but the results are like the attempt to place the finger upon a globule of quicksilver; we think we have it under the finger, but it is only to find it in numerous globules all around: and such is the present state of our warfare. And why is this? Because that which was a mere military mutiny is converted into an infinitely more formidable danger, by the recent universal distrust of the people of our intentions in the change of Government with respect to religious questions; and by the animosity engendered by the manifestations of our vengeance. We have, therefore, now more dangerous enemies to deal with than the mutineers, namely, a distrustful and exasperated people. Nor are the grounds wanting for distrust. 481 petitions have been presented to this House upon matters relating to India. 126 of those pray for the removal of the system of caste in India; eighty-nine are against idolatry; and 145 are for the extension of Christianity; so that 360 petitions pray for some action of the House of Commons or of the new Government of India touching religion. Now, the notices of these petitions, the phraseology of which admits of but one construction by the people of India, however harmless may be the views of the petitioners, find their way into the hundreds of Native newspapers, and touch the deepest feelings of the people of India, whether Hindoos or Mahomedans, and excite their alarm. This alarm has been increased by the numerous proclamations of the disaffected, who have asserted that the British Government propose to make the people of India Christians by force. Incendiaries, too, are fanning the flame of distrust in districts where there has hitherto been little disquiet. We read in the Calcutta Englishman, received by the last mail, an article headed "Eastern Bengal:—

"There can be no doubt that rebel emissaries are scouring all the districts of Bengal, north and south of the Ganges, which have hitherto remained quiet, and with these scoundrels have originated the different reports, calculated to discontent the Natives, which have been in circulation for some time past. The Natives generally have all been told that Government intend taking away their caste; some probably believe it; nearly all fear it. A few days since, in the Furreedpore district, a Mussulman Fakeer was overheard to say that he had been through Burdwan and Rungpore; and when at Burdwan, he met another Fakeer, who, accompanied by many people, came from up-country, and remained about fifteen days consulting his book, with a view to discover when and where it would be advisable to fight for the faith. In the Jessore district, very lately, a gentleman's servant told the children that they would soon all be killed."

Another cause for distrust is the remarkable fact, that in all the discussions which have taken place in Parliament respecting the transfer of the Government of India from the India Company to the Crown, the feelings, wishes, and rights of the twenty nations who were to be transferred from one authority to another, have not only not been paramountly considered, but have not been discussed at all. The people, therefore, may well think that they are out of sight; and that a scramble for patronage between conflicting political parties is a more important matter than their interests. The people also see that in the present India Bill there is an omission of that clause or those clauses which characterized all former India Bills —namely, legislative protection for their rights, usages, and religion; an omission which they may construe as significant of the future. One of the chief features of the hon. Mountstewart Elphinstone's proclamation on assuming the sovereignty of the Deccan, was the guarantee to the people of their rights, usages, and religion, as far as was reasonable and just. But another great cause of the present distrust of the people is the European cry for indiscriminating vengeance. The able correspondent of The Times, in his last letter, says, the cry is "Kill, kill, kill! blood, blood, blood!" and I read in last Saturday Review the following passage, which chills one's blood with horror:

"A Baptist up-country newspaper elaborately demonstrates the lawfulness of taking away life, and adds, 'the reason why we have attempted to show that the shedding of blood is in itself no sin, except where it is expressly forbidden is, that a contrary opinion leads to that wishy-washy policy which produced the Rohilcund proclamation. Does Lord Canning ever reflect that by his tenderness to murderers he is actually disobeying the commands of God? 'Whoso sheddeth man's blood by man shall his blood be shed,' is as much a precept of God as 'Blessed are the merciful, for they shall obtain mercy.'"

Again, the up-country editors argues—

"That 1,000 Hindoos ought to be put to death for every Englishwoman killed. Are the lives, he asks, of 1,000 of those beings, whose life is mere sense, to be compared with the agonies of mind of a delicately nurtured and educated woman condemned to such a fate?"

Are not such statements, Sir, sufficient to produce permanent and ineradicable feelings of animosity and dread in the minds of the people? and would ten times the amount of the European troops England could possibly supply be sufficient to keep in subjection peoples justly exasperated against us? No, Sir, a very different policy must be pursued. Let missionaries pursue their praiseworthy objects unostentatiously. There are now 460 of them, of various denominations, labouring in various parts of the country to which they have unrestricted access; but let them be kept free from Government patronage or association; for working with the suspicion in the Native mind of official prestige, they would prove the greatest enemies to the holy cause they are advocating. Let Native education be vigorously pursued and extended, and the edifice of superstition, which now obstructs progress, will be silently and unsuspectingly undermined and fall, without damage to our Government; let all religions be tolerated and, their ceremonies uninterfered with, where they do not offend public decency and propriety; let the chiefs and gentry of India be maintained in their estates and immemorial rights—for there can be no safety to a Government where the most important links of the social chain are wanting; let the usages, feelings, and prejudices even of the Natives be respected as far as may be reasonable and just; and then, with the introduction of the Queen's name and authority let there be a discriminating amnesty for the past; and, under Providence, the disposer of kingdoms and empires, we may hope that there will be a restoration of that mutual confidence and goodwill between the rulers and the ruled, which has charactized the prosperous government of the East India Company for the last hundred years, and without which confidence and goodwill there can be no peace in India, and no safety for our dominion there. Sir, I move that the Lords' Amendments to the Government of India Bill be taken into consideration this day three months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day month."

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

MR. MANGLES said, he was satisfied that anything he could now say against the principle of the Bill would not have the smallest effect, but as it was probably the last opportunity he should have of addressing the House he was anxious to vindicate the character of that Government with which he had been so long connected, first as a servant, and afterwards as a master. He was especially anxious to vindicate the character of that noble service of which he had been a member—the Civil Service; for it had been spoken of in that House with a disrespect which men of high honour acutely felt—and he could not but regret that those hon. Members who had brought the charges were not present to hear his reply. The finances of India had been referred to as not being in a sound state, and the amount of the debt, approaching to £60,000,000, had been instanced as a proof; but it was hardly fair for Englishmen, with a debt of about £800,000,000, to taunt the East India Company on that point. Then it had been said that there was a chronic deficiency in the Indian finances. The Company, however, had been urged for years to expend large sums in improvements, and having done so, they ought not, in justice, to have this imputation of a chronic deficiency thrown out against them. During the last four years, ending in 1856-7, if no public works had been undertaken in India, there would have been, instead of a deficiency, an aggregate surplus of more than £1,000,000, and in 1856-7, the deficiency, after paying £1,500,000 for public works, was only £240,000. Many of the works so undertaken would add greatly to the wealth and prosperity of the country. The landed revenue had been characterized as an oppressive system of taxation; but he maintained that, with partial exceptions, the landed revenue could be proved to be a moderate tax. Excessive landed assessment in India was the exception, and not the rule. The assessments in Bombay and Madras had been revised and lowered, while in the Presidency of Bengal and the North West Provinces there was no case in which the landowner did not derive from his land double the amount of the assessment which he paid to the Government, or, in other words, that the man who paid 500 rupees to the Government received 1,000 from the land. The late disturbances in India had been assumed as a proof of the unpopularity of the Company's rule, but the rising in India was a military mutiny, and not an insurrection of the people, though the worst portion of the population of some large towns might participate in it from love of plunder. Where there were no Sepoys there was no insurrection, and except in Oude the whole of the Hindoo population not connected with the military service was in favour of British rule. A very large portion of the more respectable Mahomedans also had, during the insurrection, shown themselves well disposed, and in more than one instance had rendered very important services to the Government. It had been said that the people had been driven by the exactions of the Company to general rebellion, but, had that been the case, we could not have held our position there for an hour. Turning to the civil service, he must express his regret that that service should have been spoken of so unjustly in that House. That service was most efficient, and all connected with it were most devoted to their duties. The existing system in that service was to begin from the bottom—that was, that the officer should begin at the lowest position and rise according to merit. That system had been the salvation of India, and he trusted it would be continued. It had been alleged that large salaries were thrown broadcast over India for the civil servants, and that they were paid on the same scale as Cabinet Ministers at home. Now there were only two high officers in India—the Governor General and the Commander in Chief excepted—who received salaries equal to those paid to the Cabinet Ministers in this country. These two were Sir J. Lawrence and the Resident of Hyderabad, and the latter was not a civil but a military officer. But when they spoke of the high salaries received by the civil service of India they must take into account the nature of the service and of the climate in which it was to be performed. They had to give higher pay to the troops while serving in India, the men engaged on the railways received double what they did here, and it was the same in all departments. They could not expect men to be content with the same salaries in India as in this country. The mutiny admittedly came upon us by surprise, and yet the right men were everywhere in the right places. There was Sir John Lawrence in the Punjab, Sir Henry Lawrence at Lucknow, Colonel Edwardes at Peshawur, Colonel Treen at Scinde. Were not all these men in the right places? It was marvellous what these, Major Chamberlayne, and others, had achieved, considering the nature of the difficulties with which they had been surrounded. The highest praise was due to our troops, who had with such valour and determination vanquished immense numbers of rebels in the field. But ought not equal credit to be given to these men, who, against fearful odds, had succeeded in conquering our enemies in remote stations before our army arrived? Indeed there was not a single instance of failure on the part of any one of the Company's servants, civil or military, throughout the whole of these trying events. Another question was whether the East India Company had done their duty in regard to the religious question. In his opinion it was not the duty of a Government to take a missionary part. Nothing could be more dangerous in a country like India for it to be supposed that the Government itself undertook the task of proselytising. Their duty was to hold the scales even, to protect the Christian against the Mussulman and the Hindoo, to place all religions on a footing of equality, and to support them in that position—leaving Christianity to make its way by the labours of the missionaries, aided by the support of charitable persons, and by its own inherent merits. In India the Natives had a great respect for the missionaries; and as a general rule, he thought there was no danger whatever of religious disturbances so long as it was believed that those who were engaged in disseminating the principles of Christianity were doing so independently of the Government. Stories had been raked up of what occurred when he was in the nursery to show that the Directors were hostile to Christianity; but at all events in recent times, the Government of India never mixed themselves up with, or supported Hindoo worship. All they had done was to maintain religious toleration. He might refer to the authority of Sir J. Elphinstone and Sir J. Lawrence in proof of that statement. Circumstances might occur which would render that the last time he should have the honour of addressing the House; and he thanked hon. Members for the attention with which they had heard him on the present occasion. He earnestly trusted that the new Government for India would prove even more beneficial for that country than the one now about to cease; but he thought that the step taken by the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton was an unwise concession to a popular outcry. The noble Lord fancied, no doubt, that he would long have the popularis aura swelling his sails, but he must by this time have found how mistaken he was. And he believed that if all that had passed could be sunk in the waters of Lethe, not a majority, not even a minority, would desire to interfere with the government as it had been for 150 years so successfully carried on. They had found how much easier it was to pull down than to build up. He expressed his conviction that there was a great future in store for India, but that could only be secured by the new Government of that country following as closely as possible in the footsteps of the old.

Mr. Mangles

MR. WARREN said, that unwilling as he was to interfere at a moment when the House was evidently bent upon discussing the details of the Bill before it, yet as this was the last opportunity he should have for making any general observations on it, he wished to do so. He thought he had earned a right to be heard, for a few moments, by having been present at and listened attentively to every discussion on this and the other Bill, and voted in every division. He was equally responsible therefore with every other Member of the House for the proper character and future well-working of the Bill. It was one of unspeakable importance, involving as it did the construction of a system of Government for so vast a section of the human family. The welfare of India, ever since this country had undertaken to be responsible for it, ought to have been cared for in moments of the calmest and profoundest consideration it could bring to bear on such a subject. Yet, how stood the fact? A sort of fatality had seemed to attach to our Indian legislation, as far as related to the times when it took place. Let the House glance back at five periods of it, beginning with the year 1784 and ending with the present year. In the first-mentioned year the existing system was established amidst, so to speak, the red-hot heat of faction, the remarkable contests between Pitt and Fox and their respective partisans. Let any one refer to the debates of that day, and he would be greatly struck by the character of them. The next period, was the year 1813, when after a thirty years' interval, the system was again under the consideration of Parliament, which gave it a twenty years' longer lease of existence; and we were then in the convulsive excitement and agonies of the war then raging in Europe. The third period of interference was in the year 1833, when this country was still agitated with the great revolution effected in the Parliamentary constitution of the mother country the year before. The fourth period was in 1853, happily a fitting one of peace and quiet; but the fifth and last was in 1857-8—in the very midst of that fearful outbreak and hurricane of rebellion and insurrection still raging around us; for the vast intended change in our system of Indian Government, on which we were at that moment engaged was absolutely announced to the country in a leading article of The Times of the 27th of November last, and he (Mr. Warren) well recollected the astonishment with which the announcement was received. Having anxiously watched the course of discussion in that House, from the period when the noble Viscount opposite, then at the head of the Government, introduced his Bill, he (Mr. Warren) begged to say that he had heard speeches delivered by some distinguished Members of that House which he should not be afraid to place by the side of some of the greatest efforts of modern Parliamentary times; there was, however, one Member to whom the House and the country were under incalculable obligations for having interposed at a critical moment to withdraw the discussion of this momentous question from the disturbing forces and blinding mists of party and faction, and bringing to bear upon it the whole combined intellect, sagacity, and experience of Parliament—he meant the noble Lord the Member for the City of London. From the moment that most important and timely suggestion was adopted by this House, the course of Indian legislation appeared to him (Mr. Warren) to run comparatively smoothly and satisfactorily. And there was another hon. Member of that House entitled also to the lasting gratitude of the House and the country—he meant the noble Lord the President of the Board of Control (Lord Stanley). Between the noble Lord and him (Mr. Warren) there at present existed grave differences of opinion on certain political and social questions of the highest importance, but that should not for one moment prevent him from bearing willing testimony to the unvarying firmness of purpose, the unruffled temper, the clear-sightedness, tact, and courtesy, and the fertility of resources, with which he had conducted thus far the Bill before the House. He (Mr. Warren) most ardently hoped for a prosperous issue of their present legislation; that the system they were constructing would work long and well, and might be administered by wise and experienced men, so as to promote the welfare not of this country only, but of the vast multitude of those whom it would soon bring under the direct government of the Queen. The responsibilities attending the assumption of that government were already felt and seen to be growing greater and greater the more closely the future was scanned; and the noble Lord and the Government might depend on every movement of theirs being watched by the country at large with unsleeping vigour—he might say a stern solicitude—in which he (Mr. Warren) himself so largely shared, that he could not resist rising to utter what he had now taken the liberty of submitting to the House, and he begged pardon for having occupied even so much of the time and attention of the House at that stage of the Bill.

MR. VERNON SMITH said, that being desirous that they should proceed to the consideration of the Amendments as soon as possible, he would postpone the questions of which he had given notice till Friday next, on which day he understood from the noble Lord the President of the Board of Control he would be prepared to make a statement. These questions were:—"Whether the 17,000 men sent to India since January last included any troops requested to be added to the establishment in India by the Directors of the East India Company? Whether he will state the terms and objects of the Commission to inquire into the reorganization of the Indian army? What is the amount borrowed under the Indian Loan Act of this Session, and whether the amount allowed to be borrowed under the act will cover the expenses of the current year, or if Bills are now drawn upon India in the usual method? And whether any instructions have been sent, or will be sent, to proclaim Her Majesty's name and authority in India, and to announce the intentions of the Government as to non-interference with the religion of the Natives?" If this was to be the last time they were to hear the voice of the hon. Member for Guildford in that House, though he was sure there could not be a more efficient member for the new Council, yet he should be sorry to lose him from the House. But with regard to his statement that blame had been cast upon the civil servants of India, and that the late Government had brought forward the Bill with the sole motive of obtaining popularity, he was bound to say that great praise had been given to the civil servants of the East India Company, and that the late Government had not not been influenced in any way by a desire to court popularity when they brought forward the first India Bill.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL suggested that it was not desirable to prolong a debate on the general government of India, and that it would be desirable to proceed with the Lords' Amendments. He had the speech of the hon. gentleman the Member for Guildford with much pleasure, and he regretted that his acceptance of a seat at the Indian Council would deprive him of his seat in the House. They had often received from him valuable information on Indian questions, and it was in that respect he (Lord J. Russell) continued to think the Bill was defective.

GENERAL THOMPSON considered the choice of the present moment for this change to be well described by a popular writer as "a crowning madness," to be paralleled only by that of the ship-captain who should choose the moment of a gale of wind at sea for shifting his lower masts; and he hoped the mover would go to a division, that he and those who held the same opinion might have an opportunity to record it. He believed that if there was any chance of preserving India, what would have more effect than 20,000 men, would be to bring a Mohammedan Indian to the table of the House, as was done yesterday with a Hebrew. This would be something like a guarantee to the 180,000,000 of British subjects an hon. Member (Mr. Fox) had named on a late occasion. He had himself talked theology with a sovereign Prince, and at Jidda with the Legate of the Sherif, and knew of personal knowledge that the well-informed Mohammedans were more tolerant than most Christians. In the Crimean war, when there was an interest in conciliating the Mohammedans, a Bishop had declared that Mohammedanism was an offset of Christianity, or words to that effect; and it was indeed true, if stripped of the prejudices of ignorance, that the difference was not greater than between the Established Church and the Unitarians, or perhaps the Catholics. Among other offers of service himself had made at that time, one, as known to officers present, was to go to the Sherif of Mecca, the Mohammedan Pontiff, and negotiate for what might be called a Concordat to authorize the enlistment of Mohammedans under British officers in Turkey; and he was persuaded it might have been done. The cry of Mohammedan intolerance was an invention of the enemy; the vulgar were everywhere intolerant. For his part he would with great pleasure accompany a Mohammedan friend to that table if he would take the oath "on the true faith of a Christian;" which he knew no reason why he should not.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Several Amendments agreed to.

Amendment page 9, at the end of Clause 27, read a second time.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he wished to propose an alteration in the words introduced by the Lords into Clause 27. The clause provided that orders, which were now sent to India through the Secret Committee, might in future be sent by the Secretary of State, without communication with his Council; and the words inserted by the Lords were,—

"But no such order shall be sent without being previously communicated to the Vice President and one other member, to be from time to time selected by the Secretary of State."

Now, he doubted whether this Amendment would provide the security wished for, and he would therefore propose to strike out the words "the Vice President and one other member," and substitute "a committee consisting of the Vice President and four other members," adding the following words to the end of the sentence, "and the opinion of the committee in respect of such order shall be recorded in writing."

Amendment proposed, to insert after the words "communicated to," the words "a Committee consisting of Four."

LORD STANLEY said, he must oppose the alteration proposed by the noble Lord, which would have the effect of dividing the responsibility of the Minister, besides imposing upon him a very invidious duty of selection. He could not defend the Amendment of the Lords, for his own opinion was either that absolute secrecy should be secured to the Secretary of State, or that he should be allowed to communicate with the whole of his Council.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM said, he objected to the Lords' Amendment, and would support his noble Friend (Lord Stanley) if he moved that the House do not agree to that Amendment. He had supported the principle that all secrecy should be at an end, and that all despatches should be communicated to the Council; but, failing in that, he could not support an Amendment which would confer secret powers upon five members of the Council, as he saw no alternative between an open Council and complete secrecy in the Secretary of State.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the suggestion of the right hon. Baronet could not be carried out, unless the noble Lord the Member for the City consented to withdraw his Motion. He thought, for his own part, that the original arrangement of the House of Commons was the best; and if the noble Lord withdrew his Amendment, he should not be prepared to press the adoption of the Lords' Amendment.

MR. MANGLES thought the Amendment of the noble Lord was an improvement on the Amendment of the Lords. It was better to have two, and still more to have five, members of the Council who should be responsible, than to leave the matter entirely in the hands of the Minister. There never was, however, a more preposterous humbug than this Secret Committee, and why it was to be continued he could not conceive.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, the Secret Committee, if there was to be one, should be selected by the Council itself, and not by the Minister.

MR. BOWYER remarked, that the Amendment proposed by the noble Lord was an improvement upon that adopted by the other House, though the number of the committee was perhaps too large.

MR. VERNON SMITH said, he must object to the Lords' Amendment. The Lords said that they would not trust the Secretary of State, and what did they do? They compelled the Secretary of State to consult two gentlemen nominated by himself. At the same time, he could not conceive any arrangement more embarrassing to the Secretary of State than the proposition of the noble Lord the Member for London. He was glad that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not support the Lords' Amendment, if that of the noble Member for London was withdrawn, for both Amendments would have the effect of re-establishing the Secret Committee—and a very bad Secret Committee—to record their protests against every act of the President of the Board of Control.

MR. RICH said, he would rather have the Secretary of State restrained by the words in the Bill than not restrained at all; but he should desire that the members selected by the Indian Minister should have the power of recording their opinions.

COLONEL SYKES said, he also thought that, if those persons were to have the power of recording their opinions, it would be a great improvement; but it would be a greater improvement to make the whole Council a Secret Council when necessary.

MR. WILSON said, he could unde rstan the argument that there should be a responsible Minister, and that all should be left to him; but when they gave to that Minister a Council specially selected for their knowledge and information, he could not understand why they should not be consulted, the more particularly upon questions of peace or war, or questions involving important points of policy. On the other hand, there was a reason why they should adopt some such limitation as that proposed by the House of Lords. Up to a certain stage of the Bill in that House, it was understood that bankers and other persons in trade should not be appointed to the Council. However, since then, all that had been changed. Bankers and traders were now eligible to seats on the Council, and therefore he could not think it advisable that the whole Council should be included in the Secret Committee. If they had had a Secretary of State for India this spring, who was bound to communicate with a Council, or a Committee of a Council, did anybody believe that the Ellenborough despatch would have gone out? If they were to have a Council, surely that Council ought to be consulted on those questions which, in their character and results, were of the greatest importance. Under these circumstances, he would support the Amendment of the noble Lord, which limited the number of the Secret Committee, though not to so great an extent as that of the House of Lords; but, in case his noble Friend's Amendment was not adopted, he would support that of the House of Lords, as better than no limitation or than undivided responsibility on the part of the Minister.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he confessed that he was surprised that his noble Friend the Member for the City of London, who had been so long connected with official life, and who knew so well what were the duties and responsibilities of those in high office, should have proposed such an Amendment. He apprehended that the foundation of the measure assented to by Parliament was, that the government of India should be transferred from the double organization of the East India Company and the Board of Control to the single responsibility of the Minister of the Crown. A great deal of the mistakes and confusion which had occurred on this part of the subject arose from the circumstance of hon. Gentlemen using the word Secretary of State instead of Ministry of the day; for although the power would be given nominally to the Secretary of State for India, the fullest responsibility would be shared by the whole Cabinet of which that Minister was a member. If he wanted an illustration of the correctness of this view, he might refer to a case which had lately taken place, in which a Minister of State, having acted without his colleagues, had resigned his seat in the Cabinet, and the Government to which he belonged had accepted that resignation in atonement for their colleague having violated what might be termed the strict line of official duty. The real object of the Lords' Amendment, and of that proposed by the noble Lord the Member for London, was that, instead of leaving the entire responsibility with the Secretary of State and with the Cabinet—and who alone were responsible for declaring peace or war—that responsibility should be shared with other persons who were not in the same position, who were not appointed by the Crown, and who were not responsible to, or dependent upon the support of Parliament, but held their offices for life, and were not even bound by an oath of secrecy like the Secret Committee. If this principle were once adopted, the same obligation might be imposed upon the Minister for Foreign Affairs, the Secretary of State for the Colonies, or the First Lord of the Admiralty, upon whose acts might depend the question of peace or war. He (Viscount Palmerston) utterly denied the logical conclusion of the argument that if this Amendment were not carried the Secretary of State would be precluded from communicating with his colleagues at the Council in all the more important matters which would occupy his attention. There was nothing in the Bill to preclude the Cabinet from consulting any person in the Council or out of it from whom they might be able to derive information or advice. But what he objected to was, that it should be defined in the Bill that the Secretary of State for India should consult any particular individuals. Then it was said that those persons were to record their opinions; but suppose they did, and that the Cabinet declared war and the Secret Committee agreed with them, was it to be said that the Cabinet was to shelter itself under that sanction. Or, on the other hand, if the Secret Committee did not approve, was it to be said that a Government was to be impeached because the Secret Committee had recorded an opinion against them? In his opinion, the House was bound, having decided upon abolishing the double Government, to do so unconditionally. Holding these views, he should vote against the Amendment.

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and negatived.

Motion made and Question put, "That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said Amendment."

The House divided:—Ayes 38; Noes 106: Majority 68.

Amendment to Clause 29, read a second time.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM said, he could well understand the whole of the patronage of the Indian Government, after that Government was transferred to Her Majesty, being vested in Her Majesty. But the terms of the clause, as amended by the Lords, vested that patronage entirely in the hands of the Secretary of State for India in Council. Clause 23 would show what the power of the Secretary of State in Council was. The Secretary of State moved any matter before the Council; but the Council could not contradict him whatever might be their opinion; the decision in all cases remained with him. As the clause went up, the patronage was in the hands of the Secretary of State it was true, but with the concurrence of the majority of the Council. The words struck out were material. He was in favour of leaving the patronage in the hands of the Secretary of State, under the control of the majority of the Council, or in the Crown, upon the responsibility of the whole Cabinet. He considered that this patronage was far too large to entrust in the hands of any Minister, that Minister not being the chief of the Government, and as he thought the Lords' Amendment objectionable in a constitutional point of view, he should move that the House do reject the Amendment in this clause.

LORD STANLEY said, he concurred with the right hon. Baronet in thinking there was a constitutional anomaly in the clause as it then stood, and he should not consequently feel justified in asking the House to agree with the Amendment of the Lords.

Motion made, and Question, "That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said Amendment," put, and negatived.

Several other Amendments disagreed to.

Further consideration of Lords' Amendments adjourned till this day at six o'clock.

MILITARY HOSPITAL AND MEDICAL SCHOOL AT ALDERSHOT.

QUESTION.

SIR HARRY VERNEY: Sir, the Royal Commission having shown the necessity for a General Military Hospital and Medical School, and a new Hospital being about to be erected at Aldershot, will Her Majesty's Government take into consideration whether this Hospital might not be used for the purpose contemplated by the Royal Commission.

GENERAL PEEL: Sir, in reply, I have to state that the question of erecting a General Military Hospital and Medical School is now under the consideration of the Government, and at some future period no doubt it will be necessary to erect a Hospital at Aldershot, to which a Medical School might very properly be annexed. But no money has been taken for the purpose in the Estimates, and the matter is still under consideration.

SCOTTISH SHERIFFS.—QUESTION.

SIR WILLIAM DUNBAR said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to take advantage of any vacancies occurring in the Sheriffships in Scotland to effect the full accomplishment of the object of the Act 16 & 17 Vict., c. 92, for diminishing the number of Sheriffs in Scotland, by transferring any of the Sheriffs of the Counties to be united into one Sheriffdom to such other Sheriffdoms as may become vacant by death or promotions, and thus save to the Public Revenue the Salaries payable to the former, as was contemplated at the passing of the Act 16 & 17 Vict., c. 80, by which the Salaries of all the Sheriffs in Scotland were increased?

MR. WALPOLE: Sir, I am not aware that any such expectation has been held out as has been referred to in the question of the hon. Gentleman. The Act of Parliament is quite clear, its provision being that with reference to fourteen Sheriffdoms held by fourteen different Sheriffs, whenever a vacancy occurs in one, the holder of the office in another should take the duties on himself, so that the number of Sheriffs may be gradually reduced from fourteen to seven in the smaller Counties in Scotland. Some vacancies in the smaller Counties have occurred since the passing of the Act, and in six out of the fourteen smaller Counties one Sheriff is discharging the duties of two Counties, which makes a reduction of three out of the fourteen Sheriffdoms. The question which I suppose the hon. Baronet wishes to put is, whether if a vacancy occurs in one of the larger Counties, the Sheriff of one of the smaller ones shall be put into the office, so as to enable that small County to be united to others, with a view to the diminution of the number? In any case where a Sheriff of a small County is of such known ability as to render it advisable to promote him to a larger one, that course may be taken; but I could not advise the Crown not to select the best man to appoint to the larger County merely to facilitate the reduction of the number of Sheriffs in the smaller Counties.

BREACH OF PRIVILEGE.—THE ATTORNEY GENERAL.—QUESTION.

MR. SCHNEIDER said, he wished to put a question to the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General which involved a question of the Breach of the Prileges of that House. It was his intention to have brought the matter forward at length, but he did not wish to stand between the proceeding with the India Bill, and he should content himself with asking a question of the hon. and learned Gentleman, and bring the matter before the House on Friday. He would therefore beg to ask the hon. and learned Gentleman whether in his capacity as Attorney General, and in the discharge of his duty to Her Majesty, he has received any fee in reference to any Bill in the discussion of which in the House he has taken part, and on which he has voted on a division?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: Sir, it has been the practice from very early times, whenever a Bill is brought into Parliament, whether it is brought forward by any Department of the Government, or is a Bill brought before the House at the instance of an individual Member, which involves any question of the rights of the Crown to any property of any description, to submit the Bill, or the clauses which relate to the rights of the Crown, to one or other, or both of the Law Officers of the Crown, the Attorney General and the Solicitor General. That practice is well known—must be well known to the Members of every Government who have sat in the House in the present century, and must be and is known to the hon. Gentleman who put the question. During the present Session two Bills, one of which was recently before the House, directly affected the rights of the Crown to property of considerable value. Those Bills, in conformity with ancient practice, were submitted to the Attorney General, and I believe to my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General, under the usual circumstances and with the usual fees attached to them; and certainly and undoubtedly in the discussion on that Bill the Attorney General and the Solicitor General, as they felt bound in duty to the Crown to do, did take part, and on one, two, and, I believe, three divisions, I myself, and I believe my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General divided in support of the particular views they had taken respecting it.

GOVERNMENT OF INDIA (No. 3) BILL.

LORDS' AMENDMENTS.

Amendment to Clause 31 read a second time.

SIR HENRY RAWLINSON said, that he entertained great objections to this Amendment. The clause provided for the competitive examination of the civil service and the medical service. By the Amendment the latter was passed over, and the medical service became nominative. At present, although theoretically there was a system of competitive examination in the medical service, practically there was none at all. Thus, in the May examination, though there had been twenty-five appointments to fill up, there were only seventeen candidates, and of these only ten passed. In the last month there were forty medical appointments, but only thirty-seven candidates, of whom thirty-one had passed the minimum examination. In reality, therefore, there was not a competitive examination; the candidates only passed a minimum examination, as was done previously under the system of nomination. What led to the small number of applications for these appointments he did not know; perhaps the remuneration was considered inadequate, or perhaps this particular service was unpopular. At the same time, he presumed that the House would wish the system of competitive examination to be maintained in the medical as well as in the civil service, and he himself was quite in favour of that system.

LORD STANLEY said, with regard to the system of competitive examination generally, he had not the least desire to avoid discussion upon that subject, and he should be prepared at the proper time with an explanation respecting it, as he thought what had passed elsewhere had been greatly misunderstood.

Lords' Amendment agreed to.

Amendment in Clause 32, by which were struck out the words:—

"And the candidates who may be certified by the said Commissioners or other persons as aforesaid, to be entitled under such regulations shall be recommended for appointment according to the order of the proficiency, as shown by such examination, and such persons only as shall have been so certified as aforesaid, shall be appointed or admitted to the civil service of India by the Secretary of State in Council."

Read a second time.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: I trust the noble Lord the President of the Board of Control will, before the House disposes of this Amendment, give us that explanation which he has just been good enough to promise. It was my wish, as well as the wish of many other Members of this House, that the principle of competitive examinations should be more generally sanctioned in this Bill, and that it should be extended beyond appointments in the Civil Service and in the scientific branches of the army. The noble Lord the President of the Board of Control has frequently declared himself to be in favour of that principle, and has assented to the insertion in this Bill of a provision sanctioning its adoption. He has, however, at the same time stated it to be his opinion that to introduce such a principle in the case of all appointments in the army in India would be premature; that such a proceeding would be open to the charge of being precipitate legislation; and that it was, therefore, expedient to confine the system of competitive examination to admission into the Civil Service and into the scientific branches of the army,—namely, into the artillery and engineers. Now, I confess it appears to me that that was a very fair view of the question to take, although the proposal of the noble Lord does not quite go to the extent which I should desire. That proposal, however, affords, I think, some earnest that her Majesty's Government would not be found averse hereafter, should experience be found to establish the success of the competitive system, to its further extension. But while in this Bill the other House of Parliament have left in the clause all the words which relate to the maintenance of the principle of competition in certain cases, they have struck out all those words under the operation of which persons undergoing an examination of this description should, as a matter of course, receive the reward which they might be entitled to expect; the result being that the power will be practically vested in the Minister of the day to put an end to those examinations altogether or not as he may deem expedient. Now it is obviously of no value that it should be enacted that a certain system of examinations should be established unless the young men who may happen to compete at those examinations obtain those rewards, which, if successful, they were led to suppose they would receive. Under these circumstances it is, I think, absolutely necessary that we should restore the words which have been omitted from this clause in the other House of Parliament, inasmuch as it would be, in my opinion, most objectionable that the discretion to which I have adverted should be left altogether in the Minister of the Crown. The noble Lord at present at the head of our Indian Administration is, it is true, favourable to the principle for which I contend, and would, I have no doubt, carry into effect the clause as it stands in a fair and liberal spirit. Another Secretary of State for India might, however, entertain entirely different views upon the subject of competitive examinations. He might say that he required practical men for the public service in that country, and that he would not adhere to a system under which young men had merely shown themselves to be proficient in certain departments of learning. To prevent the possibility of such a state of things as that hereafter arising, it is, I think, our duty to disagree with the Lords' Amendment.

LORD STANLEY: Sir, I hope the noble Lord has done me no more than simple justice in the observations which he made in reference to myself personally — observations which are equally applicable to the other Members of the Government, when he said that he believed me to be favourable to the principle of unrestricted competition. I supported that principle five years ago, at a time when it was far less popular than I am happy to say it is at present, and when a strong feeling in opposition to it prevailed in more than one quarter. I have not since altered with respect to it the views which I then entertained; and nothing, I may add, during the progress of this measure through Parliament, afforded me greater pleasure than the circumstance that I was placed in the position of one whose duty and privilege it was to extend that principle of which the noble Lord is to-night the advocate to the scientific branches of the army in India. I therefore can assure the noble Lord that if the alteration which has been introduced into the clause under our notice were in my mind calculated to have the effect of destroying or impairing that right of free competition which we in this House have asserted, I would rather resign the office which I have the honour to hold than give to that alteration my assent. I do not, however, believe that the Amendment will have any such operation, and I may, perhaps, be permitted to state to the House in a few words the circumstances under which it was introduced. In the first place, the clause as it now stands, or rather as it will stand, if this alteration be agreed to, will leave the question of competition for the civil service upon the same footing as that upon which it has stood ever since 1853, when the right hon. Gentleman, who was then President of the Board of Control, introduced a Bill which was understood, and rightly understood, to sanction the adoption of the principle of competition in the case of appointments for the civil service; but which still does nothing more than give to the Crown the power to establish the system of competitive examinations by means of an Order in Council. If, therefore, the Amendment under our consideration should be agreed to, no existing right would be impaired under the operation of this clause. The change which, during the progress of this measure, I proposed to introduce with respect to the principle of unrestricted competition was simply to recognise in an Act of Parliament instead of in an Order in Council the right to admission into the public service which might be thus acquired. When that change was proposed, we were told that it would be quite opposed to constitutional practice, inasmuch as its effect would be to give to administrative and executive appointments the sanction of a Parliamentary title. There is, as far as I can ascertain, no precedent for adopting such a course. We therefore felt ourselves obliged to admit that the objection was a valid one. Then arose the question by what other provision could we secure the adoption of this competitive principle? The clause under consideration was passed as affording the best means of attaining that object. The noble Lord, however, says that if this alteration which has been introduced into it in the other House of Parliament be assented to, it will altogether depend upon the discretion of the Minister of the day whether the system of competitive examinations is or is not carried into effect. Now, I do not think that the matter stands precisely upon the footing which the noble Lord seems to suppose. It must be borne in mind that the regulations under which those examinations are to be conducted must be laid down by means of an Order in Council. That Order in Council may, it is true, be subsequently altered or modified by another, but then you will always have this check upon the action of the Minister, that that subsequent Order in Council must, within the shortest possible time, be laid before this House, which will thus be challenged to express its opinion with respect to it. Now, knowing as we do that the great majority of the Members of this assembly—as will, I have no doubt, be the case in every successive Parliament — is favourable to the principle of unrestricted competition, we may, I think, confidently trust that the feeling which pervades the present will animate every future House of Commons, and take that feeling as a sufficient guarantee that no Order in Council will be sanctioned, the object of which may be to modify or repeal the principle of unrestricted competition. Let me suppose, for instance, that the Minister should, by means of a new Order in Council, attempt to sweep away that principle, and to return to the old system of nomination, without or without an examination test. What, I ask, would be the result? The Order in Council would be laid upon the table of this House. The propriety of issuing it would be discussed. A Motion would be made expressing the views of the House on the subject, and a division would be taken upon the question; and how, I should like to know, could it be possible that any Minister would have the power to carry his own views in favour of the principle of nomination in opposition to the feelings and wishes of the House of Commons? If, by any possibility, any future Minister should possess such a power, how, I ask you, will the rejection of this Amendment afford any additional security against its exercise? You have now, it is said, the security of an Act of Parliament. But such an Act can always be repealed, if Parliament should change its mind. The practical guarantee for the maintenance of the principle of free competition rests now, as it has done hitherto, in the known feelings and opinions of the House of Commons upon the subject. I may also be permitted to remind the House that when a system of this kind is once established it cannot be swept away at a moment's notice by any Minister, however desirous he may be to dispense with it. When you have the system in operation, and men are undergoing a process of training with the view of availing themselves of the advantages which it presents, no change subversive of it could be introduced without a notice of at least twelve months, or more probably two years. A challenge would thus, as it were, be thrown out to this House which would be thus afforded an ample opportunity of asserting their opinion in respect to the question which it may happen to entertain. The House will have that opportunity, and whether its opinion be expressed in one form or another appears to me to be quite immaterial. The clause was drawn to meet the difficulty of constitutional law, and it is a great difficulty. But I must state my firm belief that whether these words be omitted or retained, the principle of unrestricted competition is equally safe, and equally certain to be maintained. Upon no other understanding could I be induced to consent to the Amendment that has been made in the clause.

SIR DENHAM NORREYS said, that in his opinion the House ought to insist on some further safeguard for the continuance f unrestricted competitive examinations than a mere Order in Council. No doubt if they could have the assurance that the noble Lord would always be at the head of the Indian Government, they might trust to his support of the principle of unrestricted competition. But suppose the noble predecessor of the noble Lord who had so recently attacked that system in so strong a manner, were restored to office, what would be the value of such assurances in that case? He should, therefore, vote for the retention of the clause.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM: If the noble Lord the Member for London divides the House upon this point, I shall feel it my duty to divide with him. I have the utmost confidence in the assurance of the noble Lord the President of the Board of Control, for I well remember the vote which he gave in 1853, when I had the honour of voting with him when this principle of open competition was not, as he has truly said, nearly so popular as it is at present. I ventured last night, on another question, to say, that this was the age of progress, and I was told by the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck) that I should have said an age of change. Now, this Amendment of the Lords is certainly not progress, but it is change. It is really and substantially a reversal of the decision which this House, after full discussion, has adopted. The noble Lord (Lord Stanley) had very correctly described what took place in 1853. It was considered by the Government of that day that the civil service of India should be opened to direct competition; but no such provision was inserted in the Bill itself. It was given effect to by an Order in Council issued in the following year. But after full deliberation on this question, it was thought expedient to give a statutory recognition to the principle, which did not before rest on statute. The noble Lord, however, says he can see no difference as concerns civil appointments, of which alone we are talking at present, between an Order in Council to be laid upon the table of this House and a statutable recognition such as was contained in this Bill when we sent it to the House of Lords. I must differ with the noble Lord upon that point. To repeal an Act of Parliament which confers a statutable recognition is a long and serious operation; but by a single vote depending upon the presence of hon. Members and a variety of accidents a decision may be given upon an Order in Council. I believe the principle of unrestricted competition embodied in the Bill as we sent it to the other House, at all events as regards civil appointments, was a sound principle. I do not think it would be safe to depart from that principle; but it would be an act of retrogression upon a most important point—the management of the civil patronage of India. I have the highest confidence in the success of the competitive system. We have the opinion of Sir John Lawrence, the highest authority in India, whose recent experience of these civil appointments, which have taken place under a system of open competition, has been, I am told, so favourable, that he earnestly desires, in conformity with the gallant General below me (Sir De Lacy Evans) that that principle may be extended to the scientific branches of the army. Thus we have experience, authority, and the decision of this House in favour of the system, and I can see no reason for the alteration that has been made by the other House, for I cannot conceive the reason that has been suggested—that it was supposed the sons of the middle classes were not so well fitted for the appointments as the sons of the nobility and gentry. Upon these grounds, therefore, I shall certainly give my vote with the noble Member for London.

MR. WALPOLE said, he thought there would be no controversy between his right hon. Friend (Sir J. Graham) and the Government on one or two points; especially would there be no controversy between him and them as to the last point he mentioned —that the sons of the middle classes were fully as much entitled, if they were found equally qualified, to these appointments as the sons of the nobility and gentry. That was a point on which there could be no controversy whatever. Another point on which there would be no controversy between them was that the competitive system, which was first introduced by regulations prescribed under the Act of 1853, though not by the Act itself, was intended by the Government to be as fully and fairly acted upon for the future as it was at the present moment. The question that was raised between them was this, whether they were to tie up the operation of that system within the four corners of an Act of Parliament, or whether they were to allow the Government a liberty, under certain circumstances, of subjecting that system to alterations and modifications. The danger of inserting a clause of that kind in the Act was, that it tied up the matter altogether and left no latitude to the Government, however important or necessary it might be, to effect any modifications in the system or in the mode of carrying the principle into effect. He took leave to say that such a power had never been taken in any Act of Parliament yet. But the security they had already for the continuance of the competitive system was as great as it well could be short of the objectionable system of inserting it in the Act; for by the words of the clause itself the regulations made upon that question by the Secretary of State in Council must be laid upon the table of the House within a month, so that the House had the most complete power to pronounce an opinion on the alterations that might be made, while they retained to the Government the additional power of considering whether under certain circumstances it might not be expedient to alter or modify the system. His right hon. Friend said this was an age of progress, while the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield called it an age of change. Well, his right hon. Friend was a great constitutional authority; and if he were sitting on that (the Ministerial) bench—as he heartily wished he was—he would say that nothing could be so unadvisable as that the Crown appointments should be made in such a way as to deprive Ministers of the responsibility in making those appointments. But if they restored the words which the Lords had removed, that responsibility would be, to some extent, taken away; and, therefore, in his judgment the omission of these words was better than their insertion, not because the omission did away with the principle of competitive examination, but because the insertion deprived them of the power of regulating it afterwards.

MR. WILSON said, the argument of the right hon. Gentleman necessarily led to the conclusion that the principle of competitive examination was to be given up altogether. It reserved a discretion to the Crown, leaving that discretion as wide as any Minister chose to make it, and the whole object of the clause would be lost. He could understand that the Government should wish to abandon the principle of competitive examination, but he could not understand why the whole world should be invited to compete, as they were in the opening of the clause, if there was to be no security that the successful candidates should be appointed. But if any person were not appointed after being successful in the competition, it would give rise to a charge of unfairness and partiality against the Government, which ought, above all things, to be avoided. He would, therefore, give his vote for restoring the clause to the shape in which it had left that House.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he thought the hon. Member for Devonport (Mr. Wilson) hardly appreciated the measure which the Government had presented to the House. His objection was, that if the clause as amended by the Lords were passed in this House, the result would be, that there would be no security that those who were successful in the examination would be appointed. Now, they had this security, as his right hon. Friend had explained; they had the security of the existing Order in Council, until that order were revoked or modified. But it could not be revoked or modified without the modification being laid on the table of this House, so as to invite the opinion of the House upon it. Therefore, any person who was successful in open competition had this double security for his appointment—first, the Order in Council; and second, the veto of the House of Commons upon any change in that Order; and he ventured to think that that was a security which all the candidates for examination would consider perfectly satisfactory for the future, as it had been considered satisfactory in the past. The House was quite agreed about the principle of competitive examination; and, as he believed, quite satisfied with the declaration of his noble Friend that he was prepared to carry out that principle to the utmost. But then there stepped in this objection to the Bill as it left that House, that they first declared in the Bill that all appointments were vested in the Crown, and then they had a Parliamentary declaration that such persons only should be appointed as fulfilled certain conditions. It was a mockery first to give the appointments to the Crown, and then to say that those appointments should be conferred solely by a Parliamentary title altogether independent of the Crown. That was a constitutional objection, of which he thought hon. Members opposite would feel the force; and it was on that ground that his noble Friend had proposed that the Amendment of the Lords should be assented to.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, he wished to remind the House that the question was in a very different position now from what it was in 1853. They had now changed the Government of India, and one of the chief dangers that had always been apprehended by those who had seriously considered that question was, that which might arise from placing of the Indian patronage wholly in the hands of the Crown. Now, in 1853, if the competitive system had been abolished, the patronage would have fallen back into the hands of the Directors of the Company, where it had always been; but if it were abolished now, it would fall into the hands of the Crown. He did not feel much confidence in the duration of the Council which was about to be established, and it was against the abuses of future Parliaments that they had to guard. If in future times Parliament should relax its vigilance—and he had no great confidence in their watchfulness—the same danger would arise which had for so many years made successive Governments shrink from abolishing the system of double Government which had hitherto existed.

MR. VERNON SMITH said, he had never been a great enthusiast for the competitive principle, but having had some experience of the competition in the civil service, he was bound to say the young men who had been selected for offices in that service were admirable specimens. He thought that, having agreed on that principle, no one could hesitate to say that an Act of Parliament would afford the strongest security for carrying it out, now that an issue had been raised as to whether its operation could be best secured by that means or by an Order in Council. An Order of Council might be overlooked or be left to sleep on the table of the House; but once having got the principle within the four corners of an Act of Parliament, it could only be set aside by an Act of the Legislature; and there would be then no risk of the system of competition being destroyed without such an examination of its merits as would show that its destruction was due to a manifest change in public opinion. He would, therefore, urge the House to adhere to the Bill in this respect as it was sent up to the Lords.

Question put, "That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said Amendment."

The House divided:—Ayes 60; Noes 73: Majority 13.

Amendment in Clause 34 read a second time.

SIR DE LACY EVANS said, that the system of competitive examination was as good for the scientific branches of the army as for the civil service; and he had a Motion to submit with regard to the scientific arrangements of the army. He therefore proposed to reinsert the words omitted by the other House after the word "examination," as follows:—

"And the candidates who may be found entitled under such regulation shall be recommended for such cadetships according to the order of their proficiency, as shown by such examination."

LORD STANLEY said, it was clear that the principle involved in the former discussion was equally applicable here, and after the expression of the opinion of the House in the recent division he would not contest it further. In taking leave of this subject, he could only express his hope that, though the House had preferred one mode of establishing this principle to another, they would not believe—what, certainly, was not the case—that it was the intention of the Government to abandon a principle that had been so frequently and so distinctly affirmed.

Amendment disagreed with.

Amendment in Clause 35 read a second time.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM said, he was extremely unwilling to raise slight objections to any portion of this Bill, which he was ready to acknowledge had been conducted through the House by the noble Lord (Lord Stanley) and the Government with remarkable fairness and candour; but it appeared to him that the insertion in this clause of the words "preventing or" would constitute a very great difference in its meaning. He approved the spirit and object of the clause as it left that House, because, as it then stood, it gave no encouragement to unnecessary wars. All the aggressive wars that had taken place in the history of India had been carried on under the pretext of repelling threatened invasion. He need only allude to the Affghan war in illustration of this statement. He was quite confident that if these words, "preventing or" were allowed to remain, the clause would be rendered altogether nugatory. Take the case of Nepaul. The Governor General might raise the question that in his opinion invasion was intended on the part of that State, and with the view of preventing such threatened invasion hostile proceedings might be undertaken at a great cost to the revenues of India. It had been said, however, that these words were a solecism, as if it was absurd to send troops out of the country to repel an invasion when the enemy must be actually in the country. He had to state that the clause was drawn by a skilful dialectician, and one too that had no mean skill in logomachy, and these were the terms that occurred to him to use. He did not say that in repelling invasion they ought not to take troops beyond the external frontier. This was done on the very last occasion on which their Indian provinces were invaded. The Sikhs crossed the Sutlej, thereby invading our territory. Lord Hardinge repelled the invasion, and drove them across the Sutlej and carried the troops beyond the external frontier. This was a sort of operation which it would not be desirable to prevent, for to meet invasion by going beyond the frontier was a legitimate mode of carrying on hostile measures. On the other hand, taking hostile measures to meet threatened invasion was precisely the course of proceeding which had led during the last century to the most offensive, profligate, and aggressive wars, and it was most desirable that every precaution should be taken, as far as enactment could do so, to prevent recourse being had to such a policy. On these grounds he objected to the introduction of the words "preventing or" by the Lords.

SIR FREDERICK SMITH said, he thought that when the Governor General had reason to believe that preparations for the invasion of our Indian territory were being made near the frontier, he ought to have the power of sending beyond the frontier a force sufficient to frustrate the designs of the enemy, because by so doing he might, by a speedy blow, prevent that expenditure of blood and treasure which would be occasioned by an actual invasion. Every man at all acquainted with the art of war must know perfectly well that nothing could be more foolish than to wait until an enemy who contemplated invasion had completed his preparations before you attacked him. The hands of the Governor General ought not to be tied up in such matters by an Act of Parliament. Lord Hardinge was disinclined to believe that the Sikhs intended to invade the empire, but had he been certain of that he would have crossed the Sutlej, and brought that war to a much speedier end.

GENERAL CODRINGTON said, there could be no doubt that our Indian army would be placed at a great disadvantage if it were not permitted to cross a river for the purpose of attacking an army that was making preparations to invade our territory. An attack of that nature might be the best mode of defending our territory.

LORD STANLEY said, that with all deference to his right hon. Friend, he did not think that the words "preventing or repelling actual invasion" would have covered such a case as that of the Affghan war, because that war was carried on at a great distance from our then frontier in India for the purpose of establishing a safeguard, not against actual invasion, but against a nation that at some future time might have attempted to invade our territory. He had reason to believe that the intention of inserting the words objected to was to remove the objection of some persons who said that there was a contradiction of terms in saying that you were not to cross the frontier except for the purpose of repelling invasion. Speaking strictly, there could be no invasion to repel until the enemy had crossed the frontier. But the truth was, that the clause was more a declaration of the intention and opinion of Parliament than anything else. The words "except in case of urgent necessity or actual invasion" were, in fact, so wide that a court of law would construe them so as to make them cover everything which could possibly be imagined. He believed that if the Governor General could establish the fact that in directing the Indian army to cross the frontier his object was bona fide to prevent invasion a court of law would hold that he was justified in acting upon his own judgment. It would be impossible to hold him guilty of a breach of the clause if he could establish the honesty of his intention. He thought the first part of the clause was such as to render it superfluous for the House to criticise minutely the legal effect of the other part, and therefore he should recommend the House to adhere to the clause as it stood.

MR. RICH said, he agreed with the right hon. Member for Carlisle that the word "preventing" would cover almost any military operation in India. The words "urgent necessity" would meet the case of an army assembled on the frontier for the purpose of invasion. He was in favour of adhering to the original words, as he thought it desirable to impose every restraint on a Governor General, in resorting to the dreadful alternative of war.

COLONEL SYKES observed that he was afraid that the phraseology of the words of an Act of Parliament was not likely to prevent wars in India. Past history told them that every Governor General somehow or other found himself engaged in a war, and the Home Government always felt themselves compelled to support him.

Question put, "That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said Amendment."

The House divided:—Ayes 95; Noes 28: Majority 67.

Committee appointed,—

"To draw up Reasons to be assigned to the Lords for disagreeing to the Amendments to which this House hath disagreed:"—Lord STANLEY, Mr. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, Mr. SOLICITOR GENERAL, Lord JOHN RUSSELL, Sir JAMES GRAHAM, and Mr. VERNON SMITH.

To withdraw immediately; three to be the quorum.

REASONS.

"The Commons disagree to the Amendments in page 9, line 2 and line 7, for the following Reasons:

"'Because they tend to divide the responsibility of the Minister; and because they create anew the Secret Committee, which under the new Government will be no longer necessary.'

"The Commons disagree to the Amendments in page 9, lines 21 and 22 and 32, for the following Reason:

"'Because it is undesirable to increase the patronage of the Minister without providing a check upon its exercise.'

"The Commons disagree to the Amendments in page 10, line 23, and page 11, line 6, for the following Reasons:

"'Because they desire to assert and secure the principle of open and unrestricted competition in a manner not admitting of doubt, and because they think this end would be better attained by legislative provision than by an Order in Council.'

"The Commons disagree to the Amendment in page 17, line 8, for the following Reason:

"'Because the period of three months allowed, if Parliament be sitting, is inconsistent with that of one month after the meeting of Parliament, which meeting may take place immediately after the issuing of the Order to which this clause relates.'

"With the preceding exceptions, the Commons agree to the Amendments made by the Lords to the Bill."

LEASES AND SALES OF SETTLED ESTATES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MR. AYRTON said, he should like to have some further explanations from the hon. and learned Attorney General respecting this Bill, because when the Bill was in its last stage a question was asked as to whether it was intended by this Bill to enable Sir T. M. Wilson to enclose Hampstead Heath, and the Attorney General said there was no intention. Since then, however, the hon. and learned Member for Gloucestershire (Mr. Rolt), had given notice of his intention to move the omission of a clause, the omission of which would have the effect of depriving the public of the enjoyment of that heath. He thought before they went into Committee they ought to have an assurance that the Government would not lend their support to any attempt to carry out that object. If that question were brought on now, it would take the House by surprise.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL observed, that he had already stated with perfect sincerity, that he had no intention, in carrying this Bill through the House, to make any important alteration whatever in the law beyond that which was expressed in the Bill itself. It was not a Government Bill. It had come down from the other House, and understanding that Lord Cranworth desired the Bill to pass, he had moved the second reading of it. He had attentively considered the clauses, and was of opinion that they were not only expedient but necessary to remedy the defects in the former Act. With respect to any clause of which notice might have been given, he had to remind the hon. Member that he had no control over any hon. Member in such a matter. All he could say on the part of the Government, who, however, had nothing to do with the Bill, was, that they knew nothing of any such clause as that referred to.

MR. GILPIN said, that their objection was, not to the Bill itself, but to the proposition of which notice had been given by an independent Member, the effect of which would be to permit the enclosure of Hampstead Heath. They wished for an assurance from the hon. and learned Gentleman to the effect, that neither he nor the Government would support such a proposition. Many hon. Members who had depended on such a clause not being brought forward with the support of the Government were absent from the House.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he had no authority from the Government to offer any assurance on the subject. As for himself he had stated on a former occasion that he had no intention of supporting any clause which, by leading to discussion, might, impede, if not prevent, the passing of the Bill.

MR. ROEBUCK said, he must protest against any attempt to take the House by surprise by a proposal such as that of the hon. and learned Member for Gloucestershire. Not that he objected to the proposition in itself, but there were circumstances under which not even a good thing ought to be done.

MR. ROLT said that, as there seemed to be a general feeling that it would be a breach of faith to press on this occasion the Amendment of which he had given notice, he would consent to withdraw it.

House in Committee.

MR. ROLT said, that from the reasons he had already given, he should not now take the sense of the Committee on the rejection of the 21st clause of the Act of 1856, the effect of which was to preclude the Act from applying to those cases in which an application had been made to Parliament; but he should bring it before the House on the first opportunity next Session, feeling satisfied that it was impossible to justify an enactment which, pretending to be founded on general principles, was aimed at a particular individual.

MR. COLLINS said, he thought that exceptional legislation of this kind was injurious to the character of the House, and he would therefore assure the hon. and learned Gentleman of his support on such an occasion.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN denied that the clause was aimed at a particular individual.

MR. MALINS said, that the framers of the Act had not the courage to say expressly that the clause applied to Sir T. M. Wilson, but there could not be the slightest doubt that the 21st clause was aimed at him. Such a clause, excluding a particular individual from the benefit of a general measure, not by name, but by a sort of sidewind, was most unjust.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN said, he might refer to the Earl of Derby as an authority, to show that when Parliament had once decided a question of this kind the Court of Chancery ought not to be allowed to upset that decision.

MR. COX said, he should be quite prepared, whenever the hon. and learned Member raised the question, to go into the whole subject, in order to show that they were justified in insisting in retaining the clause in question.

Bill passed through Committee.

House resumed.

Bill reported without Amendment; read 3° and passed.

WELLINGTON MONUMENT.
RESOLUTION.

MR. STUART WORTLEY said, he rose, pursuant to notice, to call the attention of the House to the competition relative to the Monument to the late Duke of Wellington. He was induced to do so, not because he placed any presumptuous reliance upon his own authority as a judge in matters of taste, but because he believed considerable mistrust prevailed among the public with respect to the arrangements into which it was supposed the Government had entered in reference to the erection of that monument. He had no desire, in submitting the matter to the notice of hon. Members, to embarrass his noble Friend the First Commissioner of Works in the difficult position in connection with the subject in which he was placed; neither, in the course of the observations which he was about to make, did he wish to say a single word which might be supposed to be depreciatory against any of those artists—some of them men of great distinction in their profession—who had upon a late occasion unsuccessfully competed for the execution of the proposed monument. In using the word "unsuccessfully," he simply meant to imply that no one of the designs which had upon the occasion to which he referred been exhibited had been of so high a character as to have at the time been selected as a fitting model for the great work which was in contemplation. On the contrary, he conceived that he was vindicating the cause of those artists since, if he had rightly understood his noble Friend the First Commissioner of Works, it appeared that he now proposed to commit the execution of the Wellington Monument, not to the person who had obtained the first prize at the late Exhibition, but to an artist who had obtained a prize, and that he was about to take that course notwithstanding that since the competition had been entered into the site upon which it was intended to erect the monument had been completely changed. It was under those circumstances perfectly open, he thought, to those artists who had already sent in designs to say that they had been cramped with respect to the extent of the space which it was proposed to allot for the erection of the monument, and that under the more favourable circumstances in that respect now presented they would have produced better models than those which they had previously exhibited. Now, in the case of those models which had been previously exhibited, the right hon. Baronet the Member for Marylebone (Sir B. Hall) had wisely guarded himself against being compelled to take any one of them as the design in accordance with which the proposed monument was to be constructed; while his (Mr. S. Wortley's) noble Friend the present First Commissioner of Works seemed to be of opinion that he was bound to employ in its construction some one of the artists who had already competed. He had not, however, taken the design of Mr. Marshall, which gained the first prize, but had (no doubt with able assistance) selected that of Mr. Stevens, which did not stand higher than sixth in the list of prizes, and then, either not being entirely satisfied with that, or not being convinced that Mr. Stevens could execute it, he had called on Mr. Marshall to execute some of the sculpture round the monument; and, moreover, apparently with the view of giving it an architectural character, he proposed, in addition, to obtain the assistance of Mr. Cockerell and Mr. Penrose, the official architect of St. Paul's, to superintend the execution of the monument. That was a course which appeared to every one to be inconsistent with the original notice given to artists, and also inconsistent with the ordinary course adopted upon occasions of competition upon other subjects. If a prize were held out for the best essay or the most valuable agricultural implement, the writer of the one, or the inventor of the other, whose production was deemed by the judges to be the best, received the prize. That had not been the case in the present instance, and the departure from the usual course had created great dissatisfaction, if not disgust. He did not in the least desire to undervalue the model of Mr. Stevens. He had had the pleasure of being introduced to that gentleman since this subject had been mooted. He had also communicated with the judges who acted upon the competition, and also with several of the leading artists, in order that it might not be supposed that he had anything to do with the selection of a particular artist for the execution of this work. He might say, however, that he agreed with his noble Friend in his estimate of Mr. Stevens's model, and when he first saw it, before any decision upon the point had been made known, he was of opinion that it was almost the only model in Westminster Hall that could be chosen. He did not say that Mr. Stevens was neither an architect nor a sculptor, for that gentleman had informed him that he had studied both those branches of art, but certainly he had produced no great work—had erected no great building to which he could point as evidence of his capabilities. That was no disparagement to Mr. Stevens, who was a young man doubtless destined to achieve future fame, but to take a model solely because it was graceful and elegant, standing in advantageous contrast with some of the little creditable models exhibited in Westminster Hall, without knowing whether the designer was able to execute the architectural and sculptural portions, was acting with a great degree of uncertainty. Some parts of the model had been pointed out as showing a want of knowledge of the human form, and opinions were entertained by good judges very adverse to Mr. Stevens's model. In those opinions, he (Mr. Wortley) did not concur; but, in a pamphlet written by a gentleman of great attainments, and who was engaged to instruct the students at the South Kensington Museum in some branches of study closely connected with art, it was stated that Mr. Stevens's monument was the least worthy of any of the nine selected. That proved that there were those who did not approve the selection which had been made. He (Mr. S. Wortley) had also made it his business to consult the opinions of the judges. The opinion of the chief of the judges, the Marquess of Lansdowne, was known, because that noble Lord, in his place in Parliament, had declared that, with respect to the designs sent in, "there was not one of such commanding merit as to induce the Commissioners to recommend it for adoption." He (Mr. S. Wortley) was authorized by every one of the judges with whom he had communicated to say that their opinions were in complete accordance with that of the noble Marquess. It had been, in fact, intended to state so much in the Report, but consideration for the artists induced them to refrain from doing so. Every hon. Member who mixed with artists or the lovers of art must be aware of the difference of opinion which existed as to the propriety of the selection that had been made. As far as his own observation had gone, the proposed arrangements of his noble Friend were regarded with dissatisfaction and mistrust. Having changed the site and selected Mr. Stevens's design, the next step of his noble Friend was to place the whole business in the hands of Mr. Stevens, who, with the help of Mr. Marshall and the assistance of Mr. Penrose, was, under the authority of his noble Friend, to decide what sort of a monument should be erected in St. Paul's Cathedral. He did not think, however, that either that House or the country would consent to leave the erection of the monument to an irresponsible committee of three, however eminent they might be. But, unfortunately, none of these gentlemen were much known. Of Mr. Stevens he had already spoken. Mr. Penrose was an able, accomplished, and efficient man, but being still a young man, his talents had not as yet become universally acknowledged. He had no wish to be understood as expressing any doubt as to the wisdom of the change of site. The original site was under one of the arches of the north aisle of St. Paul's, but that arrangement would have destroyed the beautiful architectural balance of that edifice unless there was a monument to be placed under each of the other arches. The public generally agreed in the change of site, and the one now chosen was admirably adapted for the purpose. The Consistory Court was of a shape similar to those large chapels in Roman Catholic cathedrals which were selected for the monuments of great men. It was a noble position, and had the recommendation of being spacious enough to receive other monuments, and he hoped that in time there would be within it memorials of such men as Nelson and Collingwood. There was one much injured man, to whom the nation owed a heavy debt of gratitude, who sacrificed his life in the Crimea in the cause of his country, and at an age when he might well have refused to engage in active service—Lord Raglan—whose monument he should wish to see in that place. He had no doubt his noble Friend had been actuated by the feeling that he was bound to give something to the prizemen who took part in the general competition. He might have supposed that they had a moral claim on the Government, but looking at the terms of the contract, he (Mr. S. Wortley) contended that not a single word was used in it signifying an intention of carrying into execution any one of the prize models. The only passage in the contract from which such an intention might possibly be inferred had to his mind a directly contrary meaning. He referred to that in which it was stated that if the artist to whom the highest premium was awarded should be employed to execute his design, he would not be entitled to receive any premium. Therefore, so far as the contract went, and indeed, having regard to the general feeling among the artists themselves who competed, he believed no complaint of injury could fairly be made on the ground of none of the prize models having been carried into execution. The Marquess of Lansdowne, moreover, who had acted as the chief judge, had stated in the other House that the judges did not feel bound to recommend the competitors for employment, nor had he ever, except in one pamphlet, seen it contended that the Government were bound to do so. It was important to trace the history of this competition. So long ago as the funeral of the Duke, in 1852, the idea of a monument was propounded. The Earl of Derby was then in office, and his (Mr. Wortley's) noble Friend (Lord John Manners) was First Commissioner of Works. The first thing that was done to give effect to the suggestion was, after a change in the Government, when the late Sir W. Molesworth, who had then succeeded to the Board of Works, invited four of the principal artists in this country to furnish models of a monument to the Government—namely, Mr. Bailey, Mr. Foley, Mr. Gibson, and Baron Marochetti. The first two gentlemen accepted the invitation; Mr. Gibson refused, but gave no reasons for so doing, except that he made it a rule not to expose himself to competitions of that nature; Baron Marochetti also declined, assigning as a reason that in such a competition it would be scarcely less painful to succeed than to fail. Mr. Foley and Mr. Bailey each sent in a model to the Government, but neither was deemed satisfactory. They then endeavoured to ascertain from the Chief Commissioner what was wanted, so that they might, if possible, modify the models they had sent in in accordance with the views of the Government; but that was denied them, and eventually £50 a piece was given by this great nation to those two eminent men for all the trouble and expense they had been put to in the matter. He believed that if Sir W. Molesworth had at that time entrusted this great work to those distinguished men—Mr. Bailey, one of our oldest sculptors, and Mr. Foley, the author of the magnificent statue of Viscount Hardinge—they would have executed a monument in every way worthy the illustrious subject of it, and satisfactory to the country. That course, however, was not taken, and when the right hon. Baronet (Sir Benjamin Hall) became First Commissioner of Works he came to the determination to submit the matter to public competition, which it was universally admitted had failed. The judges could find no work of sufficient merit to recommend for adoption, and it was necessary to restrict the competitors so closely as to size that the judges could not look at a model sent in by one of our most distinguished artists because it was half a foot too wide. He (Mr. Wortley) did not regret that competition, however, though it had failed. The principle of competition in such cases had recently been discussed before a Committee of that House on the erection of a Foreign Office, and there was a paragraph in the Report of that Committee in which they gave a decided preference to the principle of limited competition, on the ground that where the competition was limited the highest class of artists might be expected to compete, and where it was otherwise the probability was that such men would not come into it at all. The principle of unlimited competition, on the other hand, had this advantage, that it sometimes elicited talent which might otherwise remain unknown and unappreciated. He believed the public were little aware of the hardships which it inflicted on many artists. When the public looked at an exhibition of models of any great work of art, they little knew that many of the poor artists from whom they emanated had been obliged to borrow, and almost to beg, in order that they might be enabled to execute them. A good model of some great works of art could not be made for less than £200 or £300, and any one could imagine the grievous disappointment that ensued when, besides failure, the artist received no remuneration for all the labour, money, and time he had bestowed on his work. The necessary consequence was, that men who had an established reputation refused to come into a general competition, and, instead of attracting the best and greatest minds of the country, the competitors in such a case were men, generally speaking, of inferior experience and skill. The principle of open competition was not applied to any other profession. No one expected thus to get the best work from a lawyer or a physician. What would be thought of a Sovereign who, when ill, threw open his case to public competition, and offered a fee to the physician who gave the best advice? Or what would have been said if the Earl of Shrewsbury had attempted to select counsel by open competition? The fact was, artists felt that this mode of dealing with them was an insult, because it was one pursued with respect to no other liberal profession. See what had been the result of open competition in the case of the Nelson Monument. At the time that monument was built the principle of open competition was newer, and more artists of reputation competed. But a builder got the prize, who on the death of Mr. Campbell, the artist, had had the good fortune to pick up, among the many valuable remnants of his studio, a magnificent design for a Nelson monument with four beautiful lions. He turned out, however, to be incapable of executing anything but the masonry. Other persons, therefore, had to be called in, and the result was that they had a pillar which everybody abused, and a statue of Nelson which no one could see. The monument had been raised at an expense, besides subscriptions, of £30,000 or £40,000; and such was the manner in which the work had been done, that some of the bas relievos had been filled with lead or zinc. If they had had high artists who had been responsible for their work, this would not have happened. He begged leave to subscribe entirely to the opinion of the Marquess of Lansdowne, that the Wellington Monument should be considered not a departmental but a national work, for which the Government should be responsible. In his opinion, the principle by which rivalry should be guided for this great work should be emulative, not competitive—that principle which had produced some of the greatest works of the sixteenth century. This was the principle in which originated some of the greatest works of Italy—St. Peter's, and most of the great pictures and statues of that age. The Transfiguration itself was the result of competition in that sense. The rivalry between Michael Angelo and Raffaelle led to the production of the Raising of Lazarus by Sebastian del Piombo—not the competition of a lottery, but competition in the sense of a noble and a generous emulation—a principle which he thought, if judiciously applied, would do much towards developing the artistic taste and genius of this country. His noble Friend might with justice refer to the difficulties with which this question was surrounded, and ask what it was he proposed. He fully appreciated the difficulties which his noble Friend had to contend with, and could assure him that it was in no hostile spirit he had taken up the question. On the contrary, he had done so in the hope that he might be able to render him some assistance by eliciting opinions in the House that would be of use to him in arriving at a conclusion on the subject. But if the noble Lord had great difficulties to encounter, he had also great facilities in forming a sound opinion. He had shown that he need have no difficulty in finding capable artists, and he might add that he had also abundance of money. We had £20,000 of the sum granted for the funeral of the Duke of Wellington. The highest estimate he (Mr. Wortley) had yet heard of the expense of a statue was £10,000, and the remainder might be spent in architecturally ornamenting the site of the statue or in purchasing models. The noble Lord should call in the most eminent artists to give him the best designs they could produce, without tying them down to so many feet, and all classes of artists should be invited. It was of the very greatest importance that architecture and sculpture should go together as sister arts, without which success in the production of high works of art could not be expected. They all knew that in old times artists were not merely statuaries, or sculptors, or architects, but often combined all these together in their own persons. There was no jealousy of sister arts. The artist consulted the architect, and often studied that branch for himself, and it was in this way those works were produced which had astonished the world. Michael Angelo was a great painter, a great architect, and a great sculptor. Raffaelle was, as well as being a great painter, an architect, and was, indeed, appointed architect of St. Peter's. In our day, however, there was among artists an unworthy jealousy of architects. Some, indeed, were themselves architects; but, generally speaking, it was the vice of the artists of this day to confine themselves too exclusively to their own professions, and to regard with jealousy that of the architect. He trusted that state of things was passing away, and the sooner it did the better for the progress of high art. He could not look on this as a departmental question. It was one for which the whole Government was responsible, and not the Board of Works alone. They must be held responsible for the manner in which the whole of this duty was discharged. It was of the utmost importance that a high tribunal should be appointed, for the higher the tribunal the less chance was there of favouritism. Of course, the Government would have to be assisted, and he could not see any real objection to artists themselves having a share in naming a tribunal, whatever it might be, to assist the Prime Minister in the selection he might make or the course he might take. In the Resolution which he was about to move, he had embodied the proposition that the best way of creating emulation would be to employ a certain number of the most distinguished artists, and remunerating them for the labour, time and attention they devoted to the subject, and thus making it worth their while to produce the best models in their power. One point which had been started was whether the competition should be extended to the artists of foreign nations? The occasion was peculiarly a national one, and a great deal was, therefore, to be said against giving opportunities to foreigners to compete, though, as far as he was concerned, he should be inclined rather to take the opposite view, and throw it open to the whole world. He would suggest that, putting aside all that had hitherto been done, and as they had a plenty of money at command, £300 a piece would amply compensate every one of the artists for the models or designs they sent in; and it should then be the duty of the Government to select one or more artists to carry into execution the design upon which their choice had fallen. If they took that course they would call out all that was grand and noble in the genius and artistic taste of the country, and he had not so bad an opinion of the artists of England as not to believe that, if they were selected for the work they would give their whole soul to it; for it was a matter which was calculated to stir men's blood more than an ordinary subject—the memory of the Duke of Wellington being still fresh in the hearts of the people, and no class feeling it more strongly than artists themselves. In conclusion, he thought if they acted upon the suggestions thus humbly and respectfully put forward, they would not have a mere statue but a noble monument in the greatest sense of the word —an ecclesiastical and architectural monument, worthy of the hero whose memory it would celebrate, and of the country to whose glory he had so largely contributed.

Mr. Stuart Wortley

Mr. Stuart Wortley

Motion made and Question proposed,—

"That by the terms of the competition under which the models for the monument proposed to be erected to the memory of the late Duke of Wellington in St. Paul's Cathedral were lately exhibited in Westminster Hall, the artists competing were not entitled to expect that any of their works would be executed at the expense of the nation, unless on the ground of their intrinsic merit; and whereas the judges have not recommended for execution any of the works so exhibited, and a new and wholly different site has since been determined upon for this great National monument, it is therefore expedient that a limited number of distinguished artists should be further employed by Her Majesty's Government to furnish models with especial reference to the new site and altered circumstances, and that those artists should be remunerated for their labour, and their models purchased for the country."

The Question having been put,

MR. BERESFORD HOPE (after a slight pause) said, he should not have risen so early in the debate if he had seen his noble Friend the First Commissioner of Works rise, but as his noble Friend seemed disposed not to rise so early, and as his right hon. Friend had pointedly alluded to the Report of the Committee of which he had the honour to have been Chairman, he trusted the House would excuse a few words from him on this subject. His right hon. Friend dealt with that Report, a it condemned unlimited competition. He (Mr. Beresford Hope) could not so understand it. That portion of the Report was indeed written by the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho) except the last sentence, which he had called upon his right hon. Friend to read, and which he had himself drawn up; but he would not have accepted that paragraph if he had considered it to bear that signification; and he considered that the sentence last referred to, proved that such was not its meaning. No doubt, for his own part, his right hon. Friend appeared to condemn unlimited competition, but it would be strange if the House, after having voted at an early hour that evening in favour of unlimited competition, should now, at the instance of his right hon. Friend, virtually condemn that vote and decide that unlimited competition ought not to be sanctioned. His right hon. Friend had asked why they were more likely to produce good work by competition in the fine arts than to obtain a sound opinion upon a legal question by submitting it to the competition of lawyers. His answer might be very trite, but it was not the less true—

"Segnius irritant animos submissa per aures, Quam quæ sunt oculis subjecta fidelibus."

Competition for a work in architecture was a very different thing from the contention of lawyers upon a legal question. A Judge could hardly adjudicate between the hon. and learned Attorney General and the hon. and learned Member for Aylesbury, by keeping them standing on their legs, perpetually putting forth contrary opinions; but, on the other hand, the work of the artist remained quiescent and unchanged until the arbitrator pronounced his decision. There were, no doubt, cases in which competitions in art were not successful; a notable instance occurred some years since in a competition for the statue of Wordsworth in Westminster Abbey, at which he assisted to adjudicate, when one of the competitors requested the early return of his model, in order that he might take off the head and replace it with one of Sir Robert Peel for a competition for a statue to him. This very year, too, the bathos of competition was attained on the collection of designs for the monument of the Exhibition of 1851 proposed to be erected in Hyde Park, where one architect sent in a sketch, a huge glass globe rising out of a piece of water like a gigantic soap bubble in a saucer, and another depicted two illustrious persons seated in a degagé way on the top of a mass of sham rock work. He made his right hon. Friend a present of these instances of the failure of competition, but in the face of them the great and wholesome principle of free art was now being established. Perhaps our great artists would still refuse to compete. They hung back very often as they did in this case. But why? Because a clique was naturally opposed to a republic of free genius and free intellect nobly competing for the highest excellence. In the present instance, then, he concluded that something must be risked in order to ensure great results for the future, and to make good that principle. The worst that could be said was, that there was something common-place about the models sent to Westminster Hall for the Wellington monument. If that were true, it was the duty of the State to foster and encourage those artists who stood out above the rest in it, in order that by the improvement of the designs they submitted something might be elicited more worthy of the Duke of Wellington. By the confession of all sides, Mr. Stevens's model had great comparative excellence. He objected, then, to the modified censure which the Motion would cast upon the artists who sent models to Westminster Hall. Why, at the end of July, when there were scarcely sufficient Members to make a House, should his right hon. Friend propose a very expensive and questionable third competition for one and the same work? What guarantee was there that such a third competition would be more successful than the two former ones, or than the course proposed by my noble Friend? They had Mr. Stevens's model to give the idea. They had Mr. Marshall, if they liked, to make the figure (thus rewarding the first-prize man); they had the approval and superintendence of Mr. Penrose, the eminent architect in charge of the cathedral, who would ensure the harmony of the work and the structure, and they had that excellent site which had been selected in the old Consistory Court. If there were to be a fresh competition, all the artists who went in would have to conform themselves to the idea of Mr. Stevens's model; and after the experience they had had, what likelihood was there that the leading sculptors would submit to this restriction? It was urged that the new competition was necessary, in order to ensure the anatomical correctness of the effigy itself. He (Mr. B. Hope) would suggest an easier and cheaper way of attaining this object. What objection could there be to the employing of Mr. Stevens and Mr. Marshall to make full-sized models in clay of the effigy of the Duke, and then calling in all the other jealous and envious sculptors, all the anatomists and all the amateurs, or those who fancied they were, to pick holes in the models? They might thus pretty well ascertain, without the trouble or expense of an additional competition, how far Mr. Stevens and Mr. Marshall were qualified to execute the effigy, the main element in the whole competition. It had been said, that Mr. Stevens was an unknown man; but he had produced a design which, although perhaps rather roughly modelled—because a poor and struggling artist could not afford the outlay which was required to give it greater finish—exhibited true genius; he had grasped the right idea, and in his (Mr. Beresford Hope's) opinion they ought to hold out to him a fostering and friendly hand. Mr. Stevens was a prize-man in the competition; the excellence of his design struck all observers; and he thought that, under all the circumstances, his noble Friend at the head of the Board of Works had arrived at a very wise decision. The site in the Consistory Court was exceedingly fine and appropriate, and he hoped his right hon. Friend would not press his Motion, but would be satisfied with having brought the subject under the notice of the House, and with the very able exposition he had given of the philosophy of art in its various relations. He (Mr. Beresford Hope) trusted that, under the auspices of the First Commissioner of Works, a monument would be erected in memory of the Duke of Wellington to which our countrymen might hereafter point with satisfaction and with pride.

MR. CONINGHAM said, he was at a loss to understand what were the precise views of the right hon. Member for Bute (Mr. S. Wortley) who commenced by emphatically approving the monument which had been selected, who then found fault with the principle of competition, and who ended by proposing a system of universal competition which should be open to all the artists of the civilized world.

MR. STUART WORTLEY was understood to say that he had not proposed an universal competition, but a limited competition, in which Mr. Stevens might himself take part.

MR. CONINGHAM said, he had certainly understood the right hon. Gentleman to purpose a further competition. It was true that the design selected by the noble Lord at the head of the Board of Works was the production of a young artist, but he thought any one who had examined it must have been struck with its superiority in point of conception and execution. It was originally intended that the monument should be placed in one of the arches of St. Paul's, but it had since been proposed that it should be transferred to the Consistory Court, which was the same height as the arches of the cathedral. The latter site would have this advantage, that the monument being what was termed pervious —that was to say pierced—and intended to be placed where the light could be seen through it, there would be a better opportunity of viewing the effect. He did not think there could be any ground of complaint on the part of those artists who had been invited to become competitors, but who had declined to avail themselves of the opportunity. It was useless to talk of the middle ages, and of such artists as Michael Angelo, Raphael, and Donatelli; for if men possessing similar genius could be found in this age they would be selected for such a work as was now contemplated, and might at once be entrusted with its execution. Most unfortunately, the erection of our public monuments had hitherto been entrusted to very incompetent persons, but he had great pleasure in congratulating the noble Lord on the selection he had made in the present instance. From what he had seen and heard that evening, judging by the model which Mr. Stevens had produced, and which he hoped they might see in the full-sized scale on the site appropriated to it, and understanding that there was the most hearty and friendly co-operation on his part with Mr. Penrose and Mr. Cockrell, the architects, he (Mr. Coningham) could not but anticipate that from their joint consultations and united efforts the happiest results would ensue. He hoped, therefore, that the right hon. Gentleman would not press his Motion.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he had heard with much gratification the views which had been expressed by hon. Gentlemen whose opinions were far better entitled to weight than his own upon questions of art. He thought that, after the observations of the hon. Member for Maidstone (Mr. Hope), and the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Coningham), his right hon. Friend the Member for Bute (Mr. S. Wortley) must be satisfied that whatever support he might have received in the views which he was desirous should receive the sanction of the House, there were Gentlemen who were at least as competent as himself to form a judgment on this subject, who approved the course adopted by Her Majesty's Government. He was, however, happy to find that upon several important points he agreed with his right hon. Friend, and that they only had the misfortune to differ upon matters of minor importance. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Wortley) had said that he thought the selection of a site was most fortunate; that, so far as the prize designs were concerned, he conceived that the Government had chosen the best — and that they had taken the most valuable advice they could obtain. Now these were three most important admissions and he (Lord J. Manners) put it to the House whether they would now take the matter out of the hands—feeble as he admitted they were — of those who were responsible for its conduct, and erect themselves into a committee of taste to upset all the arrangements which had been made, and to defer for an indefinite period the erection of a national monument to the Duke of Wellington. It was true his right hon. Friend had mentioned some particulars in which he thought the judgment which had been arrived at was an unsound one; but he (Lord J. Manners) was almost at a loss to know on what grounds his judgment was founded. The right hon. Gentleman admitted that out of the eighty-three designs submitted to competition the best had been selected, but he said that the terms on which competition was invited were such as could give the competitors no reasonable hope that any one of them would be selected. He (Lord J. Manners) certainly did not put the same construction upon the terms of the notice, which were as follows:—

"The Commissioners of Her Majesty's Works and Public Buildings give notice that it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to erect a monument in St. Paul's Cathedral, London, to the memory of the late Duke of Wellington, and that they are prepared to receive designs for the same from artists of all countries."

His right hon. Friend might, however, rely upon the concluding paragraph of the notice:—

"If, however, the artist to whom the highest premium may be awarded shall be employed to execute his design he will not be entitled to receive any premium."

His right hon. Friend had put upon this sentence the interpretation of a lawyer, and said that it excluded any one whose design did not receive the first premium from being selected to execute the monument, but he (Lord J. Manners) believed its meaning was that if any artist, who had not received the highest prize, was selected he would be entitled to a premium in addition to the cost of his design. He said that a great country had no right to invite the artists of all the world to compete for national monuments unless they were resolved that that competition should lead to some substantial result, always provided that among the designs sent in there was one or more which were worthy of adoption. It all turned upon that question. Now, who was to decide this point? Was his right hon. Friend or anybody else in this House to say that out of eighty-three designs sent in not one was worthy of being executed? [Lord ELCHO: The judges said so.] They said no such thing. They did not, indeed, declare that any one of the designs was worthy of erection; but though they left this point in the dark, they added:—

"We cannot at the same time forbear suggesting that before any design is finally adopted by the Government, it would be desirable, considering the peculiarity of the situation contemplated, and that it essentially differs from that of all the other monuments now existing in the cathedral, the opinion of some experienced artists should be called for, who would be better judges of the local effect than we consider ourselves to be; more especially as Mr. Cockrell, the only one of the appointed judges professionally connected with the arts, though we have derived from him valuable assistance and information in the progress of the examination, has declined on that account taking a part in the ultimate decision."

It was quite clear that this, the only recommendation made, authorized the consideration of the local effect which would be produced by the design selected, and suggested that the Government should confer with those persons most competent to give advice before arriving at a final decision. Now, this was exactly the course he had taken. In the first instance he had satisfied his own mind, as well as he could, that some one design was worthy of adoption, and having done so he invited the gentleman to whom reference had been made in terms of such deserved commendation carefully to examine the prize designs. He (Lord J. Manners) had not indicated the bias of his own mind, but Mr. Penrose informed him that design No. 18, which he had previously selected, was the one which, in his opinion, best suited the locality, and was most deserving of erection. He thought he should have grossly neglected his duty if he had not availed himself of Mr. Penrose's assistance; and if his right hon. Friend meant to say that he had any previous knowledge of the opinion of that gentleman he laboured under a complete mistake. His (Lord J. Manners's) knowledge of Mr. Penrose was, if he might use the term, purely professional; but he felt that the recommendation of the judges was a sound one, and he knew he could not act upon it in a more satisfactory manner than by calling for the valuable advice on which he had acted. Now, he was authorized by Mr. Penrose to say that he should view it as a great misfortune if the House were in any way to put a stop to the proceedings instituted with respect to this monument. He put it to the House, therefore, after all that had transpired, considering, as his right hon. Friend had pointed out, that six years had elapsed, and that yet no monument had been erected, whether they would take the course of throwing the whole matter into inextricable confusion by adopting the proposal now made. The right hon. Gentleman had, to a certain extent, sketched the proceedings which had taken place, and he would venture to describe the steps by which they had arrived so slowly and unsatisfactorily at their present position. In 1854 the then First Commissioner of Works invited a limited competition for this monument, and selected four sculptors of undoubted eminence—Mr. Bailey, Mr. Foley, Baron Marochetti, and Mr. Gibson. Of these gentlemen two declined to enter into the competition, and Baron Marochetti returned this answer to Sir William Molesworth:—

"I am flattered that my name has been placed on the list of sculptors from whom it has been proposed to select one to execute the Monument to the Duke of Wellington in St. Paul's Cathedral. I hasten to express to you my thanks for the honour thus conferred upon me, but I must decline to engage in a competition in which success would be only less painful than failure. If, however, the proposed competition should not produce the desired result, and if in such an event I should be judged worthy of employment on this work, I should with pride bestow on it the utmost efforts of my art, no less on account of the man who is to be commemorated, than of the place the monument is to occupy."

Mr. Gibson, writing from Rome, sent an answer much more curt in its terms:—

"I have the pleasure to acknowledge the honour of your communication to me respecting a monument to the memory of his Grace the Duke of Wellington. I beg to say that I am always ready to undertake any work of importance for my country, but decline to send designs in competition."

Did his right hon. Friend propose to ask those two eminent men again to compete? [Mr. S. WORTLEY: Not to compete!] Then, in the name of common sense, what were they to do? [Mr. S. WORTLEY: To emulate!] To emulate! Well, he was a plain man, and could not apprehend these nice distinctions, nor did he think the sculptors would be less puzzled by them than he was. Did his right hon. Friend mean to say that the offer of £300 a piece would make all this distinction between competition and emulation? He (Lord J. Manners) did not think so badly of those eminent sculptors as to imagine that the certainty of a small sum of money would induce them to enter into a competition which the invitation of the Government had not induced them to enter. But Mr. Bailey and Mr. Foley, both sculptors of great eminence, did not decline this invitation. They entered into the limited competition proposed; but what was the result? The Government of the day, no doubt rightly, decided that neither of their designs was worthy of being erected in St. Paul's, as a monument to the Duke of Wellington. Now, in the office of the First Commissioner of Works was a most valuable and important reply from the pen of Mr. Bailey to the letter which announced this decision to him. Mr. Bailey pointed out all the evils which must result to art if, when a limited competition was entered upon, none of the designs sent in were selected for execution. He (Lord J. Manners) wished he had found it possible to present to the House, prior to this debate, Mr. Bailey's letter and other papers relating to this subject; but, as they were rather in the nature of private letters than of public papers, he hardly felt justified in so doing. The whole tone and tenor of Mr. Bailey's communication, however, were such as would make him very reluctant to invite any limited competition without a clear decision beforehand that, whatever might be the merits of the designs sent in, one or the other should be selected. Mr. Bailey pointed out that by inviting artists to enter into such a competition, and then throwing their designs over and instituting an unlimited competition, you gave to the second competitors the inestimable advantage of pilfering ideas from those who had first sent in designs. But now apply the objection taken with so much force by Mr. Bailey in a case where only two designs were in question to this new proposal of a second limited competition after no less than eighty-three designs had been submitted in competition. Was it not clear that those whose designs had thus stood the test of public criticism might fairly say, "You have no right now to hand over the competition to a limited number of gentlemen, selected by the favouritism of the Government of the day, when there is a possibility that they may pick here and there from the designs which have cost us so much thought, labour, time, and money, expended by some of the poorest and most struggling artists in the world?" He had heard that sentence of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman with the greatest pleasure. It was just, and he asked the House of Commons to act in accordance with it. His right hon. Friend pointed out what these struggling artists were called upon to do—what sacrifices of time, labour, and money were entailed upon them; and he asked that, in return, the House of Commons should not, without the most weighty considerations, set aside their designs. He asked his right hon. Friend whether he thought he had assigned any satisfactory reason for departing on this occasion from what ought to be the general rule. They had not heard his right hon. Friend say that he was himself of opinion that the design which had been selected was unworthy of being completed. The right hon. Gentleman told them that he had privately canvassed all the judges, and that they had all told him they signed their Report without intending to have their approbation of any one of the designs acted upon. All he could say was, that, if such were the case, it was the duty of the judges to have made that clear before all the world. He could find no such declaration in their Report. On the contrary, after reading the Report with the most minute care he could bestow, he had arrived at the opposite conclusion. In private the judges had not told him anything of the sort, and he thought the House of Commons would do well not to act upon these private recommendations, which those who made them declined to put in print. As he understood the Report of the judges, he felt fully justified in the course which he had taken; and the more he gathered the opinions of those who were able to speak with authority upon the subject, the more he was fortified in the decision at which he had arrived. He believed that the opinion which he had already quoted of Mr. Penrose was shared by men in the highest position in artistic circles. He believed that if the House of Commons did not now interfere Her Majesty's Government would be able at no distant period to afford the gratification to the people of this country of seeing, in the noblest site which St. Paul's Cathedral presented, a monument erected worthy alike of the great man whom it commemorated and the building in which it was placed. But if at the fag-end of the Session, in a House so thin as that which he was now addressing, his right hon. Friend induced the House of Commons to pass this Resolution, it would paralyze the hands of the Executive and of the artists as well, and trace over again the unfortunate history of so many of the public monuments of England. The Government would be reluctant, under those circumstances, to take upon themselves any responsibility in those thorny matters of art, and artists would be disgusted at the manner in which they were treated in being asked to enter again into a limited competition without any certainty that any one of the competitors would be employed. They had been invited to a limited competition with no result; they had been invited to an unlimited competition, with what result depends upon the fate of this Motion; and it was proposed to invite them to a second limited competition with no certain prospect—he would say, with no hope—of any fortunate result. His right hon. Friend indulged in a dream if he supposed the Prime Minister, burdened as he was with affairs of State, would undertake to go from studio to studio, attended by a jury of artists, all differing in opinion, all anxious to carry out their own views, and some very possibly biassed by personal considerations in favour of one or other of the competing sculptors. The Prime Minister must from necessity devolve the responsibility upon the Minister whose duty it was, from the nature of his office, to make the selection in a nature of this kind; and he trusted and almost believed his right hon. Friend, whose whole speech was characterized with so much kindness and courtesy to himself, did not intend to press his Motion to a division. He thought the House would be ill-advised if they passed the Resolution, and he entreated them not to agree to it, but to leave the matter in the hands of the responsible Ministers of the Crown, who, after two competitions, felt themselves in a position to arrive at a final decision, which they believed would be satisfactory to the country. His hon. Friend the Member for Brighton (Mr. Coningham) had alluded to the expediency of placing on the proposed site a model of the full size of the monument. The proposal was most admirable, and should he be intrusted with the future prosecution of the task, it was his intention to propose to Mr. Stevens that a model of that character should be erected in the Consistory Chapel, with free access to it for all, so that before anything was finally decided those who took an interest in the question might have an opportunity of examining it. If the result of that exhibition should be to show that Mr. Stevens was not competent to execute the chief figure of the design, it was the wish of Mr. Stevens that Her Majesty's Government should only leave to him the execution of the design, and appoint some other artist to execute the figure. Frankly, he had no fear himself that a man of genius, as Mr. Stevens had shown himself to be, would fail in that particular; but, in justice to the modesty and good feeling of a young and rising artist, he mentioned that Mr. Stevens had expressed no objection to the proposal, and that it met with his entire approbation. If the House thought him unworthy of the position in which Her Majesty had been pleased to place him, he should, of course, bow to their decision; but he thought he had shown that the course which he had adopted was consistent with the views of those who had the best means of forming a sound opinion. He was satisfied himself that if no interference now took place, and if the Government were permitted to carry out those intentions which they had indicated, the result would be success; but if, on the other hand, impediments were thrown in the way, there would be interminable delay, constant bickerings, and their successors would say there had been a complete mistake in the management of that which ought to be one of the greatest monuments of a great nation.

Mr. COWPER said, that the reasons which the noble Lord had given for the course which he had taken had not been satisfactory to his mind. He quite agreed with the noble Lord that, when a competition was resolved upon, a preference ought to be given, in the selection of the artist, to those who had competed. But the noble Lord had omitted to add that the monument to be erected was not, properly speaking, the monument competed for. In the best times of art, sculpture was viewed more in relation to architecture than it had been in later days; and whatever might be the abstract beauty of a piece of sculpture, it was dependent for general effect on harmonizing with the building and its architecture. In the present case, when the competition was announced, the site determined upon was specified as being under one of the arches of the nave of St. Paul's, and the artists who competed produced a work which they believed to be suitable to the place. The site, it must be admitted, was not a good one. The monument would have been seen by spectators on four sides, and on two sides the light would have come upon it direct from the windows. The artists, therefore, naturally fell into the pyramidal form of design, and presented one central figure surrounded by smaller figures, none of them being of such a character as to allow of their being placed against a wall. From this reason, perhaps, it was that so many of the designs provoked a comparison with the work of the silversmith or the confectioner, when they prepared central ornaments for a dining table. One of the artists, however, proposed the design of an equestrian statue of the Duke of Wellington, placed upon storeys of arches, the only precedent for which was the equestrian statue of the Duke at Hyde Park Corner. He agreed with those who thought that the Consistory Chapel was a better situation than the nave; but in that chapel there was only a single window, and the light would only fall upon the monument from one side. The best place was against the wall, in an alcove which was well suited for the monument. The proper design for such a monument was mural, and it followed that all the designs were different from those which the same artists would have sent in if they had known of the new site. In the Consistory Chapel the work need not be allegorical, and might resemble more nearly the great monument of Italy, the tomb of the Medici. Whatever might be the merits of Mr. Stevens's design, it would, in his opinion, be much better adapted for the former site under the arch than for the Consistory Chapel. He trusted, therefore, that it would not be hastily selected, but that the sculptors of the highest professional acquirements and skill in England would be afforded an opportunity of giving their opinions as to the general effect which a particular piece of sculpture would be likely to produce in the proposed site. By taking that course there would be a much better chance of securing a monument worthy of the age and of the country than by the adoption of the plan which the noble Lord proposed. For his own part, he could not help thinking that it was extremely inexpedient to commit the erection of the monument to three persons who were apparently to possess equal authority as to the manner in which the work was to be carried into execution. Let him suppose that those three persons should not coincide in opinion with respect to the work, who, he would ask, was to decide between them? If the framing of the general design of the monument were intrusted to one of the number, and that to the other two was confided merely the execution of the details, to such a proposal he should entertain no very strong objection. So far, however, as he understood the proposal of the Government, each of the three gentlemen in question was to possess an equal share of authority with his colleagues. To Mr. Marshall, it seemed, was to be committed the execution of the sculpture connected with the work. [Lord J. MANNERS: I never mentioned Mr. Marshall's name.] He had understood the noble Lord to say, upon a former occasion, that the figures were to be executed by Mr. Marshall. [Lord J. MANNERS: Not in that monument.] Well, at all events, in the chapel, and the result would, in all probability, be a want of harmony in the whole work, owing to the circumstance that those figures would not be in accordance with the rest of the work, and that there would thus be a conglomeration of various styles. He trusted, therefore, that the noble Lord would see the propriety of not persevering in the course which he had indicated, and that he would afford the artists of England an opportunity of framing a new design for the new site. Some of the ablest of the artists residing in this country—Mr. Gibson and Baron Marochetti, for instance had not competed upon the last occasion; and it was but right that, before any further steps were taken in the matter, the Government should have the advantage of being aided in the conclusion at which they might arrive by men of such high eminence. The site being changed, there was the less necessity for confining the selection to any of the models which had been produced at the competition. He thought the noble Lord desired to do what was right, but he could not help feeling that he had assumed a responsibility which it was not wise in him to assume. Mr. Stevens had not hitherto produced any work which should induce them to trust blindly in his hands a national work, such as this monument to the Duke of Wellington ought to be ; and he trusted the noble Lord would not sanction the placing of an equestrian statue on the top of the arch, inasmuch as that form of monument was open to strong objection, as was demonstrated in the case of the statue at Hyde Park Corner. Having made these observations, it remained for him simply to express a hope that the Motion of his right hon. and learned Friend would receive the support of the House.

Mr. STIRLING said, he thought the House owed a debt of gratitude to the right hon. and learned Gentleman for having introduced the subject under discussion to its notice ; but he must at the same time observe that the arguments which he had adduced in support of his Motion did not seem to him (Mr. Stirling) sufficiently cogent to induce hon. Members to support the proposition of which he was the advocate. The great argument against that proposition was, he thought, to be found in the circumstance that there had already been two instances in which competition for the execution of the monument in question had taken place, and that both instances had been marked by failure. The same result might occur again. It was quite true that the noble Lord when he came into office found the subject in a very difficult position. The failure of the late competition was not owing to any want of care on the part of the right hon. Gentleman who then had charge of the department, but rather to the ignorance of the public as to what it was they really required. Sculptors were invited to send in designs adapted to a site which subsequent reflection had shown to be unfit, and thus the labours of those artists were thrown away. The noble Lord had to decide upon his own responsibility whether there should be a fresh competition, or he should select from those who had been already chosen. The noble Lord had adopted the latter course, and had selected Mr. Stevens, with Mr. Marshall and Mr. Penrose. With respect to the latter gentleman it was not quite the fact that he had produced no great work by which a judgment could be formed of his abilities. The beautiful sepulchral chamber in which the remains of the Duke of Wellington now rested, was the production of that gentleman, and that sarcophagus was one of the most remarkable works of modern times. He (Mr. Stirling) was disposed to support the decision of the noble Lord, believing that it was intended Mr. Penrose should make a mural design in the Consistory Court, to be filled in with sculpture by the two other gentlemen. He had however, been alarmed to hear the noble Lord state that Mr. Penrose approved the design of Mr. Stevens as the one that should be adopted, for the erection of a monument consisting of a dome and canopy, and a horse on the top, in the cathedral of St. Paul's, would be a most disastrous artistic exploit. He hoped therefore that the noble Lord had not selected Mr. Stevens's model as the one to be erected, but that he had chosen him as a man who having displayed so much talent in the execution of that design ought, in his opinion, to be entrusted with the execution of a new design to harmonize with the new site in which the monument to the Duke of Wellingten was to be placed. Upon that point he hoped to receive some further information from his noble Friend.

Lord ELCHO said, the noble Lord the First Commissioner of Works on a former occasion had expressed a hope that there would be no dogmatizing upon art ; and that evening he warned the House against resolving itself into a Committee of Taste. The present was not a question of taste so much as of common sense. The object in view was to erect to the memory of the Duke of Wellington the finest monument that the sum at their disposal (£20,000) could procure, and the question was, whether the course adopted by the noble Lord was the best that could be taken. Upon that point he differed from the noble Lord. There had been two competitions, the first of which was an undoubted failure. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir B. Hall) then invited an unlimited competition, upon which the noble Lord said the judges gave no opinion. That was true so far as to any pointed award, but the Marquess of Lansdowne had expressed his opinion in Parliament that not one of the designs was of sufficient merit to induce the Commissioners to recommend its adoption. Such, too, he was informed were the opinions of the other judges, and thus the second competition had also been a complete failure. And without giving any opinion of his own, he might add that public opinion had confirmed the judgment of the Commissioners. The hon. Member for Maidstone (Mr. Hope) had advocated the course taken by the Government, and admitted that the results of the competition were not ridiculous but common-place, notwithstanding which admission, he proposed that one of the competing designs should be erected. The hon. Gentleman did not desire that any of the designs so condemned should be erected, but seemed to fancy that if "we," whoever "we" might be, were to sit upon the models, something might result from the process of incubation which would be satisfactory. With that process he (Lord Elcho) would have nothing to do. The noble Lord condemned his own scheme by not wishing to erect any one of the designs, and instead of giving the commission to the first prizeman, giving it to the sixth, under the superintendence of an architect, with the aid of another competitor, to execute some figures suitable to the monument and the site. That might be a wise course, but if unity of design was desired, the work should be intrusted to one alone. If they wished that this monument should bear the impress of the genius of the gentleman of whom they had heard so much (Mr. Stevens), let them confide the monument entirely to him, and let him be responsible for it. There was an old saying, that too many cooks spoiled the broth, and he was afraid that this might be the result in the present instance. He believed the truth to be that his noble Friend was fond of a quiet life, and was therefore anxious to conciliate as many artists as he could by employing as many of them as possible; and he could hardly wonder at that feeling of his noble Friend, for he had himself had opportunities of knowing that artists were people whom it was very difficult to satisfy. But he hoped his noble Friend would show that he could resist that influence. The designs which resulted from open competition had certainly not stood the test of public criticism. On the contrary, they had been condemned by the public, and he contended that the Government was in no-wise bound by the terms of the competition to confide the erection of the monument to any one of the competitors. The terms of the competition for the Wellington Monument and the Foreign Office were precisely similar. In the case of the Foreign Office, as in that of the Wellington Monument, there was nothing in the terms of the competition which necessarily bound the Government to select the architect from the successful competitors. It must be clear to the House that when the principle of unlimited competition was adopted the object was to attract talent from all quarters, with the view to obtain the best possible design; but when that principle was adopted no one could foresee the result of such a competition. It remained to be seen, in such a case, whether or not artists of the highest class came forward; and, therefore, it would be foolish in the last degree if the Government were to be bound necessarily to accept any one of the designs that resulted from a competition which was unlimited. He was strongly in favour of competition, but he as strongly objected to the Government of necessity giving the execution of the work in a case like the one in question to one of the persons who had taken part in the competition. If the Government were to be so bound, and the work, when executed, should turn out a failure, the public would point to it as the result of unlimited competition. He ventured to think that the Government would act more wisely if they were to select one or two of the most eminent artists which England, or, if necessary, the world could produce, and confide the execution of the work to him or them, The object the House had now in view was to erect a monument worthy of the illustrious Duke and of the country; but his opinion was, that the course the Government meant to pursue was not likely to lead to that result, and the House had, therefore, better be satisfied with the sarcophagus and save their £20,000, than consent to the erection of another monster perhaps as startling as that which was to be seen at Hyde Park Corner.

SIR BENJAMIN HALL said, when he held the office of First Commissioner of Works he suggested to the Government that they should have recourse to unlimited competition with regard to the monument proposed to be erected to the memory of the Duke of Wellington. There had previously been a limited competition, as stated by his right hon. Friend (Mr. Wortley). Four artists were selected—Baron Marochetti and Mr. Gibson had declined to compete, but Mr. Foley and Mr. Bailey had sent in designs which were not deemed worthy of adoption by the Government. Then it was that he (Sir B. Hall) proposed to resort to unlimited competition; and, looking at the object in view, and the large sum of money that was to be expended upon the work proposed to be executed, he thought that the best principle on which the Government could act, and the House of Commons had sanctioned his proposal. Allusion had been made as to the terms of the competition issued from the Office of Works, and to their being strongly guarded. They were peculiarly guarded, because he felt, where the competition was absolutely unlimited, it might be possible in a case of this kind that persons might be capable of sending in very pretty designs, calculated to strike the eye, but who might be incapable of carrying out those designs in marble or any other material which might be decided upon. The suggestion he had made resulted in the exhibition of designs which were seen in Westminster Hall. They had two exhibitions of designs in the same place last season, and he never saw so great a contrast as that between the designs exhibited for the public offices and these for the Wellington Monument, whilst the talent displayed in the designs for the new public offices, and for laying out the ground in the neighbourhood of Downing Street with a view to the concentration of the public offices in that locality, was so great that the exhibition elicited universal approbation. He was bound to admit that the exhibition of designs for the Wellington Monument was a failure. That opinion was confirmed by the judges, and, he believed, by the public at large. His right hon. Friend had referred to the Report recently presented to the House by the Committee which sat upon the reconstruction of a new Foreign Office and other matters relating thereto, and in allusion to the principle of unlimited competition had read only that part of the Report which just suited his special purpose, and had wholly omitted to bring under the consideration of the House that portion which showed the benefits resulting from unlimited competition. He (Sir B. Hall) was a member of that Committee, and he would read to the House the words which concluded the paragraph on the subject of limited and unlimited competition. They were as follows:—

"The principle of unlimited competition has the advantage of giving an opening for the recognition of real, though unknown talent, which patronage, however wisely exercised, or even limited competition, may fail to call forth."

In a competition of that nature he thought it was the duty of the Government to give the execution of the design to one of the successful competitors, provided — and he wished that to be understood—there was the conviction on the part of those who had to decide, that the talent displayed in the competition and the known practical experience of the competitors, afforded to the public a sufficient security for the successful and proper execution of the work in the event of its being entrusted to any one of them, and in this view of the case he was fortified by the opinion of the Committee which was that—

"In now recommending that a preference should be given to the successful competitors in the erection of the new Foreign Office, your Committee have been induced to do so from a conviction that the talent displayed in their designs, and in most cases their known practical experience in the construction of buildings, afford to the public all needful security for the successful and proper execution of the work."

It would be a question for the noble Lord to determine whether all those who had gained the premiums for the Wellington Monument were capable of executing the work, or which of the successful competitors was most capable, supposing that the noble Lord was of opinion that any of them ought to be employed. With regard to the site, he begged to remind the House that at first the only site that could be procured was under one of the arches. Since that time the Consistory Court, in consequence of recent legislation, had become vacant, and it had been placed at the disposal of the noble Lord. Now, it had struck him very forcibly that the design which had been prepared for one part of the building could not with any propriety be put up in another part of the building for which it was in no way adapted. An equestrian figure, the horse standing upon arches seemed an extraordinary design for the site now selected, and he believed it would be extremely difficult so to alter the design as to make it suitable for the Consistory Court. The noble Lord had stated that before anything was done he would have the model exhibited on the proposed site; he hoped that in the meantime he would reconsider the whole subject. With that understanding he thought they should leave the responsibility with the Government. He knew the extreme difficulties which the noble Lord had to undergo in his department in regard to matters which were termed matters of taste, and he would be the last man to do anything to increase those difficulties. He entreated him, however, to consider fully this subject, and if he should see that the model as now designed really could not be put into the chapel with effect, then let him communicate either with the successful competitors or with other artists, so that the monument might be put up as speedily as possible, and might harmonize with the locality for which it was destined.

Sir Benjamin Hall

MR. MONCKTON MILNES said, he was afraid they must all admit, however painful it might be to many excellent gentlemen, that the exhibition in Westminster Hall had been a failure; and, having come to that conclusion, the next thing was to see if anything could be done out of the sphere of that competition. The best course for the Government to pursue would be to call into their counsels all the artists who were thought capable of performing the work required, whether they had joined in the competition or not. His noble Friend would do well if he put aside altogether his present proposal, and next year asked the artists of this and other countries to exhibit their models, not under any regulated form of competition, but simply for the purpose of showing to the Government and the country the best possible statue that could be produced. He thought that by a plan of that kind they would ensure the exercise on the subject of the talents of the most distinguished artists of the age, for there was no danger of the pride or self-esteem of the distinguished exhibitors being in any way offended, and that if there was next year an exhibition of this kind, accompanied with no conditions whatever, it would prove successful. Better have no statue at all than one that would be unworthy of the country.

MR. MACARTHY remarked that there was no instance of a man on horseback having been allowed to enter a temple.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, in answer to he hon. Member for Perth (Mr. Stirling), that what he proposed to do was to authorize Mr. Stevens to erect a model, with such modification as might seem requisite, on the proposed site in the consistory Chapel of St. Paul's, so that they might be able to judge of its fitness and of the effect.

MR. STUART WORTLEY said, he understood that under no circumstances would the authorities of St. Paul's allow a figure of a person on horseback to be erected in St. Paul's. He did not undervalue Mr. Penrose, but he did not think he was so well known that the public would like to have the management of this great national monument committed to him and Mr. Stevens. Throughout this debate he had been represented as recommending a second limited competition. He recommended no such thing. What he recommended was, that they should, as his hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract (Mr. M. Milnes) said, set aside all that had taken place at the competition, which had utterly failed in producing any worthy design, but that they should excite emulation by employing the principal artists who were known in Europe to send in designs, making it certain that the best design would be adopted, and then he had the best reason for believing that there was not one of them who would not produce a design.

Question put,

House divided:—Ayes 26; Noes 44: Majority 18.

SUBALTERNS OF THE ARMY.

ADDRESS MOVED.

COLONEL FREESTUN said, he rose to move that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that she would take into consideration the unfavourable position of the subalterns of the army, with a view to affording them relief. The present scale of pay for subalterns was adopted no less than a century ago. The pay was so very inadequate that many officers were obliged to quit the army, because they could not support themselves by their professional emoluments. The various items of a subaltern's necessary expenditure, amounted altogether to £157 5*s.* per annum. Against this sum had to be set a twelvemonth's pay, or £95 16*s.* 3*d.*; thus leaving the unfortunate officer at the end of the year £61 8*s.* 9*d.* in debt. This, however, was not all; because subalterns were also frequently put to heavy expenses of different kinds by being removed from place to place, which the extra allowances they received were wholly insufficient to meet, and it should also be recollected that in the majority of instances they had been obliged to pay no less than £480 for their commission. He adduced the authority of The Times to show that the maxim that the labourer was worthy of his hire was as applicable to the army as to any other profession, and that men of talent ought not to be excluded from that service because they were not possessed of wealth. He cited individual instances of the privation and hardship to which subalterns were exposed, chiefly owing to the insufficiency of their remuneration. The struggle in which they were continually involved to maintain the style and appearance of gentlemen upon the scantiest pittance rendered their position far less enviable than that of the non-commissioned officer whose pay was more in keeping with his rank. The number of ensigns that had resigned at the close of the war was fifty-two, irrespective of the number of lieutenants, and this he believed was owing to the inadequacy of the pay and other causes. It might be asked, why should the income of subalterns be increased when there were so many candidates for entrance into the service under the existing scale of pay? To that it might be answered that the excitement of a military life, and the comparatively easy road which it was supposed to offer to personal distinction, led many young men to seek admission to the army. And after they had been in the service some time their parents were unwilling to interfere with their future prospects, and often submitted to severe privation and even to debt to support their sons until they were entitled to promotion. Again, the low pay of the subaltern officer militated very much against the promotion of non-commissioned officers, which he thought was very desirable. He would suggest that an augmentation of 1*s.* 6*d.* per day should be made in the pay of the ensigns and lieutenants, and that there should be some addition to their present allowance of furniture, which consisted only of a table, two chairs, and a set of fire-irons. He proposed that an iron bedstead and a chest of drawers should be added, and thus the officer by being enabled to go into barracks at once be saved the expense of previously staying at an inn. The extra pay would amount to £82,826 a year. No doubt that was a large sum ; but he was sure that neither the House nor the people at large would wish that these young men, who were ready to shed their blood in defence of their country, should be compelled to live in a state of comparative beggary. It might be said that the subalterns of the continental army were not better paid than our own ; but they were not by any means in the same category, for they had no mess fund, and they had not to find themselves in clothing or rations. That great financial reformer, the late Mr. Hume, had told him that he would support a Motion of this nature if it should be introduced ; and he trusted that the appeal which he now ventured to make to the gallant General opposite as an old soldier would be responded to in a generous spirit. He begged to move the Resolution which he read.

MR. P. O'BRIEN seconded the Motion.

Motion made and Question proposed,—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to take into consideration the unfavourable position of the Subalterns of the Army, with a view of affording them relief."

SIR WILLIAM FRASER said, the Motion had his hearty sympathy. He agreed with the hon. Mover that it would be a great boon to subalterns if some good plain furniture were put into the rooms allotted to them, for one of the greatest items of expense to which they were put was in moving their furniture from place to place. At present all that they found in their rooms supplied by Government was a poker, tongs, and fender of oldest fashion, two chairs, and an old table, with a board containing a list of these articles, and a warning—usually a very superfluous one — against damaging them. Three removes, it was said, were as bad as a fire—so that at the end of three marches a subaltern's furniture entirely disappeared. It was a great hardship, too, to call on the subalterns to pay for the band, which they had generally few opportunities of hearing, and which in most cases was more a source of pleasure to the people in the neighbourhood of headquarters than to them. It certainly was to be regretted that they could not return the hospitality which they received from the gentry in their neighbourhood without being put to a great expense. There was no messing in the French army, which he thought was a great disadvantage, since the system of messing contributed more than anything else to keep up the gentlemanly tone which distinguished the officers of the English army ; and he thought their pay ought to be such as to enable them to afford the expense. He was sorry that the Motion had been brought on in such a thin House, and so late at night, and he would suggest that the hon. and gallant Gentleman should renew his Motion at a more favourable occasion, when it could be more fully discussed.

SIR FREDERICK SMITH said, he would not yield to any one in a desire to improve the condition of the officers of the army, but as he thought that the Motion could not be so fully discussed now as its merits demanded, he should move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That the debate be now adjourned."

MR. WESTHEAD said, he would support the adjournment of the debate, because it was impossible, under existing circumstances, to do justice to the subject, to which he was sure the Secretary for War would direct his attention during the recess. At the same time, he felt convinced the nation would not grudge a proper amount of remuneration to the British officer.

COLONEL FREESTUN said, that as an hon. and gallant Member had moved the adjournment of the debate, he hoped that the hon. and gallant General (General Peel) would at least give him an assurance that the subject would receive the attention of the Government during the recess. Perhaps the Government would consent to appoint a Commission to inquire into the subject.

GENERAL CODRINGTON said, he could not but regret that no intimation of the intentions of the Government had fallen from the right hon. and gallant General. He was anxious to state his opinion as to the utter inadequacy of the pay given to subalterns in the British army. It was ludicrous to suppose for a moment that that pay could cover the expenses to which their position necessarily exposed them. Each subaltern ought to be supplied by the Government with an iron bedstead, a chest, a bookcase, and one or two more chairs. All those articles of furniture might be of the commonest description, but they ought to be substantial.

GENERAL PEEL said, he wished to express his regret, that owing to his unavoidable absence, the hon. and gallant Colonel was on two occasions prevented from submitting his Motion to the House at an earlier period of the Session. It was perfectly impossible at the present period of the Session to enter into the question, which could not be prejudiced by its postponement until next Session, inasmuch as all the Estimates for this year had been agreed to.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

The House adjourned a Quarter before One o'clock, till Thursday.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Wednesday, July 28, 1858.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1ª International Patent Right.

3ª Railway Cheap Trains, &c.; Cornwall Submarine Mines; Clerk of Petty Sessions (Ireland).

LOCAL GOVERNMENT BILL.

DEBATE RESUMED. BILL PASSED.

Order of the Day read for resuming the adjourned debate upon the Amendment moved by the Earl of CARNARVON yesterday on the Third Reading.

The said Debate was accordingly resumed.

Then the said Amendment was agreed to.

Amendments moved, and disagreed to.

Amendments made.

Bill passed and sent to the Commons.

SALE OF BEER.

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD said, he wished before their Lordships adjourned to ask the noble Earl at the head of Her Majesty's Government whether he could hold out any hope to those who were anxious for some alteration or revision of the law affecting the sale of beer, especially in beerhouses, that that subject would be brought under the consideration of Her Majesty's Government before Parliament reassembled? He was sure that every one of their Lordships who knew anything of the present law must agree with him that its operation produced the greatest possible mischief and demoralization, especially among the rural population. That law did not act as it was intended to act. This was a matter which he, for one, would very much rather leave in the hands of the Government, who he was sure could deal with it much more effectually than any independent Member. Indeed, it would only be in the event of the Government holding out no hope of their undertaking to deal with it that he should take any step concerning it. If the Government had no intention of dealing with it he should next Session move for a Select Committee to consider the matter. But he hoped that during the recess the Government would consider it with the view of amending the law.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, he could have no difficulty in stating that the Government would direct their attention to the subject. His right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State for the Home department had during the present Session prepared the outline of a Bill on the subject, but he found that the subject was so difficult that it was quite impossible for him to propose a satisfactory measure this Session. The subject would therefore be taken into serious consideration by the Government during the recess. He was not at all prepared to say what course should be taken, but he thought that one of the most advantageous modes of bringing the subject under the consideration of the House would be by the appointment of a Select Committee, as suggested by the right rev. Prelate. At the same time he did not wish to be bound by any opinion, and would simply promise that the subject should engage the anxious consideration of the Government.

House adjourned at Six o'clock, till To-morrow, at a quarter before Five o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, July 29, 1858.

MINUTES.] Sat First in Parliament.—The Lord Clifford of Chudleigh, after the Death of his Father; and took the Oath prescribed by the Act of 10th Geo. IV. to be taken by Peers professing the Roman Catholic Religion.

PUBLIC BILLS.—3ª Friendly Societies Act Amendment; Government of British Columbia; Art Unions Indemnity; Reformatory Schools (Ireland); Metropolis Local Management Act Amendment; Drafts on Bankers Law Amendment; New Writs.

UNIVERSITIES (SCOTLAND) BILL.

COMMONS' REASONS CONSIDERED.

Commons' Reasons for disagreeing to some of the Lords' Amendments considered (according to Order), which Reasons were as follow:—

"The Commons disagree to the Amendment in page 2, being to leave out Clause 3, for the following Reason:

"Because by the Act of the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Years of Her Majesty, Chapter Eighty-nine, all Professors of the Universities of Scotland were relieved from the Necessity of taking the Religious Test to which they previously were subject, except those holding Chairs of Theology, and although the Offices of Principals in all the Colleges, with Two Exceptions, were included under the Designation "Chairs of Theology," this proceeded apparently on the Assumption that the Holders of these Offices were actually Teachers of Theology, while, in point of fact, none of the Principals of any of the Colleges, except St. Mary's, St. Andrew's (a Theological College, and not affected by the Clause struck out by your Lordships), have as such taught Theology for more than a Century and a Half; and because these Offices of Heads of Colleges are Situations of Dignity which ought to be open to Persons of Eminence, of whatever Denomination, and whether Clergymen or Laymen.

"The Commons disagree to the Amendments to Clauses 8, 9, 10, and 11, for the following Reason:

"Because by making Professors Co-electors of the Rector with their Students they would be placed in a Position hurtful to their Dignity and Influence.

"The Commons disagree to the Amendment in page 15, being to leave out Clause 26, for the following Reason:

"Because the Distinction between the Two Classes of Professors, proposed to be done away with by this Clause, is, as set forth in the Report of the Royal Commissioners of Visitation appointed in 1836, invidious and unjust, detrimental to the Interests of the University, injurious to Her Majesty's Prerogative, and deriving no Countenance from the Rights and Charters of the University.

"With the preceding Exceptions, the Commons agree to the Amendments made by the Lords to the Bill.

THE DUKE OF MONTROSE said, he thought the views taken by the other House in regard to this measure were erroneous, but he was afraid that if their Lordships were to insist upon their Amendments the effect would be to cause the loss of the Bill. To prevent such a result, and having regard to the importance of the measure, and the value of the reforms which it would introduce into the Scotch Universities, he therefore proposed that their Lordships should decline to insist on their Amendments.

THE EARL OF HADDINGTON concurred in the noble Duke's desire to avoid risking the fate of this Bill; and though he extremely regretted the course taken by the other House on this subject, he could not advise their Lordships to enter at this period of the Session into any controversy with that assembly. He could not, however, but regard the mode in which the other House had dealt with the test applicable to Principals and Professors of Theology in these Universities as a severe blow to the Established Church.

LORD CAMPBELL said, he had formerly supported the repeal of the test which required all Professors in the Scotch Universities to belong to the Established Church, because he had thought such a restriction unjust and inexpedient. At the same time, an exception was made in regard to the heads of the Universities, who had always been connected with the Established Church. Still he hoped that their Lordships would not insist on their Amendments, as by their doing so the Bill might be lost, and therefore, though most reluctantly, he acquiesced in the course recommended by the noble Duke.

Then it was moved, not to insist on the Amendments, to which the Commons have disagreed.

The Bishop of Oxford

On Question, Whether to insist on the said Amendments?

Resolved in the Negative, and a Message sent to the Commons to acquaint them therewith.

After a few words from the Earl of MINTO,

CORRUPT PRACTICES PREVENTION ACT CONTINUANCE BILL.

COMMITTEE. REPORT.

House in Committee (according to order).

Bill reported without Amendment.

LORD EBURY moved, that the first clause should be omitted, which enacted that a candidate may provide vehicles for the conveyance of electors to the poll, but shall not give them money to pay for their conveyance. Having had an opportunity, on Tuesday last, of stating his objections to this clause, it would not be necessary for him now to trouble their Lordships at any length. The clause, he contended, was not necessary at all; but even if it were necessary, the mode of carrying the intention into effect was a most inconvenient one, and contrary moreover to every principle of legislation on the subject for the last twenty-five years. This being his opinion, he hoped to induce their Lordships to concur in his Amendment. Now, as to the question of the necessity for the clause. Noble Lords opposite disclaimed any intention of a dissolution of Parliament, and therefore he might assume that there was not likely to be a dissolution between now and next Session. Were there to be any contested elections between now and then? It was true that there were rumours that two Members of the House of Commons were to be elevated to the peerage; but neither in North Cheshire nor in South Devonshire was there likely to be any contest in the elections to fill up the vacancies the elevation would occasion. This measure, therefore, was not necessary to meet any circumstances likely to arise before next Session. Something had been said about an uncertainty in the law, and his noble Friend had talked of the case of "Cooper v. Slade" upon that point. It was true that there was an uncertainty in the law, but there was no uncertainty whatever in the practice of the House of Commons. He had had great experience in the trial of election petitions by Committees of the other House, and there was no case in which a Member had been unseated by the House of Commons for having paid the bonâ fide travelling expenses of voters. In "Cooper v. Slade," what had taken place was adjudged to be a corrupt contract; and what was decided was, that you must not write to a voter and say, "If you vote for me I will pay your expenses." It was stated to be the intention of the Government next year to submit the whole question as to elections to the consideration of a Select Committee, and therefore this particular clause was at present totally uncalled for. Even supposing there was a necessity for the clause, he believed the mode of carrying the intention into effect was an inconvenient one. The noble Earl the Lord Privy Seal, in moving the second reading, had described the Bill as a measure intended to enable poor voters to exercise their franchise; but were they sure that the enabling poor people to vote was really what was desired? There was not a word in this clause about poor voters, in contradistinction to any other voters. What it did was to allow a candidate to carry every single voter to the poll in a chaise and pair. He would read to their Lordships a few words of warning which he had received from an election agent. That gentleman said, that the expense of conveying voters to the poll at an election was one of a very serious character; and he did not hesitate to say that such expense was, to a very great extent, wasteful and grievously corrupt and extravagant. He went on to say, that from his experience he was convinced that this clause would add enormously to the expense of elections, especially in county contests, and would enable the possessor of the longest purse to win. That was that gentleman's opinion. This clause was not only different from, but was contrary to the principle which had governed the whole tendency of legislation since the passing of the Reform Bill. Year after year measures had been carried for preventing the exercise of undue influence and for lessening the expense of elections; the time for keeping open the poll had been greatly reduced, the cost of bands and colours had also been abrogated, refreshment tickets had been declared illegal, and each step that had been taken had been in the direction of greater purity of elections. Almost every one of the recommendations of the Committee of the House of Commons of 1834 had been carried into effect, and he begged to recall to the recollection of their Lordships the concluding paragraph in the Report of that Committee. It was to this effect:—

"Your Committee are of opinion that every measure regulating the election of representatives should be based on the broad principle that the representative should be placed in the House of Commons, if possible, free of expense."

That was the true principle, and now, for the first time in their legislation, they recognized the absurdity that a candidate should be liable for the personal expenses of the voter. Why should the candidate be liable? If a man were unable to walk to the poll to record an independent vote, let him be carried by all means; but why at the candidate's expense? Why should not the cost fall upon the Consolidated Fund? It would be quite as reasonable as that the candidate should pay it. He should, no doubt, be told that the House of Commons were the best judges of this matter, and that they had sent up the clause by a large majority. But this was not the first time that they had done the same thing. On the last occasion they sent it up backed by a much larger majority; but their Lordships expunged it nevertheless, and received the heartfelt thanks of every honest and independent elector throughout the country for doing so. This clause aimed a deadly blow at the purity of elections, and he trusted that their Lordships would defend their own independence and the independence of the voter by striking it out of the Bill.

Moved, To leave out Clause 1.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE said, the reason why this Bill had been introduced was, that in the existing state of things candidates did not know how to act with regard to the conveyance of voters, and the single object of it was to remedy the present unsettled state of the law in regard to that question. If, as his noble Friend said, the recent decisions of the House of Commons were in favour of allowing it, he did not see how his noble Friend could object to the Bill. Under the existing state of things, those who were most desirous of keeping within the pale of the law were placed at a disadvantage as compared with others. It was urged as a practical objection to this Bill, that after it was passed no voter would go to the poll without being carried. He did not concur in that opinion, especially as the name of every person carried, the distance he was carried, and the charge for his conveyance would have to be published. The real question was, whether the law should be placed on a clear intelligible footing, instead of being left doubtful and in such a state as to encourage evasion? It was for the advantage of all parties that some strict defined rule should be laid down on which all might act alike.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, he entertained insuperable objections to this clause, and thought, if it passed, the Bill ought to be called a measure for the "promotion," not the "prevention," of corrupt practices. It would open the door to all sorts of corruption and bribery and would give the advantage in every case to the wealthiest candidate. He recommended that the question should be deferred until it could be dealt with in the large measure of Parliamentary Reform which the Government had undertaken to introduce next Session.

THE EARL OF WICKLOW was of opinion that the question involved should not be allowed any longer to remain in its present doubtful state. He was in favour of the clause, believing it was only just and fair that the candidates should defray the expenses of bringing the voters to the poll, rather than that the latter should be burdened with such a charge.

LORD CAMPBELL complained of the late period of the Session at which so important a measure had been brought before their Lordships. It was read a second time, he believed, on the very day fixed by the noble Lord the Chairman of Committees as the last day on which their Lordships would read any Bill a second time, and therefore, if not contrary to the letter, it was contrary to the spirit of the noble Lord's Resolution. Arguments might be urged on both sides of the question, and he was not prepared to give any positive opinion upon them. It was very important that the honest and poor voter should be placed in a position to exercise the franchise; but to give him facilities might open the door to bribery and corruption. In his opinion, instead of removing doubts in the law, this clause would give rise to many difficult questions, for the decision of the courts of law. The question was far too important to be decided satisfactorily in the last week of the Session, and the necessity for legislation was not urgent, and it had been announced in the other House that a Reform Bill was to be introduced next Session, when the whole subject would be discussed. It was impossible to doubt that the clause would add greatly to the expense of elections. Non-resident electors would be brought from remote parts of the country, from the Continent, and possibly from Australia.

The expenses not being payable to the voter himself could only be paid by an agent, and a special messenger might be sent to accompany each non-resident voter. Then would arise the question which he had no doubt would soon be discussed in Westminster Hall, whether conveyance did not include refreshment and conveyance back again—whether all the consequences of what was enacted were not enacted. Those were specimens of the questions which would arise, and as no evil could result from postponement, he entreated their Lordships not to agree to the clause.

LORD REDESDALE reminded their Lordships that the Corrupt Practices Act of 1854, came up after the day fixed as the last day on which they would read a Bill a second time, and was read a second time as a Bill of urgency. This Bill had received the approval of Lord Palmerston and Lord John Russell, and he thought they were justified in acceding to a proposition which came to them with such authority, and which peculiarly affected the privilege of the other House.

EARL GRANVILLE said, there was this very essential difference between the dates of reading this Bill and the Bill of 1854 a second time. In this case, the last day on which they would read Bills a second time happened to be fixed five days before the end of the Session, and in 1854 it was eighteen days before the end of the Session. He did not think that too much stress ought to be laid upon the supposed acquiescence of Lord Palmerston and Lord John Russell in this clause, because the former noble Lord distinctly stated that there were arguments on both sides, and Lord John Russell expressed a strong opinion that this ought to be merely a continuance Bill. He concurred with the noble and learned Lord in his objection to the period at which their Lordships were called upon to pass a measure which was only read a second time on Tuesday at the tail of twenty-eight other Orders of the Day. Lord Lyndhurst thought the Bill in its present shape so objectionable that he had authorized him to obtain a pair for him against the clause if their Lordships should divide upon it. When their Lordships remembered that the Secretary of State for the Home Department had expressed an opinion that this Bill ought to be referred to a Select Committee, and that it was the intention of the Government to bring in a general measure in the early part of next Session, there could be no pretext for hurrying their Lordships into the adoption of a premature and ill-considered alteration of the law. He had, therefore, great pleasure in supporting the Motion of his noble Friend.

On Question, Whether the said clause shall stand part of the Bill? their Lordships divided : — Contents 43 ; Not-Contents 23 : Majority 20.

CONTENTS.

Chelmsford, L. (L. Chancellor.)	Sandwich, E.
Cleveland, D.	Wicklow, E.
Manchester, D.	Dungannon, V.
Bath, M. [Teller.]	Hardinge, V.
Salisbury, M.	Hutchinson, V. (E. Donoughmore.)
Amherst, E.	Melville, V.
Bathurst, E.	Strathallan, V.
Beauchamp, E.	Aveland, L.
Carnarvon, E.	Cloncurry, L.
De La Warr, E.	Colchester, L.
Derby, E.	De Freyne, L.
Desart, E.	De Ros, L.
Ellenborough, E.	Dinevor, L.
Graham, E. (D. Montrose.)	Dunsandle and Clanconal, L.
Hardwicke, E.	Ker, L. (M. Lothian).
Jersey, E.	Plunket, L. (Bp. Tuam, &c.)
Leven and Melville, E.	Redesdale, L.
Lonsdale, E.	Sondes, L.
Lucan, E.	Stewart of Garlies, L. (E. Galloway.)
Mansfield, E.	Saint Leonards, L.
Portarlington, E.	Wynford, L. [Teller.]
Romney, E.

NOT-CONTENTS.

Somerset, D.	Boyle, L. E. (Cork and Orrery.)
Lansdowne, M.	Campbell, L.
Effingham, E.	Chesham, L.
Granville, E.	Churchill, L.
Harrington, E.	Cranworth, L.
Minto, E.	Ebury, L. [Teller.]
St. Germans, E.	Foley, L. [Teller.]
Somers, E.	Rivers, L.
Eversley, V.	Stanley of Alderley, L.
Stratford de Redcliffe, V.	Wodehouse, L.
Torrington, V.	Wycombe, L. (E. Shelburne.)
Audley, L.

Resolved in the Affirmative.

Bill to be read 3ª To-morrow.

GOVERNMENT OF INDIA BILL.—COMMONS' REASONS CONSIDERED.

Commons' Reasons for disagreeing to some of the Lords' Amendments considered (according to Order).

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, it could hardly be expected that on a question of so much importance, and involving so many varied considerations as this, there should not be differences of opinion between the Members of each House of Parliament, and also between the two Houses themselves. Your Lordships made several Amendments in this Bill, to the greater number, though perhaps not the most important, of which the Commons do not object. There are, however, five Amendments which were made by your Lordships to which that House has objected, and for objecting to which they have sent up Reasons to your Lordships. Perhaps it may be convenient that, instead of dealing entirely separately with each of these Amendments, I should at once state the course which Her Majesty's Government are prepared to take with regard to them all, leaving the decision upon each for separate discussion and consideration. The first Amendment to which the House of Commons have disagreed, and insist upon their disagreement, will be found in the seventh line of the ninth page of the Bill. As the Bill came from the House of Commons, it was provided that, with regard to all despatches which might require secrecy—and that there were some that did require it was not denied by any one—the Secretary of State should exercise the functions heretofore performed by the Secret Committee of the Court of Directors. It was objected by my noble Friend the noble Earl below me (the Earl of Ellenborough) that that provision gave to the Secretary of State, not only a power which was not absolutely necessary, but a much greater authority than is now possessed by the President of the Board of Control, because, although the President may insist upon sending out any secret orders he pleases, he must communicate them to the Chairman and Deputy Chairman of the East India Company; and, therefore, although he is not bound to follow their advice, he must necessarily have a consultation with them before taking a step which may lead to very important consequences. My noble Friend argued with very great force that the Secretary of State would now be placed in a position of more complete independence than was the President of the Board of Control, and might upon his own responsibility, and without hearing the opinion or advice of any of the Councillors with whom the law surrounds him, take a step which might have most important and most prejudicial effects. In compliance with these representations of my noble Friend, it was agreed to introduce into this clause words requiring the Secretary of State, before sending out secret orders, to communicate them to the Vice President of the Council and one other member of the Council, to be elected by himself. I think that that was a wise and judicious arrangement, and one which, without too much cramping the authority of the Secretary of State, secures to him the same means of obtaining assistance and advice as are possessed by the President of the Board of Control under the existing system. It is, however, the opinion of the House of Commons, that the provision which we introduced "tends to divide the responsibility of the Minister, and to create anew the Secret Committee, which, under the new Government, will be no longer necessary." There is no question that, to a certain, but very limited extent—because the Secretary of State has the power of overruling the Councillors whom he consults—it does relieve him from responsibility. If the House of Commons are of opinion that that responsibility should be so whole and undivided as not to require that he should consult any person whatever before he takes so important a step as sending secret orders out to India, undoubtedly that is a view which is not carried out by the Bill as it was sent down by your Lordships. What the House of Commons means by saying that the Secret Committee will under the new Government no longer be necessary, they do not explain, and of course I cannot explain it for them. I cannot say that I think the Amendment was an injudicious one, or that its rejection by the Commons is a desirable alteration of the Bill. At the same time, I do not think that, considering the very great interests which are involved in the passing of this Bill, the Amendment made by your Lordships is of sufficient importance to justify you in adhering to it against the wish of the House of Commons, and therefore I shall propose that your Lordships do not persist in that Amendment. For the same reason, because I think that the question involved in them, though not an inconsiderable one, is only of subordinate importance, I shall ask your Lordships not to insist upon the Amendments made in page 9, lines 27, 39, and 40. The objections taken by the Commons to these Amendments appear to me to be rather inconsistent with that to which I have just referred. In that instance they objected that the Amendment introduced by your Lordships tended to divide the responsibility of the Minister. In this instance, in which your Lordships proposed to give to the Secretary of State undivided responsibility with regard to the appointment of the members of the Councils of the Governor General, and of the different Presidencies in India, the House of Commons say that that undivided responsibility ought not to rest with the Minister, and that "it is undesirable to increase the patronage of the Minister without providing a check upon its exercise." The distinction between the views of the two Houses is this. According to your Lordships' Amendment the Secretary of State was called upon to make these appointments in Council, which rendered it necessary for him in every case to lay the proposed appointment before the Council, and to listen to any objections which might be raised to it. The House of Commons have rejected that Amendment and restored the clause to the form in which it originally stood—namely, that the Secretary of State shall make these appointments, not only with the knowledge of the Council, but also with the concurrence of the votes of a majority of the Councillors. As the previous alteration leaves to the Secretary of State too large a discretion, I think that this unduly restrains his powers and places too much in the hands of the Council as a body the appointment to very important offices, thereby encouraging what my noble Friend (the Earl of Ellenborough) particularly deprecates—canvassing and the looking to individual members of the Council rather than to the Secretary of State in this country and to the Governor General in India. I object to this alteration, but I am not prepared to ask your Lordships to persist in an Amendment which has been deliberately and carefully considered and rejected by the House of Commons. The next two Amendments to which the Commons object are in pages 10 and 11, and involve the principle of appointment by competition. Now, I wish to draw your Lordships' attention to the exact state of the case, and to the questions which are raised by the Bill as it was sent up from the House of Commons by your Lordships' Amendment, and by the rejection of that Amendment by the other House. As the Bill originally stood, it was proposed to substitute the Secretary of State and the Council for the President of the Board of Control and the Court of Directors of the East India Company. With these authorities have hitherto rested the appointments to the civil and military services of the Company; but candidates have been required to undergo a very severe and, to a certain extent, competitive examination. The particulars of that examination, and the amount of competition which was to be introduced into it have been regulated, not by an Act of Parliament, but by instruments proceeding from the competent authorities; and in substituting the Secretary of State and Council for those authorities the Bill, as originally introduced, gave to the Secretary of State the same power of making regulations, to be confirmed by Order in Council, as was formerly exercised by the Court of Directors and the President of the Board of Control. The House of Commons, however, went a step further, in the direction of a competitive examination, and proposed not only that all candidates should be subjected to such an examination, but that the result of that competition should, without reference to any other circumstances or any other conditions, regulate the order of succession in which candidates should receive their appointment. I do not wish to enter into the general question of the principle of competitive examination for admission to the civil or military service; but I think there are two grounds on which your Lordships' Amendments may be fairly vindicated, and their rejection by the House of Commons may be reasonably objected to. The one is, that the principle of competition was exactly as much secured, subject to the consent of Parliament, by the Bill as it stood in the first instance, and by the system as it existed under the East India Company, inasmuch as the regulations being made and confirmed by Order in Council, that Order in Council, or any other Order varying those regulations, having to be laid before the House of Commons, that House had an opportunity of expressing its opinion as to the expediency of such variations. And seeing how much the principle of competition is on its trial—perhaps its successful trial—at this moment, I think it was not judicious absolutely to tie the hands of the Executive Government as by an Act of Parliament to lay down such stringent rules as to the necessity of appointing the most successful competitor. Another objection is, that hitherto the regulation of appointments to the civil and military service of this country has not been under Act of Parliament, but by the direct authority of the Crown—of course under the responsibility of its advisers. This clause might therefore be regarded as, to a certain extent, infringing on the prerogative of the Crown in respect to these appointments. I must, however, fairly admit that there is a partial answer to this objection as far as the civil service is concerned; for, though undoubtedly such a regulation as to the civil service of this country would be an infringement on the prerogative of the Crown, it is not so clear that that infraction would extend to the case of India, because it is not a prerogative which the Crown has hitherto exercised there. It is a power and a prerogative which the House of Commons and Parliament are for the first time vesting in the Crown—namely, the administration of Indian affairs by direct management, and by the patronage—which is the important point—connected with the services of India. Therefore it is competent for Parliament to hand over that power and authority to the Crown sub modo—that is to say, subject to such conditions as at the time of the transfer it may deem fit. Though I do not assent to the principle adopted by the House of Commons—though I think it an unwise course so to fetter the hands of the Executive and of the Indian Minister, as well as to limit the discretion of Parliament itself—yet in regard to the civil service I am not prepared to advise your Lordships to insist on your Amendment. But I must say, there is another branch of the service which appears to me to stand on quite a different footing. You are now handing over to the Crown the supreme authority over the army of India; but, by the 33rd clause of this Bill, it is provided that all appointments to cadetships shall be vested in Her Majesty. And if you provide, as I think you must do, that with regard to the military service of India, as well as with regard to the military service of this country, all appointments of this description should be vested in the Crown, it is almost a contradiction in terms to say, in the first instance, that all cadetships in the scientific branch shall be vested in Her Majesty, and to follow that up by saying that no persons shall be recommended except in the precise order as they come out of a competitive examination, and that the Crown shall be compelled to exercise its authority according to the result of that competition. With respect to the civil service, it may be argued that, practically speaking, the Crown does not exercise that authority over appointments which is perhaps by the strict theory of the constitution vested in it. But, in reference to the army, whether of this country or of India, it is of great importance that we should not lose sight of the principle that the Crown, and not Parliament, is the true source of appointment and of promotion. That is a constitutional principle which I confess I should see abandoned with very great regret; and I think this point has not been maturely considered by the House of Commons. As to admission to the civil service, the question was raised in the other House, was deliberately discussed, and a division taken upon it, when the Government, no doubt in a thin House, was left in a minority. This being so, and the other House having come to a deliberate decision on this subject, that is another reason why we should not insist on our Amendment with regard to it. But the power of the Crown in theory and in practice over appointments and promotions in the army I hold to be a matter of very considerable constitutional importance. The House of Commons, however, appears rather hastily to have inferred that the same necessity applied to the military as to the civil service; and, accordingly, it introduced into this clause Amendments relating to cadetships in the scientific branches corresponding to those applicable to the civil service. This was done without taking into serious consideration and discussing whether there is not a broad constitutional distinction between the power of the Crown over the civil and military departments respectively. This is a point of such great moment that, without saying that, even if the other House should adhere to its opinion, I should think it preferable that this important measure should be lost, and that these long discussions should be protracted to another Session, with all the inconvenience attending such an ad interim Government of an empire like India, still it would be unwise for your Lordships hastily and at once to adopt the decision of the House of Commons in rejection of your Amendments. And as respects the provision that the Crown shall be bound to grant cadetships precisely in accordance with the success of the candidates in a competitive examination, it is, I believe, due to the prerogative of the Crown, due to your Lordships' own position, due to the great interests involved, as well as respectful to the other House itself, that it should be invited to consider the marked distinction between the two cases, and that as the formal mode of attaining that end your Lordships should be advised to insist on your Amendment, which strikes out that absolute and imperative condition imposed on the Crown of selecting for cadetships in the scientific branches of the army those persons who may have most distinguished themselves at the examination, and that, too, in the exact order in which they have so distinguished themselves. There is another clause as to which the House of Commons seems to have shared the misapprehensions entertained by some of your Lordships. I allude to Clause 54, which was much discussed here, and which requires that whenever any order directing actual hostilities to be commenced shall be issued, the fact of its issue shall be communicated to both Houses of Parliament. In the original provision the communication to Parliament was to be made within one month from the date of sending out the order; but your Lordships amended it to three months if Parliament should be sitting, adding at the same time the words "unless such order shall be revoked or suspended." If Parliament was not sitting, then the communication was to be made within a month after its next meeting. Perhaps the clause is not sufficiently explicit, because the intention is, that if at the end of three months Parliament should not be sitting, then within one month after the resumption of its deliberations the notice in question should be given. But the House of Commons seems to have thought the first and second conditions inconsistent with each other, and it says that the period of three months does not harmonize with the one month after the meeting of Parliament, which meeting may take place immediately after the issue of the order contemplated by the clause. That misconstruction existed in this House, and I regret that words were not inserted to make the meaning clearer; but the grounds stated for allowing an interval of three months after the declaration of hostilities were really such as it would be impossible for the House of Commons to resist or overlook. These grounds were, that the orders might be sent out to India—and recollect it is with India you are dealing—for the commencement of hostilities. They could not be received within a month in that country, and after their receipt circumstances might possibly arise which would prevent the Governor General either from reasons of discretion or actual inability, from carrying those orders into effect. He might send home word, "It is quite clear we shall have to engage in warlike operations, but it is necessary to temporize; I have not at command sufficient military resources, and I shall not be prepared to execute your orders within the next two months." In the meantime, however, before it was possible to send back this answer to this country—nay, even before the order itself could reach India—the clause as it first stood required the fact that such an order had been issued to be promulgated and laid before Parliament. The consequence of that would be that the very next mail would take out to India news that directions had been given to commence hostilities, and every country against which such hostilities had been ordered would have ample notice of your intention to make war upon them, although your own Governor General might have told you that for two or three months to come he would not be prepared to act upon your instructions. Thus, you would be actually giving your enemy—or rather your intended enemy—full warning of what you were going to do, while at the same time your own instruments had not the means of giving immediate effect to your directions. No one, therefore, can, I think, doubt the propriety of the alteration made by your Lordships to cause the fact of such an order having been sent out to be announced to Parliament not within one month, but within three months after its issue, so as to afford time for communicating with India, and learning whether or not there would be any difficulty in promulgating the order. Your Lordships, as I have already said, have also inserted in this clause words providing that if such orders were suspended or revoked, then it should be unnecessary to lay them before Parliament at all. Clearly, if they are not to be acted upon, it would be unwise to inform the persons with whom you have to deal that you ever intended to declare war against them. The clause then enacts that these orders shall be communicated to Parliament, if it is then sitting, within three months. This will give the Government three months' grace, at the expiration of which they will be bound to lay the orders they have issued before Parliament. If, however, after that interval has elapsed, Parliament should not be sitting, then the Government will have had the advantage of the three months already given them for the issue and promulgation of the order, and as soon as the Legislature re-assembles, or within one month after its re-assembling, it will be incumbent on them to communicate to it the fact that the hostilities had been ordered. I propose that the clause shall provide that the order shall be communicated to both Houses of Parliament within three months after the sending of such order if Parliament is sitting, and if Parliament is not sitting at the end of such three months, then within one month next after the meeting of Parliament. That, I think, would carry out what were your Lordships' intentions. It removes the obvious misconstruction which the House of Commons has put upon the clause. With that alteration I think they would be of opinion that the clause is reasonable and just. I shall, therefore, my Lords, propose, with regard to Clause 54, that we do insist upon your Lordships' Amendments as altered by the Amendment which I propose to insert in it. My Lords, these are all the objections which the House of Commons have made to the Amendments made by your Lordships in the India Bill, and I thought it more convenient that I should make a general statement with regard to them rather than make a separate statement on each. My proposition, therefore, is not to insist upon your Lordships' Amendments as far as regards the first and second of these Amendments, and also with regard to the third, so far as it relates to the civil service, but to insist upon your Lordships' Amendment and to submit it again to the further and more deliberate consideration of the House of Commons with regard to cadetships in the scientific branches of the military service; and also to insist upon your Lordships' Amendment with another Amendment of a clause which I cannot but think has been misapprehended and misunderstood by the House of Commons.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I do not rise for the purpose of offering any objection to the course proposed by the noble Earl. In the first place, I entirely agree to the very judicious course which under the present circumstances he has proposed that we shall take; and in the second place, the Session is so nearly at an end that I agree with the noble Earl it would be perfectly idle to insist upon all our Amendments. At the same time I cannot help adverting to the strange conduct of the Government with regard to this Bill. The noble Earl, by the fact of his being Prime Minister and leader of this House, by the exercise of that influence which a Government always exercises at the end of a Session, is virtually master of the proceedings of this House, and in that capacity I think he is necessarily bound to watch over the dignity and propriety of the proceedings of this House. I do not wish to wander from the question before the House, but to illustrate my meaning I must allude to another question, which was very recently discussed by your Lordships — I allude to the Jewish question. In that case we followed implicitly what was laid down by the noble Earl as the most proper course to be adopted. We on this side of the House remonstrated strongly against certain proceedings connected with that Jewish question as likely to throw ridicule and a certain amount of discredit on this House. As soon as the proceedings were closed here, public opinion certainly was expressed in every possible way in the sense that we expected. Of course there was no help for that. But when the matter came before the House of Commons we found in the report of the proceedings that every side of the House agreed in the objection we had made, and I think this House, as a body, had a right to expect that some of the Members of that Government which induced us to take the course we did should have vindicated that course in some manner—instead of which two of the noble Earl's colleagues in the other House remained perfectly silent, and one of the Secretaries of State expressed his regret that the House of Lords, having taken a course which they thought wrong, did not at least act in a straightforward manner. With regard to this Bill, and in reference to that clause to which the third Amendment refers, and which relates to competitive examination, an Amendment was proposed to which I strongly objected. The noble Earl said the House of Commons had adopted on that subject a course which he did not think judicious. But it was not a private Member of the House of Commons who proposed that course; that clause was proposed by one of the Members of Her Majesty's Government, the President of the Board of Control, and, therefore, by one who was bound to be in accord with the opinions of the Government on the subject. When the Amendment was proposed I objected strongly, on the first blush, that it was an Amendment which appeared to me to take away the whole security which was thought necessary by the President of the Board of Control. But I was met by what appeared to me a very fair argument at the time—that while practically it would not interfere with open competition, as to admission to the civil service, it would at the same time save a great constitutional principle and prevent an encroachment on the prerogative of the Crown: and to that this House yielded. I strongly objected to the Amendment with regard to the re-constitution of what will practically be a Secret Committee; but I felt that the noble Earl's authority on the opposite side was strongly in favour of the Amendment. I urged every reason which appeared to me why it was most desirable not to fetter the Secretary of State. The Amendment, however, being proposed by the noble Earl was naturally carried. Now, if this Amendment was worth anything, it was to have been expected that Her Majesty's Government would have made some effort to complete that which was the work of the Prime Minister. But not a bit of it. If I am to believe the reports of the proceedings of the other House, the President of the Board of Control voted against this Amendment, and stated that in his opinion the Amendment was perfectly indefensible. Well, then, I come to the next clause. What the House of Commons have done with regard to it I think rather bears me out in what I took the liberty of pointing out on each successive clause connected with patronage,—that whereas a great outcry was raised against the late Government as to the imaginary amount of patronage which they were about to transfer to themselves, every single change that has taken place under the direction of Her Majesty's present Government has been to increase the patronage conferred upon the Secretary of State; and, therefore, I am not surprised that the House of Commons should have insisted on some check being retained upon the exercise of patronage. If your Lordships had adopted the course which we on this side of the House suggested, and which was so strongly supported by the noble Earl the late President of the Board of Control, you would not now be obliged to abandon your Amendment as to the nomination of the Members of the Councils of the Governor General and Governors respectively. I think the House has some reason to complain that that confident communication which they should for their own sake have maintained has not, at all events, been maintained between the Members of the Government sitting in each House in order to keep up that consistency between the proceeding of the two Houses which I think is most important to the dignity and honour of both Houses of Parliament. With respect to the Amendment proposed by the noble Earl as to competitive examination, I must say that I feel some pride that the noble Earl, after having opposed my Amendment, should now be the person to oppose one portion of the Amendment of the House of Commons. I must be again allowed to say that if there by any validity in the objection to take from the Crown the appointment of the military cadetships, the same objection applies to the civil appointments. With regard to the last Amendments, I can only say that I feel very grateful to the noble Earl for having so very clearly stated the reasons why we, during two stages of the Bill, pressed upon him those alterations, and which I am glad to say, except with a verbal Amendment, he intends now to insist upon. I have stated why we on this side of the House think we have good reason to complain of the conduct of the Government with respect to this Bill, but at the same time it is far from my intention to object to the course proposed by the noble Earl.

LORD CAMPBELL said, he had a few observations to make with respect to the passion of the House of Commons for competitive examinations. He believed, with great respect for that House, that they were running quite wild upon that subject. He was himself an advocate, not for the competitive examination, but for a discriminative examination for the purpose of ascertaining whether people seeking public offices knew their business; and he was of opinion that the system might be usefully applied to candidates for seats in the House of Commons. He would, in fact, imitate in that case the practice which prevailed in Scotland, of requiring a Judge at the period of his elevation to the bench to act for a time in the character of a "Lord Probationer," and to give proof of his capacity for deciding causes before his appointment was confirmed. It appeared to him that as the House of Commons was now pushing the competitive system to a point which would interfere with the prerogative of the Crown, it was time to inquire whether it would not be well to adopt a discriminative examination, for the gentlemen who sought to obtain admission into that assembly and to "pluck" those who should not be found properly qualified, by their knowledge of law, of finance, and of other subjects, to discharge the duties of legislators.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH: My Lords, although I perceive with the greatest possible concern and regret the Amendments which have been made by the House of Commons, I do not feel disposed to comment upon what took place in that House with respect to them. I admit that on all great questions the largest amount of ability is displayed by the gentlemen who lead the debates in that House, and, although I most deeply regret the opinion which appears to be generally entertained there with respect to competitive examinations, yet I should be sorry to attribute to the Members of the other House any but the most conscientious convictions of duty in adhering to their opinion. I shall not trouble your Lordships with any general observations, but shall proceed at once to the questions at issue. If it be true, as the House of Commons state, with regard to the first point, that it is impossible to defend the Amendment which your Lordships have made, I can only regret that the House of Commons did not give better reasons for insisting on the Bill as it stood when they sent it up to your Lordships; for I find that they declare, in the first place, that the submitting of the secret despatches to two members of the Council would tend to divide the responsibility of the Minister. My Lords, it could not by possibility have that effect, because the members of the Secret Committee are constituted only for the purpose of inspecing the Secret Despatches, and they would have no power of objecting to those despatches or of preventing their being sent. They would have no other power, in fact, than that of offering, in a confidential manner, their opinions with respect to them if they happened to differ from the Minister. I will give you an example, the application of which I am sure you will admit. The other day I wrote a despatch with regard to Lord Canning's Proclamation. That despatch was in the hands of the Secret Committee for six days. No objection was taken to it and no representation was made to me on the subject: but if I had stated that as a reason for my responsibility being considered to be divided—if I had endeavoured to shelter myself under the circumstance of that despatch having been so submitted to the Secret Committee—I do not know what result of such an excuse might have had with your Lordships, but I know that I should have been considered generally to have acted in a spirit of poltroonery. It would have been said, that I had not the slightest ground to stand upon, that my responsibility was complete, and that the circumstance of the despatch having been submitted to the Secret Committee in no way relieved me of that responsibility. It is said that the Bill will create anew the Secret Committee, which, under the new form of Government, will not be necessary. But my Lords, the real change effected by this Bill in the practical Government of India is not great. With the exception of the Queen's name, which I deem very valuable, and the nomination by the Crown of the Governor General and Governors, there is no great practical alteration in the mode of governing India, especially since it has been determined to continue in the Council half of the existing Court. How, then, can it be said that the slight change which has taken place affords any reason for discontinuing the Secret Committee? In my opinion there is no change, however great, in the Government of India which could have dispensed with the necessity for submitting the secret despatches to some second mind. This is the real value of the Committee. It is advisable in the course of human nature for any man, be he whom he may, to submit everything of great importance that he writes to some other mind. Be that mind an inferior mind, let the person possessing it have no power whatever over his proceedings, still there is an advantage in being compelled so to communicate; and that advantage I desire to mantain. Remember, my Lords, that this provision for a Secret Committee was inserted in the original law for the Government of India by no common men; but that it was put there by Mr. Pitt and the first Mr. Dundas, two of the ablest men who ever swayed the councils of this country. Be assured that they did not do it without good reason. The President of the Board of Control had then, as now, colleagues to whom he could refer; but it was thought advisable that persons connected with India and who could understand the real bearings of the case, should at all times have despatches of importance submitted to them and should have the power of expressing an opinion with regard to them. These were my reasons for desiring the introduction of that Amendment. However, I agree with my noble Friend that it is not of so much importance as that it would be desirable to risk the passing of this measure by insisting upon it in opposition to the opinion of the other House. But then comes another Amendment of far greater importance, which, in reality, goes to the whole constitution of the Indian Government, and I confess that it is with very great regret that I find that my noble friend does not intend to insist upon it. The House of Commons say that it is undesirable to increase the patronage of the Minister without providing a check upon its exercise; but in this Bill they have greatly increased the patronage of the Minister without any check whatever. They have given him the power of creating the Governor General, the Governors, and the Members of the Council also; and they have given him a great increase of patronage in the disposition of the establishment of the India House and likewise in the nomination to cadetships, without any check at all. But that on which I insisted is not patronage. Appointments to the Council in India are not appointments which a Government would ever venture to look on in the light of patronage. They will only be made in the exercise of the highest function of the Executive Government that of providing the very best persons to assist in carrying on the most important branches of administration in India. No Government would ever venture, in the way of a job, upon appointments of that description. But this I know, that it is most desirable that there should not be a double Government in India. Under the Bill, as it stands now, the Government name the Governor General, while the Council will name the Councillors of the Governor General. The Council may take totally different views with respect to the most important matters from those taken by the Governor General. Beaten here, by the power of the Secretary of State in the Council, they may, through their appointments to the Council in India, very materially affect the conduct of public affairs; for recollect that the Governor General, though he has the power of overruling his Council in extreme cases affecting the highest interests and safety of the state, has not the power which is given to the Secretary of State by this Bill of overruling his Council on all occasions. It is only in extreme cases that he can do so, and there might be in his Council gentlemen opposed to the Governor General, who might reduce his authority to contempt by continually thwarting him; yet the power of appointing those Gentlemen you leave to the Council here. I think that this is a most material error. I have always deemed it necessary that all persons in India should look to the head of the Government alone, or, if not to him to the head of the Government here. What would be the position of my noble Friend near me if the principle proposed to be applied to the Governor General were carried out in my noble Friend's case—and if he, placed by favour of Her Majesty's confidence in the position of First Minister of the Crown, were to have all his colleagues chosen by the noble Lords who now sit opposite? Yet that is exactly the position in which you place the Governor General of India, who has to conduct matters as important as those which fall to the lot of my noble Friend. I think, therefore, that this is a most serious error in the constitution of the new Government of India, and that it perpetuates all the vices of the old administration. You re-appoint to the Council half of the existing Court of Directors, with all their traditional policy, and you enable them to appoint the Councillors of the Governor General, although it is notorious that according to their old prejudices every Governor General is regarded as an enemy unless he adopts a course of subserviency to the Court. I cannot agree, therefore, with the Commons in their objection to this clause. It would be idle to think of dividing the House upon the subject, but I cannot give my assent to it, because I believe that it will lead to great evils. Then comes a very important question with respect to which my noble Friend concedes one-half, and insists upon his own Amendment as to the other half. When he makes a distinction between the military and civil services I think he has good ground to stand upon. There is a material difference between them. When competitive examination was first established for the civil service, I admitted that there was considerable advantage in disconnecting the civil service from the Court of Directors, and that advantage still will continue to exist to a certain extent although the Court will have become a council. Feeling, therefore, that a great political as well as social revolution is thereby accomplished in India, I do not object to my noble Friend's determination not to insist on his Amendment on this point; but I rejoice that he insists upon it in the other. My Lords, I cannot but regret that the House of Commons has fallen into what appears to me a dangerous error with respect to open competitive examination as the only road by which, for the future, admission is to be obtained into the military service of India. I am quite sure that there is not only in the House of Commons, but also out of doors, a great error as to the classes which are to be benefited, and injured by this great innovation. The establishment of competitive examination does not in the smallest degree affect your Lordships' House—it does not affect your relatives or connections, nor the connections of the great landed gentry of the country. I regret to say, that Members of your Lordships' House and of the other House, and the first gentry in the country, have not endeavoured—except in very rare cases—to obtain for their sons situations in the service of the Indian Government. I regret it deeply, because I know it is by far the best field which any man can have for the exercise of his abilities, and it affords the highest rewards for the display of the highest virtues. I regret that this House has not participated in the glory which has been reflected by late events on the servants of the Indian Government. But I desire, my Lords, to retain these appointments in the class which has hitherto held them. That class is the class of educated gentlemen which occupies the centre of society, which extends on the one side to the confines of the class which lives by buying and selling, and on the other to the class of which your Lordships are Members—persons who have the means of providing for their sons otherwise than by professions of a lucrative description, of doing that for them which I think is the greatest misfortune that can befall any man—enabling them to live in idleness. This class embraces clergymen, country gentlemen of small incomes, lawyers and all the learned professions, officers in the army and navy, and all that great class of persons having a mediocrity of fortune, but of the highest and most cultivated intellect. It is from that class which it is intended by this clause to take away these appointments. In sanctioning this principle, Parliament has introduced a property qualification for appointments in the public service, because there is no doubt that it is by paying highly those who cram candidates for these appointments that they will be obtained. It is only by the expenditure of large sums in this way that it will be possible for the future to enter the service, and the gentlemen who have hitherto obtained appointments have not the means of incurring this expenditure. But the education obtained in these cramming colleges is not the highest species of education—that which is obtained at home by the example and conversation of good parents is by far the highest. You cannot compare for a moment the education which the sons of clergymen and officers get with the education obtained by the sons of rich grocers or linendrapers, who will be successful in these competitive examinations. Depend upon it this is a great and most injurious social revolution. I cannot view it in any other light. I look upon it as fraught with the greatest danger, and I do trust that the House of Commons, on reconsidering its present opinion, will be induced to acquiesce in this Amendment. I rejoice that for the present my noble Friend will insist upon the Amendment which he made in Committee, though that Amendment is not altogether satisfactory to me. I vote against the whole clause. I desire to maintain the Indian army as it is, to draw it altogether from the same sources, which are perennial founts of every thing that is noble, and everything that is virtuous. Can we desire to have men in the public service superior to those who have been derived from that source? It is now, too, when the scientific branches of the army have in the highest degree distinguished themselves and performed the greatest public services, that we are to change altogether the system by which appointments are made, to deprive them of the hope of being followed in the same noble career by their sons, to destroy their prospects of being able to provide for their families, and not only thus to injure them, but, as they must understand it, to inflict on them a great offence. These, my Lords, have always been my opinions, and it is impossible for me to refrain from expressing them.

The Earl of Ellenborough

Then it was resolved not to insist on their Lordships' Amendments on Clauses 27, 28, 29, 30, and 32; but to insist on their Amendment on Clause 34.

An Amendment made to the Bill; Committee appointed to prepare Reasons to be offered to the Commons, for the Lords insisting on some of their Amendments to the said Bill to which the Commons disagree; to meet immediately. The Committee reported Reasons prepared by them; agreed to; and Bill and Reasons returned to the Commons. The said Reasons are as follow :—

"The Lords insist upon their Amendment in page 11, line 6, for the following reason :—

"Because it is a Principle universally recognized that appointments to and Promotion in the Military Service of the Country should proceed directly from the Authority of the Crown; and it appears to be a Violation of this Principle to prescribe such Rules by Authority of Parliament as absolutely to fetter the Discretion of the Crown in the Exercise of this Prerogative, which, moreover, is distinctly admitted and confirmed by the Terms of the 33rd Clause of this Bill.

"The Lords insist upon their Amendment in page 17, line 8, for the following reason :—

"Because they believe that the Objections of the House of Commons are founded on a Misunderstanding of the Clause, and they have inserted an Amendment in the Clause which they believe will remove that Misunderstanding, the said Amendment being to insert in the original Bill the Words ("at the End of such Three Months") after the Word ("sitting") in page 17, line 9.

"With the preceding Exceptions, the Lords do not insist on their Amendments to which the Commons disagree."

CIVIL BILLS, &c. (IRELAND) ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

COMMITTEE. REPORT.

House in Committee (according to Order).

Bill reported without Amendment.

THE EARL OF ST. GERMANS objected to the clause which gave power to the Lord Lieutenant in Council to remove Assistant Barristers. Only those Members of the Council who were summoned would attend, so that the Lord Lieutenant, with two or three members of Council, might remove any assistant barrister. He did not see the necessity of the provision, and he hoped that his noble Friend would agree that it was not essentially necessary.

LORD CAMPBELL said, he quite concurred that only those members of the Council who were summoned would attend, because no member who was not summoned had a right to be present. The objection would have been got rid of if the power of removal had been vested in the hands of the Judicial Committee. The Lord Lieutenant in Council meant the Lord Lieutenant, associated with such two or three of his colleagues as he chose to summon. Instead of the Lord Lieutenant in Council, he thought a better tribunal would have been formed of the Lord Lieutenant, associated with those functionaries who formed the court of appeal under the Incumbered Estates Act.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE said, that there were some assistant barristers who were labouring under "permanent infirmity," and who were obliged to appoint deputies to perform their duties. The Bill gave these persons retiring pensions, and it enabled the Lord Lieutenant in Council to remove them if they did not resign. The assistant barristers would have the power of proving before the Privy Council that they were not labouring under permanent infirmity, and the clause as amended in the other House provided that all the members of the Privy Council resident in the county should be summoned to attend, and should receive notice of the business before them. He proposed to amend this clause by restricting the Privy Council to Members residing in Dublin and in the county in which the assistant barrister lived.

LORD CAMPBELL thought the explanation was sufficient.

LORD CRANWORTH thought it was a question whether they would not lower the position of assistant barristers by placing them on a different footing from that of the Judges of the superior courts. If assistant barristers were to be dismissed in this way, the question would be raised whether the same system should not be applied to others, and in that way great difficulties might arise.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY stated the case of Mr. Jemmett, the local Commissioner of Bankrupts, which he had brought before the House recently, and said that there might be a demand in such a case for a dismissal in a similar way. The facts in that case were not denied, but the learned Lord on the woolsack said he had no power to dismiss a Commissioner of Bankrupts, who could only be dismissed upon an Address of both Houses. If dismissal by a summary mode were instituted the practice would be carried still higher. In the other House of Parliament many questions had been raised about some Irish Judges, who could not, it was said, perform their duties, and yet would not resign until their political friends came into power.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE wished to point out that as long as an assistant barrister performed his duty no question would arise. The only object was to prevent the duties of assistant barristers being performed by deputies who were incompetent and irresponsible.

LORD CAMPBELL thought that the clause, as amended, would provide a tribunal which might be implicitly trusted.

Amendment agreed to; and Bill to be read 3ª To-morrow.

THE QUEEN'S COLLEGE, CORK, NOTICE OF MOTION WITHDRAWN.

THE EARL OF ST. GERMANS, who had a notice on the paper for the production of a letter written by him to Lord Palmerston in 1853, respecting the Queen's College at Cork, said he had put his notice on the paper in consequence of a passage in the Report of the Commissioners on the Queen's Colleges in Ireland, which imputed blame to the Government with which he was connected with respect to certain dissensions that then prevailed. On reconsideration, however, he thought it better not to make the Motion, as he found that the letter to which it referred contained animadversions on the conduct of certain parties, which it would not be beneficial to the public service to publish. He could assure their Lordships that when he was in Ireland nothing engaged his attention more than the condition of this college. He was in constant communication with Sir John Young, the Chief Secretary, with the Lord Chancellor, and with the Attorney General, and he took no step in the matter without the concurrence of those eminent persons. Had the more energetic and decisive action which the Commissioners seemed to recommend been adopted at that time, it would, he was convinced, have produced very injurious consequences to the college, by causing the secession either of that distinguished scientific man, Sir Robert Kay, or of the Vice President and many members of the colleges. He did not wish to impute any blame to the Commissioners, and was convinced that if they had seen papers which he was quite willing to show to them they would have come to a conclusion different from that at which they had arrived.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, that not having seen the Report of the Commissioners, he could form no judgment upon the merits of the case; but if that Report contained anything which the noble Earl thought reflected upon his conduct, nothing could be more natural than that he should take the earliest opportunity of setting himself right with their Lordships and the public. Under the circumstances he thought that the noble Earl had shown equally good judgment and good feeling in not pressing for the production of a letter some portions of which might have been injurious to the feelings of others.

House adjourned at a Quarter past Nine o'clock, 'till To-morrow. Half-past Two o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, July 29, 1858.

OPERATIONS IN INDIA.

MR. SPEAKER acquainted the House that he had received two letters from Viscount Canning, Governor General of India, dated the 14th and 16th days of June last, enclosing copies of letters from the Hon. F. J. Halliday, Lieutenant Governor of Bengal, and Major General Sir James Outram, acknowledging the Thanks of this House for their services relative to operations in India, expressed in the Resolutions of the 16th day of March and the 8th day of February last.

Letters read, as follow:—

"Allahabad, the 14th June, 1858.

"Sir—With reference to my Despatch dated the 11th ultimo, I have the honour to enclose for your information, the accompanying Copy of a letter from the Hon. F. J. Halliday, Lieutenant Governor of Bengal, expressing his gratitude for the testimony of approbation which his services have received from the House of Commons, in the Resolutions passed by the House on the 16th March last. I have the honour to be, Sir,

Your most obedient, Servant,

CANNING."

"To the Right Hon. John Evelyn Denison, Speaker of the House of Commons."

(Copy.)

"Allipore, 27th May, 1858.

"My Lord,—I have had the honour to receive your Lordship's letter of the 11th instant, forwarding to me the Copy of a Resolution of the House of Commons, dated 16th March, 1858, on the subject of my share in carrying into effect the measures directed by your Lordships, as Governor General of India, in Council, for the suppression of the mutiny in the Bengal Army.

"I am greatly honoured by the testimony of approbation which my very humble services have obtained from the House of Commons, and I desire to express my gratitude for it, and at the same time to thank your Lordship for the manner which the Resolution has been communicated to me in your Lordship's letter.—I have, &c.,

"(Sd.) FRED. JAS. HALLIDAY.

"The Right Hon. Viscount Canning,

"Governor General of India, &c., &c., &c."

"Allahabad, 16th June, 1858.

"Sir,—In continuation of my Despatch, dated the 14th instant, I have the honour to enclose for your information the accompanying Copy of a letter from Major General Sir James Outram, G.C.B., expressing his grateful sense of the honour conferred upon him by the approbation which his services have received from the House of Commons in the Resolution passed by the House on the 8th February last. I have the honour to be, Sir, your most obedient servant, "CANNING.

"To the Right Hon. John Evelyn Denison,
"Speaker of the House of Commons."

(Copy.)

"Calcutta, 30th May, 1858.

"My Lord,—I have had the honour to receive your Lordship's letter of the 11th instant, forwarding to me a copy of the Resolution of the House of Commons, passed on the 8th February, 1858, relative to the performance of the duties which devolved on me while humbly contributing, under the instructions of your Lordship and His Excellency the Commander in Chief, towards the suppression of the disturbances which originated in the mutiny of the Bengal Army.

"It will ever be esteemed by me the greatest of honours that my humble services should have received the approbation of the House of Commons. And I trust your Lordship will do me the favour to acknowledge in my behalf, and in suitable terms, my profound and grateful sense of the high honour which has been conferred on me.

"For the very kind and flattering manner in which your Lordship has been pleased to communicate to me the Resolution of the House of Commons, I beg to tender my respectful and most grateful acknowledgments. I have, &c.,

"(Sd.) "J. OUTRAM, Major General.

"To the Right Hon. the Viscount Canning, Governor General of India."

Mr. Speaker also acquainted the House, that it appeared from a private letter from Viscount Canning to himself, dated Allahabad, May 11th, 1858, that he had transmitted by that day's mail a letter conveying his own acknowledgments of the thanks of this House; but that the letter alluded to had not reached his hands.

RELIGIOUS BIGOTRY IN FERNANDO PO.

QUESTION.

MR. STAPLETON said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he is in receipt of intelligence to the effect that a Spanish Governor of Fernando Po has issued a Proclamation forbidding schools and prohibiting any person from going to any church or chapel except a Roman Catholic one; and further, whether Fernando Po, which was an English Military Station from 1827 to 1834, is now recognized by England as part of the dominions of the Crown of Spain.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, that he would, in the first instance, reply to the latter part of the hon. Gentleman's question. Fernando Po was not an English military station from 1827 to 1834. It had never belonged to England, nor did England claim any jurisdiction or authority there. It was in 1778 ceded by Portugal to Spain, and had since been recognized as a Spanish possession by Lord Palmerston and the Earl of Aberdeen, both of whom had been in treaty with Spain for the purchase of it, considering that its possession by this country would be desirable in reference to our operations against the Slave Trade. With respect to the first question, Her Majesty's Government had received intelligence that on the 27th May last the newly appointed Spanish Governor of Fernando Po issued a Proclamation stating that the religion of the colony was that of the Roman Catholic Church; and that no other religion would be tolerated or allowed but that taught by the missionaries of the Roman Catholic Church, nor any schools but Roman Catholic Schools; and that persons who professed any other religion but the Roman Catholic should confine their religious worship and practices to their own houses. That Proclamation was under the consideration of her Majesty's Government, as it appeared to them to be contrary to a Proclamation issued in 1843 by a former Governor, by which security to liberty in person, property, and religion was accorded to all who obeyed the laws of the colony.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

QUESTION.

MR. JOHN LOCKE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether any information has reached Her Majesty's Government in respect to the inaccurate state of the Copies of Exchequer Standards of Weights and Measures used by Inspectors and Leet and Annoyance Juries; and, if so, whether it is their intention to adopt any means to enforce a periodical adjustment of the same.

MR. WALPOLE in reply said, that he had made inquiries on the subject, and he did not find that any information had reached the Home Office in reference to the inaccurate state of the Copies of Exchequer Standards of Weights and Measures. Under the Constabulary Act the Chief Constables were intrusted with power to ascertain the propriety of the Standards used, and he found that the Chief Constable of Leicestershire had in the first six months verified and stamped 18,000 weights and measures. According to the Police Returns of 1857 the Police had proceeded against 1,655 persons, and 1,555 had been convicted. He would endeavour to obtain the information desired by the hon. Member if it were more particularly specified.

DELAYED RETURNS.
QUESTION.

MR. RICH said, he rose to ask the Secretary to the Treasury what causes have prevented the presentation of Returns of all persons who, having been nominated for junior situations in any of Her Majesty's Civil Establishments, subsequent to the date of the Order in Council of the 21st day of May, 1855, and not having obtained certificates of qualification from the Civil Service Commissioners, have been employed, and paid for such employment, in such establishments; distinguishing, in each case, under separate columns, the name of the establishment, the name of the person employed, the nature of his situation, whether temporary or permanent, the period of his employment, the amount of his pay, the authority under which such pay has been issued and allowed, and whether the person failed to obtain a certificate of qualification, or did not present himself for examination before the Civil Service Commissioners. And of all persons who having obtained certificates of qualification from the Civil Service Commissioners have been employed and paid for a period prior to the date of such certificate, and subsequent to the date of the Order in Council of the 21st day of May, 1855; distinguishing, in each case, under separate columns, the name of the establishment, the name of the person employed, the nature of his situation, whether temporary or permanent, the period of his employment, the amount of his pay, the authority under which such pay has been issued and allowed, and the date of the certificate of qualification, ordered on the 13th day of April?

MR. G. A. HAMILTON said, he must beg to explain that the cause of the delay was that reference had to be made to all the various Departments of the State for the information required; but the papers were nearly ready, and would be produced almost immediately.

PUBLIC HEALTH BILL.
LORDS' AMENDMENTS.

Order for consideration of Lords' Amendments read.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That the said Amendments be now taken into consideration."

MR. T. DUNCOMBE said, he must complain that they had not the Amendments of the Lords before them before they were called upon to consider them. The Bill was far from a good one as it was sent up from the Commons, and, as he understood, it had come back far worse. He believed one of the Amendments made by the Lords was to give a power to appoint a medical council or a medical officer permanently. As the Bill left that House, it provided that that appointment should be temporary only; but the word "temporary" had been struck out. Another Amendment was a violation of an arrangement made between the Government and the opponents of the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Adderley) would remember that on condition that the Bill should expire on the 1st of August, he (Mr. T. Duncombe) consented to waive his opposition to the Bill. But the Lords, by their Amendments, had given a two years' life to the Bill. The Bill was a bad one; at all events no inconvenience would follow from its postponement till another Session, and he therefore would move that the Lords' Amendments be considered that day six weeks.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six weeks."

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

MR. PALK said, he quite agreed that the Bill was a bad one; indeed, he thought it the worst Bill that had ever been brought in. The faith of the Government was pledged that the Bill should only continue for one year, and the adoption of the Lords' Amendments therefore would be a violation of that pledge. It was also clearly understood that no power should be taken in the Bill for the permanent appointment of a medical council. If they were to have a paid medical Board, let them know what the duties of that Board were to be. He, for one, saw no necessity for even one medical officer, and certainly it was unnecessary to keep a medical Board attached to the Board of Health, with salaries of £1,500 a year, to make an annual report.

MR. ADDERLEY said, he understood that the ground for the omission of the word "temporary" after "from time to time" was, that it was simple tautology. As the Bill stood, there was no power to appoint more than one medical officer. The Bill merely defined his duties. The Amendments made in the other House were three, two of which were verbal only, and the last was for continuing the Act to the end of next Session. As, however, this was a longer period than the time fixed upon by the House of Commons, and his hon. Friend and the House appeared to consider it a violation of the arrangement entered into, he proposed that as to that Amendment the House should disagree to it.

MR. COX said, that the effect of another of the Amendments, which the right hon. Gentleman stated to be a mere verbal one, made the appointment of the medical officer a permanent one. He therefore considered the word "temporary" necessary.

MR. WALPOLE remarked, that the Act being only a temporary one, no permanent appointment could be made under it. The one paid medical officer which the Act authorized them to appoint could therefore hold the appointment only for the year to which the operation of the Bill would be limited.

MR. W. WILLIAMS complained of the practice of calling upon the House to agree to Amendments made by the Lords, without those Amendments being previously printed and placed in the hands of Members.

MR. WALPOLE said, he believed the usual practice was, that when there was no opposition anticipated to the Amendments, for the hon. Member who had charge of the Bill to give notice to move the consideration of those Amendments on a certain day; but when opposition was expected, then the practice was to print the Amendments.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Amendments considered; several agreed to; and one disagreed to.

Reason for disagreeing to one of the Lords' Amendments reported, and agreed to.

To be communicated to the Lords.

MEDICAL PRACTITIONERS BILL.

LORDS' AMENDMENTS.

Order for Consideration of Lords' Amendments read.

MR. COWPER said, that all the Amendments were verbal, with two exceptions. The first of these was a clause introduced by the House of Lords for the protection of homœopathists. Recently, the officers of the University of Aberdeen, in examining a candidate, asked whether, if he obtained his degree, he was prepared utterly and solemnly to renounce the practice of homœopathy. The candidate declined to give such a pledge, and a clause had been introduced in the other House, providing that if any college of physicians or surgeons, or any university, should impose any tests or conditions upon any person who presented himself for examination, the Privy Council should be empowered to issue an order restricting the degrees or diplomas of such body from entitling any person to be registered under this Act so long as those conditions were maintained. The other Amendment related to the registration fee, which it proposed to make £5 in the case of persons becoming entitled to registration after the passing of the Act, and £2 in the case of persons already entitled.

LORD ELCHO said, that he wished to say, before the Bill left the House, that he believed the measure to be, on the whole, a very liberal one. The subject had for thirty years been under the consideration of Parliament, and if they had now succeeded in passing a good Bill into a law it would, in a great degree, be owing to the just and conciliatory spirit displayed by the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary.

MR. BRADY said, he wished to express his belief that the conduct of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary deserved the warmest thanks of the profession, who, he was sure, would reward with gratitude the efforts of the right hon. Gentleman to settle a question which had puzzled so many statesmen for the last quarter of a century.

Lords' Amendments agreed to.

EDUCATION.—PAPERS MOVED FOR.

MR. COWPER said, that he rose to move an Address for copy of correspondence between the Committee of the Privy Council on Education and the Managers of Schools and Her Majesty's Inspectors of Schools, relating to the distribution, publication, and preparation of the annual Reports of the Inspectors. He wished to take that opportunity of stating that certain circulars had recently been issued by the Committee of Privy Council, which had excited a considerable degree of alarm and dismay amongst the promoters of many schools in the country, and he thought it desirable that the House should have full information as to what the contents of those circulars were. It appeared that one order had been sent to the managers of schools with reference to the tabulated reports, and the statements of the Inspectors of what they had observed in reference to the buildings, playgrounds, furniture, organization, instruction, and general proficiency of those schools. Hitherto the promoters of schools had had, in addition to the condensed report on their own school, access to what were called the "tabulated" reports as to other schools within their districts, and this had had the very best effect in stimulating the exertions of the promoters by enabling them to compare their own schools with others in the neighbourhood, and to ascertain in what respect they differed on the score of efficiency of management. Now, the impression prevailed that the circular of the Committee of the Privy Council, to which he referred, proposed the discontinuance of the "tabulated" reports, and if that proposal arose from economical considerations, he should say that economy had never been more unfortunately misplaced, as the only cost was that of printing 1,600 pages. He hoped that whatever might be the nature of the circular, it would not be persevered in so far as to prevent masters of schools from having access hereafter to the printed tabulated reports of all schools in their districts. Another circular had also been sent out by the Committee which had created a good deal of dissatisfaction among the Inspectors; but upon that he (Mr. Cowper) would not venture to offer an opinion. No doubt the right hon. Gentleman would place the circular and the correspondence upon the table, and the House would then have an opportunity of ascertaining the exact bearing of the orders which had been issued.

MR. ADDERLEY said, he felt obliged to the right hon. Gentleman for proposing a Motion which would enable him in a few words to remove a considerable amount of misapprehension which had gone through the country upon the subject of the circular which had recently emanated from the Committee of Council on Education, to the Inspectors throughout the kingdom. There were not, however, two circulars, as the right hon. Gentleman seemed to think, but one relating to the two subjects that the right hon. Gentleman had alluded to. It was a complete misapprehension on the part of the right hon. Gentleman to suppose that there was any intention on the part of the Committee of Council in that circular to suppress or even to discontinue the printing of the reports of the Inspectors; nor was there any primary idea or notion in it of economising the expense of printing. What the circular proposed was, in distinct terms, the continuance of similar instructions which had been given to the Inspectors by every Committee of Council during the last fifteen years; and the tenor of the circular amounted to this —that the annual Reports, in the first place, should be henceforth embodied in one Report from the Committee of Council on Education addressed to Her Majesty in Council, but that in the embodiment of the several Reports in that Report of the Committee, the individuality of each Inspector's Report should be by no means lost, that the process should be by the excision of such matters as the Committee conceived to be unnecessary, and not of the nature of a bona fide Report, but by no means the fusion of the Individual Inspector's Report in the one made by the Committee themselves. The only object which it was sought by means of the circular to attain was, in short, of a character precisely similar to that which the correspondence of the Education Office proved to have been kept in view for many years, and it was an important one, to restrict those Reports within proper limits, and also to restrain the pamphleteering tendency which those Reports had assumed. With regard to the "tabulated" Reports, the circular made a proposition which he (Mr. Adderley) thought was of great value and importance—namely, that the Reports of individual schools, instead of being kept waiting until the end of the year to be put together in the form of an annual summary, should be at once addressed in detail and in manuscript to each school immediately after its inspection. The Report of a school at twelve months' date was absolutely valueless, either in the way of encouragement to a good teacher or of warning to a bad; but if that Report came came within seven days of the inspection, it would be of great efficiency for both those purposes. He hoped he had now made clear what was the intention of the circular which, after mature reflection, and a correspondence which was not yet closed, the Committee had seen no reason to alter. He again thanked the right hon. Gentleman for having given him an opportunity, before the termination of the Session, to explain away the misapprehension which was entertained with regard to the suppression or discontinuance, or even the fusion of the Reports. As to the right hon. Gentleman's Motion, the memorials which had come in were already very bulky, and not all upon the point which the right hon. Gentleman wished to have explained; and if the right hon. Gentleman would consent to insert the words "or extracts" after the word "copy," and upon the understanding that the correspondence was not yet closed, but other memorials were expected from other inspectors which had not yet come in, he was perfectly willing to accede to the Motion.

MR. COWPER said, he would assent to the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman.

Address for—

"Copy or Extracts of Correspondence between the Committee of the Privy Council on Education and the Managers of Schools and Her Majesty's Inspectors of Schools, relating to the distribution, publication, and preparation of the Annual Reports of the Inspectors."

Motion agreed to.

COLLECTORS OF THE REVENUE.
RETURN MOVED FOR.

MR. INGRAM said, he rose to move for a Return of the number of persons employed in collecting the taxes paid into the Exchequer, distinguishing the number employed for the land, assessed, property, and income tax, and those employed in the Excise Department of the Inland Revenue, and the number employed in collecting the Customs dues. The Motion was unopposed, but he hoped he might be allowed to take the opportunity of saying that the system of collecting the revenue was in a very unsatisfactory condition. In every parish there were several persons employed in collecting the revenue, apparently without any regular system or control. He trusted that Her Majesty's Government would take the subject into their consideration.

Return ordered,—

"Of the number of Persons employed in collecting the Taxes paid into the Exchequer, distinguishing the number employed for the Land, Assessed, Property, and Income Tax, and those employed in the Excise Department of the Inland Revenue, and the number employed in collecting the Customs Dues."

Motion agreed to.

House adjourned at a quarter before Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, July 30, 1858.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1ª Bankruptcy and Liquidation, 1858.

3ª Militia Pay; Militia (Service Abroad) Act Continuance; Militia Act Continuance (No. 2); Corrupt Practices Prevention Act Continuance; Judgments (Ireland) Act Amendment; Civil Bills, &c., (Ireland) Act Amendment; Consolidated Fund (Appropriation).

LEGAL REFORMS—GRAND AND COMMON JURIES.—NOTICES.

LORD CAMPBELL said, he wished to give notice of two Bills that he proposed to bring in at the commencement of the next Session of Parliament, and he made this announcement with the view of drawing public attention to the subject, and in the hope that he might have advice and assistance in framing the measures, which advice and assistance he should most respectfully and gratefully acknowledge. The object of the first measure was to prevent the practice of clandestinely going before a grand jury and preferring bills of indictment for perjury, conspiracy, and other offences, without any inquiry before a magistrate in the presence of the party accused, who ought to have an opportunity of defending himself. The practice had sprung up of going at once before a grand jury and preferring bills of indictment for conspiracy, perjury, and for obtaining money under false pretences, for which charges there was not the slightest foundation; and grand juries were sometimes induced, behind the back of a party, to find a bill, upon which a warrant was obtained, and the party was imprisoned until his trial, or until he found bail. Under this Bill there would be no such prosecutions without appearance before a magistrate, or the consent of a Judge. The other Bill he proposed was, to deal with a rule which had existed from time immemorial, and it was a matter which he approached with very great diffidence. The rule he referred to was that which required the unanimous verdict of a jury. He had of late experienced great inconvenience on this subject. Jurors were very different in their minds, and they sometimes would not defer, not merely to the Judge, but even to the opinion of the large majority of their own body. What he should propose was this—not that they should be governed by a bare majority, but that if, after certain deliberation by the jury, they all agreed except one or two of them, then the verdict of those who so agreed should be considered as tantamount to a verdict of the whole twelve—still subject, of course, to be reviewed by the Court, and to be set aside if necessary. In several cases lately before him, there had been only one or two discontents, and he had been obliged to discharge the juries. The law was very defective on this subject, and he proposed to introduce a Bill to remedy the defect which he had pointed out, by allowing the opinion of the great majority of the jury to be acted on.

ST. PAUL'S CHURCH-YARD.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF HARRINGTON: My Lords, in passing by St. Paul's this morning, I saw a triangular piece of ground on the east end of the churchyard, placarded "To be let on a building lease." Supposing this barbarous measure carried out, it would mask the only fine view of two sides of the noblest temple ever raised for the worship of God. I, therefore, give notice that, on a future day, I shall put the following question to Her Majesty's Government:—

"The Earl of Harrington to put a question to Her Majesty's Government, concerning a plot of ground at the east end of Saint Paul's Churchyard, which is advertised and placarded to be built on, which, if carried out, will mask a fine angular view of two sides of that magnificent building."

After having put this question on the Record of the House, I learnt from Mr. Richardson, the distinguished architect engaged on my Brompton estate, that great efforts had been made by artists and others to prevent these buildings being erected, but that all appeals had proved hopeless, for the estimated value of the plot of ground was £60,000; and one acre of land opposite the Bank of England had been estimated at £1,000,000 sterling. I said it mattered not, for the Corporation, with a noble generosity, had given up a portion of the said ground in front of the Exchange, and the country would not allow St. Paul's to be bricked up. I allowed this question to remain on the Notices of the House for some days, in order that it might command the attention of the House and the country that, on the 28th July, I would put the question to the Prime Minister.

THE EARL OF DERBY rose and said, I entirely concur with the noble Earl in his wish to prevent these buildings from being raised, but the land was valued at £60,000, and I have no power to stop their erection.

THE EARL OF HARRINGTON: The remarks made by the noble Earl on the mere announcement of my intention to put the question were very discouraging. I am aware, indeed, of the great sacrifice the Corporation was called on to make, but I feel confident, first, because I know the magic power and influence possessed by the noble Earl; and secondly, because from experience I anticipate that the Corporation is ever ready to make great sacrifices for the public good. I hope, therefore, that the noble Lord will not consider me presumptuous in putting the question on the day announced. Just previous to my putting the question on the 28th of July, the Earl of Derby had the kindness to place a plan in my hands, and told me that the Corporation had agreed to make a great sacrifice, namely, to build only on one half of the open space, so that a fine angular view of both sides of the Cathedral might be seen from the unoccupied spot. Having been privately and unexpectedly favoured by this communication, I shall limit my remarks.

My Lords, agreeable to notice given, I now venture to put a question to Her Majesty's Government. I solicit the noble Earl of Derby's powerful influence to prevent a piece of Ground at the East end of St. Paul's Church Yard, from being built on, and thereby securing the only fine view of the most sublime Temple ever raised to the glory of God and of our Protestant faith—for there it is that the open Bible reigns and universal charity is preached. I do well remember many years back, passing St. Paul's Cathedral in company with the famous Marquess of Hastings. He told me that Charles Fox had intended to have moved Parliament to pull down a part of the buildings on the Thames side of St. Paul's, but that a change in the administration had prevented it. My Lords, the thoughts of illustrious men should be recorded in history, fixed in our memories, and acted on. I call, therefore, on the noble Marquess of Lansdowne, the friend of Charles Fox, to assist me in this work. Depend upon it, nothing would so much tend to embellish London; and to promote religion and the arts, as the opening of St. Paul's to the constant gaze of three millions of its inhabitants. I have seen many fine buildings—St. Peter's, at Rome; the Domo, at Milan; the Cathedral, at Cologne; the lovely Targe, in British India; and at Athens, the noble Parthenon; but after all, St. Paul's is the wonder of the world. To preserve the fame of the great dead is a sacred duty. Now, Sir Christopher Wren was one of the foremost men this country ever produced ; not inferior to Michael Angelo, as scholar, mathematician, architect, and artist of high classical taste. We are, therefore, bound to protect the fine monument he has erected to immortalize his fame.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, that he had applied to the Lord Mayor to ask what was about to be done in this matter. He had been favoured by his Lordship with a plan from which it appeared that only half the site to which the noble Earl referred was to be built upon ; and as the building to be erected would have a semi-circular front, the view of the cathedral would be very little interfered with. He thought that great credit was due to the Corporation of London for their conduct in this matter. The piece of ground in question had cost them £90,000 ; and by surrendering one half of it, with the advantage of a double frontage to St. Paul's and Cannon Street, they had sacrificed no less than £45,000 to £50,000 for the public convenience.

PRIVATE BILLS—THE STANDING ORDERS

STANDING ORDERS AMENDED.

Order of the Day for taking into consideration the Standing Orders relative to Private Bills, in order to their being amended, read.

LORD REDESDALE proposed several new Orders which he believed would economize both time and money, and facilitate the progress of bonâ fide schemes through Parliament, while they would afford ample security to the public, and to all persons concerned.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY expressed his approbation generally of the proposed Orders, which he believed were in conformity with the recommendations of a Committee of their Lordships' House.

LORD CAMPBELL hoped there was nothing in the Amendments to confirm the doctrine lately stated by a noble Friend of his in the other House (Lord John Russell), that the House of Commons was the Supreme Power in the State, simply because it possessed the power of the purse. It might as well be said that the Crown was the supreme Power, because it could make war and peace, and could cede the Isle of Wight to the Emperor of the French if it chose ; or that their Lordships were, because in their judicial capacity they could rule that the second son, and not the first, was the heir to his father.

Motion agreed to.

Amendments made accordingly.

BARONIES IN ABEYANCE.

LORD REDESDALE, in calling the attention of the House to the return of Baronies called out of abeyance presented on the 19th instant, said, he considered this subject one well deserving of the consideration of their Lordships. There were, he believed, considerably more than 100 Baronies now in abeyance. Of late years it had been the practice for persons claiming Baronies that were in abeyance to present petitions praying that their claim might be investigated, in the hope that if they made out a clear case of their descent from the female co-heir, the Crown would exercise its prerogative by determining the abeyance in their favour. The question was one of great importance in relation to the judicial business of that House. The investigations extended over a long period, an immense amount of evidence was produced, and a large portion of time was occupied to the prejudice of suitors. The practice of calling peerages out of abeyance was far from being an ancient one, and no precedent is to be found for it under any of the Plantagenet or Tudor Sovereigns. The first case occurred in the reign of James I., being that of the Barony De Spenser, in 1604, when this prerogative was exercised in furtherance of a gross job. In that instance, the proceedings were of a very singular character. The Lord Abergavenny died, leaving an only daughter, and the question arose whether the title descended to this lady or to the heir male. The opinion of the Judges was certainly in favour of the descent to heirs general. The House of Lords, unwilling to separate the title from the estates, and from the family of Neville which had long held it, addressed the Crown, stating that they considered both worthy of the Peerage, and suggesting that the Barony of De Spenser might be called out of abeyance in favour of one. The King acceded to the proposition, and, by vote of the House, the Barony of Abergavenny was assigned to the heir male, and the Barony of De Spenser to the heir general; but so little was any principle of law attended to in this case, that the House might have arranged the other way, had it been pleased so to vote. In the reign of Charles the First one Barony was called out of abeyance ; in that of Charles the Second, two; in that of George the Second, two ; in that of George the Third, eight; in that of George the Fourth, one ; in that of William the Fourth, two—Berners and Clifford. In the present reign seven Baronies had been already called out of abeyance —only one less than the number called out during the whole of the long reign of George the Third. The number from the commencement of the practice down to the present day was only twenty-four. No one could be more sensible than he was of the advantage of ancient names to the peerage, and he believed all their Lordships rejoiced when the title of Earl of Shrewsbury was restored to a great historical name. Little objection can be urged to the practice when exercised in favour of Baronies which have for centuries been represented in the House, and which have only been in abeyance for a limited period. But the case assumed a different aspect when they had under consideration Baronies of very ancient date, which had for a long time been without any representative in that House, and the very names of which were unknown except to antiquaries and persons who took a special interest in such matters. The result was, perhaps, that the person in whose favour the abeyance was terminated was placed in a position in relation to the old Baronies which appeared hardly fair, their Lordships being, of course, aware that in the reign of Henry VIII. the long contest on the subject of precedence was decided by an Act of Parliament, declaring that precedence should be determined by the order of creation. The Grandison peerage, the claim to which had recently been decided, was in abeyance for 482 years. Only two of these Lord Grandisons ever sat in Parliament—the last in the reign of Edward the Third. The Lord Grandison who is known historically in the time of Charles I., and of whom such an interesting character is given by Clarendon, was an Irish Viscount of the Villiers family, whose title still exists in his collateral relative, the Earl of Jersey. If this abeyance should be terminated, the effect would be that the Lord Grandison entering the House as the third Peer ever summoned in right of that Barony, would sit before the 18th Lord Stourton, the 19th Lord Clinton, the 21st Lord Grey de Ruthyn, and the 22nd Lord Dacre. He would not detain their Lordships with any further remarks. At that period of the Session he would not ask their Lordships to take any positive step. It was, indeed, matter for consideration whether any step should be taken, and whether they should not look to the effect which discussion might produce on claimants.

Lord Redesdale

The noble Lord, having moved that the Return of all Baronies called out of abeyance to the present time, stating the number of years the abeyance had continued in each case, and the date of the termination of the same, delivered on the 19th instant, be printed (which was agreed to), gave notice of his intention to move next Session the following Address to Her Majesty relative to Peerages that have been in abeyance for a long period of years, in order that it might appear on the Minutes, and the House have an opportunity of considering the subject, without pledging himself to bring it forward:—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, showing,

"That within the last century several Petitions have been presented to the Crown by Persons claiming to be Co-heirs of Peerages for many hundred years in abeyance; which Petitions have, according to ancient custom, been referred to the House of Lords to report thereon:

"That the laborious investigations consequent on such reference necessarily occupy much of the time which would otherwise be devoted to the Judicial Business of the House, which is thereby interrupted to the inconvenience of the Lords and with injury to the Suitors:

"That until the period referred to the Peerages called out of abeyance were few in number, and only in favour of Persons inheriting through immediate and well-known descent from the former holders of the said Peerages; whereas, in many cases of later date, that inheritance, from the long duration of the abeyance, has become remote, indirect, and generally unknown, until proved by the evidence brought before the House:

"That the earliest precedent to be found for calling a Peerage out of abeyance is neither very ancient nor altogether free from the objection which necessarily attaches to any act done for the first time to meet a particular case, being that of the Barony of De Spencer, the abeyance of which was terminated by King James the First in 1604, in order to carry out the amicable arrangement suggested by the House of Lords for the purpose of relieving themselves from the duty of deciding in favour of One of the Two Claimants of the Barony of Abergavenny:

"That an undue precedence appears to be given to the person in whose favour an abeyance for many generations is terminated over other barons of ancient descent inheriting their titles through a long series of ancestors; thus, in the first case referred to, when in 1764 an abeyance of 358 years was terminated, The Lord Botetourt then summoned sat as Third Lord only of that name, and yet took precedence before the Seventeenth Lord Audley and the Fifteenth Lord Stourton:

"And humbly praying Her Majesty, that Her Majesty will be graciously pleased to consider whether it is expedient to adhere to the established custom of referring all Petitions of Persons claiming Peerages to the House of Lords in any case in which it shall appear from such Petitions, or any Report of the Attorney General thereon, that the Peerage claimed is in abeyance, and has been so for more than Years; and that Her Majesty may be further graciously pleased to act in relation to such Peerages in such manner as may appear expedient to Her Majesty:"

LORD CAMPBELL said, that the only remedy seemed to be to declare that after a peerage had been for a certain number of years in abeyance it should not be claimed. Otherwise right must be done; and their Lordships could not refuse a claimant his rights by saying that it was inconvenient to do him justice. He did not think the rights of the peerage would be impaired if it were laid down that a peerage should be no longer claimed after it had been 100 years in abeyance; but the only way to make Baronies in abeyance unclaimable would be to pass an Act of Parliament for that purpose.

TELEGRAPHIC COMMUNICATION WITH INDIA.—QUESTION.

LORD WODEHOUSE, in rising, pursuant to notice, to ask Her Majesty's Government their intentions respecting the establishment of telegraphic communication with India, said, that three distinct lines of communication had been proposed, in what he might call the western portion of the line, of which he would only say that many of the objections originally made to the line from Ragusa to Corfu and Alexandria seemed to have been removed, if he rightly understood the last proposal made by Her Majesty's Government to the Austrian Government. In his opinion it was desirable that as many of these lines should be constructed as possible in order that we might have several independent means of communication with India. In the Eastern portions of the route our choice seemed to lie between two lines—one from Bussora to Kurrachee, and the other along the line of the Red Sea. The efficiency of the first depended upon the Turkish Government, and he was not convinced that it would be a satisfactory mode of communication with India, the main objection being that the line was at the mercy of the Arabs who inhabited the wild country through which it passed. It was said that the telegraph was carried through districts in India where the tribes were quite as wild, but there was a great difference between the Governments of Turkey and India. It was true that the safety of this line might perhaps be secured by subsidizing the Arab tribes, and if the line were being made by an English company, the Arabs might have been subsidized by them; but at present the Turkish Government were constructing the line, which would therefore be an object of jealousy to the Arabs, and the Ottoman Government might not have the influence necessary to maintain it. If the Turkish Government could succeed in making the line, it was very desirable that it should be constructed; yet, of the two, the line by way of the Red Sea seemed most likely to form an efficient mode of communication with India. The objections were principally of an engineering character. [A noble LORD: Jeddah?] The Arabs on the Red Sea might be unfriendly, but the line would be carried along the bottom of the sea. The engineering difficulties in the Red Sea being surmounted, he believed there would be no great difficulty in carrying the line from the south-east end of the Peninsula to Kurrachee or Bombay, and this he had no doubt would be the most satisfactory and secure mode of communicating with India. The question was, how this line was to be made? He believed that the proper course would be for the Government to make it at the public expense. They would then hold in their hands the key of the communication between India and Europe. It was not very creditable to the energy and enterprise of this country and of the Government that, at a time when telegraphic communication with India was of vital importance to the interests of this country, not only was no line in course of construction, but no project had been adopted which promised the speedy execution of a line of telegraphic communication; and he wished to know what were the intentions of the Government with regard to such communications.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE said, he quite agreed with the noble Lord in the importance of the subject, but he was unable to give him any special information that had not been already laid before Parliament. It was, no doubt, desirable that as many lines should be made as possible, but it was important that there should be one line, and the question was, which line of telegraphic communication with India could be secured in the shortest time. When the line of the Austrian Government from Ragusa to Alexandria should be completed there would be a telegraphic communication from London to Suez, because a line now existed between Alexandria and Suez. Unfortunately the Government had not been able to make an arrangement with the Austrian Government with regard to this line. There were some points in dispute between the two Governments, and no absolute agreement had yet been come to. The telegraphic communication between Constantinople and Bussorah was to be made by an English Company, which had obtained the consent and support of the Ottoman Government. He admitted that portions of the line might be exposed to the attacks of hostile Arabs; but he believed that between Constantinople and Mosul no such difficulties would be encountered. The danger lay between Mosul and Bagdad, from the latter of which places it was intended to carry the telegraph in the bed of the Tigris to Bussorah, and thence by a submarine cable through the Persian Gulf to Kurrachee. For his own part, he was disposed to think that the route by the Persian Gulf was preferable to that by the Red Sea. In the first place, it was much shorter; and the experience with the Atlantic cable hardly warranted the anticipation that a submarine line could be laid down for so great a length as that of the Red Sea. In addition to this the depth of water in that sea was very various, and its bed was full of coral reefs. The Persian Gulf presented none of these difficulties. There were no great inequalities of bottom, and no coral reefs; and the gulf was studded with islands, on which, as they were under the authority of our ally the Imaum of Muscat, we might easily establish repeating stations, and over which the telegraph might be carried on poles—an advantage which we should not possess in the Red Sea. There was under the consideration of the Government another project—namely, to lay a submarine cable from the southern coast of England to Gibraltar, from Gibraltar to Malta, and thence to Alexandria, so that the whole line might be under our own control. This was a subsidiary project, and one which could not be expected to be carried out immediately; but, under all the circumstances, we should, within a reasonable period, have established telegraphic communication between London and Bombay and Calcutta.

LORD STRATFORD DE REDCLIFFE was understood to say, that the importance of having a telegraphic communication with India was so great that it did not require any observation to prove it. It was very satisfactory to find that it was in the contemplation of the Government to give every encouragement and offer every facility to parties promoting this object, and that would in the end be greatly for the advantage of the Government. The object most desirable was that this country should possess a telegraphic communication with India which should be quite independent of every other country, and which should not be subject to disturbances that might possibly take place. As to the line suggested to be constructed through the Austrian territories, he was afraid the noble Earl (the Earl of Donoughmore) had not taken into consideration some of the circumstances and difficulties connected with that line. Upon the whole, it appeared to him, from having had some acquaintance with the circumstances, that the Government should encourage the project for a telegraphic communication to India by way of the Red Sea as well as by way of Constantinople.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, that if he was rightly informed, the Directors of the East India Company had consented to take under their own management the construction of the submarine line from Bussorah to Kurrachee, and probably the new Indian Government would adopt a similar course. For his own part, he was inclined to think that, notwithstanding the danger from the Arabs, which there was reason to hope would be diminished by the presence at Bagdad of so energetic a governor as Omar Pasha, the line by the Persian Gulf would be the best of those proposed. At the same time he agreed with the noble Lord, that it was desirable that we should have more than one line of communication with India. The question then arose how we could best communicate with Alexandria, whether directly from Malta, or by means of the Austrian line from Ragusa to Corfu. If he understood the noble Earl rightly negotiations were still pending with the Austrian Government as to our use of the last mentioned line, and nothing had yet been settled. In the event of the telegraphic line in the Mediterranean going through British possessions, he trusted that the arrangements would be such that the whole line would be in the hands of the English, and no part of it in the power of any foreign Government. If the attempt to lay the electric cable in the Atlantic again failed, and the Agamemnon should return home with a sufficient length of wire for the purpose, he would recommend that she should be at once sent out to lay it down between Malta and Alexandria. This could be accomplished in a very economical manner, and he should be glad to see such a line in the possession of Her Majesty's Government. It had always seemed to him a mistake not to make telegraphic communication part of the postal system of this country. Those lines could be constructed and maintained at a very moderate expense, and made even to contribute to the national resources, besides giving a security in the transmission of important messages which could never be so completely attained through a private Company even when it was composed of British capitalists, and certainly could not equally be relied upon when in the hands of foreigners, and much less when under the direction and control of a foreign Government.

BANKRUPTCY AND LIQUIDATION (1858) BILL.

BILL PRESENTED. READ 1ª.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, on rising, according to notice, to call their Lordships' attention to this subject, said, that though there was a very wide-spread feeling in favour of some Amendment in the law of bankruptcy, yet the opinions entertained as to the mode in which that Amendment should be made were various and conflicting. Any one, therefore, who undertook the task of reforming this branch of the law must expect to be besieged on all sides by suggestions from practical men and theorists, from merchants and lawyers, and from debtors and creditors, all of whom were entitled to be heard on such a subject. Under these circumstances it was, perhaps, less a matter of surprise that his learned Friend the Attorney General, in the midst of his multifarious occupations, should have been so long in framing a measure on this important question than that in the end he should have been enabled to produce a Bill in a form which might be submitted to their Lordships' approval. Nor was it to be wondered at if, after the measure had been prepared by the industry and ability of his learned Friend, those who were to be responsible for it should, while assenting generally to its leading features, yet object to other—and those not unimportant—parts of it. The difficulties which surrounded the subject could not be better exemplified than in the history of preceding legislation on this subject. In 1849, a Bill to consolidate the bankruptcy law was introduced, and after the most careful consideration passed under the auspices of Lord Brougham, to whom the country was greatly indebted for his services in the amendment of this as well of other branches of the law. Not more than four years afterwards, however, defects seriously impairing the efficiency of that Act were discovered in its practical working, and a Commission, at the head of which was my right hon. Friend the present Home Secretary (Mr. Walpole), was accordingly appointed in August, 1853, to inquire into its operation. In April, 1854, the Commissioners made their Report, recommending various alterations in the law, some of which had since then been carried into effect. Many of their other suggestions, however, had not yet been adopted, and some of them were embodied in the Bill which he was now about to lay on the table. He was not presumptuous enough to anticipate a complete acquiescence on the part of their Lordships in the Bill in its present shape. It had been said by Archbishop Whately, with that strong sense which distinguished all his writings, that there never was, and never would be any plan proposed or executed to which there might not be strong and even unanswerable objections urged, and unless they looked at the objections which might be put into the scale on the other side, they never could advance a single step. He, therefore, anticipated objections to several parts of the measure. He invited friendly, and even hostile criticism, because the question was not a party one, and the earnest desire entertained on all sides must be, to make whatever measure was ultimately passed as perfect as possible for its purpose. He now wished rather to point out the leading principles on which the Government meant to proceed in regard to this important subject than to ask their Lordships to agree to details which were both numerous and entitled to mature consideration. It would be found that the Bill combined Amendment with consolidation. He believed it was a most important consideration, not only with regard to this measure, but with regard to all measures for the Amendment of the law, whether it was desirable that these two objects should be united in the same Bill, or whether it was advisable to pursue the course which had been adopted by their Lordships with regard to the Copyholds Amendment Act, in respect to which the Amendments had been first considered and adopted, after which the consolidation of the Copyhold Acts took place. His impression was, that it was the more convenient and desirable course, in the first instance, to deal with the Amendments, and having introduced the Amendments which were deemed necessary, then to bring in a Bill for the consolidation of the law. His intention was to give their Lordships a mere index of the present Bill instead of a minute description of its details. Supposing the question were put at the outset, what would be the most desirable Amendment of the bankrupt law, and that which would be most acceptable to the commercial community, he would refer their Lordships for an answer to the important petition he had lately presented from no fewer than 4,000 merchants and bankers of the City of London, who put prominently forward their earnest wish that some legislative sanction should be given to the arrangement of debts by liquidation under the superintendence of inspectors. In that suggestion lay the principal key to the measure which he was about to introduce. There were provisions in this Bill which would enable creditors to avoid going through the expensive course of proceedings in the Bankruptcy Court in which, as their Lordships knew, there was a per centage upon the estate of every insolvent debtor who went into the Court, and in which the creditors had very little power over the proceedings, which were entirely under the control of the official assignee. By the provisions of this Bill either the creditor or the debtor might proceed to the Court of Bankruptcy, and there petition for an order with a view to liquidation. When the petition was presented the debtor immediately received a protection from the Court, and was bound instantly to prepare a schedule of his debts and assets. A meeting of creditors was then to be called within three or four days, at which meeting the creditors were to decide whether the estate of the bankrupt should be wound up by means of liquidation, and if so, in what manner; and if three-fourths in value and number of the creditors agreed that the estate should be wound up in that manner the agreement should be binding on all of them. They might then proceed in the Bankruptcy Court to obtain an order of liquidation in the manner agreed upon between them, and to appoint inspectors, and the debtor might be called upon to assist. The whole matter went on completely under their control and management; but they were not confined to the particular arrangement which had been agreed upon, because if, in the course of the investigation of the affairs of the bankrupt, it should be found that a different arrangement was more advisable, then they were to be at liberty to change the arrangement, of course with the consent of the majority of the creditors; or if the debtor should turn out to be refractory or if for any other reason it should be thought desirable that the affairs should be wound up in bankruptcy, they might abandon the arrangement altogether and proceed to ask for an adjudication in Bankruptcy. So that in this manner the whole affairs of the bankrupt would be completely within the power of the creditors. There were other provisions of minute detail, which would enable this machinery to work most completely and satisfactorily. Those provisions would not in the slightest degree interfere with the mode of winding up the affairs of an insolvent debtor which was now very much resorted to—namely, by deeds of arrangement and composition. That he regarded as a most important feature in this Bill. Then the question arose, how were they to deal with non-traders? At times a desire had been expressed that all distinction between traders and non-traders should be abolished, and that both alike should be subject to proceedings in bankruptcy. He had very great doubts whether it would be desirable to abolish that distinction; as at present advised, he did not think it would be advisable; but, at the same time, he thought it was proper that where a person who was not in trade had incurred debts which he was unable to pay, and where he went on wasting that substance which in justice should be distributed among his creditors, they ought to have the power of enforcing a just and honest distribution of his effects. It would accordingly be found that provision was made for enabling the creditors to compel a liquidation of the debts of non-trading debtors by means of the machinery provided with respect to traders. But that provision was guarded in a certain way, and for this reason it appeared to him that it would not be advisable, where a debt was merely owing, that the creditor should be able to go at once to the Bankruptcy Court and insist on the non-trading debtor being brought into the court and the whole of his effects being distributed in satisfaction of his debts. That provision was, therefore, thus guarded:—Where a creditor had a judgment upon which he could issue execution, or where there had been an order or decree of a Court, for the payment of money which had been served upon the debtor and had not been paid at a certain time, then the creditor might go to the Bankruptcy Court and present a petition for liquidation and obtain an order, whereupon the non-trading debtor was brought within the jurisdiction of the Bankruptcy Court and the machinery of this liquidation. In that manner he would be compelled to do justice to his creditors, which, if he was an honest man, he would be disposed to do without the necessity of having recourse to these measures. There was also this provision—that a person who was not a trader might, if he pleased, voluntarily submit himself to the proceedings of the Bankruptcy Court. There was another subject which, as their Lordships knew, had occupied a great deal of public attention—namely, the propriety of some measure for administering in the Bankruptcy Court the estates of insolvent debtors after their decease. There would be found in this Bill various clauses which were familiarly known as "dead men's clauses." The subject was full of difficulty. It was very difficult indeed to know under what circumstances it would be desirable that the Bankruptcy Court should have the administration of the estate of a deceased debtor instead of the Court of Chancery, which had now jurisdiction to administer or distribute the estate through the medium of a creditor's suit. Their Lordships were aware that where there was an adjudication against a debtor in bankruptcy, and he died the next day, the Bankruptcy Court, having possession as it were of his property, could administer it after his death. And therefore this Bill provided, with regard to the effects of a deceased insolvent debtor, that if there had been an act of bankruptcy committed a month before his death, and if there were an application for adjudication within a month after his death, the Bankruptcy Court should then have the power of administering his property. There was also in this Bill an important provision as to the mode of dealing with partnerships where a firm became insolvent. It was proposed to treat the firm itself as a person, and to allow a fiat in bankruptcy to issue against the firm in the same manner in which it might issue against individual partners, and to apply to it the system which existed with regard to corporate and quasi-corporate bodies, so as to enable the creditors to compel individual partners to satisfy the joint liabilities of the firm. At the same time that this was a new system it would not interfere with the old one as to insolvent individual partners where the firm itself remained solvent. The subject of joint-stock companies had of course occupied a great deal of public attention. Their Lordships were aware that those companies were amenable to the bankruptcy laws, but that the law relating to them could hardly be deemed a part of the bankruptcy code, because they were governed by Acts of Parliament relating exclusively to them. The law provided for the winding-up of joint-stock companies by the Court of Chancery, and for the administration of their effects by the Court of Bankruptcy. There had been a great contest between the authorities upon that subject, and the Legislature had endeavoured to remove all doubts upon it by bringing the two streams, as it were, into one receptacle. It was proposed to take away the business of winding up from the Court of Chancery, and to confer it upon the Bankruptcy Court. He believed that would be deemed upon the whole to be a very desirable alteration. It was proposed that the Bankruptcy Court should have, in addition to its existing powers, all the powers which existed under the Winding-up Acts, and that joint-stock companies should have the same facilities with regard to the liquidation of their debts as was afforded in the case of debtors and creditors in the manner already mentioned. If his noble and learned Friend Lord Brougham were then in the House he would probably say, "What are you going to do with the County Court Judges? Are you going to give them any increased jurisdiction on this subject?" His answer was, that he thought that the County Courts hardly possessed the machinery which rendered it desirable that they should have a more ample jurisdiction in these matters than they had at present, and he did not propose, therefore, to throw any portion of this business upon them. In the petition to which he had already referred, from the merchants and bankers of London, it was suggested that all distinctions between insolvency and bankruptcy should be abolished, and that traders and non-traders should be subjected to one common law. He did not know that the matter was quite ripe for that proposition; but he proposed that the vacancies which took place in the Insolvent Court as they occurred should not be filled up. He believed that the process of liquidation provided in the Bill would reduce the business of the Courts very considerably, and that in a short time they might be able to put an end to the Insolvent Court altogether, one Court being sufficient for the business which it would then have to transact. The Bill further provided that a good deal of the business of the Bankruptcy Commissioners, being purely of an administrative character, should be transacted in chambers, where it might be conducted more conveniently and less expensively than in open court. There were some of the officers of the Court to whom it was necessary to advert. His noble and learned Friend Lord Brougham had been extremely desirous that the official assignees should be paid partly by salary and partly by fees, and had objected altogether to their being paid by salary alone. The Bill did not at present touch that question, because it was quite uncertain what the effect of the proceedings for the liquidation of the affairs of an insolvent debtor might be, and it was very possible that it might remove so much of the business from the Bankruptcy Court as to leave the official assignees without sufficient emolument from fees. It would be time to consider this subject more in detail when they knew exactly what would be the amount of business. With respect to the brokers, they were not appointed under the provisions of any Act of Parliament, but were selected by each Commissioner to attend his Court, having the duty imposed upon them of taking a valuation, in every instance, of a bankrupt's effects. This valuation of a broker was a very costly and utterly useless proceeding, and it was proposed by the Bill to abolish it altogether, and to provide for a valuation either under the authority of the Court or with the sanction of the creditors, as might be considered most advisable. And inasmuch as those persons were not appointed under any Act of Parliament, and had no legal claim to their offices, they could have no title to compensation on the abolition of their offices. There was another matter which had led to much litigation, and on which it was necessary to legislate — that was with respect to the classification of certificates. As the law now stood, there were three classes of certificates,—first, second, and third, — which were awarded according to the supposed merits or demerits of the bankrupt. [Lord CAMPBELL: Do away with them altogether.] His noble and learned Friend had anticipated him. The Bill proposed to do exactly what his noble and learned Friend had suggested. The Commissioners took different views of what constituted moral delinquency. Then came appeals to the Lord Chancellor or to the Lords Justices, and a great amount of time was wasted in considering the kind of certificate which a bankrupt ought to receive. The Bill abolished the distinction. There was only one other point—but it was a very important one—to which it was necessary to direct attention, and that was with regard to the offences of bankrupts and insolvents, and their punishment. He was astonished to find that the bankers and merchants of the City of London desired to give the Commissioners power to punish fraudulent bankrupts or insolvents by sending them to the House of Correction. Now, he must say that he never would consent to invest any man with the arbitrary power of sending a person to prison without the intervention of a jury; and therefore he could not consent to that proposition, although he might observe, in passing, that his hon. and learned Friend (the Attorney-General) who prepared the Bill originally seemed to have given his adhesion to it. The offences peculiar to bankrupts, such as the falsification of accounts, the concealment of property and the like, would require a great deal of consideration, because the language of the Bill, as originally framed, was not sufficiently precise to exclude from the operation of the punishment clauses various dealings which he believed were considered to be perfectly legitimate in the city of London—among others, the accepting of accommodation Bills. He mentioned this in the hope that during the recess their Lordships would direct their particular attention to this portion of the Bill. He himself should devote all the time in his power to it, and should endeavour, as cautiously and guardedly as he could, to frame those clauses so as to meet cases of real delinquency. He hoped that he had kept his word with their Lordships, and that he should not be considered to have entered too minutely into details. He had endeavoured to make his remarks serve rather as an index to the Bill, pointing out the more important provisions which it contained. He trusted that those who took an interest in the subject would give him the benefit of their assistance and advice in considering most carefully the clauses of the Bill, in order that at the commencement of next Session the Government might be enabled to introduce a measure which would prove beneficial to the public, and would receive the ready acceptance of the whole commercial community.

The Lord Chancellor

The Lord Chancellor

The noble and learned Lord then presented

A Bill to amend the Law of Debtor and Creditor, and of Insolvency and Bankruptcy, and to enable and facilitate the liquidation by creditors of a Debtors Estate, and the Administration of Estates of Insolvent Traders, deceased.

LORD CAMPBELL said, he would content himself with expressing his entire approbation of the course which had been taken in this matter by his noble and learned Friend on the woolsack, in having deliberately considered the subject, and having favoured their Lordships with an outline of the measure which he proposed. This certainly was no party question, and all must be anxious to assist his noble and learned Friend in framing his measure so that it should be generally acceptable to the public. He trusted that his noble and learned Friend would consider whether means could not be adopted for abolishing the distinction between traders and non-traders, and he suggested that a perusal of the Scottish bankruptcy laws might enable him to arrive at a solution of that question. The Scotch laws upon the subject generally were worthy of consideration; for he believed that under them the expense of working the commission and distributing the effects of a bankrupt did not exceed a charge of 7 per cent upon the estate, as contrasted with about 30 per cent under the English law.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: The pamphlet has been sent to me also, but I find that it does not praise, but condemns, the Scotch system.

LORD CAMPBELL: The proof I gave of the system was 7 per cent as contrasted with 30 per cent—a considerable proof of our Scotch advancement.

LORD CRANWORTH expressed his satisfaction at the lucid statement of his noble and learned Friend on the woolsack. In most of the propositions of his noble and learned Friend he entirely concurred, though of course he could not be expected to give in his assent to all the details without further consideration. He was glad that the noble and learned Lord proposed to amend before consolidating, for of course until it was settled what the law on the subject was to be, it was impossible to proceed to consolidate it. He sincerely hoped, that in the course of the next Session, a comprehensive measure of Amendment and consolidation on this subject would pass into law.

Bill read 1ª.

GOVERNMENT OF INDIA BILL.

Lords' Amendments agreed to.

Returned from the Commons, with a Message, That they do not insist on their Disagreement to the Amendments made by the Lords on which the Lords insist, and that they agree to the further Amendment made by the Lords to the Bill.

DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

Lords' Amendments not insisted on.

Message from the Commons that they insist on their Amendment to which the Lords disagree, with their Reason for so doing; and agree to the Amendments made by the Lords to certain of the Commons' Amendments to the said Bill.

Commons' Reason for insisting on their Amendment to which the Lords have disagreed, considered.

Moved, not to insist in the Disagreement to the said Amendment; agreed to; and a Message sent to the Commons to acquaint them therewith.

House adjourned at a quarter to Nine o'clock, to Monday next, a quarter to Two o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, July 30, 1858.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS. 1° Equitable Councils of Conciliation.

TRUSTEES AND EXECUTORS.

QUESTION.

MR. ROEBUCK said, he wished to ask the Solicitor General whether it is intended by Government to bring in a Bill next Session of Parliament to relieve Trustees and Executors from the present severe Laws affecting them, and to enlarge their powers for the better administration of their trust estates?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, an opinion having been very generally expressed that the Act passed last Session for subjecting Trustees to criminal responsibility ought to have been accompanied with some provision for relieving them from their civil liability, a measure had been introduced by Lord St. Leonards, and passed by the House of Lords, for that purpose. When it came down to the Commons, however, many of its provisions were objected to, and it was ultimately referred to a Select Committee. That Committee, on considering the subject, found difficulties springing up at every step. On the one hand there was the danger of holding out to trustees an appearance of protection which would be after all only illusory, and on the other the danger of leading them to suppose that the duty they undertook was only nominal, and subject to no real responsibility. Under these circumstances, the Committee had not felt it right to recommend the Bill as it stood, and owing to the lateness of the Session, and the difficulty of getting a quorum, it was not likely that they would make their Report before the prorogation. With regard to the future, it would be wrong in him to make any definite promise, but he would do all he could to remove the objections to which his attention had been directed, and if he saw any means of accomplishing that object, he would bring in a Bill for the purpose early in the ensuing Session, hoping at the same time to have the assistance of the noble and learned Lord to whom he had just alluded.

SERGEANT BRODIE.—QUESTION.

MR. CONINGHAM said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, whether it be true that Sergeant Brodie has within the last eighteen months repeatedly remonstrated with the officials at Pall Mall, and with the late Secretary for War against the maladministration of the Clothing Department at Weedon. Whether Sergeant Brodie has received any remuneration for the loss he consented to sustain, thinking that he held a life appointment, by the sale of £800 worth of goods at a quarter of their value; also whether it be true that his services were dispensed with only, and that he rejected the gratuity then offered to him, stating that he had committed no offence. Whether the alterations in saddlery suggested by Sergeant Brodie had ever had a fair trial, and whether he has received any remuneration for his trouble in getting up the said appointments for the Secretary of State for War. Also, whether it be true that Captain Smith, Inspector of Saddlery at Weedon, receives 10*s.* per day on the Superannuated List in addition to his salary.

GENERAL PEEL replied, that it was impossible to say what private or verbal communications might have passed between his noble Predecessor or the Officials of the War Department and Sergeant Brodie, but there was no official record of any paper whatever relating to any remonstrance made by Sergeant Brodie with respect to the Clothing Department at Weedon. Sergeant Brodie was appointed foreman of saddlery at Weedon upon the same terms, and subject to the same conditions, as other foremen in the service of the War Department. He was dismissed on the 18th of September last, and signed a receipt for the gratuity referred to in the question on the following day. The alterations in saddlery suggested by Sergeant Brodie were examined by the proper authorities, and the Inspector General of Cavalry reported against them. It was not the custom of the War Department to give any remuneration for such alterations, except in cases where they were approved and actually adopted by the service. It was true that Captain Smith received 10*s.* a day, to which he was fully entitled as half-pay, in addition to his salary. There was no intention to reappoint Sergeant Brodie to his place under the War Department.

THE INDIAN TELEGRAPH.—QUESTION.

MR. WILSON said, he would beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what progress has been made in arrangements for completing a telegraphic communication through the Mediterranean to Alexandria, and thence to India, since the dates of the last papers upon the subject, recently laid upon the table of the House.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the Porte had made a concession to certain persons of a line of telegraph from Alexandria to Aden, and Her Majesty's Government were at present in communication with those persons, with the view of continuing the line from Aden to India. If the negotiations were concluded happily—of which he thought there was a probability—the works would be commenced in the autumn.

MR. CRAWFORD said, he would also beg to inquire what progress has been made in the negotiations for establishing a telegraphic communication from Corfu to Alexandria.

MR. G. A. HAMILTON replied, that the negotiations with the Austrian Government were not yet completed, nor could he say at present what the result might be.

LAW OF BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY. QUESTION.

MR. NICOLL said, he would beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to lay upon the table of either House the long-promised Bill to amend the law relating to bankruptcy and insolvency, so that Members may have an opportunity to consider the same during the recess.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I believe, Sir, it is the intention of the Lord Chancellor to introduce such a Bill this Session in the House of Lords, but of course not with the intention of proceeding further with it at present.

BRAY'S AND BOYDELL'S TRACTION ENGINE.—QUESTION.

SIR DE LACY EVANS said, he wished to ask the President of the India Board whether it is intended to act on the strong recommendations by the official authorities at Woolwich of Bray's and Boydell's Traction Engines, as being likely, in the opinion of these authorities, to prove of utility to the army in India in facilitating the transport of troops, artillery, and stores?

LORD STANLEY: Sir, on the 27th of this month a letter was written by the Board of Control to the authorities in India, forwarding a copy of the Special Report on these engines, and suggesting that four should be sent out, two for Calcutta and two for Bombay. To that communication of course we cannot receive an answer for some time. I believe there is no doubt as to the value of the principle of these engines, but there is a doubt whether the work and construction of those that have been tried are such as will fit them for active service.

SIR DE LACY EVANS: I believe there was no imperfection in one of them.

THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON'S MONUMENT.—QUESTION.

LORD ELCHO said, he wished to ask the First Commissioner of Works, whether, as he has announced his intention of causing a full-sized model of the Wellington Monument to be made by Mr. Stevens, and placed on the proposed site before anything is finally decided, he will give the public an opportunity of viewing the work of any other sculptor who may be willing, on his own responsibility, to make a design and full-sized model of the monument.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, that in consequence of the construction put by the noble Lord on his speech on the previous evening, he must reply in the negative.

LORD ELCHO: Then I will take the sense of the House on the subject next Session.

GOVERNMENT OF INDIA (No. 3) BILL. LORDS' AMENDMENTS.

Order for Consideration of Lords' Reasons for insisting on certain of their Amendments read.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER intimated, that in consequence of the state of public business, he proposed to proceed with the Orders of the Day before moving that the House at its rising adjourn to Monday.

MR. VERNON SMITH said, that as the questions which he had given notice to put on the Motion for adjournment related to the public service in India, he should probably not be considered out of order in putting them now. Of course, it was not his intention at that period of the Session to raise a discussion on the affairs of India, though he certainly regretted that, notwithstanding the House had been occupied during a great part of the latter end of the Session with the discussion relating to the Government of India, there had, in fact, been no discussion on their present and future relations with that part of the empire. The first question he now wished to put was connected with the position of the army in India at the present moment. He wished to learn from the noble Lord the President of the Board of Control what was the amount of the force at present in India. When the late Government left office in the winter, it appeared from the best authorities, to which they had access, that it was necessary to have 80,000 European troops in India, and that was about the number calculated to be there at that time. It was then calculated that, owing to the insalubrity of the climate, accidents in warfare, disease, and deaths in action, reinforcements ought to be provided to the amount of 20,000 in the course of the year. The noble Lord had stated the other evening that since January last 17,000 men had been sent to India; but, as in the present state of the law no troops could be added to the establishment of India unless upon application of the East India Company, he wished to know whether the Directors of the Company had applied to the Government to add to the forces in India owing to advices they had received, and a desire on their part that the establishments should be increased, or whether those 17,000 only constituted the necessary amount to supply vacancies caused by disease and deaths in action. It was all important that they should be officially informed upon this point, seeing that at present they had no other information than was obtained from newspaper reports and private letters. He did not wish to be understood as making any complaint against the noble Lord on that account, for his experience during the past year convinced him of the difficulty of obtaining reliable information from India during the heat of action. Now, however, that the enemy had been in a great measure dispersed, we ought to have some information not only as to the amount of the European force, but something like an approximate calculation of the force of the rebels. They knew the number of regiments which had mutinied, and he believed that no additional levies had been added to the troops which had mutinied, and the Contingents of the Native States which had also mutinied. The last account from the seat of war, so far as he could judge, appeared to him very satisfactory, but he could not help observing, that although the British arms were everywhere victorious, though the mutinous soldiers were routed and dispersed, they were not destroyed. They heard of their rallying again and again, appearing suddenly before fortress after fortress in various parts of the country, and occupying them the moment our troops were withdrawn and engaged elsewhere. Everything indicated, indeed, not only present resistance, but a long, and, he feared, a protracted struggle. It was, therefore, of importance that Parliament should be informed what was the actual condition of our own army, and what was the extent of the reinforcements intended to be sent in order to bring this kind of warfare to an end, and restore the country to tranquillity. His next question related to a subject also of great importance—namely, the organization of the Military Commission which the noble Lord had issued. On a former occasion he stated that he found upon examination that the civil element which had been promised in the constitution of that Commission had been omitted. He considered that element of great importance, and much regretted its omission, though, no doubt, satisfactory reasons could be given for it. But what the public ought to know was, what would be the extent and power of that Commission. For his own part, he thought it would be better if the Commission were issued in India, because they would find there persons more competent to enter into such an inquiry than here. At the same time, he was quite alive to the difficulty of getting persons in India to serve on such a Commission under present circumstances. He was aware that the Governor General had issued circulars through Colonel Durrant to obtain information from persons perfectly competent to afford it, and that information, when obtained, would be extremely useful to those who were about to conduct the inquiry. Most of the gentlemen who were appointed on this Commission had been a long time absent from India, and though amongst them there were military officers of great distinction they were not precisely the fittest persons to examine into a subject so extensive and momentous as what should be the future organization of the Indian army. The Sepoy regiments had wholly broken down. Yet they heard of many persons sanguine enough to urge that in any new constitution of the Indian army the Sikh and the Goorkha elements should be largely introduced. With regard to the Goorkhas, the experience we had had of them did not warrant that recommendation; and with regard to the Sikhs, though no one could dispute their bravery, yet the bringing them into action side by side with our own troops, while it had taught them discipline and made them valuable allies, it had also made them dangerous as enemies. Under all circumstances he doubted much whether it would be advisable to trust the Sikhs, lest they should follow the example of the Sepoys. This was an important question. Hitherto the great glory of the Indian empire was, that we had been able to hold and defend the nation we had conquered by the troops we had overcome. That would be a difficult task in future, and therefore he said that the organization of the Indian army was one of the most important subjects that could be deliberated upon. If the Commission should be set to work at present merely to examine all the details and to gather information, it might be useful; but if it was a Commission issued for the Government to rely and fall back upon hereafter, then he said that such a course would be unworthy of a British Minister, and one which he hoped the noble Lord would not pursue. They had plenty of information and many and valuable papers on the subject from Sir J. Lawrence, Colonel Jacob, Sir C. Napier, and others, upon which the Government might establish some scheme of organization, without relying upon the Commission. He should be glad, therefore, to know what was to be the extent of the powers of this Commission. The third question related to another important subject. The House was aware that at the commencement of this Session an Act was passed enabling the East India Company to borrow £8,000,000 between the time at which the measure became law and the month of April, 1859, and it was provided by that Act that the Company should, early next Session, present to Parliament a statement of their affairs—showing how much they had borrowed of this money and how much remained to be borrowed. But as they were now about to separate for some time, he hoped the noble Lord would be able to give the House some information before they prorogued of the amount that had been raised, and whether it was sufficient to meet the expenses that were likely to accrue before they were again called together. In order to render this information complete, it would be necessary to know the amount of bills issued, and the position in which the Company stood with regard to its finances. The usual way of advancing money for the purposes of the Indian Government, until the mutiny broke out, was to receive the money from the merchants here, giving bills in exchange upon the Indian Treasury, and that was usually done to the amount of about £4,000,000 a year. That system was discontinued when the Act passed, as it was thought imprudent to draw upon the Indian finances at a time when money might be urgently required for the public service. Still, if the revenue of India was larger in amount, or the operation of borrowing in India now more successful than during the last year, it might be possible that bills might again be drawn upon India in the same way; but at all events the House should know what was the financial position of the Company, and what were its means of meeting the demands of the next twelve months. His last question was, whether any instructions had been sent, or would be sent, to issue a proclamation of Her Majesty's name and authority in India, and to announce that the Government did not intend to interfere with the religion of the Natives. The first portion of this question the noble Lord had answered on a previous occasion. He said that it was intended to issue a proclamation establishing the Queen's name in India, but whether it was to emanate from India or from this country, he did not explain. The latter part of the question was of importance in connection with the proclamation. The proclamation of the Queen's name would, no doubt, impress the Natives of India with the notion of a very considerable change, but different interpretations might be put upon it. Some persons might regard it as a means of introducing and forcing Christianity upon the Natives, and it was therefore most desirable that the proclamation should be accompanied by some explanation which would prevent such a misapprehension. On the other hand there existed in this country a belief—whether well founded or not—that in the late direction of affairs in India there had been a disinclination to maintain the truth of our own religious faith, and that too great a deference had been paid to the religion of the Natives. He, therefore, thought it advisable that the Government should adopt some means, by proclamation or otherwise, of declaring that, while they were fully prepared to maintain the Christian faith, they would be most jealous of any interference with the religion of the Natives, and would cautiously guard against any indiscretion in that respect on the part of persons employed in the public service. He thought the noble Lord might fairly take Parliament into his confidence upon these subjects, for upon him devolved a greater task than had perhaps fallen to the lot of any Minister—a task almost as great as that of founding a new empire in India. In his (Mr. Vernon Smith's) opinion the task of those who had been engaged for two centuries in establishing the Indian empire was less difficult than that which now devolved upon the British nation of re-establishing that empire, the glory of which had been destroyed by the late mutiny, although he hoped it would still continue one of the most important and valuable possessions of the British Crown. The questions he wished to ask were: Whether the 17,000 men sent to India since January last included any troops requested to be added to the establishment in India by the Directors of the East India Company? Whether he will state the terms and objects of the Commission to inquire into the re-organization of the Indian army? What is the amount borrowed under the Indian Loan Act of this Session, and whether the amount allowed to be borrowed under the Act will cover the expenses of the current year, or if Bills are now drawn upon India in the usual method? And, whether any instructions had been sent, or would be sent, to proclaim Her Majesty's name and authority in India, and to announce the intentions of the Government as to non-interference with the religion of the Natives?

MR. STAPLETON—who was indistinctly heard—said, he had a question of his own on the same subject. He wished to call the attention of the House to the intention expressed by the President of the Board of Control, in moving the second reading of the Government of India Bill, of referring the question of appointments to cadetships in the non-scientific branches of the Indian army to the Commission which was about to inquire into the reorganization of that army; and to ask, whether the members of the Council for the affairs of India, to be appointed by Government, would be appointed subject to what Parliament might hereafter decide with respect to such cadetships. He had put this notice on the paper in consequence of the noble Lord's statement, that the present arrangements were only temporary, and that the whole subject of the Indian army would be referred to a Commission.

MR. RICH said, he thought the observations of his right hon. Friend (Mr. Vernon Smith) implied some distrust with regard to the proclamation which the noble Lord had intimated his intention of issuing; but he could only say, from the declarations which had been made by the noble Lord in the course of the discussions on the India Bill, that, in his opinion, Parliament might entertain full and entire confidence that the noble Lord, in dealing with this great subject, would act with firmness and moderation, and would temper justice with mercy. His right hon. Friend (Mr. Vernon Smith), had in the course of his observations, but probably through inadvertence, totally ignored a large body of our fellow-subjects in India, who had, with very trifling exceptions, throughout most trying circumstances, maintained their loyalty—the armies of Madras and Bombay. The right hon. Gentleman had also ignored the loyalty of a number of the Native Princes, who had magnanimously upheld British dominion. He felt confident, however, that the noble Lord, while he asserted the proud dominion of England, would at the same time recognize the loyal spirit which had been manifested throughout India by large bodies of our Indian fellow-subjects.

LORD STANLEY: Sir, the House is entitled to demand, and I think the public may fairly expect to receive, from those who are in possession of it, some information upon the important questions to which the right hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Vernon Smith) has referred; and I am glad he has afforded me an opportunity of briefly stating to the House what I believe to be the position of affairs with regard to the points to which he has called attention. In the first place, I have been asked as to the extent of the European force at present in India, and I think the right hon. Gentleman also inquired whether we could form any estimate of the probable aggregate strength of those various and scattered bodies of mutineers to whom our troops are opposed in the field. Now, upon the latter point I am afraid it is not possible for me, or indeed for any one even in India, to form an accurate judgment. It appears that, of late, the whole progress and tendency of affairs have been in this direction—that the organized insurrection has everywhere been defeated, but that parties of armed insurgents are scattered far and wide throughout the country, eluding pursuit, and generally avoiding conflict with our troops. Under these circumstances it is utterly impossible for any one to say what is the strength of the mutineers. It is probably unknown, not only to any British general, but to any leader of the insurgents themselves. This is the more likely to be the case, because I learn—not from any official reports, but from private letters—that at the time when the insurrection existed in a more organized form than I hope is the case at present, recruiting went on rapidly among the insurgents, and that some of the revolted Sepoy regiments regularly enlisted new recruits, forming in one instance a second battalion, and preserving in some degree the military order and discipline to which they had been accustomed in our service. As to the strength of the European force, I am able to give a more satisfactory answer. The right hon. Gentleman stated, a few nights ago, that he had seen some account which represented the effective European force in India as being reduced to 26,000 men. I am happy to say that that account is very far below the reality. I have obtained from the War Department the latest Return which they possess of the strength of the Queen's army in India, and perhaps the best course I can take will be to read, not the Return as I have it, but a summary of the totals. The total number of Europeans in the Queen's army supposed to be in India, or on their way out, was 78,416; but from that it is fair to say there must be deducted 7,456 men, who were reported sick at the time when these Returns were made, and 11,059 were draughts on their way out. These troops will probably have arrived at the present time, and will constitute part of the effective strength of the force, which will thus comprise nearly 71,000 men. The Returns are not all of the same date; some are dated the 1st of May, others the 1st of June; and of course further deduction—I am afraid a considerable deduction—must be made for casualties since that time. But the fact remains that the Queen's army, at the date of the latest Returns, numbered nearly 60,000 effective men, and about 11,000 draughts on their way out. With regard to the Company's forces, I have obtained a memorandum from the East India House, which is made up partly by actual statements of facts and partly by estimate to the 1st of July. It gives a total of 15,855 Company's troops (Europeans). That number is made up, I should say, by adding the troops embarked in June and July, and now on their way; but there is also a deduction of 1,192 for casualties, estimated upon the proportion of loss which has occurred up to the date of which we have information. I need not say that no estimate of this kind can be entirely reliable, and, therefore, the papers which I quote must be looked upon as forming an approximate calculation only. We have thus, however, an estimated strength of 15,800 Company's troops and 71,000 Queen's troops (all Europeans),—making a total of between 86,000 and 87,000 Europeans; and it is obvious that, after the largest deduction which it can be necessary to make (and I am afraid that deduction must be a heavy one) for losses sustained by service in the field and by sickness consequent on exposure, since the date to which these Returns refer—after, I say, making the largest and most liberal deduction on that account, we may still consider that we have between 70,000 and 80,000 effective men—certainly above 70,000—for service in India. I was asked by the right hon. Gentleman how many of the men sent out since January last were, at the request of the Directors of the Company, added to the establishment in India, distinguishing them, I suppose, from the number of draughts and recruits? On this point I have received a memorandum from the East India House, dated the 23rd of this month, giving the figures which I quoted in the House the other day. I then stated that nearly 17,000 had been sent out between January and July. The exact number I find is 16,730, and of those all are draughts or recruits except 634, being eight companies of Her Majesty's 57th Regiment. The 16,000 are, therefore, draughts and recruits. Other regiments, as is well known, have been despatched from various parts of the world. The House will remember that at an early period of the insurrection application was made—not, according to form, through the Court of Directors here, but directly—at the Cape and other places, and these requests were, from the urgency of the occasion, acceded to without waiting for orders from home. With regard to the second question addressed to me by the right hon. Gentleman, as to the objects of the Commission which is to inquire into the organization of the Indian army, I think I shall best reply by reading the heads of the inquiry upon which it is intended that that Commission shall enter. They are:—

"1. The terms on which the army of the East India Company is to be transferred to the Crown.

"2. The permanent force necessary to be maintained in the Indian provinces respectively after the restoration of tranquillity.

"3. The proportion which European should bear to Native troops, in infantry, cavalry, and artillery respectively.

"4. How far the European portion of the army should be composed of troops of the line, taking India as parts of the regular tour of service, and how far of troops raised for service in India only.

"5. In connection with this question the best means of providing for the periodical relief of the former portion, and of securing the efficiency of the latter.

"6. Whether it be possible to consolidate the European forces, so as to allow of exchange from one branch of the service to the other, and what regulations would be necessary and practicable to effect this object with perfect justice to the claims of all officers now in the service of the East India Company?

"7. Whether there should be any admixture of European and Native forces, either regimentally or by brigade?

"8. Whether the local European force should be kept up by draughts and volunteers from the line, or should be, as at present, separately recruited for in Great Britain?

"9. Whether it would be possible to raise any regiments in the colonies, either for temporary or permanent service in India?

"10. Whether the Native forces should be regular or irregular, or both, and if so, in what proportions?

"11. Whether any Native artillery corps should be sanctioned?

"12. Whether cadets sent out for service with Native troops should in the first instance be attached to European regiments, to secure uniformity of drill and discipline?"

These are the heads of the inquiry proposed. As to the modification which has taken place in the constitution of the Commission, and on which some remarks have been made by the right hon. Gentleman, I have to say that it was originally considered desirable that, besides the civilians who are officially to sit upon it, there should be three other gentlemen of eminence in public life who should give it the benefit of their experience and of their services; but, from various circumstances, and more especially considering the time of year at which this Commission was to sit—the first meeting having taken place in the course of the present week, and the next being fixed for Tuesday—it was found so difficult to obtain the services of those who we desire should sit upon the Commission that that part of the scheme was abandoned. It is quite true that an inquiry—the nature of which I do not exactly know—upon the same subject is taking place in India; but though, of course, there are many advantages in instituting an investigation of that kind upon the spot, one great disadvantage attends it—namely, that the great majority of those officers whose services would be most valuable are actively engaged, and are unable, therefore, to give their attention to it. This objection does not apply in the same degree to those who have either retired from the service, or who, on the ground of health, have lately returned from India; and, I am happy to say, we have many of that description whose advice and assistance will be most valuable. Before I leave the subject of the Commission I will state that it is not intended, and cannot be intended, to lessen in any, the slightest degree, the responsibility which must devolve upon the Government for the settlement of this very large question. The ultimate decision, be it what it may, must depend upon the responsibility of the Government of the day, and the Report of the Commission of Inquiry will carry with it no other weight than that which is derived from the eminence of its members, the experience and knowledge they bring to bear upon the subject, and the soundness of the reasons they employ. I have been also told by an hon. Gentleman (Mr. Stapleton) that some arrangements which I proposed on the second reading have been departed from, because patronage which formerly rested with the Directors will henceforth be vested in the Crown. Now, in recommending that proposition to the approval of the House, my wish was to carry on as far as possible the analogy of the system which actually exists; and I confess I think the hon. Member who referred to the subject, when he describes the members of this Council as being taken entirely from one class of society, whereas members of the Court of Directors were taken from quite another, has, to use the mildest term, greatly overstated the case. Certainly a large and very valuable section of all former Courts of Directors always consisted of men of Indian service and experience; but I may remind the House that there is in the Bill as it stands an actual legal provision that a majority, and something more, of the Council should be taken from that same class. Then the same hon. Member asked me whether it was intended that the arrangement with regard to the non-scientific military appointments should be provisional only and subject to the Report of the Commission, or whether it was intended as a permanent arrangement. Now, it is obvious that what one Act of Parliament has sanctioned another at any future period can overthrow. As to the objection that compensation might be claimed where any appointments of this kind were taken away, we have shown, I think, what our feelings are upon that point by the 14th clause of the Bill, in which it is stated expressly that if the Council itself were abolished within ten years no claim for compensation could arise. Naturally, as discussion has gone on we have seen our way more clearly, but I do not think it is proper — though, of course, it is in the power of Parliament to deal with the subject as it will — that any measures taken for the reorganization of the Indian army should involve a change in the manner in which the first appointments will be made. I think the question of first appointments, and that of the discipline and reorganization of the army afterwards, are distinct questions, and that it is quite possible to deal with the one without touching the other. Now, with regard to the financial part of the question connected with India, to which the right hon. Gentleman has referred, I think I shall best satisfy the wishes of hon. Members by reading a memorandum which I have received from the East India House. That memorandum states that,—

"The India Loan Act conferred the power of borrowing £8,000,000
Which has been already used to the extent of 4,421,000

Leaving yet available the power of borrowing		£3,579,000
Add
India Bonds:—Unissued portion of £7,000,000	£1,135,600
May be issued to replace those notified for discharge	653,900
Ditto, to replace those now deposited with Bank of England, which will be available on loan being paid off in October, 1858	1,000,000
		2,789,500
May be borrowed on debentures and bonds		£6,368,500
The disbursements of the Home Treasury to the 31st of January, 1859, in excess of the present cash balance, are estimated at . . .		£5,172,200

"The means of the Home Treasury are therefore estimated to be more than adequate to meet the disbursements until next Session, without including the sums that may be realized for Court's bills on India, or from the sale of Exchequer bills and bonds now in hand (£1,598,900).

"In this estimate the receipts from railway companies are not included."

From a consideration of those figures, which do not include the receipts from railway companies, I think it will be found that the statement which I have to make in answer to the right hon. Gentleman is satisfactory so far as the financial part of the question is concerned. I now come to the question which the right hon. Gentleman has put to me in reference to the proclamation which is of opinion it would be desirable to issue when the transfer of the government of India to the Crown has been completed. In reply to the right hon. Gentleman's observations upon that point, I can only say that, both on account of the importance of the occasion and also to guard against misconstruction, I think that that transfer ought to be in some manner formally notified to the people of India. So far as our interference with the religion of the Natives is concerned, I shall content myself with observing that there is in a recent despatch of the Earl of Ellenborough's, dated the 13th of April, a passage which I shall quote, simply because it expresses in language clearer and more forcible than any to which I could give utterance my own feelings and that of the Government of which I am a member upon the subject. [The noble Lord then read an extract from the despatch in question, stating that the Government would be guided by a policy of neutrality and good faith in reference to matters affecting the religion of the Natives of India, and most earnestly calling upon all the authorities in India not to afford the slightest cause for the suspicion that that policy had undergone or would undergo any change.] Those are the opinions of Her Majesty's present advisers. That passage expresses sentiments in which I fully concur, and I deem it highly desirable that, whether by proclamation or by some other means, the fullest assurance should be given to the Natives of India that the change which is about to take place in the government of that country is not intended to involve any change in the policy of the Government. With regard to the manner in which the announcement in question ought to be made, I may be permitted to say that I do not think it is usual to put, as it were, into the mouth of the Governor General of India the words in which it should be couched, without leaving to him any discretion as to the modification or withholding altogether of any particular form of expression. That is a point which yet remains under the consideration of the Government; but I may say that my own individual impression is, that the most advisable course to take with respect to it would be to state in general terms to Viscount Canning that which we wish to be done, leaving it to his own discretion to use such language as he may deem expedient. My answer to the question of the right hon. Gentleman on this point therefore is, that there will be an announcement of the transfer of the government of India from the Company to the Crown, and that due care will be taken to assure the people of that country that the change is not meant to interfere with their ideas or habits in regard to matters of religious belief.

MR. SPOONER said, the question which had been put by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Northampton, and the answer which had been given to it by the noble Lord, were of very grave importance. The right hon. Gentleman had stated with justice that the answer of the noble Lord might be liable to misconstruction, and he (Mr. Spooner) admitted that he wished the question had not been put, or that the House had been favoured with a different explanation from the noble Lord. The noble Lord had stated that neutrality was still to guide and govern the Councils of India with regard to religion. Now, if by the word "neutrality," the noble Lord meant that there should neither be an attempt to compel or to bribe with the view of converting to Christianity, and that persons of all religions should be treated with perfect impartiality, then he readily granted that that would be a right line of conduct to pursue ; but if that were the meaning of the noble Lord, "neutrality" was not the proper term by which to designate it. On the other hand if it were not his meaning, then he would ask whether the noble Lord intended to declare that it was a matter of indifference to a Christian country and Government whether or not idolatry still prevailed in the large empire committed to our care? For his part, he was entirely at a loss to see how they could justify, in an assembly of a Christian nation, the expression that we ought to be neutral upon the question whether an idolatrous system continued, or whether the Hindoos were sufficiently enlightened to know the value of the Christian religion. If a public proclamation assured the Natives of India that there should be no compulsory interference with their religion, that there should be no bribery, and no attempt to make converts by coercion ; that they should be left entirely to the effect of the Word of God, and of His Holy Spirit upon their minds, he had confidence enough in that Holy Word and in that Holy Spirit to leave them to do their own work and produce their own effects ; but whilst that was declared, the proclamation ought also to express the full conviction of the Government that Christianity was the only sound and true religion ; the only method either to civilize or to diffuse happiness among the inhabitants of India, and at the same time the only sure ground on which we could look for the blessing of Almighty God upon our rule. In such a course he should fully concur; but he would maintain that we had not acted in accordance with such a course of "neutrality" when we paid for the maintenance and encouragement of idolatrous practices—a sin of which he had been informed we were not, even at the present moment, entirely clear. We had been guilty of great crimes in India—and he agreed with the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton when he stated, in a manner that had made a great impression on his (Mr. Spooner's) mind, his conviction that India was not given to us merely to gratify our ambition as a nation, or to realize fortunes for our merchants, but for higher and nobler purposes. No ; there were great responsibilities and elevated duties connected with its possession, and we had not acted up to those responsibilities and duties. But we had actually supported, encouraged, and paid for the maintenance of idolatrous practices. Then with respect to the subject of education in the schools of India, he had been told that we did not suffer any minister of the Christian religion to interfere in the teaching of those schools, whilst we permitted interference on the part of the Brahmins and other religious castes of Hindoos. He lamented, then, the answer which had been given by the noble Lord, because he feared that it might lead to misapprehension ; and he could not sit quietly there and hear it stated that neutrality was to be strictly observed, without asking for an explanation of what that neutrality meant, and expressing his opinion that if the observance of neutrality were then to be announced, that announcement ought to be accompanied by a declaration of the opinion of the Government that the Christian religion was the only true religion, and that whilst they felt it was not their duty to endeavour to compel conversions, it was their duty to do all in their power, by means of religious instruction, and by placing the truth before the people of India, to accomplish that one great object for which we had been entrusted with the government of India ; thus taking that course by which this country might become the honoured instrument of carrying out Christianity in conjunction with Christian civilization.

MR. ROEBUCK said, that nothing but a deep sense of public duty could induce him to rise to enter on such a thorny path as that of religious controversy. The example, however, had been set him by the hon. Member for Warwickshire (Mr. Spooner). There was a very significant passage in a despatch of the Earl of Ellenborough, to which he wished to call attention as a guide in the government of India. That noble Lord said, that as a private man one ought not to do that, which as a public man, one condemned. As public men we should condemn any attempt in India to use our power for the purpose of proselytizing. If a man in power employed his powers of persuasion to lead men to the adoption of particular opinions, he must bring with him the power attached to his peculiar position, and if he was in power, that power ought not to be used for the purpose of proselytizing. He only rose to say, that he hoped that no man, in his desire to lead the people of India into the adoption of Christianity, and to induce them to think as he does—which was proselytizing in India—that no man would use that power to induce persons to become Christians. There would arise far better results to the people of India if they were governed on general principles of justice than to attempt to proselytize and to create Christians, so called, by missionaryizing the country, if he might use such a phrase.

MR. KINNAIRD said, he also was one of those who regretted that the passage from the despatch of the Earl of Ellenborough should have been referred to, as it might be misunderstood by the country, and it certainly did not agree with what had been stated in "another place" by the noble Earl at the head of the Government. That noble Earl distinctly stated, in answer to a right rev. Prelate, that he wished to carry out in India the policy which, when at the head of the Colonial Office, he carried out in Ceylon, and entirely to disconnect the Government of this country with the maintenance of idolatrous worship in that country. That was quite contrary to what had fallen from the noble Lord the President of the Board of Control. He (Mr. Kinnaird) quite agreed with the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield that the authority of the Government ought not to be brought to bear on matters of religion; but the proper course was not neutrality but toleration of all religions. Christian converts were as much entitled to protection and employment as any other persons; but the complaint was, that in India the Christians had not that fair and equal justice which was extended to all other sects, and now they were told there was to be no change in that respect. That statement would not be very satisfactory to the country. He regretted that the question had been mooted, for during the whole of the discussions upon the Home Government of India he had carefully abstained from bringing it before the House, but as it had been raised, he could only express his regret that the noble Lord had not made a statement as plain and distinct as that which had been made by the noble Earl at the head of the Government.

MR. BOWYER said, he could not understand what the hon. Member for Warwickshire (Mr. Spooner) wanted. He had got three Protestant bishoprics in India made out of the revenues of India. The hon. Gentleman said that the influence of the Government ought to be used in the propagation of Christianity. [MR. SPOONER: No!] He (Mr. Bowyer) certainly understood the hon. Gentleman to say that we were not to use force or bribery, but to employ the moral influence of the Government in the promotion of Christianity. The hon. Gentleman, however, had not settled what Christianity was to be taught. The hon. Gentleman, no doubt, thought him (Mr. Bowyer) no better than a Hindoo, or any other idolater, and his hon. Friend behind him (Mr. Gilpin) no doubt did not come off much better in the opinion of the hon. Member, for though he might not think him an idolater, he probably did not come up to his idea of a Christian. Before the hon. Gentleman wished the Government to teach Christianity, he must decide what sort of Christianity they were to teach; and when he had solved that question, it would be time enough to undertake the task. He (Mr. Bowyer) wished to ask a question. One of the questions asked by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Northampton (Mr. Vernon Smith) was, whether instructions were to be sent out to India to proclaim Her Majesty's name and authority. It would be recollected that he (Mr. Bowyer) had put on the Votes a notice of Motion, that after the transfer of India to the Crown the word "India" should be added to the style and title of the Crown. The noble Lord the Member for Tiverton had said that there could be no doubt of the effect which the name of the Queen would have on the Natives of India; but, in his (Mr. Bowyer's) opinion, the full advantage of the influence of the Queen's name over the Natives could not be obtained unless India were added to the style and title of the Crown. This would be in accordance with precedent, for history showed that whenever a regal or quasi regal territory was acquired by the Crown a corresponding addition was made to the Royal style and title. Thus in the case of Wales, which, having been added to the Royal dominions, was given in perpetuity to the eldest son of the Sovereign; so, also, in the case of France, in the time of Edward III., when a large part of that country was in the possession of the King of England; or that of Scotland, after the accession of James I., and in that of Ireland, all of which countries were contained in the style and title of the Crown; and since the union with Scotland and Ireland, the term "Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland" included the style and title which had been heretofore adopted. He was told that if this was done it would lead to an expectation on the part of the Colonies that they should be dealt with in the same manner; but there was no reason why that should be done, as it would be a novelty, and it was never the custom for a Sovereign of this country to take the style and title of a colony. He, therefore, would repeat his wish that some means might be devised for including India among the titles of Royalty, borne by Her Majesty.

COLONEL SYKES said, the declaration of the noble Lord the President of the Board of Control would, he believed, do more to remove the dangerous distrust which now pervaded the minds of the people of India than the most brilliant and continuous successes of our arms. He would, therefore, congratulate the noble Lord upon his declaration, upon his liberal feelings, his enlarged views, and his generous sentiments. From personal experience he could deny the existence of any prejudice against Christian converts in India. He had on former occasions given instances of their employment in the public service and of other advantages being conferred upon them. The principle in India had been invariably to select men for the public service according to their capacity for the duties they were required to perform, quite irrespective of their religious views or sentiments. It had also been the object of the Indian Government for many years to separate itself entirely from idolatrous usages and practices. It had given up the Pilgrim tax at Allahabad, and had abandoned the lands it held from Juggernaut, valued at three lacs of rupees. It would eventually entirely disconnect itself from the maintenance of idolatrous worship, but it could not do so all at once. He would repeat that the declaration of the noble Lord would do more for us in India than anything that had been spoken during the whole progress of the discussion in that House.

MR. GILPIN said, he also rose to express his unqualified satisfaction with the manner in which the question had been treated by the noble Lord. Those who truly desired the spread of Christianity in India would wish to see Christianity kept free from those horrible atrocities which, whether committed by black men or by white men, were utterly repugnant to its genius and its nature, and only asked for a fair field for the operations and exertions of those who were disposed to teach Christianity for its own sake. He could not understand that system of neutrality which supported bishoprics out of the funds of the State, and sought to promote Christianity in India only by the questionable establishment of a State Church.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, when the Lords' Amendments to the India Bill were brought down for consideration to this House, we made five objections to those Amendments, but agreed to a considerable number. The Lords have considered the objections of the Commons, and have waved their opinions in a majority of the cases. On three heads they have waved their opinions, and those three heads contain by far the most important objections of the Commons. But they have invited us to reconsider our objections on two points, and I wish to direct the consideration of the House to those points, feeling sure the House will reconsider their opinions in the same calm and considerate manner in which the Lords have expressed theirs. The first objection is not the one which has been read by the Clerk at the Table, but I will advert to it at once, in order that I may at the same time tender the advice which I would humbly venture to offer them on the subject. The first objection is contained in Clause 54, and it appears to have originated in a misconception, into which it is not remarkable that we should have fallen, because the language of the Amendment of the Lords is so obscure as to justify the interpretation which we had put upon it. The clause in question deals with the circumstance of instructions being sent out to India commanding a foreign war, and it is there provided that, when an order to commence hostilities is sent to India, the fact of such order having been sent shall be communicated to Parliament within three months after the sending of such order if Parliament be sitting; and, if Parliament be not sitting, then within one month after the next meeting of Parliament. There appeared to be some inconsistency in that language, and we proposed that one month should be inserted in both cases. But what was intended by the Amendment of the Lords was, that notice should be given of the fact within three months if Parliament should be sitting, and if it should not be sitting then within one month after the resumption of its deliberations after the lapse of that term. The Amendment of the Lords, though obscurely expressed, was really wisely conceived, for, suppose the Government sent out orders to India to commence hostilities, a month would elapse before the Governor General could receive them. By that time, under the clause as amended by the Commons, the orders would have been communicated to Parliament; but on the arrival of the instructions in India the Governor General might possibly be unprepared at the moment to obey them, and in that case he would have no time to make the Home Government acquainted with his position. The communication of the order for the commencement of hostilities, however, would then have been made to Parliament, and so the very Power against which it was intended to wage war would become aware of the policy of this country before the Governor General was in a situation to give effect to it. Therefore the Lords suggested that in any event the term of three months should be allowed to elapse before the communication of the order to Parliament, so as to admit of time being given for communication with the Governor General. I hope the House will reconsider that Amendment, which is now sent down in language that cannot be misunderstood, and I venture humbly to recommend it as one calculated to promote the public advantage. I will now proceed to the consideration of the other Amendment of the Lords, which is one of great interest at this moment. The interest of this Amendment arises principally from this circumstance, that to a certain degree it has been supposed to affect the action of the competitive principle in public appointments. If I might presume to give an opinion on that subject, I would say that I am a firm, though not an extravagant or headstrong supporter of the competitive principle for public appointments. In the theory of that principle I entirely concur; but I know well that theory and practice do not always agree, and I have viewed the application of that principle with, I will not say great anxiety, but certainly with all that interest which attends the application of a novel principle to public affairs. As far as I am able to form an opinion, I think that principle, in its practical application, has been entirely successful. It has come out of the ordeal of proof a pure and perfect weapon; but still I cannot disguise from myself that it is a principle very novel in its character and likely to have important results, and I cannot suppose that on a question of that novelty and magnitude there can be throughout the community a perfect identity of sympathy and opinion. I am not, therefore, at all surprised that, when the Amendment of the Lords came down, we found an objection on their part to tie up in an Act of Parliament the application of the competitive principle, which they fully recognize, to so important a branch of the public service as that of the civil service in India. So far, therefore, from thinking that the Amendment was not entitled to the utmost respect and consideration, I felt the natural force of that objection, and the natural suspicion and jealousy with which a House of Parliament is no doubt bound to calculate all the consequences of a novel course. This House, however, decided after deliberation not to adopt the Amendment of the Lords, but to adhere to the clause in the Bill which gave what may be called a Parliamentary title to employment in the civil service of India obtained by unrestricted competition, and the Lords, respecting the decision, had yielded, and not ungracefully, to the opinion of the House on the subject. There is, however, another clause of a different character, in which that principle was to a certain degree involved, but on which no discussion has, as yet, taken place. To that clause the Lords object upon constitutional grounds, and to it I would draw the attention of the House. It certainly does seem rather inconsistent that in the very Bill which provides that Her Majesty shall appoint to all military Commissions, we should, at the same time, insert a provision which makes the appointments to a portion of those Commissions entirely independent of the will of Her Majesty. In that light the Lords have viewed this provision, and they are apprehensive that inconvenience may arise from a departure from a constitutional principle which has always prevailed in the military service, with respect to such appointments. As the clause went up to the Lords it was arranged, as in the case of the civil service, that these Commissions should be attained by open competition; and that according to the order of superiority, those who were successful should be appointed. Now, it does not appear that the Lords at all object to the principle of competition being applied to the scientific branches of the Indian army. That appears to be recognized as a course which it was desirable to promote and secure. Since the year 1853, the civil service of the East India Company has been open to unrestricted competition, and the civil patronage has been distributed entirely according to the order of merit, although it was not provided in the Act of that year that such a proceeding should absolutely be followed. It was there only provided that there should be public examinations, according to the regulations drawn up by the Secretary of State, and which should be approved by Her Majesty in Council, and that a copy of those regulations thus approved should be laid before Parliament, in order that Parliament might be aware of the existing regulations, with any alterations that might take place in them. Now, what the Lords object to in the 34th clause is not the principle of competition, or its being secured with respect to the scientific branches of the army as amply as it has been secured with regard to the civil service since 1853, but to this being done in a manner which would seem to violate the constitutional principle which hitherto has prevailed in all appointments to the military service. I am sure I do not mistake the feelings of the House, when I say that there can be no desire on our part to trench upon the prerogatives of Her Majesty. Those prerogatives during her beneficent reign have been so discreetly and wisely exercised, that there is a very general opinion throughout all classes of the community, that their existence has been beneficial to our liberties and to the good government of the country. But, in having to consider so large a question as the transfer of the government of India from the Company to the Crown, we have been placed in a difficult and delicate position, which required on the part of both branches of the Legislature very judicious discrimination. In this great work we have added greatly to the regality of Her Majesty. We have invested her with new prerogatives, new privileges, and new powers; but in doing that we have felt it our duty to insert conditions and regulations with respect to those new privileges, and prerogatives which we should not have thought of introducing, if we had had to deal with the ancient power belonging to the Crown. What has been the great difficulty which has prevented long before this the termination of that anomalous government of India which was carried on by the Company? It has been felt for nearly a century that it was a great anomaly that India should belong to the English, and yet should not be directly governed by the Sovereign of England. But the difficulty of solving this problem was, that no one could devise any means by which we cou'd deal with the vast patronage of India. It was always said, that it was more natural and would be more beneficial that the government of India should be carried on directly by the Sovereign of England; but there has been, in the first place, a great apprehension that the power of the Crown would be dangerously increased by the possession of all the patronage which would result from such a government, and there has been, secondly, a great suspicion in this country, remembering that India was gained by the energies of the middle classes, and that these classes have long possessed the patronage of that great empire, which they had fairly won, that the proposed change to a more direct and satisfactory polity could not be effected without injury to the legitimate interests of the bulk of the community, and a dangerous increase of the power of the Crown. It appears to me that that difficulty, which has baffled some of our wisest statesmen and the wisdom of many Parliaments, we have in a great degree solved by the creation and development of that very competitive principle of which I have been speaking. Those who before had to consider this question had not the means or the machinery by which they could meet the difficulty. We have met them in the present instance most efficiently and completely. Let us see how the patronage of India, as regards the middle classes, after this great revolution has taken place, of the transfer from the Company to the Crown, is affected by the Bill as it comes down from the Lords. Let us see whether, in accomplishing this great work, we have been mindful of the interests of those of our fellow-subjects who have such strong claims upon our consideration. The whole of the civil service, as the Bill comes from the Lords, is secured entirely to those who deserve to obtain, and who are qualified to possess these important offices; in other words, the whole of the civil administration of India is secured by a Parliamentary title to the great bulk of the community. If we look to the military portion of the patronage, we shall find that it will be distributed by a body of men who, in position, character, attainments, and connections, resemble in a great measure the late Court of Directors—of a body which must consist in part of members of the late Court, and which, as far as the nominated members are concerned, will be composed of gentlemen of Indian experience and connections; so that the larger portion of the military patronage also will be distributed among the middle classes, through almost the same conduits as heretofore, except with this advantage, that the new distributors will not be checked in their action by the importunities of that contracted constituency which exercised a baneful influence upon the Court of Directors. So far, then, as those two sources of patronage are concerned, they will be naturally distributed or attained in a manner which will ensure the diffusion of the great mass of that patronage through the community. But we have thought it right, in deference to the enlightened spirit of the age, to withdraw from the distribution of the Council those military commissions which relate to the scientific branches of the army. We have thought that they ought to be obtained by the same intellectual merit and qualification which we would secure for the civil administration, and it is now proposed by the Amendments of the Lords that, in addition to giving the whole of the civil service, and the greater portion of the military appointments with a Parliamentary title to the middle classes, so also commissions of a scientific character in the army should be obtained by the same section of the community upon precisely similar conditions. Between the Amendment of the Lords, and the clause as it was first drawn, there is this difference that the constitutional forms which we ought to respect are more completely observed, but the same advantages are secured. Under these circumstances, I trust the House will consider without prejudice this particular Amendment of the other branch of the Legislature—will, upon reflection, be of opinion that it is an Amendment made in no spirit of hostility to that application of the competitive principle to the scientific branches of the army which we seek to maintain, or dictated by any other feeling than a respect to constitutional usages, and will be prepared, in the same spirit of conciliation and reciprocal respect which has attended these discussions, to accept the alterations inserted by the Lords. Let me impress upon the House one consideration which ought not to be absent from our minds in concluding our labours upon this important question. There has rarely been a subject of legislation more important than the one with which we have dealt in this Session respecting the Home Government of India. Let the House recollect, that for upwards of seventy years this question has been, at intervals, the subject of Parliamentary discussion; that it has given rise to the greatest acerbities of feeling and prolonged acrimony of political sentiments; that it has convulsed Cabinets, has dissolved Parliaments, and that finally it has been recognized by the country as one of those knots that no ingenuity and no impartiality could ever untie. I claim no merit for the Government in having brought this matter to some satisfactory conclusion. I claim some merit for Parliament and some for the House of Commons; but I claim the chief merit for the more enlightened spirit of the times in which we live, for the diffused education of the country where we have the happiness to be fellow-citizens, and the rising sense of the value which we all of us attribute to intellectual acquirements, and our recognition of them as a proper qualification for admission to civil office. This spirit has assisted us in bringing this Bill to its present state. It is, I think, only surprising that there have not been greater differences of opinion between the two Houses and among ourselves in this House; but what I would impress on the House of Commons is this—the great desirability there is that this legislation should be brought to a conclusion without leaving on any side and in any quarter, in any state or condition of this country, any feeling of irritation or jealousy. It is impossible that the middle classes, whose claims have been urged so freely, fairly, and constantly in this House and in other places — it is impossible that the great body of the community can for a moment feel that their claims have not been regarded. We have effected this change, if the House to-night consents to this final step; and so far as the patronage of the great empire of India —won, I freely admit, by the energies of the middle classes—is concerned, the great bulk will be obtained and enjoyed by those middle classes, not only with the certainty which they enjoyed in old days, but with far more honour and by a process infinitely more beneficial. Let not, therefore, the other House think that, in coming to what I may call a happy conclusion, we obtained that result by any disregard in this House of the fair prerogatives of the Crown. I am sure that those prerogatives are duly estimated, and will be, if necessary, properly protected in this House; and let us, by acceding to this suggestion of the Lords, conclude our labours with this conviction, that we have, after all our pains, established, on the whole, a home Government for India adapted to the circumstances with which it will have to deal, and have at the same time effected this object without creating jealousy, suspicion, or dissatisfaction in any portion of the community over which Her Majesty reigns. I trust the House will, therefore, consent to the Amendment which the Lords have proposed to the 34th clause; and I can only say, on the part of the Government, that in making that recommendation we do it with the full and frank intention of establishing, with respect to the scientific branches, that wise and beneficial competition which will prevail in the civil service of India. It will be one of the first duties of my noble Friend, if the House accedes to this proposition, to draw up regulations which will rule the examinations in question, and which, when approved by Her Majesty in Council, will be laid on the table of this House. They will then be open to the criticism and vigilance of the House, and whenever any alterations are made, they will likewise be announced to the House. We shall then have the satisfaction of having established the competitive principle by Act of Parliament throughout the whole civil service of India; of having secured to the great body of the community the free enjoyment of military patronage, by its distribution through a Council sympathizing with them; and of having, at the same time, secured the competitive principle even in the scientific branches of the army, and that in a manner which no one can say has attacked or weakened any prerogative or right of any person in this country, from the Sovereign on her throne to the humblest of her subjects.

Motion made and Question proposed,—

"That this House doth not insist on its disagreement to the Amendment made by the Lords in page 11, line 6."

MR. ROEBUCK said, that in his opinion the right hon. Gentleman who spoke last had put the matter before the House on an unfair footing. There were three services in India to be considered—the civil service, the engineers and artillery, and, lastly, the army. If it were thought right that the competitive system should be introduced into the first two, why should it not be introduced into the third also? But it was now proposed that, whereas candidates were to be elected to the civil and the scientific branches by competition, they should be elected to the army by a certain other mode. This, he confessed, he could not understand. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that if the House did not agree to the Lords' Amendments, the prerogative of the Crown would be assailed, and that that prerogative had always been exercised in so mild and harmless a manner that no possible harm could arise from conceding in this matter. But if that ground were taken, he would ask whether the prerogative of the Crown had not been trenched upon already with reference to the first two branches of the service? The Chancellor of the Exchequer had also argued that the great difficulty heretofore felt in changing the Home Government of India arose from the apprehension which existed lest, by throwing so large an amount of patronage into the hands of the Crown, the equilibrium of society, which it was now so desirable to retain, might be endangered. In reply to that, he would ask in what other possible way could such a catastrophe as that apprehended be averted than by throwing the whole service open to unrestricted competition. That House had better apply itself, not to arranging the distribution of patronage between the aristocracy and the middle classes, but to obtain the best possible instruments for the public service, and this could only be effected by encouraging the principle of competitive examination. In the choice of clerks he considered that the name of every candidate should be put upon the list without the exercise of any patronage whatever, that a register of such names should be kept, and that if there were ten places and a thousand candidates, the thousand candidates should be examined. This would do away with the danger of upsetting that equilibrium the reversal of which the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer so much apprehended. A great mistake, however, existed on that subject. For instance, it was said that competition determined the appointment of clerks in the public offices. But what was the fact? He had that day, through the influence of a member of the Government, obtained the privilege of getting the name of a young man placed upon the list for competition, but this was an act of patronage. He was obliged for it, because the probability was, that if the name had not been so put down, the young man would never have had the opportunity of competing; but he considered the whole system of patronage in such matters much to be deprecated. He trusted the House would not accede to the Lords' Amendment, but that they would insist on a perfect, open, and complete competition, in every case.

SIR HENRY RAWLINSON observed, that the only question before the House was with reference to competition for the scientific services. He did not oppose the Motion that the House should agree with the Lords' Amendment, but he thought the nature of the clause had been entirely misunderstood when it was supposed to affect the Queen's prerogative. It must be remembered that the system of appointments in the Indian army differed entirely from that in the royal army. Her Majesty never did nominate directly—and it was not proposed by this Bill that she should nominate directly—to any branch of the Indian army. Her Majesty merely appointed on the recommendation of the Secretary of State, and could it make any difference whether that recommendation was the result of competition or of private patronage? If officers of the artillery and engineers were not to obtain appointments by competition, they would obtain them in the first instance by the nomination of members of the Council, some of whom would not owe their position to the Secretary of State or to the Crown, but to the votes of the Court of Directors. So far as the prerogative was concerned, it seemed to him that there could be no difference between recommendations which were the result of competition and recommendations which were the result of private patronage. Still he was not prepared to oppose the Lords' Amendment, and he would state why. The 34th clause did not provide for an exclusive competition, for the word "only" in the civil service clause was designedly omitted from the clause relating to the scientific branches, in order that the establishment at Addiscombe might—if it were thought advisable by the Secretary of State—be maintained. The object was to secure a double competition, the open competition proposed by the clause, and the limited competition of Addiscombe. The system of competition had already been successfully adopted in the civil service. It was now proposed that the same experiment should be tried in the case of the artillery and engineers, and he entertained a confident belief that it would be equally successful in those branches of the service. He thought it desirable, however, that the establishment at Addiscombe should be kept up, and it was scarcely worth while to insist on disagreeing with the Lords' Amendment, for whether the competition was thrown entirely open, or the limited competition of Addiscombe was retained, the candidates for the scientific branches of the service would be drawn from the same class as at present.

SIR DE LACY EVANS said, the question under discussion seemed to become more and more complicated, for it now appeared that there had been some private understanding that there was not to be an open competition, but that Addiscombe was to have its chance, and that those candidates who proved their competency would not necessarily receive appointments. No intimation of such an arrangement had, as far as he was aware, been given by any Member of Her Majesty's Government during any of the discussions that had taken place; and, notwithstanding the very able and comprehensive speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he felt bound —more so, indeed, than he had felt himself previously—to vote for disagreeing with the Lords' Amendment. He entirely concurred in the opinion of the hon. and gallant Member (Sir H. Rawlinson) as to the beneficial results which might be anticipated from competitive examinations; and the right hon. Gentleman had also made some observations for which he thanked him. He had borne testimony to the success with which the principle had been applied to the civil service in India. The question had very justly, during the present discussion, been connected with the subject of patronage, about which not a word had been said in the other House, where the question had been treated only as affecting the prerogative; but one of his main objects, in common with many other hon. Members, was to withdraw from the hands of the Minister a great portion of the patronage which this Bill would place at the disposal of the Government. He thought, also, that the effect of the competitive system upon the military information of the country ought not to be lost sight of in considering this question. The noble Member for Tiverton (Viscount Palmerston) had said on a former occasion that we were a warlike nation without being a military nation, and it was to be regretted that the people did not possess such an amount of military information as would be most useful in the defence of this country and its possessions against foreign Powers. It had been stated by two eminent Members of that House, one of them the present Lord Chancellor of Ireland, who had strongly advocated the adoption of the competitive system, that its effect was to give a stimulus to scholastic education throughout the country. The noble Lord at the head of the Government (the Earl of Derby) had spoken on this subject in "another place" in a most conciliatory tone, but all the noble Lords who had expressed their opinions had not followed his example. One of those noble Lords (Lord Campbell)—one of the highest dignitaries of the law—had accused that House of having lost its senses on this subject. That noble Lord had said that the House of Commons had gone wild, and he added that the House of Commons ought to be resisted in this course. [The hon. and gallant Member was stopped by a call of "Order" from Mr. SPEAKER.] He must say he thought the noble and learned Lord had done himself injustice, for he believed the profession in which that noble and learned Lord had gained such distinguished and deserved honour was more exposed to the principle of competition than perhaps any other in this country. Not a day passes in which the learned Members of our bar were not competitors, in fact, in these examinations, for the highest prizes of the law. The noble Lord said he was in favour of discriminative examinations, though what he meant by that term the noble and learned Lord did not very clearly explain. A noble Earl, in "another place," contended that the introduction of a system of competitive examinations would produce a social revolution, that the sons of gentlemen and of officers in the army would be excluded from the service, and that in future the appointments would be confined to the sons of rich grocers and persons of that class. Those statements were, however, wholly at variance with the facts which had been brought forward by the present Lord Chancellor of Ireland when he was a Member of that House. He showed that the system of competitive examination in Ireland had worked in a totally contrary direction—that ninety-five out of one hundred of the young men examined belonged to the most respectable classes of society, being the sons of gentlemen and men of education. He therefore regarded the argument on the other side on this subject as altogether unworthy of notice. He had the fullest confidence in the noble Lord now at the head of the Board of Control; but the noble Lord had no permanent tenure of office, and then he could not forget that while the Members of the Government in that House were in favour of competitive examination, and only opposed a technical difficulty to its being enforced by Act of Parliament, the head of the Government in the other House spoke of the principle of competition as being "on its trial," and thought it would be "highly injudicious to tie up the hands of the Executive Government," and oblige them to take the persons who had sustained the best examinations. It did not, therefore, appear to be in the contemplation of the noble Earl to give appointments as a matter of course to those who sustained the best examinations. But, without detaining the House further, he would only add that, in his opinion, the competitive principle was the best security that could be adopted for securing the efficiency of the services in the Indian army, and, therefore, he hoped they would disagree with the Lords' Amendment.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, I will in one or two words explain the grounds on which I mean to give my vote. I am one of those who are entirely in favour of the principle of appointments by competitive examination. I think it is a great improvement of recent times; but at the same time it is not universally applicable. With regard to the Civil Service I think it is an excellent system, provided always that the standard of examination is not too high, and that persons are not expected to be full of more knowledge than is necessary as a test of their capacity for the service. My opinion is that it is also a good system for the officers of the scientific branches of the army, because in regard to them high attainments are of the first importance. At the same time, it is right to admit that the application of the system to the scientific branches of the army is but of recent standing; and, therefore, those who entertain a different opinion from me may fairly be entitled to require a somewhat longer experience of the practical result of the system than has yet been obtained. My hon. and gallant Friend who has just sat down is right in saying that the application of the system of competitive examinations to the scientific branches of the British army has been perfectly satisfactory, and especially in that country of which he is so distinguished an ornament, and which has contributed a very large number of young men who are a credit to the profession with which they are connected. I disagree, however, with the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck), when he speaks of the applicability of competitive examinations for officers of the line. The test of learning which you would apply to a young man who is a candidate for a commission would be no necessary test of his capacity for the service in which he is to be engaged. It would be just as if you wished to find out whether or not a man was an excellent pugilist, and the test you applied was whether he could run fast. The test is not at all of the kind which would prove whether the man was capable of discharging the duties which he had to perform. My opinion, then, is that the House is right in maintaining for the Civil Service of India the system of competitive examinations which has now been established for several years. I am also of opinion that it would be expedient to establish the same system for the scientific branches of the Indian army which you have established for the scientific branches of the general army, and as it appears to me that principle is conceded by every one. So far as I understand the question we are now called on to determine, it is simply one as to the manner in which the competitive examinations is to be adopted. I think there is great force in the argument that it would be a departure from the ordinary principles of the constitution if we were to pass an act of Parliament which should render it imperative on the Sovereign to give commissions to particular individuals. I think the regulations which shall establish a competitive examination for the scientific branches of the Indian army ought to be based on Orders in Council coming from the royal authority, and not be a system imposed by a standing law. If, therefore, I am to understand from the Government that they are prepared to pledge themselves that they will issue an Order in Council establishing competitive examinations for the scientific branches of the Indian army, I should prefer that mode of accomplishing the object to having it done by Act of Parliament. The question is simply as to the mode of doing the thing, and it is not a question whether the thing is to be done. We have now arrived at the moment when this Bill must pass into a law. We have all of us in the course of the discussions that have taken place been compelled to surrender opinions which we have entertained, and the result will be a general compromise on the part of all those who have taken any part in carrying forward the measure. As the Lords have adopted almost all the recommendations we made, I am inclined to think that it would be graceful on our part to yield to them upon this question. I think, also, that the method of proceeding by Order in Council would be more in accordance with the general principles of the constitution than if we were to enforce the principle we are in favour of by an Act of Parliament.

MR. WHITE said, he should be sorry to impute to the noble Lord at the head of Her Majesty's Government ignorance of constitutional forms, or to say that he attached not the slightest value to the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer with regard to the prerogative of the Crown; but he must aver that the noble Lord and the right hon. Gentleman had wholly ignored the essential difference between the army of England and the army of India. He did not dispute the authority of the Crown with regard to the English army, but then there was a check upon it. Had they not a Mutiny Bill every year, and did they not grant supplies? There was no such check with regard to the army of India. He, as belonging to the middle classes, should stand by his order. He was not disposed to hand over to the Crown such power and such authority without those constitutional checks which they had a right to impose. They had a right to insist upon their original Bill; and as he considered that any one who was right could not be ridiculous, he, if he stood alone, should divide the House.

COLONEL SYKES said, that if, as he understood was the case, the Government intended to adhere in the Indian army to the practice adopted in the Queen's army —if cadets intended for the scientific branches were to compete for entry into a military college—he should vote with the noble Lord (Lord Stanley) on this question.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM: Before the President of the Board of Control addresses the House, it will perhaps be convenient for him to hear the opinion of different Members, who, like myself, have taken some little interest in the subject now under discussion. I entirely agree with the Chancellor of the Exchequer that this question of Indian patronage has really been the obstacle, certainly for half a century, to the transfer of the government of India from the Company to the Crown. It has really been at the root of the anomaly which has continued to the present time the government of that mighty empire in the hands of a commercial body. I have always felt the right solution of that question to be one of immense constitutional difficulty ; and among other reasons which swayed me throughout this Session, in an earnest desire for the postponement of the decision upon this transfer of the government, was the difficulty which I felt respecting the future distribution of this Indian patronage. Now, I am bound to say, that in my humble judgment the Bill before us, as it went up from the Commons to the Lords, did in a very fair manner solve the difficulty by the distribution of patronage which it provided. To Her Majesty directly was given, by the 29th clause of this Bill, a great accession of patronage. The Governor General of India, the Governors of the Presidencies, the fourth member of the Council of India, and the Advocate General—all these officers are henceforth to be appointed by Her Majesty under warrant and by her sign manual. It placed these offices at the sole disposal of Her Majesty, acting by her constitutional advisers, whereas heretofore none of these appointments were made by the Crown ; and with respect, I think, only to one of them, that of the Governor General (I am not quite sure as to the Governors of the Presidencies), the power of veto only was heretofore vested in Her Majesty. Then with respect to the civil patronage, as has been already stated, the arrangement which has prevailed for three years under an Order in Council — namely, that the civil service shall be open to the free competition of all classes—has now been confirmed by a clause assented to by both Houses, and is thus rendered irrevocable, except by a repeal of this Act duly sanctioned by the Legislature. Such a concession appears to me a most important one. It recognizes, for the first time in an Act of Parliament, the principle of open competition with reference to a great branch of the public service. Much, therefore, as it appears to me, is gained by the measure as it stands. But then comes the constitutional question :—By tying up that, or other portions of the patronage, do we infringe the prerogative ? The House of Lords, in their Reasons, seem to assert that such an infringement is involved in the clause, as we sent it up to them, respecting a portion of the Indian patronage. Now, I cannot draw that fine distinction between the military patronage and other large portions of the civil patronage. In the very clause which gives to Her Majesty the great appointments I have mentioned, those of the Governor General and the Governors of the Presidencies, there is a special reservation of another very important branch of patronage relating to the Councils of the Governors of the different Presidencies ; and there is a statutable assignment of that patronage for ever, not to Her Majesty, but to the Secretary of State in Council, with the concurrence of a majority of his Council. The clause does not say that Her Majesty's pleasure shall be taken. It does not even provide that these appointments shall take place under the sign manual. As I read the clause, these appointments are absolutely vested in the Secretary of State and a majority of his Council. Here, then, is a very important branch of patronage not to be exercised by the Crown ; and with respect to the junior members of the civil service, I have already stated that these appointments are, by the consent of the House of Lords, henceforth to be given to those who upon an examination shall stand first in point of merit. The constitutional objection, therefore, whatever may be its force, appears to me to apply equally to both these provisions. Now, it is very remarkable that in the Bill of the noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston) it was provided that there should be an attestation in respect to the European troops, to be furnished by Her Majesty in Council. The Bill sent up to the Lords provides no such attestation, and does not deal in the slightest degree with the transfer to the Crown of the attesting power with respect to the European portion of the Indian army. Clause 40, in the noble Lord's Bill, declared that all Indian officers henceforth should be the officers of Her Majesty. There is no such declaration in the Bill which we sent up to the other House. We have hitherto studiously reserved the entire question of the Indian army. It was so stated by the noble Lord (Lord Stanley), who, in answer to the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Vernon Smith), said that the whole question of the Indian army was referred to a Commission here, and partly also to a Commission in India, and that the subjects connected with the reorganization of that army were not to be mixed up with the question at present under discussion. Now, Clause 33 of this Bill, as we sent it up to the Lords, has drawn quite rightly the distinction between the military and the civil services. It has most guardedly recognized, to a certain extent, the authority of the Crown, yet without making a complete concession of the whole appointments to the Indian army. With regard to the civil service, it is distinctly provided that those persons only, without exception, who shall succeed in open competition shall be appointed; and as to the military service, Clause 33 enacts that the names of all persons nominated in the manner which the Bill provides shall be submitted and recommended to Her Majesty. But there is a reservation as to the scientific branches —the artillery and engineers; and in the clause immediately following that to which I have adverted, even with respect to them, as we sent it up to the Lords, persons who receive the certificate of superior merit are to be recommended for these appointments; clearly, therefore, recognizing the general controlling power of the Crown—not going the length as regards the military which we went as regards the civil service—but adhering to the principle that open competition in the Indian army, as in Her Majesty's army in the scientific branches, ought to be the rule of appointment. Now, it only remains to consider the question as between an Order in Council and an enactment by statute. If I could bring myself to believe that the application of the statute to the Indian army, in which Her Majesty's authority is not now supreme, was a dangerous infringement of the prerogative, nothing would induce me to vote in favour of that principle. It appears to me, however, there is no such infraction of this prerogative. But we are told that we in this House are enamoured of this principle of open competition, and that it may with advantage be applied to ourselves. Now, I do not wish to bandy any jeers and gibes of that kind with the other House of Parliament. To do so would conduce neither to the dignity of either branch of the Legislature, nor be quite consistent with the public interests. I am, however, entitled, in reply to such an allusion, to ask where is hereditary wisdom to be found? In what consists the justice of the taunt that India must henceforward be governed by gentlemen to the exclusion of the middle classes—a gentleman being defined to be something between a Peer of Parliament and those who buy and sell? Is this, I would ask, the only argument that can be advanced against the system of competitive examinations? Who, let me ask, founded—who won our Indian empire? Those who bought and sold. Who extended it? Those who bought and sold. Who now transfer that empire to the Crown? Those who bought and sold—a company of merchants—merchants, forsooth! whose sons are now not thought worthy to have even inferior offices in India committed to their hands. But are the sons of those who buy and sell necessarily not entitled to the appellation of gentlemen? Definitions are dangerous, but I should, nevertheless, like to know what it is that constitutes a gentleman. Why, Sir, it appears to me that if a man be imbued with sound Christian principles, if he have received an enlightened and liberal education, if he be honest, and virtuous, and honourable — it appears to me, I say, that such a man is entitled to the appellation. And who will tell me that among the sons of those who buy and sell may not be found men possessing literary attainments and a refinement of mind which places them in a position to bear comparison with the highest born nobleman in the land? Who, let me ask, were the conquerors of India? From what class have they sprung? Who was Clive? The son of a yeoman. Who was Munro? The son of a Glasgow merchant. Who was Malcolm? The son of a sheep farmer upon the Scotch borders:—

> "Curibus parvis et paupere terrâ > Missus in imperium magnum."

These, Sir, are the men who have won for us our Indian empire, and I entertain no fear that the sons of those who buy and sell, and who enter the Indian service by means of this principle of open competition, will fail to maintain a high position in our army, or that they will do anything to dishonour the English name. I have none of those fears, therefore, with respect to the adoption of this principle which are in some quarters entertained. I believe it gives a greater security to the appointment of efficient men than a mere system of patronage would afford. Patronage is liable to be constantly abused for personal or political purposes. It operates in many instances in cases in which the person who makes the appointment has little or no knowledge of the person upon whom the appointment is conferred. Open competition, on the contrary, brings the man before you. And what are his claims when he does present himself? In the first place, he brings with him the assurance that he is a man of industrious habits. He also affords some guarantee that he is a man of great self-control; that his life has been spent in virtuous pursuits, inasmuch as his attainments point out a preference for mental as contrasted with sensual enjoyments. Then, what is the ennobling spirit of his life? Ambition. A desire for honourable fame. What are the domestic virtues which he exhibits? A desire to win the favour and approbation of his friends, and eventually, in many cases, to contribute to the support of aged parents and other relatives. Such are the moral qualities which the principle of open competition will evince and secure, and upon these grounds I for one prefer that principle deliberately to patronage with all its corrupting influences. I cannot believe that I am violating any public duty or infringing any prerogative of the Crown in advocating the extension to a small portion of the appointments in the military service in India of a principle which Parliament has consented to apply to the whole of the Civil Service in that country. I cannot see the fine-drawn distinction which appears to be made between the two services; and if I am driven to a division, I shall feel compelled to record my vote against the Amendment which has been introduced into this clause in the other House of Parliament. At the same time I will put it to the House whether, under all the circumstances, it be really right to go to a division. I wish to pay no fine compliment to the noble Lord the President of the Board of Control. He has told us in emphatic terms that he would rather resign his office to-morrow than take any step which, in his conscience and judgment, he believed to be subversive of the principle for which he, in common with myself, has contended. In the honour of the noble Lord I place the most implicit reliance. I am perfectly willing to place trust in him, but I must be permitted to say that I do not think he now knows all the difficulties with which this Amendment is surrounded. I feel confident, however, that he would not give to it his support if he were not of opinion that, consistently with his duty, he could uphold the principle which I advocate. I am also prepared to admit that there is this difference between the application of the principle of open competition to the civil and its extension to the military service. In the case of the former you have experience to guide you; while in the case of the latter you do not as yet possess that salutary advantage. If, moreover, we leave this important question for the present, subject to be dealt with by an order in Council, experience will soon come to our assistance and tell us whether it be or be not desirable to fix by means of a legislative enactment the footing upon which it is for the future to stand. Having made these observations, I beg again to repeat my adherence to the principle of unrestricted competition, and if, therefore, the House should go to a division—a course of which I doubt the policy—it will be my duty to vote against the Amendment to which the noble Lord asks us to assent.

LORD STANLEY: I concur with the right hon. Gentleman in every word which he has said with respect to the advantages of the system of open competition as opposed to the system of patronage. I agree with him, moreover, in the comments which by implication he has made upon the remarks to which expression has been given elsewhere upon this subject, and I am quite willing to repeat this evening to the House the pledge which a few days ago I ventured to give — namely, that I would support no proposition, come from what quarter it might, which in my judgment was hostile to the principle of open and unrestricted competition. What we have now to consider, however, is, whether, owing to the Amendment which has been introduced into this clause, that principle is or is not really in danger. We are not at present dealing with appointments in the Civil Service, or in the non-scientific branches of the army. It has been agreed on all hands that the Civil Service should remain open. It has been agreed, also, that for the present, at all events, the competitive principle should not be applied to the non-scientific branches of the military service. We are dealing exclusively with the Artillery and Engineers. The question which we have to consider, however, is not whether the system of open competition should be applied in the case of admissions to these two branches of the service. To its adoption in those instances the Government has given its assent. The real point at issue is, whether the application of that system should be regulated by an Act of Parliament or an Order in Council. The framing of such an Order in Council will necessarily rest with myself, and neither I, nor the Government of which I am a Member, could come to this House and say that we had fulfilled our pledges if that Order in Council were not to sanction the adoption of this principle of open competition in its fullest extent. Well, then comes the question, in what consists the difference, practically speaking, between the clause, as amended by the other House of Parliament, and as it stood when we sent it up to that House? Merely in the circumstance that in the latter case the guarantee—for the maintenance of the principle of free competition was supposed to be contained—I say advisedly was supposed—in the Act itself, whereas, if the Amendment of the House of Lords be adopted, it will rest upon the security of an Order in Council, backed, as I believe, by the universal feeling of the public, and by the power of this House, to intervene at any future time in case the agreement that has been come to should not be observed. Now, I say, that this supposed guarantee appeared to be, rather than was, actually embodied in the clause as it left the House of Commons. The clause then provided, "that candidates who might be found entitled, &c., might be recommended for appointments according to the order of their proficiency." "Recommended;" yes, but not appointed. There was nothing in the clause as it originally stood to render it compulsory on the Crown to make those appointments. All that it made imperative was, that the Minister for India should "recommend" to the Crown those who had passed one of these competitive examinations in the order of their success. The clause, therefore, afforded no legal guarantee that they would receive the appointments to which they had become entitled. It, no doubt, gave you a moral guarantee upon the subject, and that guarantee, I contend, the clause, as amended, still contains. For my own part, I have great faith in the system of competition by means of examinations. It is of comparatively recent origin, but it has steadily made its way. Every year brings over to it some new converts from the ranks of those by whom it was at first opposed. It will, I believe, prove itself eventually to be stronger than all Governments and all Parliaments—superior to every influence which can be brought to bear against it. Holding that belief, I am the less solicitous about the precise degree of cogency which may be supposed to belong to the machinery by which this system is proposed to be carried into effect. I would now ask the House to consider what has been done by the supporters of the competitive principle during the progress of the measure under our notice. The scientific branches of the army were not open to competition of even a modified character, except in the case of that very limited competition which took place amongst those who had already been nominated to Addiscombe. Whatever may be done under the Order in Council in that direction is so much clear gain to the principle which we advocate. And this is not all: for though practically the civil service was open to competition after the pledge given by the Government of 1853, yet it was not until the present year that the pledge was embodied in an Act of Parliament, and thus placed on an irrevocable footing. I mention these facts, because I think hon. Gentlemen who object to this Amendment do not quite understand the advance that has been made in this respect. We have for the first time declared that a Parliamentary title shall be given to Executive appointments. That is a new principle, which has not hitherto prevailed in this country. That principle you have extended to the civil service. Let me say, in passing, that when you have once admitted the principle, and laid down a rule to give a Parliamentary title to one class of offices, it is very difficult to draw a distinction that will limit its application to the civil service only. I think, therefore, that the advocates of the competitive system have gained largely already. With respect to the military service, it is simply placed upon the same footing as was the civil service five years ago, when competition was established by Order in Council. Looking at that circumstance, and, seeing that the principle of a Parliamentary title to Executive appointments has already been recognized by both Houses, it seems to me that the difference between that which we proposed and that which the other House has adopted is so small that, considering upon how many points they have given way, we should be justified in accepting the Amendment of the House of Lords.

MR. CONINGHAM said, he must declare his preference for a statutory regulation over a mere Order in Council. He was in favour of open and fair competition as opposed to a system of patronage; and when they looked back to the way in which the patronage of the Horse Guards, which was in reality the patronage of the Court, had been administered for the last few years, he saw no reason to add to that patronage which the Court already possessed. Therefore he declared himself most strongly and emphatically in favour of open competition; and if the House of Commons yielded on this question, they would give way on a point which he considered to be of the utmost importance.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 98; Noes 53: Majority 45.

On the Lords' Amendment, in page 17, line 18,

MR. GRIFFITH said, it appeared to him that the whole clause would be perfectly useless if that Amendment were retained, inasmuch as the announcement which it was proposed should be made to Parliament would merely state a fact which must previously have become known to the public.

LORD STANLEY said, what the Lords really meant was that in no case should publicity be required within less than three months after the order for commencing hostilities was sent out. The reason for inserting three months he took to be this—namely, to enable the Governor General to communicate with the Government at home, after he had received the order, and before it was made known to Parliament. It might so happen that the Governor General might reply that he had no means, without receiving reinforcements, of commencing hostilities. In that case the order would have to be suspended, and it would be very inconvenient if, in the interval, the order had been communicated to Parliament and the public, and the enemy had become acquainted with the intentions of the Government.

Resolved, that this House doth not insist on its disagreements to the Lords' Amendments in page 17, line 18.

Lords' further Amendment to Clause 54 agreed to.

REWARDS TO MEMBERS.—RESOLUTION.

MR. SCHNEIDER said, he wished to give some explanation with reference to a question which he had put the other night to the Attorney General. That question arose out of the Resolution passed on the 22nd of June, on the Motion of the noble Lord the Member for the East Riding (Lord Hotham) relative to remuneration given to Members for business done in the House. That Resolution he believed to be utterly impracticable with reference to the purpose for which it was introduced; and could not be carried into effect. He fully agreed with the spirit of the Resolution, but had divided the House against it, because he thought it highly inexpedient that a Resolution should be placed on the books of the House which must be continually evaded. He wished the House clearly to understand, that if this feeling which induced him and those who voted with him to oppose this Resolution, and he thought it only fair that this explanation should be put upon record as their motives had been much misinterpreted; but the language was so wide as to include cases which had not been contemplated by the noble Lord (Lord Hotham) who had moved it. Especially it had not been intended to apply to the case of the Attorney and Solicitor General, but yet the language embraced both of them. These officers were paid, not by salaries, but by fees, and it could not be the intention of the House that they should be deprived of their fees. But since the Resolution had been passed more than one member of the long robe had supported measures in reference to which he had at one time or another received a fee. The Resolution would even apply to the hon. Member for Whitby (Mr. Stephenson). Years ago that hon. Member had been asked to give his advice on the main drainage of the metropolis and had received a fee for so doing; and in this Session he had lent his assistance to carry out a Bill embodying his views. But no one ever thought of calling his conduct in question, although he had distinctly violated the language of the Resolution; on the contrary, the House felt deeply indebted to that hon. Gentleman for the able assistance he had rendered throughout the discussions on that Bill. In the present state of the House, and at this period of the Session, he (Mr. Schneider) felt that he would not be doing his duty if he did more than call the attention of the House to the subject; but he hoped that some Member of the Government would take the matter into his consideration, and would next Session bring forward some Resolution which would really carry out the intention of the noble Lord (Lord Hotham), while it should be free from the objections which he had stated. He was afraid that several hon. Members had had imputations cast upon them in consequence of the language of the Resolution. The noble Lord who had moved it, if he had been present, would, he felt confident, have corroborated his statement, that he had never intended to cast imputations upon hon. Members. In conclusion, he would move that the terms of the Resolution should be read.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Resolution of the House of the 22nd day of June last relative thereto be read," put, and agreed to.

Resolution read.

MR. WARREN said, that he rose before the Attorney General, for the purpose of saying a few words on this subject on his own account, and also on behalf of the noble Lord to whose recent Resolution the matter before the House related. He had received a letter from his noble Friend requesting him to explain the cause of his absence—a public engagement in the country made by him some time ago, when he could not have supposed that on the last day of the Session any such Motion as this could come on. His noble Friend further authorized him to state, that before leaving town, his attention had been called to this matter, in the House, by the hon. Member for Norwich, and that the case of the Attorney and Solicitor General, in respect of Government business, had not been unforeseen by him in framing his Resolution. What they did in the House of Commons, in Government matters, was part of their official duty, and their professional fees were their necessary official remuneration. Their conduct in Government cases, therefore, was no more open to exception than that of a Minister of the Crown who is paid by salary. Having thus expressed the views of his noble Friend, whose character and position gave him such great weight in this House, he (Mr. Warren) begged briefly to explain his own, by saying that they were in entire accordance with those of his noble Friend in framing his Resolution, in the policy of which he had concurred from the first. That Resolution had received, in a very decisive manner, the approbation of the House, after ample discussion, having passed by a majority of 210 against 27, and ought not lightly to be disturbed. If he (Mr. Warren) had considered that it involved any discredit or dishonour in respect of the great profession to which he had the honour to belong, he would on no account have supported it, but it did no such thing. He appealed to many of those then present to recollect how very guarded and courteous his noble Friend had been in advocating his Resolution, showing that nice regard for the feelings of the members of a powerful and honourable profession which characterized all that he (Lord Hotham) said and did, to all persons, whether in or out of the House. He did not even glance at any individual, or any particular transaction, but expressed what was, and ought to be, the opinion of the House on a matter of great moment to its own privileges and character before the country. He (Mr. Warren) said emphatically, that to do what that Resolution denounced, was contrary to the usage, and derogatory to the dignity of that House; and it was a Resolution perfectly intelligible as it stood, though its terms were certainly very comprehensive. Such a case as that now before the House, however, was clearly not within the spirit of the Resolution, and he urged the Government to pause before they unsettled and reopened a Resolution which had so unequivocally received the fiat of the House, and which related to a matter of so much difficulty and delicacy.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he regretted that the hon. Member for Norwich (Mr. Schneider) had been prevented from calling their attention at an earlier period of the Session to the terms of the Resolution. That Resolution was one of very great importance, not so much as affecting the interests of members of the bar who were also Members of that House, but as affecting in an important degree the independence of every Member of Parliament and the interests of every subject in the realm. If the Resolution had gone no further than absolutely to prohibit any Member of the House from receiving pecuniary or other rewards in respect of the discharge of his duties in that House, no one could have taken exception to it, for such a thing would not only be unconstitutional and illegal, but altogether unworthy and unbecoming any Member of Parliament; but the Resolution went much further than that. He had to express his grateful thanks to the hon. Member for Norwich, for having given him a private intimation of a report which he had heard, and which had been confirmed by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Wallingford, that it was really believed by some persons that he (the Attorney General) had accepted a large sum—£500, he believed, had been named—from some Indian prince or gentleman, with a view to services to be performed in that House. He should not have thought it necessary to refer at all to so silly a story—which he need hardly say was absolutely untrue—were it not that it afforded him an opportunity of saying, that certainly on a recent occasion a very large sum of money was offered to him on behalf of one of those individuals who had lately sought justice, or what they thought justice, at the hands of the British Parliament. He took the opportunity of informing the gentleman—who was not any prince of the Royal House of Oude or of Surat—that anything of the kind was so utterly inconsistent with our notions of duty and propriety, and so contrary to the constitution of this country, that any one who made such an offer would be exposed to some personal risk, and he believed that no such offer had been made to any Member of that House since. In answer to the inquiry of the hon. Member for Norwich, he begged to state that it was his intention at the very earliest period of next Session to direct the notice of the House to the Resolution carried by his noble Friend, and to the effect it had in respect to the members of the Bar who were also Members of that House. From what passed when the Resolution was under discussion, it seemed to be believed, chiefly by Members on the other side of the House, that the Resolution would prohibit Members not only from accepting remuneration for anything done in the discharge of their duty, in the House, but that it would also apply to any Member who gave his legal opinion on any case which might result ultimately in proceedings before either House of Parliament. He would not refer to the well-known and ancient practice by which the Attorney and Solicitor Generals were bound, in the discharge of their duty, to give their opinions upon all Bills submitted to this House, and upon all proceedings taken out of this House in which the rights of the Crown were in any way concerned. If that practice were departed from the Crown would be left without the assistance which had always been deemed necessary for the protection of its interests; but without referring now to this question, it was perfectly obvious, and on a future occasion he should be able to satisfy the House, that if the noble Lord's Resolution was made applicable to the case of a counsel who, being consulted by an individual from India or elsewhere, and recommending an appeal to Parliament, was afterwards precluded from taking part in any discussion on the subject, the necessary and inevitable effect would be to prevent a person who had suffered wrongs in any of our Colonies from consulting the most eminent counsel (who were generally Members of this House) lest upon the opinion given, a resort to Parliament should ultimately be found necessary, and he should then be deprived of their advocacy. If a barrister had given his opinion professionally that the case submitted to him was a just and righteous one, upon what ground should he be prevented from advocating it in this House? The question involved large and important considerations, and his conviction was, that the Resolution was entirely superfluous and unnecessary, inasmuch as he scarcely believed there existed a member of the Bar—whether of England, Scotland, or Ireland—who had, within our own times, received any description of remuneration in any shape or way of which the most honourable, the most fastidious man in the Queen's dominions could complain. Entertaining this conviction, he would say no more than that, while on the one hand he should be among the first to stand forward and secure, if it were necessary, the dignity and the purity of the Bar from reproach or suspicion, he should certainly feel it his duty at an earlier period next Session to bring the whole question under the consideration of the House, and he was sure the members of the profession would be perfectly content with the decision at which the House might then arrive.

The Attorney General

Mr. INGHAM said, he was glad to hear that there would be some general discussion upon the subject embraced in the noble Lord's Resolution. There was no case within his knowledge, nor did he believe that any existed, in which any member of the Bar, after giving his advice on a case submitted to him professionally, had received pecuniary compensation for his advocacy in Parliament; and if the Resolution which had been come to were carried out as strictly as it was said it might be, the result would be to deprive this House of the valuable information which its legal Members were able to bring to bear upon subjects which might come before it.

On the Motion that the House, at its rising, adjourn until Monday,

MAJOR GENERAL INGLIS.

QUESTION.

Colonel NORTH said, he rose to ask the President of the Board of Control whether it was intended, either by Her Majesty's Government or by the East India Company, to propose the grant of a pension to Major General Sir John Eardley Wilmot Inglis, K.C.B., for his distinguished services in the defence of the Residency at Lucknow. He had delayed any allusion to this subject until the last moment, hoping that the Government or the Company would have rendered any such step on his part unnecessary, by themselves, recognizing the services of General Inglis; and it was with pain and regret that he asked the question now, convinced as he was that it would have been far more gratifying to the feelings of this distinguished officer if any such recognition of his services had been spontaneously made by them. He (Colonel North) would not do the House the injustice to suppose that the events of the siege of Lucknow and its heroic defence had passed from their memories. Viscount Canning, in his general order of the 9th of December, 1857, had done justice to this heroic defence, and had spoken of Brigadier Inglis in terms of the highest praise. He might refer to the despatches of Sir J. Outram and Sir C. Campbell to show the high sense which they entertained of the services which had been rendered by the magnificent defence made by the garrison of Lucknow, and their admiration of the gallantry and ability which had been displayed by Major General Inglis, its commandant. The three most remarkable events connected with the contests in which we had been recently engaged, and those which excited the highest admiration, were the defence of Kars, the defence of Lucknow, and the relief of that band of heroes, who had formed its garrison by Sir H. Havelock. The defence of Lucknow had lasted for no less a period than eighty-seven days, and had resulted in saving to the Indian Government no less a sum than twenty-four lacs of rupees, thirty guns in position, an immense amount of ammunition, the jewels of the King, and, above all, in the preservation of the lives and honour of a large number of our countrywomen and their children. Major General Inglis had conducted that defence to a successful issue, and had, moreover, retained the responsibility of the command of the garrison, even after it had been relieved by Outram and Havelock. Now, what reward, he would ask, had been conferred upon him for services such as these? The gallant defender of Kars, as a reward for what he had done, had been made a general officer, a Knight Commander of the Bath, a Baronet, had in addition received a pension, and was at the present moment Commandant at Woolwich. That gallant officer, he was ready to admit, merited all the honours which a grateful country could confer upon him, while Sir H. Havelock, who had also performed most distinguished services for England, and who had relieved the garrison at Lucknow, had been made a general officer, a Knight Commander of the Bath, a Baronet, had received a pension, had been appointed to the command of a regiment, and had received a command in India. Brigadier Inglis, however, whose conduct had been spoken of in terms so flattering by Sir J. Outram and Sir C. Campbell, who had prosecuted a "magnificent" defence to a successful issue, had up to this moment received merely the honour of being made a Knight of the Bath and a general officer. He held, it was true, also at the present moment a command in India; but what, he would ask, was the cause of his being present in England at this moment? It was the state of his health, which had become considerably impaired, and what, under these circumstances, would be likely to be the result of his return to India, whither he (Colonel North) believed he was about to proceed towards the close of the year? He would not be able to endure the climate of that country, and must, therefore, in all probability, return to England as a general officer, with £400 a year. In consequence of his having been removed from the command of the 32nd Regiment, and promoted to the rank of a general officer, he (Colonel North) believed that Major General Inglis was placed in a worse position than he had occupied before. As colonel of the 32nd Regiment he might, if his health had failed him, have exchanged into a regiment on home service, or to one which was on duty in a more favourable climate. He could also very easily have retired from the command of the regiment by the sale of his commission. Owing to his promotion, however, he would have great difficulty in disposing of his commission as a general officer. He should, under these circumstances, put it to the House whether in their opinion Major General Inglis had received a sufficient reward for the very distinguished services which he had rendered to his country? That gallant officer was, however, but a single instance of the pecuniary loss which promotions sometimes entailed. Colonel Lake, who had been the right-hand man of the hon. and gallant Member for Calne in his defence of Kars, furnished another example. That distinguished soldier had been removed from the East India Company's service to the Queen's, and that removal had, in a pecuniary point of view, been his ruin. He found that, as an Engineer officer, there was no employment for him in our service, whereas if he had continued in the service of the Company he might have had an appointment of not less than £1,600 a year. True, he had been made an aide-de-camp to the Queen; but he might have received that honour and remained in the Company's service. With regard, however, to Sir John Inglis, he (Colonel North) was confident that there was not a man in the country who would not rejoice to find the Government rewarding him in a manner that was commensurate with the value of his services. For his part, he did not see why the same honours should not be conferred upon him that had been awarded to Sir H. Havelock.

SIR WALTER FARQUHAR said, he was glad that his hon. and gallant Friend had with so much ability brought under the consideration of the House the services of that most distinguished officer Sir J. Inglis. The House ought, of course, to be careful how they trenched upon the prerogative of the Crown in interfering with the recommendations of the executive Government; but he could not help recollecting that on a former occasion, when the services of that distinguished man, Sir Henry Havelock, were brought before the House by the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton, who proposed that a pension of £1,000 a year should be settled upon him, many hon. Members stated that they did not think that was an adequate remuneration for so great a man; and the feeling of the House was so unanimous against the grant of so small a remuneration, that the noble Lord yielded to it, and willingly, and he must say most gracefully, came forward on a subsequent occasion to propose that £1,000 should be settled upon Sir Henry Havelock for life, and that the pension on his death should pass to his most gallant son. And more than that, when the country had occasion to lament the loss of that valuable life—when that gallant man fell, borne down by fatigue, by action, by exposure, by over-strained exertions of body and mind, £1,000 was also settled upon Lady Havelock. That generosity on the part of the Government was hailed throughout the country with universal satisfaction; and he was confident that the country would be delighted to hear that it was the intention of the Government to recommend that a pension be settled on Sir J. Inglis. He held in his hand an extract from a despatch written by Sir J. Inglis to General Havelock, on the 25th of August, which showed more clearly than any words which he could use what was the condition of the garrison of Lucknow at that time. He had seen the original of this most remarkable document, the smallest possible scrap of paper, which was carried to General Havelock by a cossid after that General's first retirement from Lucknow. He (Sir W. Farquhar) had had himself the satisfaction of taking it to Lady Chelmsford, the mother of Lady Inglis. Every word of it relating to Lucknow was written in Greek, for the purpose of preventing the information reaching the enemy should it fall into his hands; the rest was written in English. He would take the liberty of reading the extract, which was as follows:—

Colonel North

"You must bear in mind how I am hampered; that I have upwards of 120 sick and wounded, and at the least 220 women and 130 children, and no carriage of any description, besides sacrificing 23 lacs of treasure, and 30 guns of all sorts. In consequence of the news, I shall soon put the force on half rations, unless I hear again from you. Our provisions will last us till about the 10th of September. If you hope to save this force, no time must be lost in pushing forwards. We are daily being attacked by the enemy, who are within a few yards of our defences. Their mines have already weakened our post, and I have every reason to believe they are carrying on others. Their 18-pounders are within 150 yards of some of our batteries, and from their position and our inability to form working parties we cannot reply to them, and the damage done hourly is very great. My strength now in Europeans is 350, and about 300 Natives, and the men dreadfully harassed, and owing to part of the Residency having been brought down by round shot many are without shelter. Our Native Horse having been assured, on Colonel Tytler's authority, of your near approach some twenty-five days ago are naturally losing confidence, and if they leave us I do not see how the defences are to be manned. Since the above was written, the enemy have sprung another mine, which has given us a great deal of trouble and caused some loss.'

In giving praise to this distinguished man he wished it to be distinctly understood that he did not at all mean to detract from the praise due to the illustrious Sir Henry Lawrence; for it was owing to his precautions that the garrison were able to hold out at all. But Sir Henry Lawrence died on the 4th of July, and Mr. Banks, who succeeded him, was killed on the 22nd. From the 22nd of July till its relief the whole responsibility of the lives of the men, women, and children, and the garrison of Lucknow, devolved upon Sir J. Inglis. By God's mercy, he (Sir W. Farquhar) had been permitted to see his son, who was lying prostrate with fever and wounds at Lucknow, and who lamented that on that account he was not able to do the hard work which others did, nor to be so useful as he could have wished, but who was ready to lay down his life to save those who were intrusted to his care. He had heard that son recount with his own lips in glowing terms what others did in defence of the garrison of Lucknow. He told him, with the highest pleasure, of the undaunted courage, unceasing vigilance, and heroic endurance of that noble garrison. It was due to that commander, who, by his energy, ability, and courage, gave so splendid an example to the garrison, that some great compliment should be paid to him by the country for which he had suffered and fought. He trusted that the Government would listen to the recommendations of his hon. and gallant Friend. The highest authority in "another place"—no less than the Prime Minister himself—had stated that the defence of Lucknow by Sir John Inglis was one of the most remarkable of modern times.

THE ACCOUNTS OF THE WAR DEPARTMENT.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. MACARTNEY said, he rose to call the attention of the House to the paper No. 346 (Army Account 1856-7), in which appears the Report of the Commissioners of Audit, condemning the system of keeping and furnishing the accounts of army receipts and expenditure in the War Department, with the correspondence between the said Commissioners, the Treasury, and War Department. Also, to the paper, No. 424 (Establishment of the Consolidated War Department), with the view of pressing the appointment of professional actuaries to examine and arrange the army accounts for 1856, 1857, and 1858-9; so as to enable the House to ascertain the correct army expenditure previous to the next Session of Parliament, when forming estimates for the year 1859-60; and, further, to place the civil establishment under the Minister at War upon a better and more efficient system than exists at present. In the present mode of keeping the accounts in the War Department there was no means of arriving at a clear debtor and creditor account, and there was great danger, unless the Treasury and the War Minister took the matter up and remedied the false system which was pursued, that serious and heavy losses must occur. In one department of the War Office large defalcations and great mismanagement had already been made public. In 1855-56 the Commissioners of Audit recommended a similar system to be adopted in the War Department to that which prevailed in the navy. The system pursued at the War Office, if adopted by any man in trade, would prevent his being able at the end of the year to balance his books. In 1856-57, owing to the difficulty of dealing with the accounts, the Commissioners of Audit repeated their objection to the system pursued. The object he (Mr. Macartney) had in bringing this matter forward was, that before any further change was made, the Treasury and War Minister should look into this matter and see what could be done. It appeared that it had been resolved that the accounts of the Royal Artillery and Engineers were to be removed from the hands of Messrs. Cox and Co.; and a gentleman who had risen from the ranks, as gunner, no doubt a person of character and ability, had been made paymaster of those corps. He had been employed in the topographical department of the War Office, at a salary of £200 a year, and he was now to have £600 a year, and had given security for £8,000, whilst no less a sum than £50,000 would pass through his hands monthly. Such a serious change as this should be well considered, and he hoped that the Government before next Session would take steps to put the accounts of the War Office on the system recommended by the Commissioners of Audit. The great defect was, that there was no competent Accountant General attached to the department. When the consolidation of the Ordnance with the War Department took place, no such officer had been appointed; Mr. Henry Smith, who was chief clerk and accountant in the Ordnance Department, having retired, Mr. Kirby, who had been fifty-one years in the service, and had retired on his full pension in 1854, was induced to return to active life, and to accept the office of Accountant General of the amalgamated offices on a salary of £1,500 a year. There was not, he believed, a more upright or honourable man in the office than Mr. Kirby, but it was cruel to him to bring him back to the service in that way. Moreover it was notorious that his system of accounts was that which was objected to by the Commissioners of Audit. He mentioned this to show the necessity of adopting the recommendation of the Audit Office. There was another great source of complaint in the system introduced into the Ordnance Office, arising out of the mode of promoting the clerks. He had brought that question before Parliament in 1854, but the House seemed impressed with the competitive principle, and it decided that the heads of departments had a right to select the best men for promotion instead of adhering to the system of seniority. Nevertheless, he wished now to call attention to the injustice towards the permanent clerks by the introduction of temporary clerks, many of whom obtained advantages over the permanent staff. Formerly there used to be very few clerks appointed in that way; but the late Minister for War had increased them to the number of 160. These men were not under the usual restrictions as to age. One temporary clerk was 54 when he entered only four years ago, and some of them enjoyed much larger salaries than were given to regular clerks of much longer standing. He hoped the minute would be produced next Session which granted to Colonel Mundy (who was appointed Under Secretary for War, under the Duke of Newcastle, and remained in office only two years and ten months) a pension of two-thirds of his salary. In 1855-56 the expenditure of the War Department exceeded the estimates by considerably more than £2,000,000, and in 1856-57 by no less than £1,194,927. All these matters he brought forward to show how imperfectly the accounts of the War Department were kept, and how impossible it was to ascertain and to check its expenditure. He hoped the subject would occupy the serious attention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Minister for War during the recess.

MR. G. A. HAMILTON said, that the Government did intend during the recess to examine into the whole question of the mode of keeping the public accounts not merely in reference to the War Department, but with regard to all the Departments of the State. They had had before them the Report of the Committee on Public Moneys which sat two years ago. The Committee had dealt with the question in the fullest manner, and had suggested various improvements with regard to the mode of keeping and checking the accounts, and of laying them before Parliament. All these points had been considered, and a Treasury Minute had been drawn up with regard to them. That Minute would be considered by the Government during the recess, in the hope that they might be able early next Session to introduce some improvement in the present system. With regard to the complications in the accounts of some years' standing, he could not be expected to enter upon any explanation with regard to them. Whether the war had had anything to do with these complications it was impossible for him to say.

ARMY REGULATIONS.—THE ORDER OF THE BATH.

OBSERVATIONS.

LORD ELCHO said, he rose to call attention to the Army Regulation which requires an officer to have served six years before he can be promoted to the rank of Major; and further, to call attention to the limitation of the Order of the Bath to Field Officers, in consequence of which there are now no means of rewarding an officer below that rank in the British Army. His Motion had been on the paper for some months, but he had deferred it from time to time in the hope that he should have been able to have brought it on at an early hour on that, the last night of the Session. In the then state of the House, however—which, indeed, was not a House, there not being sufficient Members present to constitute a House—it would be as absurd to make a set speech on the matter as it would be to address an elaborate oration on the British constitution to a small dinner party of six. He should therefore confine his remarks within the smallest possible compass. He wished, first, to direct attention to the Army Regulation which required that an officer should have served six years before he could be promoted to the rank of Major. He was far from objecting to that regulation as a general rule, for he thought that it tended both to the efficiency of the public service and to the benefit of the officers themselves, preventing the possibility of favouritism or anything like jobbing in time of peace. Nor was it peculiar to this country, for both in the French and Sardinian armies an officer must serve eight years before he could be promoted, in time of peace, to a rank equivalent to that of Major in the British Army. The defect in our regulations, however, was that no provision was made for a modification of the rule in time of war. That was the time when a man showed what he was—whether he had aptitude and ability for his profession. In the French and Sardinian armies the probationary period was reduced one-half during war service—a year in Algiers or in the Crimea counting for two—so that in eight years in war time a man might become a major general, whereas it would require sixteen years in peace before he could do so. This was the principle which he wished to see adopted in this country; and the practice in the sister service warranted it. A man might become a post captain at twenty-two; but, supposing him to enter the army at eighteen, he could not be a major, a far less responsible position, before twenty-four. He ventured to suggest that some such system as that which prevailed in the French and Sardinian armies might in time of war be with advantage applied to our own, and that a man who showed a decided aptitude for his profession should be promoted, irrespectively of that period of service, which was proper and legitimate enough in times of peace, and at the discretion of those who were intrusted with the power of promotion. The second subject of which he had given notice related to the Order of the Bath, which was at present limited to field officers. He saw no reason why it should be confined to any one class of officers, but thought that it should be open to all ranks and grades of the army. Merit, not rank, ought to be the principle acted on, and the Order ought to be open to the ensign if he had sufficiently distinguished himself. The Bath was an old Order—a relict, in fact, of medieval times. In 1725 it first became a military Order, and then thirty-seven knights were made. It was a remarkable circumstance, however, that of those thirty-seven only two were military men. All the others were Members of Parliament, or gentlemen of the bedchamber. The two military men happened to occupy one or other of those positions, and it was extremely doubtful whether they would have received the Order if they had not. Soon after that, however, it did become essentially a military Order, and it was given to Nelson, Collingwood, Wellington, and men of that character. It so remained until the end of the war in 1815, when it was enlarged and put upon the footing upon which it now stands. Of the first class, that of G.C.B., there were to be seventy-two, of whom twelve might be civilians, and the military division was to be limited to major generals and rear admirals. In the second class, that of K.C.B., there were to be 180, and it was limited to lieutenant colonels and post captains. The third class, that of C.B., was to be open to officers holding commissions in Her Majesty's service by sea or land. In 1847 the civil service was admitted to the second and third classes of the Bath, and the military division of the third class was limited as to number and rank. The practical result had all along been that admission to the higher classes of the Order of the Bath had been limited to field officers, and that appeared to him unjust and unfair to the great body of officers in the army. In advocating the eligibility of junior officers of the army to participate in the honour of the Bath, he was fortified by the opinions both of the Duke of York and the Duke of Wellington as stated in a correspondence which passed between those illustrious persons in 1815. The Duke of Wellington on that occasion stated in a letter to his Royal Highness on the 28th of June, 1815, that he did not concur in the limitation of the order. Many captains of the army, he added, conducted themselves in a most meritorious manner, and he could never see the reason of excluding them from the honour. The Duke concluded his letter by proposing a fourth class of the Order of the Bath as a means of rewarding meritorious officers in the service. To that proposition the Duke of York replied in a letter dated from the Horse Guards on the 7th of September, 1815, from which he (Lord Elcho) would read an extract. His Royal Highness said—

"I did not fail to pay every attention to the suggestion, both in affording it my own mature consideration, and in bringing it under that of the Secretary of State, and though we both concur with your Grace as to the advantages which, in many points of view, would attend the future formation of a fourth class in the manner you propose, yet we are apprehensive that it would increase the difficulties and embarrassments which have been found to rise in the selection of individual candidates for past services. There can be no reason, however, for giving such a decision on the subject as may prevent your suggestion from being hereafter acted upon, and upon which footing it is that you have proposed it; and the present publication of what is now termed the third class cannot operate against the future re-organization of the order according to your idea. The argument in my mind in favour of the extension as the Order to a fourth class is the facility it would afford to the introduction of captains into that class. I regret the apparent necessity of their present exclusion, but when an order is first instituted and granted retrospectively, your Grace will agree as to the great difficulty which may arise to the opening of it at once to so numerous a class of officers as captains of the army. Hereafter, whether there may be a fourth instituted or not, I cannot see why an individual captain upon the occurrence of any distinguished action should not have the order."

The very grounds on which the Victoria Cross was instituted afforded an additional illustration of the principle for which he (Lord Elcho) was contending, inasmuch as it was only to be given as a reward for individual instances of merit and valour in the field. But although that order remedied the difficulty so far as the want of a fourth class was felt it did not wholly meet the case. It was not given for those services for which the Order of the Bath was given. Under the terms on which the order was instituted such a man as Sir John Inglis, for example, would not be entitled to the Victoria Cross, but any bombardier under him would, who took up a live shell and threw it away, not, it might be, knowing the danger to which he was exposing himself. In point of fact, the Victoria Cross had a direct tendency to induce young men in the army to do things —gallant they might be, but still rash and contrary to discipline—in the hope of obtaining the reward and the honour which it conferred. He would suggest, therefore, that the Statutes of the Order, should be remodelled after those foreign orders, which were established for the encouragement of bravery, but of bravery in accordance with discipline. Such, for instance, was that of St. George, of which, provided that every officer should be inserted in the list who, when in the command of troops, and animating them by his own example, captured a ship, a battery, or any place held by the enemy, or stood a siege without surrendering. He would say, in conclusion, that he was anxious that his hon. and gallant Friend should consider the subjects which he had ventured to bring under the notice of the House, with the view, if his hon. and gallant Friend thought them consistent with the discipline and efficiency of the service, to his proposing a relaxation of the rule in reference to promotion, and an extension of the third class of the Order of the Bath, if not the institution of a fourth class.

SIR FREDERICK SMITH said, he thought the junior officers of the army were under great obligations to the noble Lord for advocating their claims to share in the distinguished honour of the Bath. The question, no doubt, was a very difficult one, as indeed was evident from the fact that the Duke of Wellington had been in power subsequently to 1815, and yet had done nothing in the matter. Perhaps, too, it might occasion heartburnings if it were given to very young officers who had been more fortunately placed than their brother officers, as brevet rank sometime was. Still, he hoped it would receive the consideration of the Secretary at War during the recess. With regard to the first part of the noble Lord's speech, looking to the very responsible positions which field officers were sometimes called on to hold, he questioned whether it was desirable to interfere with the regulation which required that an officer should have served a certain number of years before being promoted to the rank of major. Before sitting down, he wished to add his meed of praise to the eulogium passed upon Sir John Inglis by his hon. and gallant Friend near him (Colonel North). As an Engineer officer he had studied all the details of the siege of Lucknow, and he knew of no defence more distinguished for constancy, ingenuity, and gallantry than the defence of Lucknow by that brave officer.

GENERAL CODRINGTON said, there was no doubt that the limitation of the Order of the Bath to the superior ranks of the army was a great disadvantage and unfairness to the lower ranks. The establishment of a fourth class or an extension of the Order to the subalterns would be most agreeable to the army generally, and would produce a greater feeling of brotherhood between the superior and inferior ranks. No doubt, there would be some difficulty in extending the superior grade of the Bath to the inferior grade of officers, because, of course, the more generally it was bestowed, the less it would be valued. He questioned very much whether it was advisable to have made the Bath a civil order at all, for certainly the services of the army merited an exclusively military order. The Victoria Cross seemed originally intended for the purpose of rewarding the inferior grades of officers in the army and navy who could not receive the Bath, but in some way or other it had been appropriated to the reward of a totally different class of services. It was now put above the Bath, inasmuch as it was made to celebrate individual and marked services. Those, however, who had received it richly merited it, and a finer list of gallant deeds than that attached to the muster roll of the decoration had never been seen. No doubt it had been attended with its little inconveniences. Lord Hardinge said that the great object in the English army should be to preserve the correct formation of regiments and brigades in line, and not to encourage officers to step out of the line and mar its completeness for the purpose of signalizing themselves by some special action of gallantry; and an order of this sort which was given for such actions might have its disadvantages. He hoped that the right hon. and gallant General who had shown in so many cases a disposition to do all in his power for the good of the army would take this matter into his consideration. With regard to the remarks of the hon. and gallant Colonel opposite (Colonel North) on the position of Sir John Inglis, no person had ever done more honour to the Bath, and nobody had more richly merited it, not only for his brilliant and gallant defence of Lucknow, but for his previous services at Moultan and in the Punjab. With regard to his pecuniary position, however, Sir John Inglis was absolutely worse off than he was before being made a Major General. But there was this to be said, that he was a young Major General, and he hoped he had still a long and brilliant career with the highest rewards before him.

GENERAL PEEL said, he could assure his hon. Friend behind him (Mr. Macartney) that as regarded the first part of his Motion every one of the recommendations of the Treasury had been carried into effect, and the improved mode of taking accounts was now in operation at the War Office. With regard to his remarks on the War Department generally, he might have contented himself with assuring him that, so far as in him lay, he would do his duty in connection with his office, if his hon. Friend had not referred to names of individuals connected with that department before his time. Major Marvin had been appointed paymaster at Woolwich long before he (General Peel) was at the head of the War Department, in consequence of the peculiar qualifications he possessed for the office, and his appointment would be the means of saving the country £4 000 a year. His hon. Friend had alluded to the fact of that gallant officer having risen from the ranks. All that he (General Peel) could say in reply was, that it was the more honour to him. As to the number of temporary clerks in the War Office, it was the most economical and efficient mode of conducting the public service, because if they were all permanent clerks, the staff could not be reduced without the payment of large sums for compensation. In consequence of the requisitions made upon the War Office by the East India Company there had been an increase in the number of letters received during the two months ending the 28th of June, as compared with the corresponding two months of 1857, of 14,653, and in the number of letters written of 16,607. There had also been an increase of 415 hours in the daily attendance, or equal to the service of 69 clerks at the ordinary rate of attendance. He could assure his hon. Friend that from himself down to the humblest person in the establishment they were all overworked. With regard to the superannuations, they had all taken place long before he came to the War Office, and he could therefore give no opinion on the subject. With regard to the remarks of his noble Friend (Lord Elcho) he thought it would be very unwise in that House to interfere with the regulations or discipline of the army, which had far better be left to the commanding officers and the head of the department. The present regulation as to the number of years' service was in operation during the whole career of the Duke of Wellington, and he must say that his experience was that six years was not too long a period for an officer to become acquainted with all his multifarious duties. He did not think the comparison of his noble Friend between a brevet major and a post-captain at all a suitable or appropriate one. It had been justly stated that the Victoria Cross was instituted as an extension of, or rather as a substitute for, the Bath. It was with great pain that they were often obliged to refuse the Bath to persons who were quite entitled to it in consequence of the number greatly exceeding that laid down by the regulations. That number was 550, but he believed at the present moment it was exceeded by more than 200. He would not say that the present constitution of the Victoria Cross might not be improved. At present it was requisite that some extraordinary proof of valour should be given in the presence of the enemy. The effect of that provision no one knew better than the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (General Codrington), who had addressed the House. There were, however, instances of valour exhibited not in the presence of an enemy that ought to be rewarded, such for example, as the case of the men on board the Sarah Sands. He was happy to say that he had received the sanction of Her Majesty to such an extension of that order as would include them and persons in similar situations. In conclusion, he could assure the House that it was his earnest desire to promote the general welfare of the army.

SIR WILLIAM FRASER said, he hoped some arrangements would be made by which officers would be relieved from the liability to pay £200 or £300 in fees on their receiving the distinction of the Order of the Bath. He feared the institution of the Victoria Cross might have a slightly detrimental effect on the service. The great principle advocated by the late Duke of Wellington for the English army, which, he said, would have gone anywhere and done anything, was the principle of duty. Of all the despatches written by that great man there was not one in which the word "glory" did occur, nor one in which the word "duty" did not occur. Such was the mode of modern warfare that it was next to impossible for an officer of any rank to attain the honour of the Victoria Cross, and he doubted whether its being attainable by subalterns, corporals, and men of the line would not lead them to neglect duty in the pursuit of glory.

ORDNANCE SURVEY.—QUESTION.

SIR DENHAM NORREYS said, he wished to ask the noble Lord the President of the Board of Control, in the absence of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, whether, before final determination on the scale to be adopted in future, the Chancellor of the Exchequer will cause inquiry to be made, firstly as to the expense, and secondly, as to the correctness of the system of reduction by photography now practised by the Ordnance Department for forming the six-inch and one-inch maps. He must complain that a Commission had been issued upon a Motion in the House of Lords, in order to upset a decision of the House of Commons upon this subject. He did not wish to say a word against the gentlemen composing the Commission, except that they were known to entertain decided opinions as to the scale of survey. The Government had taken it upon themselves to act contrary to the opinion of the House of Commons, and the responsibility now rested upon them. He was greatly afraid that the reduction of these maps by photography would not realize the expectations entertained of it.

LORD STANLEY said, he could not pretend to have any information of his own upon that subject; but he had been informed, on the authority of those who had conducted that survey, that the reduction by photography was perfectly and minutely accurate, and that a saving of 650 per cent. was effected by that process, the actual cost being only 16*d*. per sheet. In reply to the question whether any further inquiry was to be made into that subject he had to state that the Government did not believe any inquiry would be necessary after the report of the present Commissioners should have been received. Another question had been put to him some time before, to which he regretted that he could not return a very definite answer. He had been asked whether anything would be done in the way of proposing the grant of a pension to Major General Inglis. Perhaps in the present state of the case it would be enough for him to say that the distinguished services of General Inglis were as fully appreciated by the Government as they were by the hon. Members who had spoken on the subject and, as he believed, they were by the public.

RAILWAY AND CANAL LEGISLATION.
OBSERVATIONS.

MR. RICH, in rising to bring under the notice of the House the Report from the Select Committee on Railway and Canal Legislation, said that the contradictory and unjust decisions of Parliament had produced a state of insecurity and uncertainty most prejudicial to the important interests concerned. More than £300,000,000 had been spent in the construction of railways, but from the causes alluded to the value of that immense property was much depreciated, and much suffering was the result among the shareholders. Many persons said, "Let them suffer, the public gains." The public did not gain, would not gain, and ought not to gain, by the commission of injustice to large bodies. He wished to impress upon the Government the necessity of their attending to this important subject. They ought either to appoint a commission of inquiry composed of properly qualified persons, or early next Session move for a Committee of that House, a majority of the Members of which should be cognizant of and interested in railway matters. In no other way would the railway interest find itself fairly treated.

Motion agreed to.

House, at rising, to adjourn till Monday next.

House adjourned at half after Eleven o'clock, till Monday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, August 2nd, 1858.

MINUTES.] ROYAL ASSENT.—Consolidated Fund (Appropriation); Copyright of Designs; Inclosure of Lands; Sheep, &c. Contagious Diseases Prevention; Turnpike Acts Continuance; Police (Scotland) Act Amendment; Bishops' Trusts Substitution; Titles to Land (Scotland); Sale and Transfer of Land (Ireland); Stipendiary Magistrates; County Court Districts; Chelsea Bridge Act Amendment; Returns to Secretary of State; Detached Parts of Counties; Herring Fisheries (Scotland); Cowley's Charity; Leases and Sales of Settled Estates Act Amendment; Administration of Oaths by Committees; Four Courts (Dublin) Extension; Railway Cheap Trains, &c.; Lunatics (Scotland) Act Amendment; Medical Practitioners; Joint Stock Banking Companies; County Property Conveyance; Legitimacy Declaration; Copyholds Acts Amendment; Universities (Scotland); Probates and Letters of Administration Act Amendment; Turnpike Trusts Arrangements; Vaccination (Ireland); Drafts on Bankers Law Amendment; Incumbered Estates (West Indies) Act Amendment; Militia Pay; Militia (Service Abroad) Act Continuance; Militia Act Continuance (No. 2); Corrupt Practices Prevention Act Continuance; Public Health; Local Government; Government of British Columbia; Clerk of Petty Sessions (Ireland); Friendly Societies Act Amendment; Art Unions Indemnity; Reformatory Schools (Ireland); New Writs; Metropolis Local Management Act Amendment; Civil Bills, &c. (Ireland) Act Amendment; Judgments (Ireland) Act Amendment; Government of India; Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Act Amendment; Cornwall Submarine Mines.

PROROGATION OF THE PARLIAMENT. SPEECH OF THE LORDS COMMISSIONERS.

THE PARLIAMENT was this day prorogued by Commission.

The Lords Commissioners, the LORD CHANCELLOR, (Lord Chelmsford) the LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (the Marquess of Salisbury), the LORD PRIVY SEAL (the Earl of Hardwicke), the LORD CHAMBERLAIN (Earl De LaWarr), and the DUKE of BEAUFORT, being in their robes and seated on a form between the Throne and the Woolsack; and the Commons being come, with their Speaker, the Royal Assent was given to several Bills.

Then THE LORD CHANCELLOR delivered the Speech of the LORDS COMMISSIONERS as follows:—

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"WE are commanded by Her Majesty to express Her Satisfaction at being enabled to release you from the Duties of a Session, which, though interrupted, has, by your unremitting Assiduity, been productive of many important Measures.

"HER Majesty is happy to believe that Her Relations with Foreign Powers are such as to enable Her Majesty to look with Confidence to the Preservation of General Peace.

"HER Majesty trusts that the Labours of the Plenipotentiaries now sitting in Conference at Paris may lead to a satisfactory Solution of the various Questions which have been referred to them.

"THE Efforts, the Gallantry, and Devotedness, displayed in India by Her Majesty's Forces, and those of the East India Company, have been above all Praise; and Her Majesty hopes that those Efforts have already been so far crowned with Success that the formidable Revolt which has raged throughout a large Portion of Her Indian Possessions may now, under the Blessing of Almighty God, be speedily suppressed, and Peace be restored to those important Provinces.

"IN this Hope Her Majesty has given Her willing Assent to the Act which you have passed for transferring to Her direct Authority the Government of Her Indian Dominions; and Her Majesty hopes to be enabled so to discharge the high Functions which She has assumed, as, by a just and impartial Administration of the Law, to secure its advantages alike to Her Subjects of every Race and Creed, and, by promoting their Welfare, to establish and strengthen Her Empire in India.

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"HER Majesty commands us to thank you for the judicious Liberality with which you have made Provision for the Exigencies of the Public Service.

"The present State of the Revenue authorises Her Majesty to entertain a confident Hope that the Supplies which you have granted will be found fully adequate to the Demands upon them.

"My Lords, and Gentlemen,

"The sanitary Condition of the Metropolis must always be a Subject of deep Interest to Her Majesty, and Her Majesty has readily sanctioned the Act which you have passed for the Purification of that noble River, the present State of which is little creditable to a great Country, and seriously prejudicial to the Health and Comfort of the Inhabitants of the Metropolis.

"Her Majesty has also willingly assented to an Act whereby greater Facilities are given for the Acquisition by Towns and Districts of such Powers as may be requisite for promoting Works of local Improvement, and thus extending more widely the Advantages of Municipal Self-government.

"Her Majesty trusts that the Act which you have passed for the future Government of the Scotch Universities will be found highly advantageous to those venerable Institutions, and will greatly promote and extend a System of sound Moral and Religious Education in Scotland.

"The Transfer of Land Bill, which extends the Powers hitherto exercised by the Incumbered Estates Commissioners, and facilitates the Acquisition of an indefeasible Title by Purchasers of Land in Ireland, cannot fail to be highly beneficial to the Landed Proprietors, and to advance the Prosperity of that Part of Her Majesty's Dominions.

"The Act to which Her Majesty has assented for the Establishment of the Colony of British Columbia was urgently required in consequence of the recent discoveries of Gold in that District; but Her Majesty hopes that this new Colony on the Pacific may be but one Step in the Career of steady Progress, by which Her Majesty's Dominions in North America may ultimately be peopled, in an unbroken Chain, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, by a loyal and industrious Population of Subjects of the British Crown.

"Her Majesty thankfully acknowledges the Diligence and Perseverance which has enabled you in a comparatively short Time to pass these and other Measures of inferior but not insignificant Importance.

"Many of you, in returning to your respective Counties, have extensive Influence to exercise, and Duties to perform of hardly less Value to the Community than those from the Labours of which you are about to be released; and Her Majesty entertains a confident Assurance that, under the Guidance of Providence, that Influence will be so employed, and those Duties so performed, as to redound to your own Honour, and to promote the general Welfare and the Happiness of a loyal and contented People.

Then a Commission for proroguing the Parliament was read.

After which

The LORD CHANCELLOR said,

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"By virtue of Her Majesty's Commission under the Great Seal, to us and other Lords directed, and now read, we do, in Her Majesty's Name, and in obedience to Her Commands, Prorogue this Parliament to Tuesday the Nineteenth Day of October next, to be then here holden; and this Parliament is accordingly prorogued to Tuesday the Nineteenth Day of October next."

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, August 2nd, 1858.

NATIONAL GALLERY—.QUESTION.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE said, he would beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he has succeeded in carrying out arrangements for opening the National Gallery on Saturday afternoons?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he had great pleasure in informing the hon. Gentleman that he had succeeded in accomplishing that object. He was bound at the same time to say that he had received from Sir Charles Eastlake great assistance and sympathy in making the arrangements; and after some short time, which must necessarily elapse before the arrangements could be made complete, the National Gallery would be open on Saturday afternoons.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.—QUESTION.

MR. JOHN LOCKE said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the Copies of Standards of Weights and Measures were issued from the Exchequer under which 1,555 tradesmen have been convicted by the Police for using false Weights and Measures in 1857, and whether the accuracy of the said Copies of Standards have been legally tested since they were first issued; and, if so, at what period? And, whether the Police Constables now engaged as Inspectors of Weights and Measures are authorized to seize all Weights and Measures indiscriminately under the Act 5 & 6 Will. IV. c. 63, which deviate from the Standards, or whether they are instructed to distinguish between cases of intentional fraud and trifling inaccuracies arising from friction, atmospheric influence, or ordinary wear and tear?

MR. WALPOLE said, he was sorry to say that he had not yet been able to obtain the desired information; but as the matter was of considerable importance he would take care that due inquiry should be made respecting it, and if any alteration should be required to have the Standards properly rectified he would take care that it should be made.

GENERAL CHESNEY'S WORK.
QUESTION.

MR. WILSON said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the sum voted in the present year in aid of the expenses in bringing out General Chesney's work is to be given with the understanding that the work is to be completed; and, also, whether the East India Company have contributed any sum for the same purpose? In putting this question, he wished to observe that £6,000 had already been paid for what was only a mere preface, and that but one volume had as yet been published, which contained, not useful matter with regard to the exploration of the East, but was a mere history of commerce.

MR. G. A. HAMILTON said, he could not at present give the hon. Gentleman the assurance he required, because the Government had not yet considered the expediency of publishing the remainder of the work. His own impression was, that three volumes had been published. The arrangement with General Chesney, upon which £4,000 had been voted by that House, and £1,000 by the East India Company, was that, in the first place, the copies of the work were to be at the disposal of the Government; next, that the materials for its completion were also to be at the disposal of the Government; and, thirdly, that General Chesney should, without any charge, edit the remainder, when the Government thought it expedient that it should be completed.

MR. WHITE said, he wished to point out that as he had been the first to mention this subject, that two volumes had been published, the first of which contained, he believed, a history of the world, and the other a history of Asia, mixed up with every variety of matter. There were two more volumes yet to be published to complete the work.

THE PARKS.—QUESTION.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said he wished to ask a question of the noble Lord the Chief Commisioner of Works, of which he had not given notice; but as it related to a matter respecting which he had had private communication with the noble Lord some time ago, he had no doubt the noble Lord would be able to give him an answer one way or the other. He would like to know when it was the intention of the noble Lord to remove those abominable iron hurdles which now fenced the parks, and prevented the people of the metropolis from the free enjoyment of them, although they were maintained at the public expense simply for the public recreation. His right hon. friend the late Chief Commissioner had assured him that they would be removed last spring, and he had understood from the noble Lord (Lord J. Manners) that he also intended to remove them. But there they are still, and there they appeared likely to remain, so far as he could see, until the iron had disappeared by the process of time. Meanwhile the public are precluded from that power of free expatiation over their own parks which is essential to their health and amusement. Perhaps the noble Lord will say that the object of these hurdles is to prevent the people from walking over the grass; but he (Viscount Talbot) did not know for what purpose the grass was there, except to be walked upon. If it were to be kept for the purpose of being looked at only, it ceased to have the advantage it was intended to confer upon the population. He wished to know, therefore, when the noble Lord intends taking the people of the metropolis out of irons, so far as related to the parks.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, that having completed the removal of the hurdles from the whole of Hyde Park, the question of the noble Viscount must relate chiefly to the Green Park. It had been his intention to remove all the hurdles from that park also; but unfortunately, as the noble Viscount was thinking proper, there came a plague of chronicles [illegible] early in the spring which destroyed the grass in a very extraordinary manner, and in consequence it became necessary to enclose with the hurdles all that portion of the park which had been so injured. He had great hopes, however, that the grass would soon recover; and he trusted that the noble Viscount would rely the removal of the hurdles from Hyde Park as an earnest of his (Lord John Manners') desire to remove them also from the Green Park.

OUR RELATIONS WITH NAPLES.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE said, he wished to ask a question of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and for the purpose of doing so he could move the adjournment of the House, if that were necessary. Nearly two years ago the Government of this country broke off diplomatic relations with the Government of Naples; and the question he now begged to ask was, whether any change has taken place, or is likely to take place, in our relations with that country? The breaking off of those diplomatic relations grew out of the barbarities which were committed by the prisoners of the Neapolitan detention towards political offenders. The imprisonment and torture to which so many persons, and those foreigners even, had been subjected, and the horrible circumstances of ill-treatment to an Italian prince. The question he brought was a most important one to be put at the present moment, and the House ought not to separate for six weeks without receiving some reply. The Sovereigns of England and France were about to meet on a day or two. Her Majesty would be surrounded by Peers and Commoners, and attended by very many of her British subjects, and he did think that a whisper or a word in the interval from Her Majesty's lips might suggest to the Monarch of France just in the midst of all the festivity and magnificence, that should any altogether hinge the struggle of Italy. The occurrence of such a sentiment would, he believed, be highly acceptable to the Emperor of the French, because it was well known, on all sides, to the Government, and ought to be known, from what had occurred between himself and him, that during the Session was the Emperor of the French, in his address, suggested that the restoration of Venice and the independence of Italy should form part of any general scheme for the settlement of peace. That proposal, however, he was grieved to understand, was unanimously rejected by the Government of England; but to that as it might, he believed that the reproach which was sometimes levelled against England, that they were very fond of constitutional freedom and liberty at home, but that they acted with despotism abroad, was but too true. The question he had to put to the right hon. Gentleman, therefore, was whether any change has taken place, or is likely to take place, with regard to our relations with the Government of Naples?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I did not collect from the observations of the hon. Gentleman whether he thinks that the renewal of diplomatic relations with Naples would be a proof of our sympathy with despotism abroad, or the reverse, though the inference from his observations may be taken either way. I think, however, all must feel that to terminate diplomatic relations between two States is always an extremely inconvenient and injurious course, and one that can only be justified by very strong reasons indeed. With regard to the case of Naples, perhaps a great deal of what has occurred, and which has very much interested this House of late, between the King of the Two Sicilies and this country, might not have occurred had Her Majesty been directly represented at that Court. But it is unnecessary now to speculate upon those circumstances. I am bound to say that the late negotiations between England and Naples, which were of an extraordinary character, and occasioned by a remarkable event—I allude to the seizure of the Cagliari—were certainly conducted in a manner which was satisfactory to this country, and, at the same time, not at all, I think, to the discredit of the Neapolitan Government. Whether those relations which subsisted heretofore will soon be revived it is impossible for me at the present moment to state. No doubt it is extremely desirable that there should be direct communications between this Government and the Neapolitan Government; and I trust that whenever those communications are restored, they will be restored under circumstances which will be generally satisfactory to the people of this country.

HARBOURS OF REFUGE.—REPLY TO ADDRESS.

MR. WALPOLE appeared at the Bar, and read the following reply from the Queen to an Address from the House for the issue of a Royal Commission relative to Harbours of Refuge in the Report of a Select Committee of this House upon Harbours of Refuge.

Answer to Address [26th July] reported, as follows:—

I have received your Address, praying that I will give directions for the appointment of a Royal Commission to complete the Inquiry in the terms recommended in the Report of the Select Committee of the House of Commons, in the present Session, on Harbours of Refuge.

And I have given directions that a Royal Commission shall issue for the purpose which you have requested.

MILITARY OPERATIONS IN CHINA. QUESTION.

MR. WHITE said, he would beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he is in possession of any further information relative to proceedings in China which would encourage the hope of such a satisfactory result as is referred to by Lord Elgin in his address to the merchants of Shanghai?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the latest accounts received from China were of a satisfactory character; and, if they did not tend to encourage a hope of the immediate conclusion of difficulties, justified him in believing that increased activity in that quarter would lead to the result which the hon. Gentleman desired.

PROROGATION OF THE PARLIAMENT.

Message to attend the LORDS COMMISSIONERS.

The House went, and the ROYAL ASSENT was given to several Bills. And afterwards a Speech of the LORDS COMMISSIONERS was delivered to both Houses by the LORD CHANCELLOR.

Then a Commission for Proroguing the Parliament was read.

After which

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said:

"MY LORDS, AND GENTLEMEN,

"By virtue of Her Majesty's Commission, under the great Seal, to us and other Lords directed, and now read, we do, in Her Majesty's Name, and in obedience to Her Commands, Prorogue this Parliament to Tuesday the Nineteenth day of October next, to be then there holden; and this Parliament is accordingly Prorogued to Tuesday the Nineteenth day of October next.

[LIST OF STATUTES.

A TABLE

OF

ALL THE STATUTES

PASSED IN THE SECOND SESSION OF

THE SEVENTEENTH PARLIAMENT OF THE UNITED KINGDOM

OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND.

21° & 22° VICT.

PUBLIC GENERAL ACTS.

I. AN Act to indemnify the Governor and Company of the Bank of England in respect of certain Issues of their Notes, and to confirm such Issues, and to authorize further Issues for a Time to be limited.

II. An Act to settle Annuities on Lady Havelock and Sir Henry Marshman Havelock, in consideration of the eminent Services of the late Major General Havelock.

III. An Act for enabling the East India Company to raise Money in the United Kingdom for the Service of the Government of India.

IV. An Act to continue an Act of the last Session to authorize the embodying of the Militia.

V. An Act to apply the Sum of Ten Millions out of the Consolidated Fund to the Service of the Year One thousand eight hundred and fifty-eight.

VI. An Act to apply the Sum of Five hundred thousand Pounds out of the Consolidated Fund to the Service of the Year ending the Thirty-first Day of March One thousand eight hundred and fifty-eight.

VII. An Act for the Regulation of Her Majesty's Royal Marine Forces while on shore.

VIII. An Act to authorize the Inclosure of certain Lands in pursuance of a Report of the Inclosure Commissioners for England and Wales.

IX. An Act for punishing Mutiny and Desertion, and for the better payment of the Army and their Quarters.

X. An Act to confirm a certain Provisional Order of the General Board of Health, applying the Public Health Act, 1848, to the District of Skipton in the West Riding of the County of York; and to further declare the Limits of the District of Toxteth Park in the County Palatine of Lancaster, for the Purposes of the said Act.

XI. An Act to repeal the Stamp Duties payable on Matriculation and Degrees in the University of Cambridge.

XII. An Act for the Alteration of certain Duties of Customs.

XIII. An Act for raising the Sum of Twenty million nine hundred and eleven thousand five hundred Pounds by Exchequer Bills, for the Service of the Year One thousand eight hundred and fifty-eight.

XIV. An Act for raising the Sum of Two Millions by Exchequer Bonds.

XV. An Act for granting certain additional Rates and Duties of Excise.

XVI. An Act for the further Amendment of the Duties of Customs.

XVII. An Act to apply the Sum of Eleven Millions out of the Consolidated Fund to the Service of the Year One thousand eight hundred and fifty-eight.

XVIII. An Act to effect an Exchange between the Commissioners of Chelsea Hospital and the Governor and Company of Chelsea Waterworks of Lands in the Parishes of St. George Hanover Square and Saint Margaret Westminster in the County of Middlesex.

XIX. An Act to continue an Act of the Third and Fourth Years of Her Majesty, Chapter One hundred and ten, to amend the Laws relating to Loan Societies.

XX. An Act for granting a Stamp Duty on certain Drafts or Orders for the Payment of Money.

XXI. An Act to confirm a Contract for the Sale by the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Works of certain Lands to the Commissioners of Chelsea Hospital.

XXII. An Act to abolish Franchise Prisons.

XXIII. An Act for abolishing the Tolls now levied on the Bridge over the Shannon at Portumna in Ireland.

XXIV. An Act to reduce the Stamp Duty on Passports.

XXV. An Act to amend the Act concerning Non-parochial Registers, and the Acts for Marriages, and for registering Births, Deaths, and Marriages, in England, and concerning Vaccination.

XXVI. An Act to abolish the Property Qualifications of Members of Parliament.

XXVII. An Act to amend the Course of Procedure in the High Court of Chancery, the Court of Chancery in Ireland, and the Court of Chancery of the County Palatine of Lancaster.

XXVIII. An Act to continue the Peace Preservation (Ireland) Act, 1856.

XXIX. An Act for confirming a Scheme of the Charity Commissioners for Sir Eliab Harvey's Charity in the Town of Folkstone.

XXX. An Act for confirming a Scheme of the Charity Commissioners for certain Municipal Charities in the City of Bristol.

XXXI. An Act for confirming a Scheme of the Charity Commissioners for certain Charities in the Parishes of Saint Nicholas and Saint Leonard in the City of Bristol.

XXXII. An Act to make valid certain Acts of the late Chief Justice of Bombay.

XXXIII. An Act for the better Management of County Rates.

XXXIV. An Act to continue "The Railways Act (Ireland), 1851."

XXXV. An Act to remove Doubts as to the Operation of a Convention between Her Majesty and the Emperor of the French relative to Portendic and Albreda.

XXXVI. An Act for releasing the Lands of the Commissioners for the Exhibition of 1851, upon the Repayment of Monies granted in aid of their Funds.

XXXVII. An Act to provide for the Allotment of the Commonable Lands within the Boundaries of the late Forest of Hainault in the County of Essex.

XXXVIII. An Act to repeal certain Provisions for the Issue out of the Consolidated Fund of fixed Amounts for the Reduction of the Funded Debt.

XXXIX. An Act to suspend the making of Lists and the Ballots for the Militia of the United Kingdom.

XL. An Act to confer Powers on the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Works and Public Buildings to acquire the Theatre Royal, Edinburgh, and adjacent Property, for the Erection of a new General Post Office, and for other Purposes.

XLI. An Act to extend the Time for making Advances towards Navigations in Ireland, under the Provisions of an Act of the Nineteenth and Twentieth Victoria, Chapter Sixty-two.

XLII. An Act for shortening the Time of Prescription in certain Cases in Ireland.

XLIII. An Act to amend the Municipal Franchise in certain Cases.

XLIV. An Act to give to the Universities of Oxford, Cambridge, and Durham, and the Colleges in those Universities, and to the Colleges of Saint Mary of Winchester near Winchester, and of King Henry the Sixth at Eton, Power to sell, enfranchise, and exchange Lands, under certain Conditions, and also to grant Leases for Agricultural, Building, and Mining Purposes, and to deal with the Interests of their Lessees under proper Reservations and Restrictions.

XLV. An Act to amend the Provisions of an Act of the Sixth Year of King William the Fourth, for separating the Palatine Jurisdiction of the County Palatine of Durham from the Bishoprick of Durham; and to make further Provision with respect to the Jura Regalia of the said County.

XLVI. An Act to remove Doubts as to the Validity of certain Marriages of British Subjects abroad.

XLVII. An Act to amend the Law of False Pretences.

XLVIII. An Act to substitute One Oath for the Oaths of Allegiance, Supremacy, and Abjuration; and for the Relief of Her Majesty's Subjects professing the Jewish Religion.

XLIX. An Act to provide for the Relief of Her Majesty's Subjects professing the Jewish Religion.

L. An Act to continue certain temporary Provisions concerning Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction in England.

LI. An Act further to continue the Exemption of certain Charities from the Operation of the Charitable Trusts Acts.

LII. An Act to appoint a Clerk of Nisi Prius for the Consolidated Nisi Prius Court in Ireland, and to make Provision for the Appointment of Tipstaffs in the Superior Courts of Common Law and Equity in Ireland.

LIII. An Act to continue Appointments under the Act for consolidating the Copyhold and Inclosure Commissions, and for completing Proceedings under the Tithe Commutation Acts.

LIV. An Act to indemnify such Persons in the United Kingdom as have omitted to qualify themseves for Offices and Employments, and to extend the Time limited for those Purposes respectively.

LV. An Act to revive and continue an Act amending the Act for limiting the Time of Service in the Army.

LVI. An Act to amend the Law relating to the Confirmation of Executors in Scotland, and to extend over all Parts of the United Kingdom the effect of such Confirmation, and of Grants of Probate and Administration.

LVII. An Act to amend the Act of the Fifth and Sixth Years of Her present Majesty, for enabling Ecclesiastical Corporations, aggregate and sole, to grant Leases for long Terms of Years.

LVIII. An Act for the future Appropriation of the Tithe or Tenth of Lead Ores in the Parishes of Stanhope and Wolsingham in the County of Durham belonging to the respective Rectors thereof, subject to the existing Incumbencies, and for making other Provisions for the Endowment of the said Rectories in lieu thereof, and for other Purposes connected therewith.

LIX. An Act further to amend the Law relating to the Erection and Endowment of Churches, Chapels, and Perpetual Curacies in Ireland.

LX. An Act to amend the Joint Stock Companies Acts 1856 and 1857, and the Joint Stock Banking Companies Act, 1857.

LXI. An Act to authorize the Inclosure of certain Lands in pursuance of a Special Report of the Inclosure Commissioners of England and Wales.

LXII. An Act to continue certain Acts to prevent the spreading of contagious or infectious Diseases among Sheep, Cattle, and other Animals.

LXIII. An Act to continue certain Turnpike Acts in Great Britain.

LXIV. An Act to make further Provision for the Practice of Vaccination in Ireland.

LXV. An Act to amend an Act of the last Session, to render more effectual the Police in Counties and Burghs in Scotland.

LXVI. An Act to amend the Act of the Ninth and Tenth Years of Her present Majesty, Chapter Thirty-nine, and to abolish Foot Passenger Tolls on Chelsea Bridge after Payment of the Sum of Eighty thousand Pounds and Interest.

LXVII. An Act to repeal certain Enactments requiring Returns to be made to one of the Secretaries of State.

LXVIII. An Act to amend the Law concerning detached Parts of Counties.

LXIX. An Act to impose Fees on the branding of Barrels under the Acts concerning the Herring Fisheries in Scotland.

LXX. An Act to amend the Act of the Fifth and Sixth Years of Her present Majesty, to consolidate and amend the Laws relating to the Copyright of Designs for ornamenting Articles of Manufacture.

LXXI. An Act to substitute in certain Cases the Bishop of one Diocese for the Bishop of another as a Trustee of certain Trusts.

LXXII. An Act to facilitate the Sale and Transfer of Land in Ireland.

LXXIII. An Act to amend the Law concerning the Powers of Stipendiary Magistrates and Justices of the Peace in certain Cases.

LXXIV. An Act for the Re-arrangement of the Districts of the County Courts among the Judges thereof.

LXXV. An Act to amend the Law relating to Cheap Trains, and to restrain the Exercise of certain Powers by Canal Companies being also Railway Companies.

LXXVI. An Act to simplify the Forms and diminish the Expense of completing Titles to Land in Scotland.

LXXVII. An Act to amend and extend the Settled Estates Act of 1856.

LXXVIII. An Act to enable the Committees of both Houses of Parliament to administer Oaths to Witnesses in certain Cases.

LXXIX. An Act to amend the Law relating to Cheques or Drafts on Bankers.

LXXX. An Act to confirm certain Provisional Orders made under an Act of the Fifteenth Year of Her present Majesty, to facilitate Arrangements for the Relief of Turnpike Trusts.

LXXXI. An Act for confirming a Scheme as amended of the Charity Commissioners for Cowley's Charity in the Parish of Swineshead in the County of Lincoln.

LXXXII. An Act to defray the Charge of the Pay, Clothing, and contingent and other Expenses of the Disembodied Militia in Great Britain and Ireland; to grant Allowances in certain Cases to Subaltern Officers, Adjutants, Paymasters, Quartermasters, Surgeons, Assistant Surgeons, and Surgeons' Mates of the Militia; and to authorize the Employment of the Non-commissioned Officers.

LXXXIII. An Act to make Provision for the better Government and Discipline of the Universities of Scotland, and improving and regulating the Course of Study therein; and for the Union of the Two Universities and Colleges of Aberdeen.

LXXXIV. An Act for enabling the Commissioners of Public Works in Ireland to acquire certain Lands and Houses for the Site of a new Court or Courts and other Offices and Buildings required for the Public Service, in Extension of the Four Courts in the City of Dublin; and for other Purposes.

LXXXV. An Act to continue an Act to enable Her Majesty to accept the Services of the Militia out of the United Kingdom.

LXXXVI. An Act further to continue an Act to authorize the embodying of the Militia.

LXXXVII. An Act to continue and amend the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, 1854.

LXXXVIII. An Act to amend an Act of the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Years of Her present Majesty, to consolidate and amend the Laws relating to Civil Bills and the Courts of Quarter Sessions in Ireland, and to transfer to the Assistant Barristers certain Jurisdictions as to Insolvent Debtors.

LXXXIX. An Act to amend an Act of the last Session, for the Regulation of the Care and Treatment of Lunatics, and for the Provision, Maintenance, and Regulation of Lunatic Asylums, in Scotland.

XC. An Act to regulate the Qualifications of Practitioners in Medicine and Surgery.

XCI. An Act to enable Joint Stock Banking Companies to be formed on the Principle of Limited Liability.

XCII. An Act to provide for the Conveyance of County Property to the Clerk of the Peace of the County.

XCIII. An Act to enable Persons to establish Legitimacy and the Validity of Marriages, and the Right to be deemed natural-born Subjects.

XCIV. An Act to amend the Copyhold Acts.

XCV. An Act to amend the Act of the Twentieth and Twenty-first Victoria, Chapter Seventy-seven.

XCVI. An Act to amend "The West Indian Incumbered Estates Act, 1854."

XCVII. An Act for vesting in the Privy Council certain Powers for the Protection of the Public Health.

XCVIII. An Act to amend the Public Health Act, 1848, and to make further Provision for the Local Government of Towns and populous Districts.

XCIX. An Act to provide for the Government of British Columbia.

C. An Act to regulate the Office of Clerk of Petty Sessions in Ireland.

CI. An Act to amend the Act of the Eighteenth and Nineteenth Years of Her present Majesty, Chapter Sixty-three, relating to Friendly Societies.

CII. An Act to indemnify certain Persons who have formed a voluntary Association for the Disposal of Works of Utility and Ornament by Chance or otherwise as Prizes.

CIII. An Act to promote and regulate Reformatory Schools for juvenile Offenders in Ireland.

CIV. An Act to alter and amend the Metropolis Local Management Act (1855), and to extend the Powers of the Metropolitan Board of Works for the Purification of the Thames and the Main Drainage of the Metropolis.

CV. An Act to amend an Act of the Thirteenth and Fourteenth years of Her present Majesty, to amend the Laws concerning Judgments in Ireland.

CVI. An Act for the better Government of India.

CVII. An Act to apply a Sum out of the Consolidated Fund and the Surplus of Ways and Means to the Service of the Year One thousand eight hundred and fifty-eight, and to appropriate the Supplies granted in this Session of Parliament.

CVIII. An Act to amend the Act of the Twentieth and Twenty-first Victoria, Chapter Eighty-five.

CIX. An Act to declare and define the respective Rights of Her Majesty and of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales and Duke of Cornwall to the Mines and Minerals in or under Land lying below High-water Mark, within and adjacent to the County of Cornwall; and for other Purposes.

CX. An Act to extend the Act of the Twenty-fourth Year of King George the Third, Chapter Twenty-six, for issuing Writs during any Recess of the House of Commons, whether by Prorogation or Adjournment.

LOCAL AND PERSONAL ACTS,

DECLARED PUBLIC,

AND TO BE JUDICIALLY NOTICED.

i. AN Act to empower the Birmingham and Staffordshire Gaslight Company to raise a further Sum of Money.

ii. An Act to amend the Act, Fifty-sixth King George the Third, Chapter Forty-four, for improving the Port, Harbour, and Town of Whitehaven in the County of Cumberland, in relation to the Securities to be granted for borrowed Money.

iii. An Act for conferring additional Powers and Privileges on the Edinburgh Life Assurance Company.

iv. An Act to empower the Cheltenham Waterworks Company to raise a further Sum of Money.

v. An Act for Supplying with Water the Inhabitants of Gosport, Forton, and Anglesey, and other Places in the Parish of Alverstoke in the County of Hants.

vi. An Act to incorporate the Chester United Gas Company, and to confer upon them further Powers for the Supply of Gas to the City and Borough of Chester and the Suburbs thereof.

vii. An Act to extend the Time for the Construction of the Haslingden and Rawtenstall Waterworks.

viii. An Act for incorporating "The Madras Irrigation and Canal Company," and for other Purposes connected therewith.

ix. An Act to enable the Nottingham Gaslight and Coke Company to raise a further Sum of Money, and to afford a Supply of Gas to Places in the Neighbourhood of Nottingham; and for other Purposes.

x. An Act to enable the Folkstone Waterworks Company to raise further Moneys; and to confer upon them other Powers.

xi. An Act to empower the Liskeard and Looe Union Canal Company to construct a Railway from Moors Water to Looe, all in the County of Cornwall; and for other Purposes.

xii. An Act to confer upon the Local Board of Health for the District of Merthyr Tydfil further Powers with reference to the Supply of Water; and for other Purposes.

xiii. An Act to enable the Caledonian Railway Company to make a Branch Railway to Dalmarnock in the County of Lanark; and for other Purposes.

xiv. An Act to authorize the making of a Railway from the Lancaster and Carlisle Railway at or near Clifton to the South Durham and Lancashire Union Railway at or near Kirby Stephen, all in the County of Westmoreland; and for other Purposes.

xv. An Act for making a Railway from the Caledonian Railway, near Symington Station to Biggar and Broughton; and for other Purposes.

xvi. An Act to enable the Dundalk and Enniskillen Railway Company to raise further Money; and for other Purposes.

xvii. An Act for better enabling the British Gaslight Company, Limited, to light with Gas certain Parts of the Town or Borough of Kingston-upon-Hull; and for other Purposes.

xviii. An Act fot better supplying with Water the Town and Parish of Aberdare in the County of Glamorgan.

xix. An Act for making a Railway from the Craven Arms Station of the Shrewsbury and Hereford Railway in the County of Salop to the Borough of Knighton in the County of Radnor; and for other Purposes.

xx. An Act for better supplying with Water the Borough of Barnstaple and places adjacent thereto, in the County of Devon; and for other Purposes.

xxi. An Act for providing a Market House and Market Place and other Buildings for Public Accommodation at the Town of Newport in the County of Salop, and for establishing and regulating Markets and Fairs there; and for opening a new Street and widening other Streets, and otherwise improving the Town; and for other Purposes.

xxii. An Act for supplying and lighting with Gas the several Townships of Peniston, Thurlstone, and Oxspring, and Places adjacent, all in the Parish of Peniston in the West Riding of the County of York.

xxiii. An Act to repeal the Act relating to the Company of Proprietors of the Liverpool Exchange, and to substitute other Provisions in lieu thereof.

xxiv. An Act for enabling the Justices of the County of Lancaster to erect or provide Assize Courts in or near Manchester in the Hundred of Salford; and for other Purposes.

xxv. An Act for enabling the Corporation of the City of Manchester to raise further Sums of Money; and for other Purposes.

xxvi. An Act to regulate the Annual Close Time for Salmon Fisheries in the River Tay and its Tributaries and on the Sea Coasts adjoining.

xxvii. An Act for enabling the Company of Proprietors of the Birmingham Canal Navigations to raise further Money; and for other Purposes.

xxviii. An Act to provide for the better Maintenance of the Garngad Road in the County of Lanark.

xxix. An Act to enable the Selkirk and Galashiels Railway Company to raise additional Capital.

xxx. An Act to authorize the Ely Valley Railway Company to make a Branch Railway, to be called "The Mwyndy Branch;" and for other Purposes.

xxxi. An Act for granting further Powers to the Malvern Improvement Commissioners.

xxxii. An Act for repealing so much of the several Acts for building Vauxhall Bridge, and for making convenient Roads thereto, as relate to certain of such Roads; providing for the future Maintenance and Repair of such Roads; and for other Purposes.

xxxiii. An Act for better enabling the British Gaslight Company, Limited, to light with Gas certain Parts of the District called the Staffordshire Potteries; and for other Purposes.

xxxiv. An Act for more effectually maintaining the Navigation of the River Trent from Wilden Ferry in the Counties of Derby and Leicester, or One of them, to Gainsborough in the County of Lincoln, and other Works connected therewith.

xxxv. An Act to enable the London Dock Company to raise a further Sum of Money, and to augment their Capital Stock; and for other Purposes connected with their Docks.

xxxvi. An Act for lighting with Gas the Parish of Maidstone and the Neighbourhood thereof in the County of Kent.

xxxvii. An Act for the more effectual Management and Repair of the Road from Manchester in the County Palatine of Lancaster, through Hyde, to Mottram-in-Longdendale in the County Palatine of Chester.

xxxviii. An Act to authorize the Metropolitan Board of Works to form an improved Communication between Limehouse and the Victoria Park in the County of Middlesex; and for other Purposes.

xxxix. An Act for extending, improving, and maintaining the Port and Harbour of Burghead in the County of Elgin.

xl. An Act for incorporating the Stoke, Fenton, and Longton Gaslight Company, and extending their Powers; and for other Purposes.

xli. An Act for the Regulation of certain Public Sufferance Wharves in the Port of London.

xlii. An Act to repeal the Acts relating to the Besselsleigh Turnpike Road in the County of Berks, and to make other Provisions in lieu thereof.

xliii. An Act for making a Railway from the Meigle Station of the Scottish North-eastern Railway to the Town of Alyth, to be called "The Alyth Railway;" and for other Purposes in relation thereto.

xliv. An Act for increasing and regulating the Capital and Borrowing Powers of the Brentford Gas Light Company; for consolidating into One Act the Provisions of the several Acts relating to the Company; and for other Purposes.

xlv. An Act for vesting the Inverury and Old Meldrum Junction Railway by way of Lease in the Great North of Scotland Railway Company; and for other Purposes.

xlvi. An Act for making a Railway from Banbridge to Lisburn, to be called "The Banbridge, Lisburn, and Belfast Railway;" and for other Purposes.

xlvii. An Act to enable the East Suffolk Railway Company to construct a Branch Railway near Lowestoft; to raise further Sums of Money; and for other Purposes.

xlviii. An Act to confer upon the Waterford and Kilkenny Railway Company Facilities for raising Money.

xlix. An Act for repairing and maintaining the Road from Horsham in the County of Sussex, through Dorking and Leatherhead, to Epsom in the County of Surrey, and from Capel to Stone Street at Ockley in the said County of Surrey.

l. An Act for extending the Time for the Completion of the Works authorized by "The Stokes Bay Railway and Pier Act, 1855;" and for other Purposes.

li. An Act to amend the Acts relating to "The East Kent Railway (Extension to Dover)."

lii. An Act for better supplying with Water the Inhabitants of the Town of Taunton in the County of Somerset.

liii. An Act to enable the Ballymena, Ballymoney, Coleraine, and Portrush Junction Railway Company to sell their Undertaking to the Belfast and Ballymena Railway Company.

liv. An Act to amend "The Tramore Embankment Act, 1852."

lv. An Act for incorporating the City of Waterford Gas Company, and for authorizing them to acquire the existing Gasworks at Waterford, and to supply Gas; and for other Purposes.

lvi. An Act for authorizing the Abandonment of Part of the authorized Line of the Exeter and Exmouth Railway, and the making, instead of the Part so abandoned, of an Extension of the Main Line of the Railway; and for reducing and regulating the Capital and Borrowing Powers of the Exeter and Exmouth Railway Company; and for other Purposes.

lvii. An Act to confer upon the London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Company further Powers for raising Money, and to authorize the Purchase and Lease by them of the Undertakings of certain other Railway Companies.

lviii. An Act to authorize a Lease of the Staines, Wokingham, and Woking Railway to the London and South-western Railway Company, and for other Purposes connected with the Staines, Wokingham, and Woking Railway Company.

lix. An Act for enabling the Eastern Steam Navigation Company to extend their Powers of trading, to increase their Capital, and to alter and amend their Charter and Deed of Settlement.

lx. An Act to enable the Globe Insurance Company to alter and amend some of the Provisions of their Deed of Settlement; and to confer further Powers on the Company.

lxi. An Act to authorize the Cromford and High Peak Railway Company to raise further Sums of Money; and for other Purposes.

lxii. An Act providing for the separate Incorporation of the Overseers of the several Townships of Manchester, Ardwick, Chorlton-upon-Medlock, and Hulme for specific Purposes; for the levying and Collection of Rates; for the extinguishing the Exemption of Gasworks from Rates.

lxiii. An Act for enabling the Local Board of Health for the District of Wallasey to construct Works and supply their District with Water and Gas; for enlarging their Powers with respect to the Acquisition and Maintenance of Ferries; and for other Purposes.

lxiv. An Act to vest the Stirling and Dunfermline Railway in the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Company, and for other Purposes.

lxv. An Act for the Formation of a Junction between the Fife and Kinross and Kinross-shire Railways, and the Construction of a joint Station at Kinross.

lxvi. An Act to enable the Caledonian Railway Company to make a Branch Railway to the Port Carlisle Railway; and for other Purposes.

lxvii. An Act to extend the Time for the Completion of the Salisbury and Yeovil Railway, and to authorize the Sale thereof to the London and South-western Railway Company.

lxviii. An Act to repeal "The Blyth Harbour and Dock Act, 1854," and to regulate the Company constituted thereby, and for other Purposes.

lxix. An Act for the Improvement of the Parish of Chiswick, in the County of Middlesex; and for other Purposes.

lxx. An Act to incorporate the Luton Gas and Coke Company, to authorize the Adjustment and Increase of the present Capital, and for other Purposes.

lxxi. An Act to repeal An Act for amending and maintaining the Turnpike Road from the Northern End of the Village of Balby in the County of York to Worksop in the County of Nottingham, and to make other Provisions in lieu thereof, so far as regards a Portion of the said Turnpike Road.

lxxii. An Act to alter and amend the Acts for the Improvement of the Navigation of the Rivers Burry, Loughor, and Lliedi, in the Counties of Carmarthen and Glamorgan, and to improve the Harbour of Llanelly in the said County of Carmarthen.

lxxiii An Act for enabling the Ayr and Dalmellington Railway Company to raise additional Capital; for vesting their Undertaking in the Glasgow and South-western Railway Company; and for other Purposes.

lxxiv. An Act for the Amalgamation of the Hertford and Welwyn Junction Railway Company and the Luton, Dunstable, and Welwyn Junction Railway Company into One Company, to be called "The Hertford, Luton, and Dunstable Railway Company," and for regulating the Capital of the Company formed by the Amalgamation; and for other purposes.

lxxv. An Act for enabling the Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway Company to make a Railway from near their Newton and Hyde Station to the Township of Marple in the Parish of Stockport in the County of Chester, to be called the Newton and Compstall Branch; and for other Purposes.

lxxvi. An Act for extending the Limits of the Bradford Waterworks, and for authorizing the Construction of new and altered Works; and for empowering the Corporation of Bradford to borrow a further Sum of Money; and for other Purposes.

lxxvii. An Act for enabling the Wexford Harbour Embankment Company to alter the Number of their Shares, and to issue Preference Shares in lieu of unissued Shares; and for other Purposes.

lxxviii. An Act to extend the Time for purchasing certain Lands required by the Belfast and County Down Railway Company, and for other Purposes connected with the same Company.

lxxix. An Act for better enabling the British Gaslight Company, Limited, to light with Gas the City of Norwich and Suburbs thereof; to dissolve the Norwich Gaslight Company, and to repeal the Acts relating thereto.

lxxx. An Act for enabling the Mayor, Aldermen, and Burgesses of the Borough of Liverpool to acquire Lands for a Post Office and Public Offices, and to make a new and widen existing Streets within the Borough; and for other Purposes.

lxxxi. An Act for making and maintaining a Bridge over the River Yar in the Isle of Wight, with Approaches and Roads thereto; and for other Purposes.

lxxxii. An Act to authorize the Construction of a Railway from Andover to Redbridge in the County of Southampton, and for that Purpose to convert the Andover Canal into a Railway.

lxxxiii. An Act to incorporate and regulate "The Oude Railway Company;" to enable the Company to construct and maintain Railways in the East Indies, and to enter into Contracts with the East India Company; and for other Purposes.

lxxxiv. An Act to enable the London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Company to complete the Communication by Railway between Shoreham, Henfield, and the Mid-Sussex Railway; and for other Purposes connected with their Undertaking.

lxxxv. An Act to amend the Birkenhead Improvement Amendment Act, 1850, especially with respect to the General Mortgage Debt of the Commissioners and their Powers to sell certain Lands; and for other Purposes.

lxxxvi. An Act to repeal the Act relating to the Dean Forest Turnpike Roads, and to make other Provisions in lieu thereof, and to authorize the Construction of a new Road; and for other Purposes.

lxxxvii. An Act for amending the Acts relating to the Manchester Corporation Waterworks.

lxxxviii. An Act to extend the Time for the Completion of so much of the Cornwall Railway as lies between Truro and Falmouth; and for other Purposes.

lxxxix. An Act for authorizing the London and South-western Railway Company to make new Works, and to make Arrangements with other Companies, and for authorizing a Lease to them of the Salisbury and Yeovil Railway, and for regulating their Capital and borrowing Powers; and for other Purposes.

xc. An Act to enable the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board to construct certain Works at Birkenhead, in substitution for and in addition to those already authorized, and for other Purposes.

xci. An Act for confirming the Gift by Francis Crossley, Esquire, to the Borough of Halifax, of a Park for the Benefit of the Inhabitants of the Borough, and for authorizing the Mayor, Aldermen, and Burgesses of the Borough to maintain and regulate the Park, and to provide, maintain, and regulate Public Baths in the Park, and for making a Cemetery, and for making further Provision with respect to the Waterworks and the Gasworks, and the Improvement of the Borough; and for other Purposes.

xcii. An Act to consolidate and amend the Provisions of the several Acts relating to the Liverpool and Birkenhead Docks and the Port and Harbour of Liverpool, and for other Purposes connected therewith.

xciii. An Act to afford Facilities to the Limerick and Foynes Railway Company for raising the Funds necessary to enable them to execute their Undertaking.

xciv. An Act to enable the Midland Great Western Railway of Ireland Company to make an Alteration in the Line of their Streamstown and Clara Junction Railway; and for other Purposes.

xcv. An Act for making a Tramroad from the Aberllefenny Slate Quarries, in the Parish of Talyllyn, in the County of Merioneth, to the River Dovey, in the Parish of Llanfihangel-Geneu'r-Glyn, in the County of Cardigan, with Branches therefrom; and for other Purposes.

xcvi. An Act to enable the Great Northern and Western (of Ireland) Railway Company to make Deviations in their authorized Railways, and to empower the Midland Great Western Railway of Ireland Company to acquire Shares in the Undertaking of the Great Northern and Western (of Ireland) Railway Company; and for other Purposes.

xcvii. An Act for making a Railway from the Hertford and Ware Branch of the Eastern Counties Railway to Buntingford.

xcviii. An Act for authorizing the raising by the Ulverstone and Lancaster Railway Company of further Money, and the selling or leasing of their Railway to the Furness Railway Company; or the making by the Two Companies of Working Arrangements; and for giving further Powers to the Two Companies respectively; and for other Purposes.

xcix. An Act for enabling the Eastern Counties Railway Company to abandon a Portion of the Newmarket and Chesterford Railway, and also a Railway to the River Thames at Galleon's Reach.

c. An Act to enable the Bury and Radcliffe Waterworks Company to raise further Sums of Money; and to amend the Act relating to the Company.

ci. An Act for enabling the Portsmouth Railway Company to extend their Railway from Havant to Hilsea; to acquire additional Lands; to use a Portion of the London and South-western and London, Brighton, and South Coast Railways; and for other Purposes.

cii. An Act to authorize the South Devon and Tavistock Railway Company to lease their Railway, to enable them to raise further Capital for the Completion of their Undertaking, and to make Arrangements as to their Share and borrowed Capital; and for other Purposes.

ciii. An Act for lighting with Gas the Town of Northampton, and the Neighbourhood thereof, in the County of Northampton.

civ. An Act for enabling the Battersea Park Commissioners to sell, and the West End of London and Crystal Palace Railway Company to purchase, Pieces of Land situate near the South End of the new Bridge leading from Chelsea to Battersea Park, for Lease of Undertaking to the London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Company, for extending the Time for completing Extension to Farnborough; and for other Purposes.

cv. An Act for constructing a Market, Market Places, and Slaughter-houses, with all necessary Conveniences, within the Hamlet of Canton, in the County of Glamorgan, to be called "The Llandaff and Canton District Markets."

cvi. An Act for vesting the Undertaking of the Backburn Railway Company in the Lancashire and Yorkshire and East Lancashire Railway Companies; and for other Purposes.

cvii. An Act for enabling the East Kent Railway Company to extend their Railway from Strood to join the Mid Kent Railway (Bromley to Saint Mary's Cray); and for other Purposes connected with their Undertaking.

cviii. An Act for making a Railway from the Great North of Scotland Railway to Old Deer, and thence to Peterhead and Fraserburgh, with a Branch to Ellon, all in the County of Aberdeen, to be called "The Formatine and Buchan Railway."

cix. An Act for consolidating and amending the Acts of the North British Railway Company, and for authorizing Alterations in the Leith and Fisherrow or Musselburgh Branches thereof, and for other Purposes.

cx. An Act for extending the Powers of the Shrewsbury and Welchpool Railway Company for purchasing Lands and completing their Railway; and for other Purposes.

cxi. An Act for the Amalgamation of the Undertakings of the East Suffolk Railway Company, the Yarmouth and Haddiscoe Railway Company, and the Lowestoft and Beccles Railway Company; for leasing the same; and for other Purposes.

cxii. An Act for making a Railway from Athenry to Tuam in the County of Galway, and for other Purposes.

cxiii. An Act to authorize the Great Northern and the Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway Companies to work in common, and for certain other Purposes relating to the Great Northern Railway.

cxiv. An Act for making a Railway from or near Guisbrough to or near to Skinningrove, all in Cleveland in the North Riding of the County of York; and for other Purposes.

cxv. An Act for enabling the Stockton and Darlington Railway Company to make a new Railway in the County of Durham in connection with the Wear Valley and Stockton and Darlington Railways; to acquire additional Lands; and for other Purposes.

cxvi. An Act for the Amalgamation of the Stockton and Darlington, the Wear Valley, the Middlesbrough and Redcar, the Middlesbrough and Guisbrough, and the Darlington and Barnard Castle Railway Companies; and for regulating the Capital and Borrowing Powers of the Stockton and Darlington Railway Company formed by the Amalgamation; and for other Purposes.

cxvii. An Act for enabling the Stockton and Darlington Railway Company to make new Railways in the North Riding of the County of York; and for other Purposes.

cxviii. An Act to authorize the Construction of a Station near Victoria Street, Pimlico, in the County of Middlesex, and of a Railway to connect the same with the West London and Crystal Palace Railway at Battersea in the County of Surrey, in order to afford improved Communication between certain of the Railways South of the Thames and the Western Districts of the Metropolis; and for other Purposes.

cxix. An Act for making a Railway Communication between Dublin and Meath.

cxx. An Act for the Improvement of the Western Parts of the Parish of Hove in the County of Sussex, and for establishing more efficient Police Regulations within the whole of the said Parish.

cxxi. An Act to make Provision for better supplying Birkenhead and Claughton with Gas and Water, and for transferring the Undertaking of the Birkenhead and Claughton Gas and Water Company to the Birkenhead Improvement Commissioners; and for other Purposes.

cxxii. An Act for making a Railway from the Tillicoultry Station of the Stirling and Dunfermline Railway to the Fife and Kinross Railway at Hopefield, to be called "The Devon Valley Railway," and for other Purposes in relation thereto.

cxxiii. An Act to confer further Powers upon the Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton Railway Company with respect to the Completion, Alteration, or Abandonment of certain of their Branch Railways, and to authorize certain Arrangements with respect to their Share Capital and the Purchase of the Stratford-upon-Avon Canal; and to amend the Acts relating to the Company; and for other Purposes.

cxxiv. An Act to authorize the making of a Turnpike Road from Thames Street in the Parish of Clewer in the Borough of New Windsor in the County of Berks to Oxford Road in the said Parish; and for other Purposes.

cxxv. An Act for carrying into effect an Agreement between the Ribble Navigation Company and Sir Thomas George Hesketh Baronet.

cxxvi. An Act to enable the Newport, Abergavenny, and Hereford Railway Company to divert their Railway in the Parish of Aberdare in Glamorganshire; and to confer upon them other Powers.

cxxvii. An Act to enable the Whitehaven Junction Railway Company to construct new Branches, to widen their Line, to erect Shipping Places and other Works, to raise a further Sum of Money; and for other Purposes.

cxxviii. An Act to empower the Lancaster and Carlisle Railway Company to abandon a Part of the Lancaster and Carlisle and Ingleton Railway, and to alter and divert certain Roads in connection with their Railway; to acquire additional Lands; and for other Purposes.

cxxix. An Act to incorporate the Crystal Palace District Gas Company; to enable the said Company to raise further Money; to authorize the Company to contract for and purchase the Undertaking, Land, and Premises of the Sydenham Gas and Coke Company; and for other Purposes connected therewith.

cxxx. An Act to authorize Arrangements between the Chester and Holyhead Railway Company and London and North-western Railway Company, and to authorize the Chester and Holyhead Railway Company to raise a further Sum of Money; and for other Purposes.

cxxxi. An Act for enabling the London and North-western Railway Company to construct Works and to acquire additional Lands in the Counties of Salop, Middlesex, Hertford, Buckingham, Warwick, Chester, Stafford, Northampton, Leicester, and Lancaster; for authorizing Arrangements in reference to "The Improved Postal and Passenger Communication between England and Ireland Act, 1855;" and for other Purposes.

cxxxii. An Act for the Establishment of a Board of Guardians of the Poor in the Parish of Saint Leonard, Shoreditch, in the County of Middlesex; and for other Purposes with respect to the Parish.

cxxxiii. An Act to consolidate and amend the Acts relating to the Stockton, Middlesbrough, and Yarm Water Company; to change the Name of the Company, and authorize the Construction of additional Works and the raising of further Monies; and for other Purposes.

cxxxiv. An Act to enable the North Yorkshire and Cleveland Railway Company to construct a new Branch from their Railway; to make a Deviation in the Main Line and other Works; to alter and amend the Acts relating to the Company; and for other Purposes.

cxxxv. An Act for making further Provision with respect to the Severn Valley Railway, in order to the Completion thereof; and for other Purposes.

cxxxvi. An Act to improve the Management of the Manchester South Junction and Altrincham Railway.

cxxxvii. An Act to authorize the Construction of a Railway from Redditch to the Midland Railway.

cxxxviii. An Act to incorporate and regulate the Great Southern of India Railway Company, and for other Purposes connected therewith.

cxxxix. An Act for extending the Powers of the Plymouth Great Western Dock Company; and for other Purposes.

cxl. An Act to alter and improve the Boundaries of the Municipal Borough and District of Middlesbrough; to enable the Local Board of Health of the District to enlarge the Market Place; to enable the Corporation to construct Landing Places on the North Side of the River Tees, and to establish a public Passage up and over the said River; to transfer the Powers of the Burial Board to the Local Board; and to confer other Powers on the Local Board and the Corporation; and for other Purposes.

cxli. An Act to confer additional Powers on the Tees Conservancy Commissioners; to regulate the Fisheries in the River Tees; to vest the Anchorage and Plankage Dues in the said Commissioners; to alter and amend their existing Acts; and for other Purposes.

cxlii. An Act to extend the Time for making the Worcester and Hereford Railway, and for granting further Powers with respect to that Undertaking.

cxliii. An Act to make further Provisions for vesting the Sheffield, Rotherham, Barnsley, Wakefield, Huddersfield, and Goole Railway in the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company, and for other Purposes.

cxliv. An Act for enabling the Limerick and Castle Connell Railway Company to extend their Railway from Castle Connell to Killaloe; to issue Preference Shares; and for other Purposes.

cxlv. An Act for the Abandonment of the West End of London and Clapham and Norwood Junction Railway, and for other Purposes.

cxlvi. An Act to enable the South Wales Railway Company to acquire additional Lands at Newport; and for other Purposes.

cxlvii. An Act for authorizing a Lease of the Vale of Towy Railway to the Llanelly Railway and Dock Company.

cxlviii. An Act for enabling the Atlantic Telegraph Company to create and issue Preference Capital, for the Extension of Borrowing Powers, and Amendment of Act.

cxlix. An Act to consolidate and amend the Acts relating to the River Clyde and Harbour of Glasgow.

cl. An Act for limiting, defining, and regulating the Capital and Debt of the Warrington and Stockport Railway Company; for amending the Acts relating to the Company, and conferring on them further Powers; and for other Purposes relating to the Company.

PRIVATE ACTS,

PRINTED BY THE QUEEN'S PRINTER, AND WHEREOF THE PRINTED COPIES MAY BE GIVEN IN EVIDENCE.

1. AN Act for enabling Mining Leases to be granted of an Estate in the North Riding of Yorkshire, late of Henry Darley Esquire, deceased, and for other Purposes, and of which the Short Title is "Darley's Estate Act, 1858."

2. An Act to confirm certain Arrangements with regard to the Trust Estate of the late George Viscount Keith, and to enable his Trustees to carry the same into effect.

3. An Act for confirming and giving effect to an Agreement for a Lease by the Westminster Improvement Commissioners of Land in Victoria Street and Tothill Street in the City of Westminster to the Westminster Palace Hotel Company, Limited, and of which the Short Title is "Westminster Palace Hotel Company's Act, 1858."

4. An Act to authorize the raising of Money to be expended in permanent Improvements on the Entailed Estates of Braco, Marr, Carraldstoun and others, and the granting of Feus and long Leases of Parts of the said Estates.

5. An Act for vesting Estates of the late Mr. Henry Holroyd deceased in Trustees for Sale, and for authorizing Grants in Fee and Building Leases for long Terms of Years of the same Estates; and for other Purposes.

6. An Act to grant further Powers and to make further Provisions in respect to the Estates subject to the Trusts of the Will of Benjamin Hall Esquire, deceased.

7. An Act for authorizing the Trustees of the late James Davidson of Ruchill to sell Part of his Lands of Ruchill, Garrioch, and Balgray in the County of Lanark, and to reinvest the Prices of such Lands; and for other Purposes.

8. An Act for regulating the Dundonald Bursaries in the University and College of Glasgow; and for other Purposes.

9. An Act for authorizing Mining, Building, and other Leases, the obtaining of the Enfranchisement of Copyholds and the Renewal of Leases, and the making of Partitions, Sales, and Exchanges of the Estates devised and bequeathed by the Will of Henry Belward Ray Esquire, deceased; and for other Purposes.

10. An Act to amend an Act of the Parliament of Ireland passed in the Eleventh and Twelfth Years of the Reign of King George the Third, intituled An Act for vesting the Estate of the Right Reverend Father in God Doctor John Stearne, late Lord Bishop of Clogher, deceased, in Trustees in trust for carrying the charitable and other Bequests of his Will into execution.

PRIVATE ACT,

NOT PRINTED.

11. An Act to repeal so much of an Act passed in the Seventh Year of the reign of His late Majesty King William the Fourth and in the First Year of the Reign of Her present Majesty, intituled An Act for naturalizing Dame Marie Louise Pelline De Dalberg Acton and her infant Son, Sir John Emerich Edward Dalberg Acton Baronet, as enacts that the said Sir John Emerich Edward Dalberg Acton Baronet shall not thereby be enabled to be of the Privy Council, or a Member of either House of Parliament, or to take any Office or Place of Trust, either Civil or Military, or to have any Grant of Lands, Tenements, or Hereditaments from the Crown, to himself or any other Person or Persons in trust for him.

[INDEX.

INDEX

TO

HANSARD'S PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES.

IN THE SECOND SESSION OF

THE SEVENTEENTH PARLIAMENT OF THE UNITED KINGDOM,

21° & 22° VICTORIA,

1857-8.

EXPLANATION OF THE ABBREVIATIONS.

1*R.* 2*R.* 3*R.* First, Second, or Third Reading.—Amend., Amendment.—Res., Resolution.—Com. Committee.—Re-Com., Re-committal.—Rep., Report.—Adj., Adjourned.—cl., Clause.—add. cl., Additional Clause.—neg., Negatived.—l., Lords.—c., Commons.—m. q., Main Question.—o. q., Original Question.—o. m., Original Motion.—p. q., Previous Question.—r. p., Report Progress.—A., Ayes.—N., Noes.—M., Majority.—1st Div., 2nd Div., First or Second Division.

☞ When in the Text or in the Index a Speech is marked thus *, it indicates that the Speech is reprinted from a Pamphlet or some authorised Report.

When in the Index a † is prefixed to a Name or an Office (the Member having accepted or vacated office during the Session) and to Subjects of Debate thereunder, it indicates that the Speeches on those Subjects were delivered in the Speaker's private or official character, as the case may be.

When in this Index a * is added to the Reading of a Bill, it indicates that no Debate took place upon that stage of the measure.

"ABEONA," The
c. Question (Mr. Lindsay), [149] 1193

ABERDEEN, Earl of
Slave Trade, The, [150] 2214; — Right of Search, [151] 2085
Universities (Scotland), 2R. [151] 1359, 1369

ABINGER, Lord
East India Company's Petition, [148] 1158
Land, Transfer of, 3R. [150] 424
Liturgy, Revision of the, Commission moved for, [150] 177
Transfer of Estates Simplification, Rep. [149] 852

Accommodation Bills,
c. Question (Mr. Bass), [151] 416

ADAIR, Mr. H. E. Ipswich
Corrupt Practices Prevention, 3R. [151] 2123

ADAMS, Mr. W. H., Boston
Bank Issues Indemnity, 3R. [148] 443
Bothnia—Claims of British Merchants, Commission moved for, [151] 1850
Bristol Municipal Charities, 2R. [150] 2276
India, Government of (No. 1), Leave, [148] 1452
India, Government of (No. 3), Consid. add. cl. [151], 1031

ADAMS, Mr. W. H.—cont.
India—Mutiny in, Papers moved for, [149] 372
Jews, 2R. [151] 1624
Joint Stock Companies' Acts Amendment Com. cl. 20, [150] 2275
Land, Sale and Transfer of (Ireland), Com. [150] 1564; Com. cl. 3, [151] 58
Leases and Sales of Settled Estates Act Amendment, Bill withdrawn, [151] 1436
Marriage Law Amendment, Consid. [151] 792
New Trial in Criminal Cases, 2R. [151] 1061
Oaths, Leave, [148] 402
Supply—Royal Parks, [150] 1115; — County Courts, 1478; — Embassies and Missions Abroad, [151] 1273
Weights and Measures, 2R. [150] 915
Wills, Calendars of, [151] 1082

ADDERLEY, Rt. Hon. C. B. (†President of the Board of Health, and Vice President of the Committee of Privy Council for Education), Staffordshire, W.
†Commissioners for Exhibition (1851), 2R. [150] 2264
Drainage of the Metropolis, [148] 552
Education (England), Commission moved for, [148] 1223; Papers moved for, [151] 2279
†Health, Board of—Medical Staff, [150] 1197
†Health, Public, Act Amendment, [149] 463
†Health, Public, Act Amendment (No. 2), Leave, [149] 1554

ADDERLEY, Rt. Hon. C.B.—cont.
†Health, Public, Com. [150] 2280; cl. 4, 2281, 2284; Consid. add. cl. [151] 1655; Lords' Amends. 2276
India, Troops for, [148] 462
†Local Government, [149] 2015; 2R. 2095; Com. cl. 9, [151] 171, 172; cl. 10, 173
†New Zealand, [150] 361
†Roman Catholic Charities, [150] 2292
†Science and Art, Department of, [151] 1171; —Supply 1180, 1201, 1203
†Supply—Education, [151] 135, 152;—General Board of Health, 1444
Thames, State of The, [148] 461
†Vaccination—Small Pox; [150] 1196

Address in Answer to the Speech,
l. (Lord Portman), [148] 5; Her Majesty's Answer, 227; Explanation (Earl of Derby), 314, 521
c. (Mr. C. W. Martin), [148] 86; Report, 143; Her Majesty's Answer, 268

Adjournment of the House,
c. Notice (Chancellor of the Exchequer), [151] 870

Administration of Justice,
c. Com. moved for (Mr. McMahon), [149] 1802; Motion neg. 1814

Administration of Justice Bill,
c. 1R.* [150] 2220; 2R.* [151] 265

Administration of Justice (Dublin) Bill.
c. 1R.* [150] 2098

Admiralty, The,
c. Explanation (Sir F. Baring), [149] 1423

Admiralty Court, The,
c. Question (Mr. Hadfield), [148] 558

Admiralty Court Bill,
c. 1R.* [151] 730; 2R.* 930

Admiralty Court, Registrar—Supply,
c. [150] 1472

ADVOCATE, The LORD (The Rt. Hon. J. Moncreiff), Leith, &c.
Conspiracy to Murder, 2R. [148] 1802
Land, Transfer of, (Scotland) [148] 1733
Probates and Letters of Administration, [148] 1732
Scotch Universities, [148] 1472;
See also MONCREIFF, Rt. Hon. J.

ADVOCATE, THE LORD (Rt. Hon. J. Inglis), Stamford—See also, INGLIS, Rt. Hon. J.
County Franchise (Scotland), Leave, [150] 209
County Voters (Scotland), Registration of, [149] 1265; Leave, 1405; 2R. 2007; Com. [150] 2190
Edinburgh, &c., Annuity Tax, Leave, [149] 445; 2R. [150] 2181
Lands, Titles to (Scotland), [149] 575

cont.]

ADVOCATE, The Lord—cont.
Lands, Valuation of (Scotland), Act Amendment, 2R. [149] 662
Marriage Law Amendment, 2R. [150] 135; Com. cl. 1, [151] 680, 681, 682
Probates, Scotch, [149] 1493
Sheriff's Court (Scotland), [150] 1611
Supply—County Courts, [150] 1480;—General Register House (Edinburgh), 1494, 1495, 1497, 1498
Under Secretary of State for Scotland, Res. [150] 2134
Universities (Scotland), [149] 858; Leave, 1554; [150] 336; 2R. 1881, 1903, 2134; Com. cl. 1, [151] 410; cl. 2, 413; cl. 3, 414; cl. 4, 508, 510, 512, 513, 514; cl. 7, 515, 516; cl. 10, 518; cl. 13, 732, 734; cl. 14, 737; cl. 15, 742, 744, 746, 747; cl. 19, 749, 752; Consid. 948, 950; add. cl. 951, 953, 957; cl. 7, 958; cl. 14, 959, 961; cl. 16, 962
Western Bank of Scotland, [149] 812, 1196

Affairs, Public, State of,
l. Observations (Earl of Derby), [148] 686

Africa, Western Coast of—Supply,
c. [151] 1268

African Squadron—African Slave Trade —see Slave Trade

Aggravated Assaults Act,
c. Question (Mr. FitzRoy) [151] 10; (Mr. Dillwyn), 2036

AGNEW, Sir A., Wigtonshire
Agricultural Statistics (Scotland), [149] 463
County Voters, Registration of (Scotland), Com. [150] 2191
Westminster Hall, [150] 335

Agricultural Statistics Bill,
c. Leave, [149] 162; 1R.* 163; 2R. 1871; Amend. (Mr. Packe), 1888, [o. q. A. 135, N. 241, M. 106] 1919

Agricultural Statistics (Scotland),
c. Question (Sir A. Agnew), [149] 463; Papers moved for (Mr. Caird), 783; Motion withdrawn, 785

AIRLIE, Earl of
"Cagliari," Case of the, [149] 1930, 1939; [150] 1848
Universities (Scotland) Com. cl. 1; Amend. [151] 1667

AKROYD, Mr. E., Huddersfield
Address in Answer to the Speech, [148] 99
Church Rates, 3R. [150] 1710
Education (England), Commission moved for, [148] 1210
Marriage Law Amendment, 2R. [150] 143
Metropolis Local Management, Com. cl. 1 [151] 1943; cl. 2, 1946; cl. 9, 1951

ALBEMARLE, Earl of Annexation of Native States, Motion postponed, [150] 326
India, Government of, [149] 1651

[cont.

ALBEMARLE, Earl of—cont.
India, Government of (No. 3), Com. cl. 7, [151] 1571; cl. 12, Amend. 1583; cl. 36, 1690; 3R. 2008
India—Governor General, Papers moved for, [150] 1514;—Colonization of, [151] 376
Oude, Kingdom of, [149] 1921;—Restoration of the Royal Family of, [150] 858

ALCOCK, Mr. T., Surrey, E.
Army Estimates, [149] 135, 137
Battersea Park, [151] 877, 1394, 1502
Chelsea Bridge Act Amendment, 2R. [150] 1992
Church Rates, Com. cl. 1, [150] 568
Commissioners for Exhibition (1851), 2R. [150] 2262; Com. cl. 1, [151] 85; Amend. 87; cl. 2, 92
India—Clothing for the Army, [151] 756
Metropolis Local Management, 2R. [151] 1702
Mutiny, Com. [149] 400
Real Property, &c.—Probate Duty, Res. [150] 869

Aldershot, Military Hospital and Medical School at.
c. Question (Sir H. Verney), [151] 2190

Ali Moorad's Claim—Mr. Butt,
c. Notice (Mr. Roebuck), [148] 1730; Petition, 1855; Com. moved for, 1859; Amend. (Mr. Fagan), 1860; Amend. and Motion withdrawn, 1865; Nomination of Com. 1866; Report, [149] 75

Alien Act, The
l. Question (Lord Lyndhurst), [148] 1848;—Observations (Lord Campbell), 1850
c. Question (Mr. Roebuck), [148] 762

Aliens, Law Relating to—Case of Azzopardi,
l. Explanation (Lord Lyndhurst), [149] 1; (Lord Campbell), 69

Allowances to Witnesses at Sessions, &c.
c. Question (Mr. Collins) [151] 311

ANNESLEY, Hon. Capt. H., Cavan Co.
Army Estimates, [150] 399
Army, Sanitary Condition of the, Res. [150] 482
Guards, Mortality in the, [148] 1261; Report moved for, 1545, 1548

ARCHDALL, Captain, Fermanagh
Belfast Riots, [148] 1869

ARGYLL, Duke of (†Postmaster General)
†Address in Answer to the Speech, [148] 67, 69, 70, 71
†Dublin and Holyhead, Communication between, [148] 970
†East India Company's Petition, [148] 1137
†Hearsey, Major General, [148] 235, 236
†India—Arms and Press Acts, Papers moved for, [148] 263, 267, 268:—Vote of Thanks to the Civil Service, Army and Navy, 856

ARGYLL, Duke of—cont.
India, Government of, Report moved for, [149] 1955
Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Papers moved for, [150] 238; Res. 608

Army,
Accounts, Auditing of, c. Question (Mr. Macartney), [150] 178
Aldershot, Military Hospital and Medical School at, c. Question (Sir H. Verney) [151] 2190
Bands, Regimental, c. Question (General Codrington), [149] 816; (Mr. Laurie), 857
Barracks, Accommodation in, l. Returns moved for (Lord Panmure), [149] 789
Barracks—Infantry and Cavalry, c. Question (Viscount Ingestre), [148] 1370;—Model, Papers moved for (Mr. B. Hope), [149] 781; Question (Mr. Warren), [150] 449;—at Chatham, Question (General Buckley), 921;—at Kensington Gore, Question (Mr. H. Baring), [151] 175
Billeting System, c. Com. moved for (General Peel), [149] 555; Question (General Codrington), [151] 1606
Captains in the, c. Address moved (Sir De L. Evans), [150] 1100; Motion withdrawn, 1103
Clothing of the, c. Question (Captain Vivian), [151] 1283
Commissions in the, c. Question (Mr. W. Williams), [149] 222; Observations (Mr. Bagwell), 427; Question (Mr. Laurie), 1264;—Sale of, Question (Lord Burghley), [150] 2252; (Colonel North), [151] 415
Cooking Apparatus, l. Papers moved for (Earl Fortescue), [151] 1908
c. Question (Viscount Ebrington), [150] 921
Estimates, c. [149] 134, 224, 817, 1248, 1602; 371; Amend. (Major Wortley), [150] 398; Amend. neg. 399, 1105; [151] 1481
Highlanders, The 78th, c. Question (Mr. Campbell), [150] 1612
Hundredth Regiment, l. Question (Marquess of Clanricarde), [151] 1349
King, Captain, of the Depot Battalion, c. Question (Mr. Brady), [150] 429
Land Transport Corps, c. Com. moved for (Lord A. Vane-Tempest), [149] 1621; Motion withdrawn, 1627; Question (Lord A. Vane-Tempest), [151] 2126
Lasso, Use of the, by the Cavalry, c. Question (Captain Vivian), [150] 1061
Medals for the Troops in India, c. Question (Mr. Kinnaird), [149] 423, 712
Medical Department, c. Question (Mr. Grogan), [148] 1605
Medical Officers, c. Question (Mr. Brady), [149] 983; (Colonel Kingscote), [150] 334; (Colonel North), [151] 1082
Military Academy—Competitive Examinations, c. Address moved (Mr. Monsell), [149] 1724, [A. 217, N. 177, M. 40] 1740; Her Majesty's Answer, 2010
Military Auditors, c. Question (General Codrington) [148] 465 Military Education, c. Question (Mr. Monsell [150] 1103
Military Organization, c. Res. (Captain Vivian), [150] 1328, [A. 106, N. 104, M. 2], 1358;

Army—cont.
Question (Sir J. Walsh), 1447; Observations (Captain Vivian), [151] 550
Militia, Embodied, l. Returns moved for (Earl of Carnarvon), [148] 1586
Mortality in the Guards, c. Question (Mr. Laurie), [148] 1169; (Captain Annesley), 1261; Report moved for, 1545; Amend. (Mr. S. Herbert), 1548
Ninety-second Regiment in Bombay, c. Question (General Codrington), [151] 1081
Officers' Servants, c. Question (General Codrington), [150] 1921 Presbyterian and Roman Catholic Chaplains in the, l. Question (Marquess of Londonderry), [149] 1350
c. Question (Captain O'Connell), 249; (Mr. Hume), [150] 2014; Observation (Mr. Serj. Deasy), 2150
Prize Money, Indian, c. Question (Mr. Kinnaird), [149] 324
Promotions in the, see Warrant of 1854 (below)
Recruiting System, c. Observations (General Codrington, [150] 363
Regulations, c. Observations (Lord Elcho), [151] 2360
Sandhurst and Woolwich, c. Question (Mr. Lygon), [149] 2118
Sanitary Condition of the, l. Report of Commissioners, [148] 969
c. Observations (Mr. Laurie), [149] 108; Res. (Viscount Ebrington), [150] 473
Staff Appointments, c. Question (Viscount Goderich), [149] 710
Staff Officers' Servants, c. Question (General Codrington), [148] 976
Subalterns of the, c. Question (Colonel Freestun) [151] 1499; Address moved (Colonel Freestun), 2238; Adj. moved, (Sir F. Smith), 2240; Amend. and Motion withdrawn, 2241
Surgeons, Military, c. Question (Mr. Brady), [149] 983
Troops, Conveyance of — The "Austria," l. Paper moved for (Earl of Hardwicke), [148] 348
Warrant of 1854 — Promotion, c. Question (General Peel), [148] 139, 759; (General Wyndham), [149] 323; (Colonel North), 1355; [151] 84; (Lord A. Vane-Tempest), 754, 1788; (Colonel Knox), 2043
Woolwich Academy, Admission to, c. Question (Mr. P. O'Brien), [150] 251;—see Barracks —India—Militia—Mutiny Bill—Weedon.

Army Service Bill,
c. 1R.* [151] 1266; 2R.* 1369; 3R. 1654
l. 1R.* [151] 1655; 2R.* 1773; 3R.* 1906
Royal Assent, 1967

Art Unions Act Amendment Bill,
c. 1R.* [150] 2220; 2R.* [151] 83; 3R.* 503
l. 1R.* [151] 586; 2R.* 1906; 3R.* 2243
Royal Assent, 2369

Ascension Day,
c. Motion (Lord R. Cecil), [150] 496; Motion withdrawn, ib.

Ashburnham, General.
c. Question (Mr. Warren), [148] 862

Ashburton, Lord
India, Government of (No. 3), Com. cl. 7, [151] 1577

Ashley, Lord, Kingston-upon-Hull
Stade Dues, Address moved, [149] 1015

Assessed and Income Taxes,
c. Res. (Mr. Lindsay), [151] 209; Motion withdrawn, 214

Atherton, Mr. W., Durham City
Common Law Procedure Act Amendment, 2R. [150] 928
Durham County Palatine Jurisdiction, 2R. [150] 222
Lancaster, Duchy of—Mining Operations; Com. moved for, [150] 454
Mortmain, Law of, [150] 1801
Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Res. [150] 818
Western Bank of Scotland, [149] 1212

Atlantic Telegraph Company's Bill,
c. 1R.* [148] 1083; 2R.* 1470; 3R.* [149] 1447
l. 1R.* [151] 1507; 2R.* 2193
3R. Amend. (Earl of Derby), [151] 1967; Adj. Debate, 2077
Royal Assent, 2369

Attorney General, The (Sir R. Bethell), Aylesbury — See also, Bethell, Sir R.
Admiralty Court, The [148] 558
Bankruptcy Law, [148] 550
British Bank Directors, [148] 759
Circassia—Treaty of Paris, [148] 1739
Conspiracy to Murder, 2R. [148] 1820
Divorce Act, The, [148] 1261
Justice, Department of, [148] 553
Land, Transfer of, [148] 758
Law Reform, [148] 359

Attorney General, The (Sir F. Kelly), Suffolk, E. — See also, Kelly, Sir F.
Accommodation Bills, [151] 416, 417
Bankruptcy and Insolvency Laws Consolidation, Leave, [151] 222
Bankruptcy, Law of, [149] 1354
Bernard, Dr., Case of, [149] 1486, 1489, 1491
Breach of Privilege, [151] 2191
Canada, Mercantile Law in, [149] 2118
Criminal Statute Law, [149] 710
Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Act Amendment, [151] 1785; 2R. 2056
Divorce, Court of, [149] 1493
Drafts on Bankers Law Amendment, Consid. [151] 2053; 3R. 2076
Incumbered Estates (West Indies), Consid. [151] 2056
Justice, Administration of, Com. moved for, [149] 1811
Land, Sale and Transfer of (Ireland), Com. [150] 1556
Law Reforms, [150] 924
Leases and Sales of Settled Estates, Com. [151] 2206, 2207

[cont.

ATTORNEY GENERAL, The, (Sir F. Kelly)—cont.
Legitimacy Declaration, Leave, [150] 2156; Com. [151] 1145; cl. 1, 1540; cl. 8, 1541; cl. 9, 1542, 1543
Manchester Court of Bankruptcy, Commissioner of the, [151] 2032
New Trial in Criminal Cases, Com. [151] 1062
Probate and Letters of Administration Act Amendment, [151] 1785; 2R. 2055, 2056; Com. 2068, 2070; cl. 5, 2072; cl. 8, 2073; add. 2074
Property, Law of, Amendment, Consid. [151] 2138
Rewards to Members, Res. [151] 195, 2191, 2350
Supply—Lord Advocate, &c. (Scotland), [150] 1492;—Temporary Commissions, [151] 1404; Patent Law, Fees, &c. 1415
Trustees Relief, [151] 1284

Attorney General, The late, and the Law Lords,
c. Observations (Sir R. Bethell), [149] 4

Attorney General v. The Prince of Wales,
c. Papers moved for (Mr. A. Smith), [149] 1999; Motion negatived [not agreed to, as erroneously stated], 2001

Audit, Commissioners of—Supply,
c. [150] 1262

Australia—Naval Stations,
c. Question (Lord A. Churchill), [148] 681

Australian Mail Service
c. Question (Mr. Young), [148] 353; Observations (Mr. Ald. Copeland), 580; Question (Mr. Macartney), 1083; (Mr. H. Berkeley), [150] 2015; [151] 174

Australian, North, Expedition,
c. Question (Mr. Booth), [149] 1584

Austria and the Porte,
c. Question (Mr. G. Duff), [151] 607

"Austria" The—Conveyance of Troops,
l. Papers moved for (Earl of Hardwicke), [148] 348
c. Report moved for (Colonel Sykes), [148] 682

AYRTON, Mr. A. S., Tower Hamlets
"Austria," The Steam Ship, Report moved for, [148] 684
Ballot, Leave, [150] 1768
Breach of Privilege—Washington Wilks, [150] 1326
Chelsea New Bridge, Leave, [148] 1847
Chelsea Bridge Act Amendment, 2R. [150] 1996
Church Rates Abolition, Com. cl. 1, [149] 1459, 1557; 3R. [150] 1722
Church Rates Amendment, Adj. moved, [149] 1869
Commerce, Tribunals of, Com. moved for, [149] 1142, 1160
Commissioners for Exhibition, (1851), 2R. [150] 2267; Com. cl. 1, [151] 92
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Com. cl. 1, [151] [cont.

AYRTON, Mr. A. S.—cont.
1489; Amend. 1497, 1498, 1598; cl. 2, 1603; Consid. cl. 1, 2064
Cruelty to Animals, 2R., [149] 1556
Divorce, Court of, [149] 1492
East India Loan, Com. [148] 1873, 1888; Consid. [149] 16; add. cl. 155
East India Railways, Com. moved for, [149] 1394, 1401
Galway Freemen Disfranchisement, Leave, [149] 388; Com. [151] 595; cl. 1, 602
Health, Public, Act Amendment, Leave, [148] 501
India, Despatches from, [150] 931
India, Government of (No. 1), Leave, [148] 1319
India, Government of (No. 2), [149] 870, 1350
India, Government of, Com. Res. 2; Amend. [149] 2177, 2199; Res. 3, 1614; Res. 6, [150] 2246
India, Government of, (No. 3) Com. cl. 3, [151] 452; cl. 8, 766; cl. 11, 780; cl. 14, 867; 868; cl. 21, 886; cl. 27, 889; Consid. add. cl. 1029
Joint-Stock Banking Companies, Com. cl. 3, [150] 1911
Joint-Stock Companies Acts Amendment, Com. cl. 19, [150] 2273, 2274
Justice, Administration of, Com. moved for, [149] 1812
Leases and Sales of Settled Estates, Com. [151] 2206
Local Government, 2R. [149] 2097
London Corporation Regulation, Nomination of Com. [149] 399
Marriage Law Amendment, 2R. [150] 120; Com. cl. 1, [151] 674, 678, 682; cl. 2, 683
Medical Practitioners, Com. cl. 3, [151] 997; cl. 4, Amend. 998
Metropolis Local Management Act Amendment, Leave, [151] 1519; Com. cl. 1, 1929, 1941; cl. 2, 1947; cl. 5, 1950; cl. 26, 1957; add. cl. 1958, 1959; Consid. add. cl. 2047
Oaths, 2R. [148] 1087
Paper Duty, Res. [151] 120
Poor Rates (Metropolis), Leave, [149] 626, 647; 2R. [150] 496, 515
Probate and Letters of Administration, Com. cl. 5, [151] 2072; cl. 8, 2073; add. cl. 2074
Stamp Duties on Drafts, Com. Preamble, [150] 291
Supply—Poor Law Board, [150] 1134, 1137;—Police Courts (Metropolis), 1487;—Metropolitan Police, 1489;—British Museum, 1581; [151] 1426:—Main Drainage of London, 1428
Thames, State of the, [151] 437
Universities (Scotland) Com. cl. 19, [151] 748

BAGWELL, Mr. J., Clonmel
Ali Morad's Claim—Mr. Butt, [148] 1859
Army, Commissions in the, [149] 223, 427, 432, 434
Army Estimates, [149] 137
Bank Issues Indemnity, 3R. [148] 442
Budget, The—Financial Statement, [149] 1310
Cashel Election, [149] 248
Clerks of Petty Sessions (Ireland), 2R. [150] 2277
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Com. cl. 1 [151] 1591
Donegal, Destitution in, Com. moved for, [149] 1525, 1543

[cont.

BAGWELL, Mr. J.—cont.
Dublin, Affray at, Report moved for, [149] 676
Endowed Schools (Ireland), [150] 428
Ellis, Mr., Murder of, [151] 20
Havelock, Major General, Pension to, Rep. [148] 412
Incumbered Estates Court, [148] 1262
Irish Business, [151] 880
Kafirs, The Starving, [148] 554
Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Res. [149] 765
Marriage Law Amendment, Com. cl. 4 [151] 684; add. cl. 685
Navy Estimates, [149] 1645
Nisi Prius Court (Ireland), 2R. [150] 2278
Oaths, 2R. [148] 1088; Com. cl. 3, [149] 305
Peace Preservation (Ireland) Act Amendment, 2R. Amend. [150] 2086
Reformatory Schools (Ireland), [148] 271; 2R. [150] 522, 523; Com. cl. 7; [151] 1432, 1433; cl. 15, 1434; cl. 17, ib., 1435
Secretary, The Irish, Office of, [150] 1455 1465
Supply—Officers of Lord Lieutenant (Ireland), [150] 1253;—Secretary to Lord Lieutenant (Ireland), 1257; — Inspectors of Lunatic Asylums (Ireland), 1259, 1260, 1261;—Board of Public Works (Ireland), ib.

†BAILLIE, Mr. H. J., (Secretary to the Board of Control), Inverness-shire
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Com. cl. 1, [151] 1492
Dhar, Principality of, [149] 547
East India Loan, Consid. [149] 146
East India Railways, Com. moved for, [149] 1390
Education Regulations (Army), India, [149] 426
India, Colonization of, Com. moved for, [149] 276, 554;—Mutiny in, Papers moved for, 356;—Public Works, 712;—Honorary Distinctions for Service in, 1989, 1990;—Press in, 2014; Reinforcements for the Army, [150] 524;—Private Correspondence, 764
India, Government of, Com. moved for, [149] 1704; Res. 5, [150] 2056
Kroomen, Enlistment of, [149] 816
Kurrachee, Suppression of the Mutiny at, [150] 924
Lucknow, Property taken in, [150] 333
Malacca, Straits of, Correspondence moved for, [149] 990
Marriage Law Amendment, Com. add. cl. [151] 685
Negroes, Enlistment of, Papers moved for, Amend. [149] 1043
†Oude, Annexation of, Papers moved for, [148] 1477, 1478, 1496
Oude—Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, [150] 180; Res. 731, 1035;—European Regiments in, 427
Prize Money, Indian, [149] 325
Universities (Scotland), Com. cl. 13, [151] 734

BAINES, Rt. Hon. M. T. (†Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster), Leeds
Bristol Municipal Charities, 2R. [150] 2277
†Charity Commissioners, [148] 1605
†Conspiracy to Murder, 2R. [148] 1758
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Consid. add. cl. [151] 2023

[cont.

BAINES, Rt. Hon. M. T.—cont.
Lancaster, Duchy of—Mining Operations, Com. moved for, [150] 446
Local Government, Com. cl. 9, [151] 171; Amend. 172; cl. 10, 173
London Corporation Regulation, Motion for Counsel, [149] 1748
Marriage Law Amendment, 2R. [150] 129; Com. cl. 1, [151] 675; add. cl. 685
Partnerships, Registration of, 2R. [151] 237

BALL, Mr. E., Cambridgeshire
Agricultural Statistics, Leave, [149] 162; 2R. 1917
Bank Acts Committee, Nomination of Com. [148] 965
Budget, The — Financial Statement, [149] 1306
Church Rates Abolition, 2R. (148) 1565; Com. cl. 1, [149] 1468; 3R. [150] 1719
Havelock, Major General, Pension to, Rep. [148] 414

Ballot, The
c. Leave, [150] 1773, [A. 197, N. 294, M. 97] 1793

Bangor, Bishop of,
Church of England, Political Services of the, Address moved, [151] 494

Bank Acts,
c. Notice (Chancellor of the Exchequer) [148] 458
Com. moved for (Chancellor of the Exchequer), [148] 580; Amend. (Mr. Disraeli), 632, [o. q. A. 295, N. 117, M. 178] 666;—Instruction (Chancellor of the Exchequer), 669;—Explanation (Mr. Spooner), 674;—Nomination of Com. 964; Adj. moved (Mr. Greer), 965; Motion neg. 966; Amend (Sir J. Pakington), ib.; Amend neg. 967, 1083;—Instruction (Mr. Greer), 1544; Motion withdrawn, 1545

Bank Issues Indemnity Bill,
c. Leave, [148] 145; 1R.* 226;
2R. 274:
Com. cl. 2 [148] 398; Amend. (Mr. Malins), 403, [A. 18, N. 100, M. 82] 409;
3R. 431
l. 1R [148] 409;
2R. 447;
3R. 526
Royal Assent, 672

Bankers' Drafts
c. Question (Mr. Caird), [150] 1311;—see Drafts on Bankers, Law Amendment Bill—Stamp Duty on Drafts Bill

Bankruptcy and Insolvency Laws
l. Petition (the Lord Chancellor), [150] 1997; Question (Lord Truro), [151] 1070
c. Question (Mr. Nicoll), [151] 2304

Bankruptcy and Insolvency Laws Consolidation Bill,
c. Leave, [151] 220; 1R.* 223

Bankruptcy and Liquidation Bill,
l. 1R. [148] 2268

Bankruptcy Commission,
l. Question (Lord Brougham), [148] 2268

Bankruptcy, District Courts of, Abolition Bill,
l. 1R. [148] 1682, 1704;
2R. discharged [149] 167

Bankruptcy, District Courts of, Abolition (No. 2), Bill,
l. 1R. [149] 169

Bankruptcy Laws,
l. Question (Lord Brougham), [148] 666
c. Question (Mr. Bouverie), [148] 859; (Mr. Bass), [149] 1466

Barber, William Henry, Case of,
c. Com. moved for (Mr. Brady), [150] 2114; Amend. (Sir J. Pakington), 2117; Nomination of Com. [151] 152; That Viscount Goderich be discharged attendance (Mr. Brady), 274; Adj. moved (Chancellor of the Exchequer), [151] 275

BARING, Rt. Hon. Sir F. T., Portsmouth
Admiralty, The Establishments, [149] 1426
Budget, The—Financial Statement, [149] 1339
Customs Establishments, [149] 1466, [150] 247
Dockyards, &c., Officers at Out-ports, [149] 1466
East India Loan Issues, [148] 757; Com. 1667
Government Property—Expenditure from Estimates, Com. moved for, [150] 1702
Indian Government of Com. moved for, [149] 1756; Com. Rep. [150] 2075
Indian Government of Act, 21 & 22 Vict. c. 106, [151] 666, 670, 21 & 22 Vict. c. 75, Com. 681, 682
Navy Estimates, [149] 133, 1235, 1239, 1241, 1247, 1252, [150] [illegible]
Prisons Bill, [149] 561;—Superintendents, [150] 1374;—Expenditure and Management referred, [151] 1378, 1379;—Rev. Prison Officers, [illegible], 1424;—Local Management, 1444
Ways and Means, [151] 1639, 1643

BARING, Mr. H. B., Marlborough
Barracks at Kensington Gore, [151] 175

BARING, Mr. T., Huntingdon
Bank Acts, Com. [148] 669, 671
Bank of England (Indemnity), Com. moved for, [148] 1664
Bank Notice (Scotland), [148] 1676, 1677
Bank Notice (Ireland) Leave, [148] 758; Com. 1677, 1682
Bankruptcy Bill, [149] 28, 2, 3, 4, 167
Bankruptcy Laws, Com. moved for, Leave, Amend. [148] 1666, 1667
Indian Government of Act, Res. 2 [150] 910, Res. 3, 1042, 1043, [151] 670, Res. 4, 671, Res. 5, 672, Res. 6, 673, Res. 7, 674, Res. 8, 675, Res. 9, 676, Res. 10, 677, Res. 11, 678, Res. 12, 679, Res. 13, 680, Res. 14, 681, Res. 15, 682, Res. 16,

BAXTER, Mr. W. E.—cont.
nacy, (Scotland), Amend. 1263;—Police, 1471;—General Register House, Edinburgh, 1495, 1497, 1499;—Theological Professors, Belfast, [151] 1240;—Non-Conforming, &c. Ministers (Ireland), Amend. 1277
Under Secretary of State for Scotland, Res. [150] 2118, 2150
Universities (Scotland), 2R. [150] 1909; Com. cl. 2, [151] 413; cl. 4, 509; cl. 15, 747; cl. 19, Amend. 748; Consid. cl. 14, 959, 961; cl. 19, Amend. 963

Bayswater and South Kensington,
c. Question (Mr. Mackinnon), [149] 2013

BEAMISH, Mr. F. B., Cork City
Queen's Colleges (Ireland), [148] 556

BEECROFT, Mr. G. S., Leeds
Justice, Administration of, Com. moved for, [149] 1812

Beer Houses.
c. Question (Viscount Goderich), [149] 1989

Beer, Sale of,
l. Question (Bishop of London), [151] 2242

Belfast Riots,
l. Question (Viscount Dungannon), [150] 1591
c. Question (Captain Archdall), [148] 1869; (Mr. J. D. FitzGerald), [150] 1534;—Roman Catholic Magistrates in, Question (Mr. Deasy), [150] 523;—Corporation of, Question (Mr. Macartney), [151] 84, 1001;—New Public Offices—Supply, 1423

Belfast (Town) Improvement Bill,
c. 1R.* [148] 757;
2R. 1367; Amend. (Mr. McMahon), [148] 1368; Amend. withdrawn, ib.

Belgrade, Outrage at — Consul Fonblanque,
c. Question (Viscount Bury) [150] 1946; (Mr. G. Duff), [151] 394

BELHAVEN, Lord
Universities (Scotland), Com. cl. 3, Amend. [151] 1676; cl. 15, 1678

Bell, for the Clock Tower, Westminster,
c. Question (Mr. Bowyer), [148] 456; (Mr. Hankey), [150] 274

BELMORE, Earl of
Endowed Schools (Ireland), [149] 2116

Belvoir, Agricultural Model School at,
c. Question (Mr. Calcutt), [150] 332

Bengal Officers in the Civil Service,
c. Question (Mr. Palk), [148] 1370

BENTINCK, Mr. G. W. P., Norfolk, W.
Agricultural Statistics, Leave, [149] 163; 2R. 1896
Ballot, Leave, [150] 1754

[cont.

BENTINCK, Mr. G. W. P.—cont.
Bank Act Committee, Nomination of Com., [148] 964
Battersea Park, [151] 878
Chelsea Bridge Act Amendment, Com. [151] 1648; cl. 3, 1651
Conspiracy to Murder, Leave, 1024; 2R. [148] 1787, 1789
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Com. [151] 1486; cl. 2, 1603
County Franchise, Leave, [149] 1833
Galway Freemen Disfranchisement, Com. [151] 596
Godrevy Lighthouse, Com. moved for, [149] 334
Harbours of Refuge, Com. [148] 1359; [151] 1748
Haslar Slip, [149] 1722
India—Transport of Troops to, Com. moved for, [148] 734;—Vote of Thanks to the Army, &c., 914
Jews, 2R. [151] 1622; Com. 1756
Lighthouses, &c., Address moved, [149] 1136
Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Res. [149] 764
Maynooth College, Com. moved for, [149] 1996
Members' Seats, Res. [149] 2001
National Defences, The, [150] 1935, 1940
Navy Estimates, [149] 126, 925, 1347, 1348, 1632, 1641, 1643
Navy, Manning the, Com. moved for, [150] 895, 901
Oaths, Leave, [148] 480, 498
Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Res. [150] 1036
Paper Duty, Res. [151] 134
Property Qualification, 2R, [150] 223; Com. Adj. moved, 576, 1421; cl. 1, 1431, 1437; 3R. 1506
Rewards to Members, Res. [151] 199
Supply—New House of Parliament, [150] 1203;—New Bridge at Westminster, [151] 1437
Thames, State of the, [151] 436; 578; Res. 1167

BERKELEY, Hon. F. H. F., Bristol
Adjournment of the House, [151] 870, 871
Australian Postal Service, [150] 2015; [151] 174
Ballot, Leave, [150] 1733, 1736
Bribery at Elections, [149] 324
Cemeteries, Metropolitan, [150] 250
Corrupt Practices Prevention, 3R. Amend. [151] 2115
Elections, Corrupt Practices at, [148] 1262
Galway Freemen Disfranchisement, Com. cl. 1, [151] 602
Members' Freedom from Arrest, 2R. [151] 690
Rifles, Breech-loading, in the Navy, [150] 2253
Thames, State of the, [151] 874

Bermudas—Supply,
c. [151] 1268

Bernard, Dr., Case of,
c. Question (Mr. Roebuck), [149] 1486

BERNERS, Lord
Jews, 2R. [151] 713
Markets, Metropolitan, [150] 761

BETHELL, Sir R., Aylesbury, (†Attorney General, The)
†Admiralty Court, The [148] 558
Attorney General, The late, and the Law Lords, [149] 4, 10
†Bankruptcy Laws, [148] 550
Bernard, Dr., Case of, [149] 1488, 1490
†British Bank Directors, [148] 759
Chancery Amendment, 2R. [149] 1557
†Circassia—Treaty of Paris, [148] 1739
†Conspiracy to Murder [148] 1820
†Divorce Act, [148] 1261
Joint-Stock Companies Acts Amendment, Com. cl. 7, [150] 2273; cl. 20, 2275; cl. 21, 2276
†Justice, Department of, [148] 553
Lancaster, Duchy of—Mining Operations, Com. moved for, [150] 453
Land, Sale and Transfer of (Ireland), Com. [150] 1553
†Land, Transfer of, [148] 758; 2R. [150] 2285, 2286
†Law Reform, [148] 359
Oaths, Considered, [149] 487, 536; Lords' Amend. [150] 341
Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Res. [150] 1003, 1101
Probate Court, The, [150] 258
Wills, &c., of British Subjects Abroad, 2R. [150] 2276

Beverley Election,
c. Prosecution ordered, [148] 385

BIGGS, Mr. J., Leicester
Church Rates, Com. cl. 1, [150] 568
Marriage Law Amendment, Leave, [149] 621
Poor Law Amendment, Com. cl. 1, Amend. [149] 2001, 2003

Bills, Withdrawal of,
c. Question (Mr. Labouchere), [151] 1749

Billeting System,
c. Com. moved for (General Peel), [149] 555; Question (General Codrington), [151], 1606

Bishops, Pensions to Retiring,
c. Question (Mr. Griffith), [148] 556; (Mr. S. Wortley), [151] 606

Bishops' Trusts Substitution Bill,
l. 1R.* [148] 685; 2R. 852; 3R.* [149] 556
c. 1R.* [150] 108; 2R.* 730; 3R.* 1481
l. Royal Assent, [151] 2369

Bishops' Trusts Substitution (No. 2) Bill,
c. 1R.* [150] 920

Bishops' Trusts Substitution (No. 3) Bill,
c. 1R*. [150] 1194; 2R.* [151] 730

BLACK, Mr. A., Edinburgh
Agricultural Statistics (Scotland), Papers moved for, [149] 783
Church Rates, Com. cl. 3, [150] 570
County Franchise (Scotland), Leave, [150] 214

BLACK, Mr. A.—cont.
Edinburgh Annuity Tax, 2R. [150] 2157
Edinburgh Castle, [150] 860
Endowed Schools (Ireland), Papers moved for, [149] 782, 783
India, Government of (No. 2), Leave, [149] 838
Irish National School Books, [148] 1732
Joint-Stock Banking Companies, 2R. Amend. [150] 534
Lands, Valuation of (Scotland), Act Amendment, 2R. [149] 660
Medical Practitioners, 2R. [150] 1408; Com. 1409; Amend. 1410, 1421; [151] 995; cl. 3, 997
Military Surgery, Professor of (Edinburgh), [148] 1265
Militia (Service Abroad) Act Continuance, Com. cl. 1, [151] 1965
Mutiny, 2R. [149] 267
Supply—Queen's, &c. Remembrancer (Scotland), [150] 1252;—Officers of Lord Lieutenant (Ireland), 1253;—Printing, &c., Houses of Parliament, 1265;—County Courts, 1480;—Education, Amend. [151] 150, 152;—Department of Science and Art, 1201;—Theological Professors, Belfast, 1241;—Nonconforming, &c. Ministers (Ireland), 1280
Universities (Scotland), 2R. Amend. [150] 1881, 1909; Com. cl. 3, Amend. [151] 413; cl. 4, 508, 509, 511; cl. 10, Amend. 517, 518; cl. 13, 522, 731; Amend. 737; cl. 19, 752; Consid. cl. 7, 958; cl. 14, 960; Amend. 961

Black Sea, Commerce of the,
c. Question (Mr. Wise), [148] 468

BLACKBURN, Mr. P., Stirlingshire
Agricultural Statistics (Scotland), Papers moved for, [149] 784
Army Estimates, [150] 386, 388
Chelsea Bridge Act Amendment, 2R. Amend. [150] 1992; [151] 791
Commissioners for Exhibition, 1851, Com. cl. 1, [151] 86, 87; Amend. 88, 91
County Franchise (Scotland), Leave, [150] 214
County Voters, Registration of (Scotland), Com. [150] 2191
Edinburgh Annuity Tax, 2R. Amend. [150] 2174
India, Government of (No. 3), Com. cl. 14, [151] 866; cl. 34, 932, 934
India, Property destroyed in, [148] 555;—British Settlers in, [151] 1187
Lands, Valuation of (Scotland), Act Amendment 2R. [149] 667
Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Res. [149] 739
Mutiny, 2R. [149] 268
Prince Edward Island Loan, Com. Res. [150] 403
Roads, &c. (Scotland), 2R. [149] 1920
Roads (Scotland), Commission moved for, [151] 1161
Stamp Duties on Drafts, Com. cl. 2 [150] 290
Supply—Education, [151] 152
Thames, State of the, Res. [151] 577, 1170
Universities (Scotland), Com. cl. 3, Amend. [151] 414; cl. 4, Amend. ib., 509, 511; cl. 7, Amend. 515; cl. 13, 734; Consid. add. cl. 956, 957; cl. 14, 960; Lords' Amends.) 2131, 2137
Western Bank of Scotland, [149] 1202, 1204

BLAKE, Mr. J. A., Waterford City
Commerce, Tribunals of, Com. moved for, [149] 1158
Reformatory Schools (Ireland), Com. cl. 17, Amend. [151] 1434, 1435
Science and Art, Departments of, [151] 1171; —Supply, Amend. 1174, 1181
Tenants' Compensation (Ireland), 2R. [150] 1810

BLAND, Mr. L. H., King's Co.
Ali Moorad's Claim—Mr. Butt, Com. moved for [148] 1864
Conspiracy to Murder (Ireland), Leave, [150] 879, 883
Decimal Coinage, [149] 1494
Lunatic Asylums (Ireland), [148] 1473
Oaths, 2R. [148] 1105
Secretary, The Irish, Office of the, [150] 1464
Supply—Queen's, &c. Remembrancer (Scotland), [150] 1252;—Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant (Ireland), 1256
Tenants' Compensation (Ireland), 2R. [150] 1816

BOLDERO, Lt. Col. H. G., Chippenham
Army Estimates, [149] 1250; [150] 373, 381, 385, 386, 393
Army, Sanitary State of the, Res. [150] 486; —Clothing for the, [151] 1283
Navy Estimates, [149] 1232, 1234, 1235, 1643
Recruiting System, [150] 368
Weedon Establishment, Commission moved for, [150] 1799, 1801; [151] 254, 578, 579

Bombay, Chief Justice of, Bill,
l. 1R.* [150] 147; 2R.* 403; 3R.* 761
c. 1R.* [151] 83; 2R.* 265; 3R.* 503
l. Royal Assent, [151] 1243

BOOKER-BLAKEMORE, Mr. T. W., Herefordshire
Bank Acts, Com. moved for, [148] 662
Marriage Law Amendment, Com. [151] 670
New Trial in Criminal Cases, 2R. [151] 1058

BOOTH, Mr. G. S., Hampshire, N.
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Com. cl. 1, [151] 1592
North Australian Expedition, [149] 1583
Poor Law System of Medical Relief, [150] 1854

Bothnia, Gulf of—Destruction of Timber in the,
c. Question (Sir J. Pakington), [151] 1183, 1371; Commission moved for, (Mr. Crawford) 1844, [A. 65, N. 105, M. 40] 1862

BOUVERIE, Rt. Hon. E. P. (†Chief Commissioner of the Poor Law), Kilmarnock, &c.
Breach of Privilege—Washington Wilks, [150] 1320
Church Rates, Com. cl. 3, [150] 570
Clyde Navigation, Considered, Amend. [151] 504, 506, 667
Government Property—Exemption from Rates, Com. moved for, [150] 1798

[cont.

BOUVERIE, Rt. Hon. E. P.—cont.
India, Government of (No. 2) [149] 873
Joint-Stock Banking Companies, Com. [150] 1505
Limerick City, New Writ moved for, [150] 336
Local Government, 2R. [149] 2097
Marriage Law Amendment, Com. add. cl. [151] 685
Members' Freedom from Arrest, 2R. Amend. [151] 688
New Trial in Criminal Cases, Com. [151] 1063
Oaths, That Baron de Rothschild be a Member of the Committee, [150] 351
†Poor Rates, [148] 1471
Poor Rates, (Metropolis), Leave, [149] 644
Poor Removal, Com. moved for, [150] 1914
Poor Removal Law Amendment, [151] 1183
Property Qualification, Com. [150] 578
Rewards to Members, Res. Previous Question moved, [151] 187
Supply—Poor Law Board, [150] 1134;—General Register House (Edinburgh), Report, [151] 1639
Under Secretary of State for Scotland, Res. [150] 2125
Universities (Scotland), Com. cl. 2, Amend. [151] 413; cl. 4, 513, 514; cl. 13, Amend. 520, 730, 731, 734; cl. 15, Amend. 738, 743, 744; Lords' Amends. 2131

BOVILL, Mr. W., Guildford
Barber, W. H., Case of, Com. moved for [150] 2118
Conspiracy to Murder, Leave, [148] 1004
India, Government of, Com. Res. 3, [150] 1664
Joint-Stock Banking Companies, 2R. [150] 539
Patent Law Amendment, 2R. [150] 520
Rewards to Members, Res. [151] 204

BOWYER, Mr. G., Dundalk
Bell, the Westminster, [148] 456
Cantillon, Legacy to—Will of Napoleon I., [148] 1275
Conspiracy to Murder, Leave [148] 942
County Franchise (Scotland), Leave, [150] 207
Firework Explosion, The [151] 1499
Gaols and Houses of Correction, 2R. [148] 1248
Havelock's, Sir H., Annuity, 2R. [148] 502, 572
Howard, Mr., his Departure from Florence, [150] 1732, 1849
India, Government of, Com. Res. [149] 2077
India, Government of (No. 3), Lords' Amends. cl. 27, [151] 2186, 2321
Italian National League, [149] 462
Justice, Administration of, Com. moved for, [149] 1811
Legitimacy Declaration, Com. cl. 8, [151] 1541; cl. 9, 1542
Malta, Foreigners at, [148] 1868
New Trial in Criminal Cases, 2R. [151] 1054
Oaths, 2R. [148] 1104, 1106, 1114
Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Res. [150] 1028
Police Force (Ireland), Com. [151] 1134
Rewards to Members, Res. [151] 184
Tenants' Compensation (Ireland), 2R. [150] 1817
Ways and Means, [151] 1642

BRADY, Mr. J., Leitrim
Barber, W. H., Case of, Com. moved for, [150] 2114, 2118; Nomination of Com. [151] 153, 154; That Viscount Goderich be discharged attendance, 974
British Bank, The Royal, Return moved for, [149] 396; [150] 1404, 1517
Chelsea Bridge [149] 983
Civil Bills, &c. (Ireland), 2R. [151] 1548; Com. cl. 2, 1770
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Com. cl. 1, [151] 1493, 1596, 1597, 1602; Consid. cl. 1, 2030, 2063
Ellis, Mr., Murder of, [150] 1311; [151] 25;
Galway Freemen Disfranchisement, Com. [150] 2287
India, Colonisation of, [149] 555
King, Captain, of the Depôt Battalion, [150] 429
London Corporation Reform, [149] 248
Medical Practitioners, Com. [150] 1410; Lords' Amends. [151] 2278
Military Surgeons [149] 983
Reformatory Schools (Ireland), Com. cl. 17, [151] 1435
Registration of Births, &c. (Ireland), [150] 1610
Stamp Duties on Drafts, Com. cl. 1, [150] 289
Supply—Irish Hospitals, [151] 1277
Telegraphic Communication with India, [151] 1283
Tenants' Compensation (Ireland), 2R. [150] 1814
Thames, State of the, [150] 1921; [151] 436
Western Bank of Scotland, [149] 812, 1194; [150] 19

Bray's Traction Engine.
c. Question (Sir De Lacy Evans), [151] 1285, 2305

Brazil—Messrs. Swan and Smallpage.
c. Question (Mr. Rich), [150] 1851

Breach of Privilege—Hudson Scott and Washington Wilks,
c. Motion (Mr. G. Clive), [150] 1022; Examination, 1066; Res. 1068; Hudson Scott discharged, 1069; Petition (Mr. M. Gibson), 119; That Washington Wilks be discharged (Mr. M. Gibson), 1313; Amend. (Solicitor General), 1318, 1404;—The Attorney General, Question; (Mr. Schneider), [151] 2191

BREADALBANE, Marquess of
Barrack Accommodation, Returns moved for, [149] 809
India—Governor General and Commander in Chief—Papers moved for, [150] 1511

Bribery at Elections,
c. Question, (Mr. H. Berkeley), [149] 324

BRIDGES, Sir B. W., Kent, E.
Church Rates, 3R. Amend. [150] 1706
Marriage Law Amendment, Com. Adj. moved, [150] 1689

BRIGHT, Mr. J., Birmingham
Ali Moorad's Claim—Mr. Butt, Com. moved for, [148] 1862, 1865
Ballot, Leave, [150] 1774
Barber, W. H., Case of, Com. moved for, [150] 2117
Business, Public, [149] 596, 1987
China, Relations with, [150] 1529
Church Rates Abolition, Com. [149] 1452; cl. 1, 1465, 1471; cl. 3, [150] 570; 3R. 1402
Conspiracy to Murder, 2R. [148] 1758
Exchequer Bonds, 2R. [149] 2148
India, Government of (No. 2), Leave, [149] 843
India, Government of, Com. Res. 3, [150] 1979; Res. 6, 2236
*India, Government of (No. 3), 2R. [151] 330; Com. add. cl. 944, 945; Consid. add. cl. 1025
Justice, Administration of, Com. moved for, [149] 1809
Lancashire and Yorkshire, &c. Railway Companies, Consid. [150] 1605, 1606
Magisterial Appointments, [150] 266
National Defences, The, [150] 1937
New Trial in Criminal Cases, 2R. [151] 1059
Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, [150] 180, 181, 927; Res. 944, 1055
Paper Duty, Res. [151] 128
Passport System in France, Correspondence moved for, [149] 599
Real Property, &c.—Probate Duty, Res. [150] 870
Rewards to Members, Res. [149] 1033
Slave Trade—Relations with the United States, [151] 41
Suez, Isthmus of, Canal, [150] 1399
Winding-up Acts, [150] 1517, 1518

BRISCOE, Mr. J. I., Surrey, W.
Army Estimates, [149] 225; [150] 1109
Commissioners for Exhibition (1851), 2R. [150] 2260
Cornwall Submarine Mines, Com. [151] 1652; Amend. 1653, 1654
Education (England), Commission moved for, [148] 1244
Havelock, Sir H., Pension to, Res. [148] 392
Marriage Law Amendment, Com. cl. 1, [151] 671
Navy Estimates, Amend. [149] 1637, 1641
Public Grounds and Playgrounds, Leave, [150] 886
Stade Dues, Address moved, [149] 1015
Supply—Harbours of Refuge, [150] 1126;—Secretary to Lord Lieutenant (Ireland), 1257;—Gallery of Portraits, [151] 1422

Bristol Municipal Charities Bill,
c. 1R. [150] 1849; 2R. 2276

British Bank Directors,
c. Question (Colonel Stuart), [148] 759; Return moved for (Mr. Brady), [149] 396; Motion withdrawn, 399; Question (Mr. Brady), [150] 1404, 1517

British Columbia, Government of (Bill introduced as Government of New Caledonia Bill),
c. 1R.* [151] 730;
2R. 1096;
Com. cl. 1, Amend. (Mr. Christy), 1347;

British Columbia, Bill.—cont.
151] Consideration, 1429;
· Question (Mr. Gladstone), 1505;
• Re-com. cl. 1, 1762; cl. 2; cl. 3, 1768;
· 3R.* 1785
l. 1R.* [151] 1865;
2R. 2097; 3R.* 2243
Royal Assent, 2369; — see Hudson's Bay Company

British Museum—Supply,
c. [150] 1570, 1583

Brodie, Sergeant,
c. Question (Mr. Coningham), [151] 2303

BROUGHAM, Lord
Affairs, Public, State of, [148] 708
Aliens, Law relating to, [148] 1853; Case of Azzopardi, [149] 2, 70
Bankruptcy and Insolvency Laws, [148] 686; [150] 1997
Bankruptcy Commission, Returns moved for, [148] 1364
Bankruptcy, District Courts of, 1R. [148] 1592, 1603, 1718; 2R. discharged, [149] 167
Bankruptcy, District Courts of, Abolition, (No. 2), 1R. [149] 169
"Cagliari," Case of the, [149] 312
Chancery Amendment, 2R. [150] 1443; Rep. 1690, 1691
Coolies, Exportation of, from Hong Kong, Correspondence moved for, [151] 80, 375
County Courts, Returns moved for, [149] 313, 318, 319
County Courts Districts, Rep. [151] 992, 993
Divorce and Matrimonial Causes, 3R. [151] 162
Imprisonment for Debt, Returns moved for, [148] 1250
Imprisonment for Debt Abolition, 1R. [148] 755; 2R. postponed, [149] 572
India—Governor General, Papers moved for, [150] 1516
Jews, [150] 1999; 2R. [151] 720; Com. 921
Kerry County, Assistant Barrister of, [150] 1590, 1591, 2098
Land, Transfer of, 2R. [149] 568
Navy, Manning the, [150] 2088, 2089
Negro Regiment for India, [149] 458, 459, 557
Oaths, Report, [150] 1171, 1193; [151] 155
Parliament, Independence of, 2R. [151] 589, 590; Order discharged, 915
Passengers, Chinese, Act Amendment, 3R. [151] 993, 994
Princess Royal, Marriage of the, Address moved, [148] 754
Private Bills, Com. moved for, [151] 5
Property, Law of, Amendment, 1R. [148] 967, 968; 2R. [149] 453
Property Qualification, Com. [150] 1917; 3R. 2095
"Regina Cœli," Case of the, [151] 255, 259, 260
Slave Trade, The, [149] 21, 163, 164, 227, 230; [150] 1700, 2202
Thames, State of the, [151] 473
Transfer of Real Estate, Bill withdrawn, [151] 264
West Indies, Imported Labourers in the, [149] 445

BROUGHTON, Lord
India, Government of (No. 3), Com. cl. 7, [151] 1561, 1564, 1567; cl. 34, 1688

BROWNE, Lord J. T., Mayo Co.
Conway and Ryan, Fathers, Prosecution of, [149] 1589; [150] 1850
Supply—Holyhead Harbour, [150] 1126;—Poor Law Board, 1133, 1137;—Public Education (Ireland), [151] 1230

BRUCE, Mr. E. L. C., Elginshire, &c.
Church Rates, Com. cl. 1 [150] 564; cl. 3, 570
County Franchise (Scotland), Leave, [150] 206
County Voters (Scotland), Registration of, 2R. [149] 2005; Com. [150] 2191
Edinburgh Annuity Tax, 2R. [150] 2180
India, Government of (No. 1), Leave, [148] 1457
India, Government of, Com. Res. 3, [150] 1653, 1678, 1684, 1685, 1989; Res. 5, 2060
Marriage Law Amendment, Com. add cl. [151] 686
Supply—General Register House, Edinburgh, [150] 1496, 1498
Universities (Scotland), Leave, [149] 1549; 2R. [150] 1884; Com. cl. 10, [151] 517; cl. 15, 745

BUCCLEUCH, Duke of
Kingston, Earl of—Question, [150] 1599
Local Government, 3R. add. cl. [151] 2154
Militia, Organization of the, [150] 2002
Thames, State of the, [151] 380, 394
Universities (Scotland), Com. cl. 12 [151] 1678; cl. 15, 1679

BUCHANAN, Mr. W., Glasgow
Bank Issues Indemnity, 2R. [148] 300
Commerce, Tribunals of, Com. moved for, [149] 1159
County Voters, Registration of (Scotland), Com. [150] 2190
Edinburgh Annuity Tax, 2R. [150] 2176
Insurance and Assurance, 2R. [151] 1067
Joint-Stock Banks, [148] 384
Joint-Stock Banking Companies, Com. Adj. moved, [150] 1503, 1505; cl. 3, 1911
Roads, &c., (Scotland), 2R. [149] 1920
Roads (Scotland), Commission moved for, [151] 1163
Universities (Scotland), Leave, [149] 1550; Com. cl. 2, [151] 413; cl. 4, 414; Consid. add. cl. 950, 956; cl. 7, Amend. 957; cl. 14, 959
Western Bank of Scotland, [149] 1211

BUCKLEY, Major Gen. E. P., Salisbury
Army Estimates, [150] 1108
Chatham Barracks, [150] 1921

Budget, The—Financial Statement,
c. Res. (Chancellor of the Exchequer), [149] 1267

BURGHLEY, Lord, Northamptonshire, N.
Army, Sanitary Condition of the, Res. [150] 495
Commissions, Sale of, [150] 2252
Estimates, The, [149] 1609
Militia Captains, [149] 1800
Militia Estimates, [149] 1584

Burial Grounds, Inspection of—Supply, c. [151] 1420

BURKE, Sir T. J., Galway Co.
Galway Freemen Disfranchisement, Leave, [149] 381, 390

Burlington House,
c. Question (Sir W. Frazer), [151] 1788

BURRELL, Sir C. M., New Shoreham
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Com. cl. 1, [151] 1496
Galway Freemen Disfranchisement, Com. cl. 1, [151] 600
Metropolis Local Management, Com. cl. 4, [151] 1949; 3R. 2075

BURY, Viscount, Norwich
Army, Commissions in the, [149] 435
Belgrade, Outrage at—Consul Fonblanque, [150] 1946
Hudson's Bay Company — Mr. Bannatyne, [148] 1266; [149] 1494; Res. [151] 1794
Malacca, Straits of, Correspondence moved for, [149] 986
Marriage Law Amendment, Leave, [149] 603; 2R. [150] 144; Com. 1689; [151] 669; cl. 1, 672, 676, 677; Amend. 679, 681; cl. 2, 683; add. cl. 684, 686, 791, 792
Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Res. [150] 976

Business of the House,
c. Question (Viscount Palmerston), [148] 1606; Motion (Chancellor of the Exchequer), [151] 603, 1346; (Mr. G. A. Hamilton), 2047

Business, Private—Standing Orders,
c. Report (Colonel W. Patten), [151] 2162

Business, Public,
l. Observations (Marquess of Salisbury), [149] 2; Question (Earl Granville), 447; Res. (Lord Redesdale), 1353; Notice (Earl of Derby), [151] 1659
c. Observations (Sir W. Jolliffe), [149] 4, 71, 72, 175; (Chancellor of the Exchequer), 76, 857, 1594; Res. (Mr. Walpole), 1986; Notice (Chancellor of the Exchequer), [150] 673, 1199; [151] 870; Question (Sir G. Lewis), [150] 1438; (Mr. Hutt), [151] 1002; (Mr. Wilson), 1506, 1605

BUTLER, Mr. C. S., Tower Hamlets
Confessional in Belgravia, [150] 2016, 2017; [151] 26
Drainage, Main, Question, [150] 333
Metropolis Local Management, 2R. [151] 1745; Com. Amends. 1924; cl. 11, 1953
Supply—Secretary to Lord Lieutenant (Ireland), [150] 1258;—Court of Probate, &c., 1473

BUTT, Mr. I., Youghal
Ali Moorad's Claim, [148] 1856
Assistant Barristers (Ireland), [151] 56
Cornwall Submarine Mines, Com. [151] 1654
Galway Freemen Disfranchisement, Com. [150] 2287; Adj. moved, [151] 592, 599; cl. 1, 602
Land, Sale and Transfer of (Ireland), Com. [150] 1562; cl. 3, 2110; cl. 4, [151] 59; cl. 38, Amend. 63; cl. 40, Amend. 64; cl. 41, 65; cl. 47, 66; cl. 51, 373; cl. 88, 973; add. cl. 974
Legitimacy Declaration, Com. [151] 1145
Lights on Sailing Vessels, [148] 658
New Trial in Criminal Cases, Com. [151] 1064
Oaths, Leave, [148] 488, 489
Supply—Poor Law Board, [150] 1134, 1137

Butt, Mr., — Breach of Privilege (Ali Moorad's Claim),
c. Notice (Mr. Roebuck), [148] 1730; Petition, 1855; Com. moved for, 1859; Amend. (Mr. Fagan), 1860; Amend. and Motion withdrawn, 1865; Nomination of Com. 1866

BUXTON, Sir E. N., Norfolk, E.
Receipt Stamps, [149] 1495

BUXTON, Mr. C., Newport, Isle of Wight
*Churches and Churchyards, Com. moved for, Amend. [149] 1851, 1866
India—Mutiny in, Papers moved for, [149] 360, 370;—Amnesty, [151] 1786
Marriage Law Amendment, 2R. [150] 125
Military Academy—Competitive Examinations, Address moved, [149] 1733
Slave Trade—Right of Search, Res. [151] 1327
Supply — Public Education (Ireland), [151] 1204

BYNG, Hon. G. H. C., Middlesex
"Cagliari," Case of the, [149] 1801
Conspiracy to Murder, 2R. [148] 1780
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Com. cl. 1, [151] 1494, 1602; Consid. add. cl. 2023
County Franchise, Leave, [149] 1819
Gas, Supply of, Com. moved for, [150] 321
Havelock's, Lady, and Sir H. Havelock's Annuity, Com. Res. [148] 775
Hounslow, Review Ground at, [151] 1933
Marriage Law Amendment, Com. [151] 669
Metropolis Local Management Act Amendment, Leave, [151] 1523; Com. cl. 1, 1943
Oaths, Considered, [149] 510
Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Res. [150] 811
Poor Law (Metropolis), 2R. [150] 510
Turnpike Tolls (Metropolis), [148] 1169; Commission moved for, [150] 495
Supply—Gallery of Portraits, [151] 1422;—Embassy House at Paris, 1438, 1441

"Cagliari," Case of the—British Prisoners at Naples,
l. Question (Earl Grey), [148] 748; Observations (Lord Lyndhurst), [149] 305; Statement (Earl of Malmesbury), 703; [150] 1915; Question (Lord Wensleydale) [149] 1252; (Earl of Airlie), 1930; [150] 1848; (Earl of Minto), 1022

[cont.

"Cagliari," Case of the—cont.
c. Question (Mr. M. Milnes), [148] 140, 272, 1472; (Lord J. Russell), 469; [149] 1800; (Mr. Ridley), [148] 861; [150] 1947; Observations (Mr. Kinglake), [149] 82, 463, 1495; (Chancellor of the Exchequer), 177; Question (Mr. Griffith), 708; (Mr. Headlam), 858, 1172, 1593; [150] 1195; (Mr. Evans), [149] 1988; (Mr. Kinglake), [150] 106, 277; Postponement of Motion, 220; Question (Mr. Kinnaird), 428; (Mr. Serjeant Deasy), 2112; —see Naples, British Consul at

CAIRD, Mr. J., Dartmouth
Agricultural Statistics, Leave, [149] 162; 2R. 1871, 1918
Agricultural Statistics (Scotland), Papers moved for [149] 783, 735
Bankers' Drafts, [150] 1311
County Franchise (Scotland), Leave, [150] 195, 215
Guano, Supply of, [148] 271; [151] 873, 1501
*Hainault Allotment, Res. [151] 608, 624; Explanation, 872
Supply—General Register House, Edinburgh, [150] 1494;—Highland Roads and Bridges, [151] 1419
Tenants' Compensation (Ireland), 2R. [149] 1091
Universities (Scotland), Consid. cl. 14, Amend. [251] 958

CAIRNS, Sir H. Mc C., Belfast—See also SOLICITOR GENERAL, The,
Bank Acts Committee, Nomination of Com. [148] 965
Belfast (Town) Improvement, 2R. [148] 1368

Cairo, Police Ordinance at,
c. Question (Mr. Wise), [151] 1083

CALCUTT, Mr. F. M., Clare Co.
Belvoir, Agricultural Model Schools at, [150] 332
County Franchise (Scotland), Leave, [150] 213

Calcutta Memorial,
l. Papers moved for (Lord Wensleydale), [148] 1259
c. Question (Mr. Wise), [148] 555

Caledonia, Government of New, Bill—See British Columbia, Government of, Bill

Camberwell, Vicarage of—Law of Sequestration,
l. Petition (Lord St. Leonards), [151] 6

CAMBRIDGE, Duke of, (General Commanding in Chief)
Barrack Accommodation, Returns moved for, [149] 797
Havelock, Major General, Pension to, Address moved, [148] 318
India, Government of (No. 3), Com. cl. 54, [151] 1695

[cont.

CAMBRIDGE, Duke of—cont.
India—Vote of Thanks to the Civil Service, Army and Navy, [148] 846
Militia, Organization of the, [150] 2009
Windham, General, Explanation, [148] 1364 1458

Cambridge University Commission, Chairmanship of the,
c. Question (Mr. W. Vansittart), [151] 1370

Cambridge University Matriculation and Degrees Bill,
c. 1R.* [149] 172; 2R.* 322; 3R.* 460
l. 1R.* [149] 445; 2R.* 556; 3R.* 811
Royal Assent, [150] 403

Cambridge University Professors—Supply,
c. [151] 1420

CAMOYS, Lord
Patriotic Fund, Correspondence moved for, [149] 1262

CAMPBELL, Lord
Address in Answer to the Speech, [148] 85
Affairs, Public, State of, [148] 712
Aliens, Law relating to, [148] 1848, 1849, 1850; [149] 69
Bankruptcy and Insolvency Laws, [150] 1998
Bankruptcy and Liquidation, 1R. [151] 2299, 2301
Bankruptcy, District Courts of, 1R. [148] 1603
Baronies in Abeyance, [151] 2289
Bishops' Trust Substitution, 2R. [148] 853
"Cagliari," Case of the, [149] 1950
Campbell's, Sir C., Peerage, [151] 911, 912
Chancery Amendment, [150] 1444
Chancery, Court of, [149] 2102;—Chief Clerks' Offices, [151] 169
Church of England, Political Services of the, Address moved, [151] 500
Church of England Special Services, 1R. [148] 756; Com. cl. 1, 1463; cl. 3, 1469
Church Rates Abolition, 2R. [151] 848
Civil Bills, &c. (Ireland), Com. [151] 2269, 2270
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Com. cl. 1, [151] 2248
Divorce Act (Ireland), [149] 1924
Divorce and Matrimonial Causes, Recom. [150] 2002; Report, 2194, 2195; 3R. [151] 158, 161
Ecclesiastical Commission, 3R. [151] 1154
Glebe Houses, Dilapidations in, [151] 1149
Imprisonment for Debt, Returns moved for, [148] 1258
Imprisonment for Debt Abolition, 1R. [148] 755
India, Government of (No. 3), Commons' Reasons, [151] 2262
Jews, 1R. [150] 1600, 2000; Com. [151] 926, 1073
Kerry County, Assistant Barrister of, [150] 2097
Kingston, Earl of, Notices of Questions by the, [150] 1439, 1598, 1599
Land, Transfer of, 2R. [149] 566
Legal Reform—Grand and Common Juries [151] 2282
Libel, 1R. [148] 685; 2R. [149] 947, 965, 978, 980

[cont.

CAMPBELL, Lord—cont.
Oaths, Com. cl. 1, [149] 1757; cl. 5, 1761, 1767; Report, [150] 1171; Consideration of Report deferred, [151] 263, 729
Oaths Substitution, 1R. [150] 1600; [151] 155
Obscene Books, Sale of, Prevention, Return moved for, [148] 226, 227
Organs, Barrel, Suppression, 2R. [149] 1930
Parliament, Independence of, 2R. [151] 589
Patriotic Fund, Correspondence moved for, [149] 1262
Poisons, Sale of, [149] 1169; 2R. [150] 1510
Private Bills—Standing Orders, [151] 2285
Probate, New Court of, [149] 947
Property, Law of, Amendment, 1R. [148] 967, 968
Property Qualification, 2R. [150] 1847; Com. 1916; 3R. [150] 2096
Registers, Non-Parochial, 2R. [150] 1440
Religious Worship Act Amendment, [148] 136; 2R. 346
Royal Commission — Order of Proceedings, [151] 480
Thames, State of the, [151] 388
Transfer of Estates Simplification, Rep. [149] 851, 854
Transfer of Real Estate—Bill withdrawn, [151] 265
Universities (Scotland) [149] 850; 1R. [151] 1076; Commons' Reasons, 2244

CAMPBELL, Mr. R. J. R., Weymouth
East India Loan, Consid. add. cl. [149] 155
Highlanders, The, 78th, [150] 1612
India, Government of, (No. 1) Leave, [148] 1672
India, Government of, (No. 3), Com. cl. 32, [151] 900; add. cl. 940

Campbell's, Sir Colin, Peerage,
l. Question (Lord Campbell) [151] 911

Canada, Indian Department in,—Supply,
c. [151] 1268

Canada, Mercantile Law in,
c. Question (Mr. Vance), [149] 2118

"Candace," Loss of the,
l. Question (Lord Stanley of Alderley), [151] 2103
c. Question (Mr. G. Clive), [151] 83

Canning, Viscount, and Sir Colin Campbell,
l. Statement (Lord Panmure), [148] 672:—The Proclamation,—see Oude, Confiscation of Land in

CANTERBURY, Archbishop of Church Dicipline—Law of Sequestration, [151] 590
Church of England, Political Services of the, Address moved, [151] 486
Church of England Special Services, 1R. [148] 755, 757; 2R. 854; Com. 1461; cl. 1, 1462, 1463; Preamble, 1470; 3R. [149] 458
Church Rates Abolition, 2R. [151] 837
India, Government of (No. 3), That the Bill do pass, [151] 2010, 2013
Liturgy, Revision of the, Commission moved for, [150] 163
Marriage Law Amendment, 2R. [151] 1980

Cantillon, Legacy to—Will of Napoleon I.
c. Question (Mr. Stirling), [148] 1269

Canton, Executions at,
c. Question (Mr. Robertson), [149] 2013

Cape of Good Hope,
Garrison at the, c. Question (Sir De L. Evans), [149] 711
German Corps at, c. Question (Sir De L. Evans), [151] 10
Kafirs, The Starving, c. Question (Mr. Bagwell), [148] 554; (Mr. Pease), 1504
Mails, c. Question (Mr. Macartney), [150] 429
Supply—Orange River Territory, c. [151] 1420;—Improvement of the Kafirs, ib., [A. 177, N. 30, M. 147] 1422

CARDEN, Ald., Sir R. W., Gloucester
Joint-Stock Banking Companies, 2R. [150] 537
Rag Fair on Sunday, [151] 419

CARDIGAN, Earl of
Barrack Accommodation, Returns moved for, [149] 802
Jews, 2R. [151] 726

CARDWELL, Rt. Hon. E., Oxford City
Agricultural Statistics, 2R. [149] 1904
Bank Acts, Com. moved for, [148] 632; Instruction, 1545
Bank Issues Indemnity, Leave, [148] 226
Budget, The — Financial Statement, [149] 1317
Canning's Lord, Proclamation—Confiscation of Land in Oude, [150] 332, 426, 427, 530; Res. 674, 1000, 1019, 1029, 1030, 1042
East India Loan, Leave, [148] 793; Consid. [149] 16, 20, 74, 142
Exchequer Bonds, 2R. [149] 2141
Funded Debt, Com. [151] 545
Godrevy Lighthouse, &c., Com. moved for, [149] 335
India, Government of (No. 3), Com. cl. 38, [151] 906
Lancashire and Yorkshire, &c., Railway Companies, Consid. [150] 1602
Lighthouses, &c., Address moved, [149] 1131
Manchester, &c., and Great Northern Railways Companies, Consid. [150] 1195
Partnerships, Registration of, 2R. [151] 240
Slave Trade, The—Right of Search, Res. [151] 1294, 1314
Supply, Rep. [149] 262;—Department of Science and Art, [151] 1174
Witnesses, Expenses of, [151] 1614

CAREW, Lord
Address in Answer to the Speech, [148] 22

CARLISLE, Earl of Belfast, Riots in, [150] 1594, 1596
Church Rates, [151] 169
Dublin, Affray at, [149] 172
Endowed Schools (Ireland), [149] 2114
Kerry County, Assistant Barrister of, [150] 1591
Magistracy, The Irish, [149] 166
Oaths, Report Consid. [151] 1252

[cont.

CARLISLE, Earl of—cont.
Reformatory Schools (Ireland), 2R. [151] 2007
Slave Trade, The, [150] 2209

CARLISLE, Bishop of
Convocation at York, Papers moved for, [151] 1560

CARNARVON, Earl of (†Under Secretary for the Colonies)
†Coolies, Exportation of, from Hong Kong, Correspondence moved for [151] 73, 375
India, Conveyance of Troops to, [148] 1722
†Local Government, 3R. add cl. [151], 2152, 2153
†Medical Practitioners, Com. [151] 1782
Militia, Embodied, Returns moved for, [148] 1586
†Negro Immigration into Jamaica, [149] 946
†New Caledonia (British Columbia), Government of, 2R. [151] 2097
†New Zealand, Diocese of, [150] 1445
†Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Res. [150] 614, 619
Parliamentary Reform, [148] 1119
†Telegraphic Communication with Europe and America, Correspondence moved for, [149] 1756
†West Indies, Imported Labourers in the, [149] 446

CARTER, Mr. J. B., Winchester
Corrupt Practices Prevention Consid. add. el. [151] 2023
Oaths, Com. [149] 298, 299
Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Res. [150] 1036

CASHEL, Bishop of
Church of England, Political Services of the, Address moved, [151] 500
Endowed Schools (Ireland), [149] 2115
Liturgy, Revision of the, Commission moved for, [150] 170
Oaths, Com. cl. 5, [149] 1793

Cashel Election,
c. Petition (Sir F. Baring) [149] 159; Motion (Mr. Walpole), 246

CASTLEROSSE, Viscount (Controller of the Household), Kerry, Co.
Address in Answer to the Speech, Her Majesty's Answer, [148] 269

CAYLEY, Mr. E. S., Yorkshire N. Riding
Bank Acts, Committee, Nomination of Com. [148] 964
Bank Issues Indemnity, 2R. 279; Com. cl. 2, 408
Breach of Privilege—Washington Wilks, [150] 1067
Exchequer Bonds, 2R. [149] 2169

CECIL, Lord R. T. G., Stamford
Ascension Day, [150] 496
Business, Private—Standing Orders, Report, [151] 2169
Church Rates Abolition, 2R. Amend. [148] [cont.

CECIL, Lord R. T. G.—cont.
1560; Com. cl. 1, [149] 1464, 1465, 1466, 1472; [150] 567; cl. 3, Amend. 570
Church Rates Amendment, [149] 1870
Corrupt Practices Prevention, 3R. [151] 2119
Criminals, Foreign, [149] 1185
Danubian Principalities, Address moved, [150] 76
India, Government of, Com. Res. 4, [150] 320
Oaths, Considered, [149] 512
Private Bills, Res. [150] 455, 472

Cemeteries, Metropolitan,
c. Question (Mr. H. Berkeley), [150] 250

CHANCELLOR, The LORD (Rt. Hon. Lord Cranworth),—See also, CRANWORTH, Lord
Address in Answer to the Speech, [148] 85
Aliens, Law relating to, [148] 1851
Bankruptcy Commission, Returns moved for, [148] 1366
Bankruptcy, District Courts of, 1R. [148] 1599, 1719
Bankruptcy Laws, [148] 686
Church of England Special Services, Com. Preamble, [148] 1470
Imprisonment for Debt, Returns moved for, [148] 1257, 1259
Land, Transfer of, 1R. [148] 807
Property, Law of, Amendment, 1R. [148] 968

CHANCELLOR, The LORD (Rt. Hon. Lord Chelmsford)—See also, THESIGER, Sir Frederic
Bankruptcy and Insolvency Laws, [150] 1997; [151] 1070
Bankruptcy and Liquidation, 1R. [151] 2293, 2301
Bankruptcy, District Courts of, Abolition, 2R. [149] 168
Chancery Amendment, 2R. [150] 1440; Rep. 1690
Chancery, Court of [149] 2100;—Chief Clerks' Offices, [151] 162
County Courts Districts, Rep. [151] 992; 3R. 1075
Divorce Act (Ireland), [149] 1923, 1924
Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Act Amendment, 2R. [150] 579; Recom. 2000
Executors, Confirmation of, 2R. [151] 1152; Com. cl. 3, 1353
India, Government of (No. 3), Com. cl. 12, [151] 1585
India, Vote of Thanks to the Governor General, Acknowledgment of, [150] 2193; [151] 2152
Kerry County, Assistant Barrister of, [150] 2097
Land, Sale and Transfer of (Ireland), Com. [151] 1775
Land, Transfer of, 2R. [149] 570; 3R. [150] 422
Libel, 2R. [149] 971
Manchester Court of Bankruptcy, [151] 2152
Metropolis Local Management, 2R. [151] 2161
Oaths, Com. cl. 5, Amend. [149] 1758; cl. 6, 1796; Report [150] 1185, 1191, 1192, 2219
Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Res. Previous Question moved, [150] 622, 627, 663
Parliament, Prorogation of, [151] 2369

[cont.

CHANCELLOR, The Lord—cont.
Probate, New Court of, [149] 947
Probates and Letters of Administration Act Amendment, 2R. [150] 579
Property, Law of, Amendment, 2R. [149] 452
Registers, Non-Parochial, 2R. [150] 1139
Royal Commission, Notice, [151] 479
School Trustees, 2R. Amend. [151] 1665, 1667
Transfer of Estates Simplification, Com. [149] 239; Rep. 852
Trustees Relief, Com. [149] 231.
Universities (Scotland), Com. cl. 21, Proviso, [151] 1679
Victoria Station and Pimlico Railway, Motion for Counsel, [151] 589, 691, 797

CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER (Rt. Hon. Sir G. C. Lewis), Radnor, &c.—See also, LEWIS, Rt. Hon. Sir G. C.
Bank Acts, [148] 458; Com. moved for, 580, 663; Instruction, 669, 670; Nomination of Com. 964, 965, 967, 1083
Bank Issues Indemnity, Leave, [148] 145, 185, 198, 202, 225; 2R. 306, 309, 310; Com. cl. 2, 404; 3R. 444; That the Bill do pass, 446
Chapel in Paris for British Residents, [148] 860
Church Rates Abolition, 2R. [148] 1580
Civil Service Superannuation, [148] 1264
East India Loan, Leave, [148] 787; 2R. 933; Com. 1870, 1873, 1875, 1877, 1878, 1882, 1885, 1886, 1888; cl. 1, 1891, 1892
Finance, [148] 427, 430
Gaols and Houses of Correction, 2R. [148] 1248
Havelock's, Lady, and Sir H. Havelock's Annuity, Com. Res. [148] 771, 778, 779
India, Government of (No. 1), Leave, [148] 1330
Joint-Stock Banks, [148] 379
Joint Stock Banking Companies, Leave, [148] 1177
Livingstone, Dr.—Central Africa, [148] 558
Proctors' Compensation, [148] 1371
Savings Banks, [148] 460
Smithfield Market, [148] 552
Supply, [148] 398; Res. 1083
Weights and Measures, [148] 1370

CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER (†Rt. Hon. B. Disraeli), Buckinghamshire
†Address in Answer to the Speech [148] 105
†Ali Moorad's Claim—Mr. Butt, Com. moved for, [148] 1860
Army Estimates [149] 224, 226, 1650
Army, Government of the, [150] 1447
Army, Subalterns in the, [151] 1499
Army—Warrant of 1854, [149] 1355
Assessed and Income Taxes, Res. [151] 212
Baltic, Destruction of British Property in the, [151] 1371
†Bank Acts [148] 458; Com. moved for, Amend. 604, 663, 670
†Bank Issues Indemnity, Leave, [148] 214
Bankers' Drafts, [150] 1311
Bankruptcy and Insolvency, [151] 2305
Barber's, W. H., Committee, That Viscount Goderich be discharged attendance, Adj. moved, [151] 975
Barracks at Kensington Gore, [151] 175

CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER—cont.
Bills, withdrawal of, [151] 1749
Breach of Privilege—Washington Wilks, [150] 1068, 1069, 1324
Bribery at Elections, [149] 324
Budget, The—Financial Statement, Res. [149] 1267, 1324, 1327, 1330
Business of the House, [149] 76, 176, 857, 1594; [151] 603, 604, 1346, 1605
Business, Private—Standing Orders, Report, [151] 2171
Business, Public, [150] 673, 1199, 1200; [151] 870, 871, 1002
"Cagliari," Capture of the, [149] 87, 176, 177, 179, 464, 709, 858, 1172, 1173, 1495; [150] 220, 280, 1196
Chelsea Bridge Act Amendment, 2R. [150] 1996
Cheques, Adhesive Stamps on, [150] 1310
China—Negotiations with, [150] 1448;—Relations with, 1526;—Military Operations in, [151] 2378
Church Rates Abolition, Com. [149] 1447, 1800; 3R. [150] 1403; [151] 1197
Church Rates Amendment, [149] 1870
Civil Service Superannuation, [151] 1498
Commissioners for Exhibition (1851), 2R. [150] 2254, 2268; Com. cl. 1, [151] 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 92; cl. 2, 94, 97; Consid. 313
Confessional in Belgravia, [150] 2017
Consolidated Fund (Appropriation), 2R. [151] 1863; Com. 1913, 1921
†Conspiracy to Murder, Leave, [148] 1053; 2R. 1830
Cornwall, Duchy of, [151] 1505
Cornwall Submarine Mines, Leave, [151] 1242, 1243; Com. 1652, 1653, 1654
Coroners' Inquests, Com. moved for, [151] 224
County Franchise, Leave, Previous Question moved, [149] 1819
Danubian Principalities, [149] 1583; Address moved, [150] 97, [151] 882
Decimal Coinage, [149] 1494
Dockyards, &c., Officers in the, [149] 813;—Superannuation of, [151] 1085
Dublin Port Dues, Com. moved for, [149] 1361
†East India Loan, Leave, [148] 791; Consid. [149] 141; 3R. 176
Educational Estimates, [150] 1197
Ellenborough, Lord, Resignation of, [150] 524
Estimates, The, [149] 1619
Exchequer Bonds, 2R. [149] 2153
France, Relations with, [149] 76;—The Earl of Malmesbury's Despatch, 526
Funded Debt, Leave, [150] 1507; Com. [151] 532, 538
Galway Freemen Disfranchisement, 2R. [149] 787; Com. [150] 2287.
Government, Policy of the, [149] 192; Notice, 464
Government Property—Exemption from Rates, Com. moved for, [150] 1798
Hainault Forest, [151] 872, 873
Hodge, Mr., Case of, [149] 249, 250
Hudson's Bay Company, [151] 1036, 1504
India, Colonisation of, [149] 554
†India, Government of (No. 1), Leave, [148] 1696
India, Government of (No. 2), Leave, [149] 818, 820, 830, 833, 837, 839, 840, 845, 846, 861, 873, 877; 2R. deferred, 1348, 1584
India, Government of, Com. moved for, [149] 1654, 2016; Res. 1, 2047, 2089; Res. 2,

CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER—cont.
2093, 2095, 2187, 2203; Res. 2, [150] 314, 316; Res. 3 (4), 319, 320, 1681, 1682, 1985, 1989; Res. 4 (5), 1990; Res. 5 (6), 2080, 2085, 2086; Res. 6 (7), 2232, 2235, 2250 2252
India, Government of (No. 3), Com. cl. 3, [151] 458; cl. 7, 468, 470; cl. 8, 771; cl. 11, 784; cl. 12, 790; cl. 13, 858, 862; cl. 14, 867, 868; cl. 15, 870; cl. 20, 884; cl. 36, 902; cl. 38, 904; cl. 48, 906; add. cl. 908, 909; cl. 34, 934; Consid. add. cl. 1014, 1032; cl. 27, 1042; 3R. 1095; Lords' Amends. cl. 27, 2186, 2306, 2324
India, Telegraph to, [151] 1284, 2304
†India—Transport of Troops to, Com. moved for, [148] 717, 718, 721, 725, 1875, 2046
†India—Vote of Thanks to the Civil Service, Army and Navy, [148] 865, 871; Previous Question moved, 890, 901, 916, 930; Amended Res. [149] 250
Jews, [151] 1378; 3R. 1863
Joint-Stock Banking Companies, 2R. [149] 1919; [150] 554; Com. 1503, 1913, 1914
Justice, Department of, [149] 815; [151] 1196
Lancaster, Duchy of—Mining Operations, Com. moved for, [150] 443
Land, Sale and Transfer of (Ireland), Com. cl. 47, [151] 66; cl. 51, 153, 471
Landlord and Tenant (Ireland), [151] 442
"Leviathan," The, and the Atlantic Telegraph Cable, [151] 1181
London Corporation, [151] 756
Lucknow, Fall of, [149] 1019
Marriage Law Amendment, Com. [150] 1689
Metropolis Local Management Act Amendment, Leave, [151] 1508, 1516, 1517, 1537; Com. 1926, 1928; cl. 1, 1939, 1941; cl. 17, 1955; Consid. cl. 1, 2051
Militia, Disembodied, [149] 1354
Militia (Service Abroad) Act Continuance, Com. [151] 1962, 1963; cl. 1, 1965
Monies, Public, Committee on, [149] 1353
Moore's, Mr. C., Appointment, Res. [151] 645 664
Naples, Relations with, [151] 2376
National Defences, The, [150] 1931, 1935
National Gallery—Opening on Saturdays, [151] 1867, 2373
Navy Estimates, [149] 945, 946
Negroes, Enlistment of, Papers moved for, [149] 1044
Nelson, Monument, The, [149] 1223
Oaths, That Baron de Rothschild be a Member of the Committee, [150] 354
Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, [150] 181, 427, 530; Res. 682, 742, 761, 857, 860, 861, 862, 864, 928, 929, 1007, 1021, 1025, 1026, 1046, 1059
Paper Duty, Res. [151] 124, 134
Parliament, Sitting of, [151] 1197
Passport System in France, Correspondence moved for, [149] 602
Pictures, National Collection of, [149] 985
Portugal, Mission to, [150] 20
†Princess Royal's Marriage, Address moved, [148] 761
Probate Acts, Compensation under the, [149] 815
Proctors' Claims for Compensation, [149] 1173
Property Qualification, Com. [150] 577
Real Property, &c.—Probate Duty, Res. [150] 873
Receipt Stamps, [149] 1495
Sittings after Midnight, [151] 1285
Slave Trade—Relations with the United States, [151] 54;—Right of Search, 1084, 2033, 2046
Speech at Slough, [150] 1078, 1089, 1095, 1216
Stamp Duty on Drafts, 2R. [149] 2175, 2177; Com. cl. 1, [150] 288, 289; add. cl. 291
Suez, Isthmus of, Canal, [149] 849; Res. [150] 1392, 1400, 1447
Supply—Customs Department, [149] 226; Rep. 260, 1721, 1722;—Office of Works, [150] 1132;—Poor Law Board, 1135;—Civil Contingencies, 1138;—Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant (Ireland), 1255;—Prosecutions, 1468;—County Courts, 1483;—General Register House, Edinburgh, 1499, 1500, 1502, 1585;—British Museum, 1578, 1582;—Theological Professors, Belfast, [151] 1240;—Embassies and Missions Abroad, 1274;—Superannuations, 1275;—General Board of Health, 1281;—National Gallery, Report, 1383, 1390;—Temporary Commissions, 1410;—Patent Law Fees, &c., 1416;—Lighthouses Abroad, 1420;—Gallery of Portraits, 1422;—New Public Offices, Belfast, 1424;—Nelson Column, 1425, 1426;—Main Drainage of London, 1429;—Major General Chesney, 1443
Telegraph, Mediterranean, [149] 984, 985;—To India, [151] 1284, 2304
Thames, State of the, [151] 440; Res. 576, 1169
Thibet, [149] 1180
Turin, British Envoy at, [149] 985
Turkey, Commercial Relations with, [150] 179
Under Secretary of State for Scotland, Res. [150] 2147
Valuation (Ireland), Com. moved for, [150] 912
Ways and Means, Com. [149] 1601; [150] 399, [151] 1645
Weedon Establishment, Commission moved for, [150] 1801
Wellington Testimonial, The, [151] 2046
Western Bank of Scotland, [150] 20
West Indies, Removal of Troops from, [151] 2126
Westminster Bridge, [151] 1268
York, Deanery of, [150] 1524

Chancellor of the Exchequer's Speech at Slough,
l. Notice (Earl of Clarendon), [150] 1193; Observations (Earl of Clarendon), 1270
c. Observations (Lord J. Russell), [150] 1069; (Viscount Palmerston), 1204

Chancery Amendment Bill,
c. Leave, [149] 1161; 1R.* 1168;
2R. 1557;
Com. 2204;
3R.* [150] 920
l. 1R.* [150] 1021;
2R. 1440;
Rep. 1690; 3R.* 1997
Royal Assent, [151] 472

Chancery, Court of,
l. Question (Viscount Lifford), [149] 2098;—Chief Clerks' Offices, Observations (Lord Chancellor), [151] 162

[cont.

Chapel in Paris for British Residents,
c. Question (Mr. Wise), [148] 860

Charitable Allowances—Supply,
c. [151] 1277

Charitable Bequests Act,
c. Question (Mr. Lefroy), [151] 1000

Charitable Trusts Acts Continuance Bill,
c. 1R.* [151] 1266; 2R.* 1369; Observations (Mr. Kinnaird), 1437; Com. Adj. moved (Mr. Kinnaird), 1549; Amend. withdrawn, 1550; 3R.* 1590
l. 1R.* [151] 1655; 2R.* 1773; 3R.* 1906; Royal Assent, 1967

Charity Commission—Supply,
c. [151] 1402

Charity Commissioners,
c. Question (Mr. Hopwood), [148] 1605

CHARLESWORTH, Mr. J. C. D., Wakefield
Justice, Administration of, Com. moved for, [149] 1810

CHEETHAM, Mr. J., Lancashire, S.
India—Colonization of, Com. moved for, [149] 292; — Public Works, 712; — Roads and Canals, [151] 1370
India, Government of (No. 2), Leave, [149] 841
Joint-Stock Companies, Com. add. cl. [150] 1912
Lancashire and Yorkshire, &c. Railway Companies, Consid. [150] 1705
Marriage Law Amendment, Com. cl. 2, [151] 683
Supply — Nonconforming, &c. Ministers (Ireland), [151] 1280: — Improvement of the Kafirs, 1421;—New Public Offices (Belfast), 1423;—Embassy House at Paris, 1441

CHELMSFORD, Lord—See CHANCELLOR, The LORD

Chelsea Bridge Act Amendment Bill,
c. 1R.* [150] 332; 2R. 1991; Amend. (Mr. Blackburn), [150] 1992; Adj. moved (Mr. Spooner), 1995, [A. 139, N. 51, M. 88] 1996; Adj. Debate, [151] 791, [A. 161, N. 96, M. 65] ib.;
151] Com. deferred, 1000;
· Com. cl. 3, 1648; Amend. (Sir J. Shelley), 1649, [o. q. A. 118, N. 41, M. 77] 1650; Amend. (Mr. B. Stanhope), [o. q. A. 116, N. 45, M. 71] 1651
· Consid. Amend. (Sir J. Shelley), 1773;
· Re-com. Amend. (Major Sibthorp), 1863 (Mr. Ingram), ib.;
· 3R.* 1863
151] l. 1R.* 1865;
· 2R. 1908; 3R.* 2151
Royal Assent, 2369

Chelsea New Bridge,
c. Leave, [148] 1847; Question (Sir J. Shelley), [149] 811; 1493; [151] 757; (Mr. Brady), [149] 983; [Mr. Alcock), [151] 877, 1394

Cheques, Adhesive Stamps on,
c. Question (Mr. Nicoll), [150] 1310; — see Stamp Duty on Drafts Bill

Chesney, Major General—Supply,
c. [151] 1442;—Question (Mr. Wilson), 2374

CHICHESTER, Earl of
Durham, Patronage of the See of, [150] 1269
Ecclesiastical Commission, 2R. [150] 11; Report, [151] 987; 3R. 1154
Spiritual Destitution, Com. moved for, [149] 1573

CHICHESTER, Bishop of
Church Discipline—Law of Sequestration, [151] 591
Church of England, Political Services of the, Address moved [151] 502
Convocation at York, Papers moved for, [151] 1561
Glebe Houses, Dilapidations in, [151] 1150

CHILD, Mr. S., Staffordshire,
Weights and Measures [148] 1370
Working Classes, Condition of the, Com. move for, [149] 343

China,
Atrocities in, c. Question (Mr. Robertson) [150] 1611
Canton, Executions at, c. Question (Mr. Robertson) [149] 2013
Coolies, Exportation of, from Hong Kong, l. Correspondence moved for, (Bishop of Oxford), [151] 70, 74; Question, 374
Expedition to, c. Question (Mr. Horsfall) [151] 11
Hong Kong—Supply, c. [151] 1269
Military Operations in, Question (Mr. White), [151] 2378
Negotiations with, c. Question (Mr. Kinglake), [150] 1448
Peiho, Forts on the River, taken, [151] 1933
Relations with, c. Question (Mr. White), [149] 1265; (Lord J. Russell), [150] 1519, 1526
Troops for, l. Papers moved for, (Lord Wensleydale), [148] 1259
War in, c. Question (Lord J. Russell), [148 1275; Observations, 1741 Yeh, Commissioner, c. Question (Mr. Laurie), [150] 1532;—see Passenger Act, Chinese, Amendment (1855) Bill.

Cholera (West Indies)—Supply,
c. [151] 1423

CHRISTY, Mr. S., Newcastle-under-Lyme
Hudson's Bay Company, Res. [151] 1831
New Caledonia, 2R. [151] 1115; Com. cl. 1 Amend. 1347, 1348
New England Company, [149] 812
Oregon, Gold in, [150] 1059

Church Discipline—Law of Sequestration
l. Question (Lord St. Leonards) [151] 590

Church Leases,
c. Question (Mr. Hutt), [149] 812

Church of England, Political Services of the,
l. Address moved (Earl Stanhope), [151] 475, 481; Amend. (Bishop of Oxford), 495;—Her Majesty's Answer, 691
Address moved (Duke of Marlborough), [151] 1660; Motion withdrawn, 1665
c. Address moved (Mr. Cowper), [151] 1392;—Her Majesty's Answer, 1604

Church of England Special Services Bill,
l. 1R. [148] 755;
2R. 854;
Com. 1459;
cl. 1, 1461; Amend (Bishop of Oxford), [o. q. Contents 33, Not-Contents 14, M. 19] 1462;
cl. 3, 1463; Amend. (Bishop of Llandaff), 1467; Amend. withdrawn, 1469;
3R. [149] 457
Question (Earl of Wicklow) [151] 2093

Church Rates,
l. Petitions (Earl of Carlisle), [151] 169; (Lord St. Leonards), 1150;—Observations (Lord Portman), 1350
c. Question (Mr. T. Duncombe), [148] 677

Church Rates Abolition Bill,
c. 1R.* [148] 1165;
2R. 1553; Amend. (Lord R. Cecil), 1560, [o. q A. 214, N. 160, M. 54] 1583;
149] Com. 1242; Amend. (Mr. Packe), 1428; Motion neg., 1455;
· cl. 1, Amend. (Sir A. Elton), 1455; Amend. withdrawn, 1456; Amend. (Lord R. Cecil) ib.; Amend. withdrawn, 1472; Adj. moved, (Mr. Lygon), ib., [A. 104, N. 346, M. 242] 1473;
· Com. deferred, 1557;
· Question (Sir J. Trelawny), 1586, 1800;
150] Com. cl. 1, 557, [A. 227, N. 153, M. 74] 570;
· cl. 3, Amend. (Lord R. Cecil), 570; cl. neg. 571;
· add. cl. (Sir A. Elton), 571; Amend. (Mr. Gladstone), ib.;
· 2nd add. cl. (Sir A. Elton), 571; cl. withdrawn, 575;
· 3R. Adj. moved (Mr. Drummond) 1402, [A. 103, N. 150, M. 47] 1403; Adj. moved. (Mr. Hume), [A. 78, N. 136, M. 58] ib.; Adj. Debate, 1706; Amend. (Sir B. Bridges), 1708, [o. q. A. 266, N. 203, M. 63] 1727;
150] l. 1R.* 1829;
2R. 799; Amend. (Earl of Derby), 837, [o. q. Contents 36, Not-Contents 187, M. 151] 855
Question (Sir J. Trelawny), [151] 1187

Church Rates Amendment,
c. Adj. moved (Mr. Ayrton) [149] 1869; Motion withdrawn, 1871; Notice withdrawn (Mr. Lygon) [150] 221

Church Rates Commutation Bill,
c. 1R.* [151] 1266

Churches and Churchyards,
c. Com. moved for (Mr. Puller), [149] 1845; Amend. (Mr. Buxton), 1858; Amend. withdrawn, 1866, [m. q., A. 54, N. 317, M. 263] 1867

Churches Metropolitan, Sanitary State of the,
c. Question (Mr. Laurie) [150] 1924

Churches, &c., (Ireland) Bill,
c. 1R.* [148] 1083; 2R.* 1552; 3R.* [150] 2157
l. 1R.* [150] 2193; 2R.* [151] 975; 3R.* 1243
Royal Assent, 1967

CHURCHILL, Lord A., Woodstock
Australia and New Zealand—Naval Stations at, [148] 681
India Government of, Com. Res. 6, [150] 2251
Jews, 3R. [151] 1864
Moreton Bay, [148] 549
New Zealand, [150] 923

Circassia—Treaty of Paris,
c. Question (Lord J. Manners) [148] 1735

Circuits, Redistribution of,
c. Question (Mr. Warren), [149] 814

Civil Bills, &c., (Ireland) Act Amendment Bill,
[151] c. 1R.* 592;
· 2R. 1430; Adj. moved (Mr. Cogan), 1431; Adj. Debate, 1543; Amend. (Mr. Cogan), 1544, [o. q., A. 97, N. 62, M. 35], 1549;
· Com. cl. 2, 1770; Adj. moved (Mr. Cogan), 1771; Motion neg. 1772, [A. 98, N. 50, M. 48] ib.;
· 3R. [A. 83, N. 54, M. 29], 2047
· l. 1R.* 2077; 2R.* 2151;
· Com. 2269; Amend. (Earl of Donoughmore), 2270
· 3R.* 2282
· Royal Assent, 2369

Civil Contingencies—Supply,
c. [150] 1138; [151] 1444; Amend. (Mr. W. Williams) 1445; Amend. neg. 1446

Civil Service Commission—Supply,
c. [150] 1131

Civil Service Estimates,
c. [150] 1111, 1466, 1570; [151] 135, 1172, 1200; Question (Mr. Wise), 1266, 1268, 1345, 1380, 1399, 1436, 1437

Civil Service Superannuation Commissioners,
c. Question, (Sir F. Kelly), [148] 1264; (Sir J. Elphinstone), [150] 922; (Mr. Wilson), [151] 1498

CLANCARTY, Earl of Belfast, Riots in, [150] 1596
Jews, [150] 1998; 2R. Amend. [151] 704; Com. 916, 1072, 1073

cont.

CLANCARTY, Earl of—cont.
Lands, Sale and Transfer of (Ireland), Com. [151] 1780
Oaths, Report, [150] 1149
Property Qualification, 3R. [150] 2091
Reformatory Schools (Ireland), 2R. [151] 1999

CLANRICARDE, Marquess of
"Cagliari," Case of the, [149] 1951
Canning's, Lord, Proclamation—Confiscation of Land in Oude, [150] 324
Communication between London and Dublin, [149] 1099
Divorce Act (Ireland), [149] 1924
East India Loan, 3R. [149] 421
Education (Ireland)—The National System [149] 401
Excise Duties, 3R. [150] 328, 329
Explanation, [149] 230
Hundredth Regiment, [151] 1349
India—Arms and Press Acts, Papers moved for, [148] 262;—Government of, Report moved for, [149] 1982; [151] 69
India, Government of (No. 3), 2R. [151] 1480; Com. cl. 7, Amend. 1578; cl. 12, 1584; cl. 30, Amend. 1587
Kerry County, Assistant Barrister of, [150] 2096, 2097, 2098
Militia, Organization of the, [150] 2008
Oude, King of, [151] 1550
Royal Commission—Order of Proceedings, [151] 479, 480
Statement, Notice of withdrawal of, [149] 163
Tenant Right (Ireland), [151] 913
Victoria Station and Pimlico Railway, Motion for Counsel, [151] 587

CLARENDON, Earl of (†Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs)
"Cagliari," Case of the, [149] 1941; [150] 1915
Chancellor of the Exchequer's Speech at Slough, Notice, [150] 1193, 1270, 1280, 1293, 1305
Coolies, Exportation of, from Hong Kong, Correspondence moved for, [151] 81
India, Government of (No. 3), Com. cl. 12, [151] 1583, 1584
Ministerial Statement [149] 54
†Naples, British Prisoners at, [148] 748
†Passport System, [148] 746; [149] 1104, 1105, 1106
†Slave Trade, Alleged Revival of the, [148] 514, 519; [150] 2217
†Sullivan, Mr., Assassination of, [148] 451
United States, Relations with the, [150] 1701

CLAY, Mr. J., Kingston-upon-Hull
Bothnia—Claims of British Merchants, Commission moved for, [151] 1860
Breach of Privilege—Washington Wilks [150] 1067, 1313
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Com. cl. 1, [151] 1600
County Franchise, Leave, [149] 1833
Galway Freemen Disfranchisement, Com. [150] 2157
Harbours of Refuge, Commission moved for, [151] 2146
Havelock's, Sir H., Annuity, 2R. [148] 510
India, Government of (No. 3), Com. cl. 12, [151] 786

[cont.

CLAY, Mr. J.—cont.
Ladies' Gallery, [151] 1613
Land, Sale and Transfer of (Ireland), Com. cl. 87, [151] 970
Metropolis Local Management, 2R. [151] 1740; Com. 1928
Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Res. [150] 1026
Stade Dues, Address moved, [149] 1011
Supply—Embassy House at Paris, [151] 1441
Thames, State of the, Res. [151] 1170

Clerks of Petty Sessions (Ireland) Bill,
c. 1R.* [148] 860; 2R.* 1367; Com. [149] 1168

Clerks of Petty Sessions (Ireland) (No. 2) Bill,
c. 1R.* [150] 1705; 2R. 2277; 3R.* [151] 1909
l. 1R.* [151] 1967; 2R.* 2077; 3R.* 2241 Royal Assent, 2369

CLEVELAND, Duke of
Jews, 2R. [151] 715
Militia, Organization of the, [150] 2004

CLIFFORD, Mr. C. C., Isle of Wight
Wight, Isle of, Pilots, Return moved for, [149] 1837

CLIVE, Mr. G., Hereford
Breach of Privilege—Washington Wilks, [150] 1022, 1063, 1065, 1404
"Candace," Loss of the, [151] 83
Galway Freemen Disfranchisement, Leave, [149] 378; Com. 1412; [150] 2286, 2287; [151] 593, 599; cl. 1, 602

Clive Fund, The,
c. Question (Sir J. Pakington), [148] 420

Clyde Navigation Bill,
c. 1R.* [148] 860; 2R.* 1367; Consid. Amend. (Mr. E. P. Bouverie), [151] 504, [A. 17, N. 75, M. 58] 507, 666

Coal Trade, The,
c. Question (Lord A. Vane-Tempest), [148] 1869

COBBETT, Mr. J. M., Oldham
Army Estimates, [151] 1483
Coroners' Inquests, Com. moved for, [151] 223
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Com. cl. 1, [151] 1496
Poor Law Medical Officers, [151] 1503
Poor Rates (Metropolis), Leave, [149] 645

CODRINGTON, Lt. Gen. Sir W. J., Greenwich
Army—Commissions in the, [149] 432;—Sanitary Condition of the, Res. [150] 493;—Subalterns in the, Address moved, [151] 2241;—Regulations, 2364
Army Estimates, [149] 136, 1250; [150] 373, 374, 381, 382, 383, 384, 386, 399, 1106, 1110; [151] 1482
Army Service, 3R. [151] 1654
Bands, Regimental, [149] 816
Bath, Order of the, [151] 2364

[cont.

CODRINGTON, Lt. Gen. Sir W. J. – cont.
Billeting System, [151] 1606
Drainage of the Metropolis, [148] 549
Enfield Rifles, [149] 1797, 1798
Government Property—Exemption from Rates, Com. moved for [150] 1799
Guards, Mortality in the, Report moved for, [148] 1550
Havelock, Sir H., Pension to, Res. [148] 394
Havelock's, Lady and Sir H. Havelock's Annuities, 2R. [148] 1081
India, Government of (No. 3), Lords' Amends. cl. 35, [151] 2203
India—Vote of Thanks to the Civil Service, &c., Amended Res. [149] 257
Metropolis Local Management Act Amendment, Leave, [151] 1537; 2R. 1745; Com. 1928; cl. 1, 1943, 1944; cl. 2, 1946; cl. 26, Amend. 1956, 1957; add. cl. 1958; Consid. cl. 1, 2050
Military Auditors, [148] 465
Military Organization, Res. [150] 1352; [151] 570
Militia (Service abroad) Act Continuance, Com. cl. 1, [151] 1961
Mutiny, 2R. [149] 267
Navy Estimates, [149] 110, 131, 1248, 1347
Ninety-Second Regiment in Bombay, [151] 1081
Officers' Servants, [150] 1921
Poor Law (Metropolis), 2R. [150] 515
Recruiting System, [150] 363
Staff Officers' Servants, [148] 976
Supply—Harbours of Refuge [150] 1126
Wages, Rate of, [148] 1869
Windham, General, [148] 1606

COGAN, Mr. W. H. F., Kildare Co.
Browne, Colonel, and Mr. O'Ferrall, [151] 1607
Civil Bills, &c. (Ireland), 2R. Adj. moved, [151] 1431; Amend. 1543; Com. cl. 2, 1771, 1772
Dublin, Affray at, Report moved for, [149] 693
Excise Duties, 2R. [149] 1747
Incumbered Estates Court (Ireland), [149] 174
Irish Business, [151] 880
Land, Sale and Transfer of (Ireland), Com. cl. 4, [151] 59
Oaths, [149] 443; Consid. Amend. 466, 483
Patriotic Fund, [149] 814
Police Force (Ireland), 2R. [151] 1133, 1144, 1549
Reformatory Schools (Ireland), Com. cl. 7, Amend. [151] 1068
St. James's Park, [150] 1852
Slave Trade—Right of Search, Res. [151] 1345
Tenants' Compensation (Ireland), 2R. [150] 1817

COLCHESTER, Lord, (Postmaster General)
Communication between London and Dublin, [149] 1098
Jews, 3R. [151] 1258
Post Office—False Character to Servants, [151] 910

COLEBROOKE, Sir T. E., Lanarkshire
County Franchise (Scotland), Leave, [150] 211
County Voters (Scotland), Registration of, [149] 1265; Leave, 1405; 2R. 2003; Com. [150] 2190
East India Loan, Consid. [149] 20

[cont.

COLEBROOKE, Sir T. E.—cont.
Edinburgh Annuity Tax, 2R. [150] 2181
India, Government of (No. 2), Leave, [149] 841
India, Government of, Com. moved for, [149] 1720; Res. 1, 2066; Res. 3 (4), [150] 318, 319, 1973
India, Government of (No. 3), Com. cl. 11, [151] 780; cl. 12, 785; cl. 15, 870; cl. 21, Amend. 886; cl. 27, 892; cl. 34, 933, 934; Consid. 1037; Lords' Amends. cl. 27, 2186; cl. 32, 2201
India, Reinforcement of Troops for, [151] 2038
Members' Seats, Res. [149] 2001
Mutiny, 2R. [149] 268
Roads, &c., (Scotland), Leave, [149] 159
Roads, (Scotland), Commission moved for, [151] 1160
Western Bank of Scotland, [149] 1217

Collectors of the Revenue,
c. Return moved for, (Mr. Ingram) [151] 2281

COLLIER, Mr. R. P., Plymouth
Breach of Privilege—Washington Wilks, [150] 1066, 1067
Chancellor of the Exchequer's Speech at Slough, [150] 1095
Chancery Amendment, Com. [149] 2204
Church Rates, 3R. [150] 1403
Commerce, Tribunals of, Com. moved for, [149] 1158
Conspiracy to Murder, Leave, [148] 1016
Joint-Stock Banks, [148] 373
Marriage Law Amendment, 2R. [150] 126
Oaths, Lords' Amends, That Baron de Rothschild be a Member of the Committee, [150] 437
Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Res. Adj. moved, [150] 857, 962
Partnerships, Registration of, 2R. Amend. [151] 228
Poor Law (Metropolis), 2R. [150] 516
Probate Courts, The, [150] 258
Property Qualification, Leave, [149] 1544
Surat—Nawab's Debt, [151] 40

COLLINS, Mr. T., Knaresborough
Allowances to Witnesses at Sessions, &c. [151] 311
Church Rates, Com. cl. 1, [150] 568; add. cl. 575
County Franchise, Leave, [149] 1835
Election Committees Scrutiny, 2R. [151] 250
Galway Election, [148] 1371
Galway Freemen Disfranchisement, Com. [149] 1421; [151] 597
India, Government of (No. 3), Com. cl. 13, Amend. [151] 857, 864
Jews, 3R. [151] 1901
Justice, Administration of, Com. moved for, [149] 1804
Leases and Sales of Settled Estates, Com. [151] 2207
Limerick City, New Writ moved, [150] 336
Oaths, 2R. [148] 1088; Consid. [149] 470
Savings Banks, [148] 459
Supply—Queen's University (Ireland), [151] 1237;—Highland Roads and Bridges, 1419

Colonial and English Law, Assimilation of,
c. Question (Mr. Horsfall), [149] 422

Commerce, Tribunals of,
c. Com. moved for (Mr. Ayrton), [149] 1142

Commercial Distress,
c. Observations (Mr. Newdegate), [148] 679

Commissions in the Army,
c. Question (Mr. W. Williams), [149] 222; Observations (Mr. Bagwell), 427; Question (Mr. Laurie), 1264; (Lord Burghley), [150] 2252; (Colonel North), [151] 415

Commissions, Temporary—Supply,
c. [151] 1402; Amend. (Mr. L. King), 1404, [A. 52, N. 85, M. 33] 1412

Commissioners for Exhibition (1851) Bill,
c. 1R.* [150] 1849;
2R. 2254;
Com. cl. 1, [151] 85; Amend. (Sir H. Willoughby), 86; Amend. neg. 87; Amend. (Mr. Blackburn), [A. 99, N. 208, M. 109] 88; Amend. (Mr. Wilson), 91;
cl. 2, 92;
Consid. 312: Amend. (Mr. Wilson), 313, [o. q. A. 126, N. 81, M. 45] 315;
3R.* 394
l. 1R.* [151] 472; 2R.* 792;
3R. 1075
Royal Assent, 1243

Committees, Chairman of,
l. Lord Redesdale Appointed, [148] 86

Common Law Commissioners' Report,
c. Question (Mr. Warren), [148] 458

Common Law Procedure Act Amendment Bill,
c. 1R.* [150] 523;
2R. 928

Commons Enclosure Bill,
c. 1R.* [149] 172; 2R.* 246; 3R.* 422
l. 1R.* [149] 401; 2R.* 445; 3R.* 703
Royal Assent, 788

Competitive Examination for the Civil Service,
l. Question (Lord Lyttleton), [150] 1691

Confessional in Belgravia,
c. Question (Mr. Butler), [150] 2016; [151] 26

CONINGHAM, Mr. W., Brighton
Army Estimates, [150] 383
Bank Issues Indemnity, 2R. [148] 290
Brodie, Sergeant, [151] 2303
Chelsea Bridge Act Amendment, Com. [151] 1648; cl. 3, 1650
Church Services, Address moved, [151] 1393
Commissioners for Exhibition (1851) 2R. [150] 2264; Com. cl. 1, [151] 87; cl. 2, 96; Consid. 313
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Com. cl. 1, [151] 1598; Consid. 2067

[cont.

CONINGHAM, Mr. W.—cont.
Drafts on Bankers Law Amendment, 3R. [151] 2076
Galway Freemen Disfranchisement, Com. [151] 597
Health, Public, Consid., add. cl. [151] 1655
India, Government of (No. 3), Lords' Amends. [151] 2346
Metropolis Local Management, 2R. [151] 1724; Com. 1927; cl. 1, 1929, 1938, 1939, 1940; cl. 2, 1946; cl. 4, Amend. 1949; 3R. 2074
Naples, British Subjects Imprisoned at, [148] 273
Oaths, Leave, [148] 496
Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Res. [150] 1030
Science and Art, Departments of, [151] 1172; —Supply, 1181
Supply—British Museum, [150] 1582;—Royal Hibernian Academy, [151] 1239; — Embassies and Missions Abroad, 1274;—National Gallery, Report, 1382;—Embassy, House at Paris, 1440;—General Board of Health, 1444;—Civil Contingencies, 1446
Weedon Establishment, Commission moved for, [151] 254, 585
Wellington Monument, Res. [151] 2220

CONOLLY, Mr. T., Donegal Co.
Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Res. [149] 743

Consolidated Fund (£10,000,000) Bill,
c. 1R.* [149] 294; 2R.* 322;
Com. 443;
3R. 465
l. 1R.* [149] 445; 2R.* 556; 3R.* 703
Royal Assent, 782

Consolidated Fund (£500,000) Bill,
c. 1R.* [149] 294; 2R.* 322; 3R.* 460
l. 1R.* [149] 445; 2R.* 556; 3R.* 703
Royal Assent, 788

Consolidated Fund (£11,000,000) Bill,
c. 1R.* [150] 496; 2R.* 523; 3R.* 763
l. 1R.* [150] 761; 2R.* 858; 3R.* 919
Royal Assent, 1021

Consolidated Fund (Appropriation) Bill,
c. 1R.* [151] 1699;
2R. 1862;
Com. 1909;
cl. 25, Amend. (Sir H. Willoughby), 1922, [A. 41, N. 89, M. 48] 1924;
3R.* 2067
l. 1R.* [151] 2077; 2R.* 2151; 3R.* 2282
Royal Assent, 2369

Conspiracy to Murder Bill,
c. Leave, [148], 933; Amend. (Mr. Kinglake), 939; Adj. Debate, 979; Adj. moved (Mr. Cox), 1077; Motion withdrawn, 1078; Amend. withdrawn, 1078, [A. 299, N. 99, M. 200) ib.; 1R.* ib.;
2R. 1741; Amend. (Mr. M. Gibson). 1758, [o. q. A. 215, N. 234, M. 19] 1844

Conspiracy to Murder (Ireland),
c. Leave, [150] 879; Motion withdrawn, 883

Constabulary Police (Aldershot and Shorncliffe—Supply,
c. [151] 1420

Constantinople and Bassorah Telegraph,
c. Correspondence moved for, (Sir H. Rawlinson), [149] 1168

Constantinople, New Consular Office at—Supply,
c. [151] 1441

Consular Establishments Abroad—Supply,
c. [151] 1270

Consular Service,
c. Com. moved for (Mr. S. FitzGerald), [149] 550

Continuance Service Men in the Navy,
c. Returns moved for, (Sir C. Napier), [149], 1225; Motion withdrawn, ib.

Convict Children,
c. Question (Mr. Spooner), [151] 1610

Convocation at York,
l. Papers moved for (Lord Redesdale), [151] 1551; Motion withdrawn, 1561

CONYNGHAM, Lord F. N., Clare Co.
Markets and Fairs (Ireland), [148] 469
Tenants' Compensation (Ireland), 2R. [150] 1815

Coolies, Exportation of, from Hong Kong,
l. Correspondence moved for (Bishop of Oxford), [151] 70; Question, 374

Cooper, v. Slade, Case of,
c. Explanation (Mr. Serjeant Deasy), [150] 276

COPELAND, Mr. Ald. W. T., Stoke-upon-Trent,
Australian Postal Service, [148] 580
Lancaster, Duchy of—Mining Operations, Com. moved for, [150] 446, 449

Copyhold Acts,
c. Question (Mr. Hankey), [150] 1517

Copyhold Acts Amendment Bill,
c. 1R.* [150] 1601; 2R.* 2014; 3R.* [151] 1155
l. 1R.* [151] 1243; 2R.* 1550; 3R.* 2151
Royal Assent, 2369

Copyhold, Inclosure and Tithe Commission—Supply,
c. [150] 1262

Copyhold and Inclosure Commissions Bill,
c. 1R.* [151] 1266; 2R.* 1369; 3R.* 1590
l. 1R.* [151] 1655; 2R.* 1773; 3R.* 1906
Royal Assent, 1967

Copyright, Law of,
l. Petitions (Lord Lyndhurst) [151] 2090; Com. moved for, 2093

Copyright of Designs Bill,
c. 1R.* [150] 763; 2R.* [151] 83; 3R.* 994
l. 1R.* [151] 1069; 2R.* 1550; 3R.* 1773
Royal Assent, 2369

CORK, Earl of,
Endowed Schools (Ireland) [149] 2104

Corn Returns, Inspectors of—Supply,
c. [151] 1420

Cornwall, Duchy of,
c. Question (Mr. A. Smith), [151] 881; (Mr. Robartes), 1505

Cornwall Submarine Mines,
c. Leave [151] 1242; Amend. (Mr. A. Smith) [A. 35, N. 6, M. 29], 1243;
1R.* 1266; 2R.* 1481
Com. Adj. moved, (Mr. A. Smith), 1652, [A. 17, N. 109, M. 92] 1653; Amend. (Mr. Briscoe), [o. q. A. 92, N. 20, M. 72] 1654; Amend. (Mr. A. Smith) 1750; Amend. neg. 1754;
3R. 1866
l. 1R.* [151] 1865;
2R. 2077; 3R.* 2241
Royal Assent, 2369

Coroners' Inquests,
c. Com. moved for, (Mr. Cobbett), [151] 223

Corrupt Practices Prevention Act,
c. Question (Mr. T. Duncombe), [148] 677; (Mr. Cross), [149] 1797; (Mr. Rebow), [151] 176

Corrupt Practices Prevention Act Continuance Bill,
c. 1R.* [151] 592; 2R.* 857;—
151] Com. 1484;
- cl. 1, 1487; Amend. (Mr. Griffith), 1488, [A. 70, N. 165, M. 5] 1496; Amend. (Mr. Stapleton), ib.; Amend. neg. 1497; Amend. (Mr. Ayrton), ib.; 1590, [A. 39, N. 145, M. 106] 1599, [m. q. A. 131, N. 58, M. 75] 1600; Amend. (Mr. B. Osborne), ib.; Amend. withdrawn, 1602, [o. q. A 125, N. 68, M. 57] ib.;
- cl. 2, Amend. (Mr. A. Mills), 1602; Amend. withdrawn, 1604;
- add. cl. (Mr. E. C. Egerton), [A. 144, N. 34, M. 110] ib.;

Consid. 1965; add. cl. (Mr. W. Vansittart), 1966, 2021, [A. 53, N. 66, M. 13] 2024;
- add. cl. (Mr. Nicoll), 2024, [A. 52, N. 83, M. 31] 2026;
- add. cl. (Mr. Greer), 2026, [A. 26, N. 112, M. 86] 2028;
- add. cl. Mr. (Griffith), 2028; cl. neg. 2029;
- cl. 1. Amend. (Mr. Stapleton), 2029, [A. 75, N. 78, M. 3] 2030; That cl. 1 stand part of the Bill, ib., 2056, [A. 94, N. 66, M. 28] 2065; Amend. Recom. (Mr. Roebuck), [o. q. A. 92, N. 46, M. 46] 2066;
- 3R. 2115, Amend. (Mr. H. Berkeley), 2118, [o. q. A. 93, N. 60, M. 33] 2123;
- That the Bill do pass, [A. 92, N. 59, M. 33] 2124

[cont.

Corrupt Practices Prevention Bill—cont.
[151] l. 1R.* 2077;
2R. 2163;
Com. cl. 1, Amend. (Lord Ebury), 2245, [o. q. Contents 43, Not-Contents 23, M. 20] 2250;
3R.* 2282
Royal Assent, 2369

CORRY, Rt. Hon. H. T. L. (†Secretary to the Admiralty), Tyrone Co.
†East India Loan, Consid. [149] 73
Harbours of Refuge, Com. [148] 1360
†Haslar Slip, [149] 1723
†Naval Returns, [149] 1799
†Navy Estimates, [149] 920, 1637, 1641, 1647
†Supply—Newhaven Harbour, [151] 1443

Counties, Detached Parts of, Bill,
c. 1R.* [151] 857; 2R.* 1481; 3R.* 1866
l. 1R.* [151] 1865; 2R.* 1906; 3R.* 2151
Royal Assent, 236

County Court Districts Bill,
l. 1R.* [151] 472; 2R.* 691;
Rep. 992;
3R. 1075
c. 1R.* [151] 1266; 2R.* 1481; 3R.* 1866
l. Royal Assent, [151] 2369

County Courts,
l. Returns moved for (Lord Brougham), [149] 313

County Courts—Supply,
c. Amend. (Viscount Duncan), [150] 1475; Amend. neg. 1486

County Franchise Bill,
c. Leave, [149] 1816; Previous Question (Chancellor of the Exchequer), moved, 1824;
1R.* 1837;
2R. 1857; Previous Question moved (Mr. Du Cane), [150] 1871, [A. 226, N. 168, M. 58] 1881; Division List, 2289

County Franchise (Scotland),
c. Leave, [150] 195, [A. 84, N. 103, M. 19] 215

County Gaols—Supply,
c. [150] 1503

County Management Bill,
c. 1R.* [149] 1424; 2R.* [150] 2157; 3R.* [151] 170
l. 1R.* [151] 255; 2R.* 586; 3R.* 910
Royal Assent, 1243

County Police,
c. Question (Mr. Liddell), [148] 1740

County, &c. Property Conveyance Bill,
c. 1R.* [151] 170; 2R.* 994; 3R.* 1699
l. 1R.* [151] 1773; 2R.* 1906; 3R.* 2151
Royal Assent, 2369

County Roads, South Wales, Superintendent of—Supply
c. [150] 1263

County Voters, Registration of, (Scotland) Bill,
c. Leave, [149] 1405; 1R.* 1424;
2R. 2003; Amend. (Mr. G. Dundas), 2006; Amend. withdrawn, 2008;
Com. Amend. (Mr. G. Dundas), [150] 2190, [o. q. A. 96, N. 108, M. 12] 2191

COWAN, Mr. C., Edinburgh
Bank Acts, Instruction, [148] 1545
Billeting System, Com. moved for, [149] 555
County Franchise (Scotland), Leave, [150] 201
County Voters (Scotland), Registration of, 2R. [149] 2006
Edinburgh Annuity Tax, 2R. [150] 2178
Joint-Stock Banks, [148] 369
Joint-Stock Banking Companies, Com. [150] 1504, 1505, 1913; 3R. Amend. [151] 224
Land Transport Corps, Com. moved for, [149] 1624
Lands, Valuation of (Scotland), Act Amendment, 2R. [149] 661
Lighthouses, &c., Address moved, [149] 1141
Paper Duty, Res. [151] 123
Probates and Letters of Administration, [148] 1732
Probates, Scotch, [149] 1493
Public Houses, (Scotland), [150] 1856
Roads, &c. (Scotland), 2R. [149] 1920
Supply—County Courts, [150] 1478;—General Register House, Edinburgh, 1494, 1495, 1497, 1501, 1533, 1534, 1585
Universities, (Scotland), [150] 335; 2R. 1898; Com. cl. 4, [151] 510, 511; cl. 10, 519; cl. 13, 521, 736
Weedon Establishment, Commission moved for, [151] 254
Western Bank of Scotland, [149] 1214

COWPER, Rt. Hon. W. F., (†Vice President of the Committee of Privy Council for Education), Hertford
Church Services, Address moved, [151] 1392
Commissioners for Exhibition, (1851), 2R [150] 2266; Com. cl. 2, [151] 94; Consid. 315
†Education (England), Commission moved for, [148] 1226, 1247;—Papers moved for, [151] 2278, 2281
†Health, Public, Act Amendment, Leave, [148] 499; 2R. 744, 1457
Local Government, 2R. [149] 2096; Com. cl. 9, [151] 171; cl. 10, Amend. 172
†Medical Practitioners, [148] 550
Medical Practitioners, Leave, [149] 648; 2R. [150] 1406; Com. 1409, 1410; [151] 995; cl. 3, 997, 998; Lords' Amends. 2277
Metropolis Local Management, Com. cl. 1, [151] 1942; cl. 2, 1946; add. cl. 1958
†Reformatory Schools, [148] 460
†Sewage of Towns, [148] 1372
Supply—British Museum, [150] 1581;—Education, [151] 151;—Department of Science and Art, 1173;—National Vaccine Establishment, 1275;—National Gallery, Rep. 1391;—Wellington Monument, The, [151] 417 Res. 2228

COX, Mr. W., Finsbury
Conspiracy to Murder, Leave, Adj. moved [148] 1077, 1078
Cornwall Submarine Mines, Com. [151] 1652

Cox, Mr. W.—cont.
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Com. cl. 1, [151] 1599, 1601; cl. 2, 1603; Consid. add. cl. 2028
Finsbury Park, [149] 1186
Health, Public, Com. cl. 4, Adj. moved, [150] 2283; Consid. add. cl. [151] 1655; Lords Amend. 2277
India, Government of (No. 2), Leave, [149] 838
India, Government of (No. 3), Com. cl. 13, [151] 865
Land, Sale and Transfer of, (Ireland), Com. cl. 47; Adj. moved, [151] 66
Law Reform, [148] 359
Leases and Sales of Settled Estates, Bill withdrawn, [151] 1436
Leases and Sales of Settled Estates Act Amendment (1856), Com. [151] 2208
London Corporation Regulation, Motion for Counsel, [149] 1748
Metropolis Local Management, 2R. [151] 1744; Com. 1927; cl. 1, 1941; cl. 26, 1957; add. cl. 1958
Oaths, Leave, [148] 482
Registrars, Superintendent, [151] 871
Septennial Act, Leave, [149] 1364
Stamp Duties on Drafts, Com. cl. 2 [150] 290
Supply — Police Courts (Metropolis), [150] 1487;—Patent Law, Fees, &c., [151] 1415; —Board of Fisheries (Scotland), 1417;—Highland Roads and Bridges, 1419;—New Public Offices, (Belfast), 1424;—Main Drainage of London, Amend. 1426, 1429;—General Board of Health, 1444
Thames, State of the, Res, [151] 576, 1165, 1171

Cranworth, Lord, (†Lord Chancellor)
†Address in Answer to the Speech, [148] 85
†Aliens, Laws Relating to, [148] 1857
Bankruptcy and Liquidation, 1R. [151] 2301
†Bankruptcy Commission, Returns moved for, [148] 1366
†Bankruptcy, District Courts of, 1R. [148] 1599, 1719
†Bankruptcy Laws, [148] 686
"Cagliari," Case of the, [149] 312, 1952
Chancery Amendment, 2R. [150] 1444; Rep. 1691
Chancery, Court of, [149] 2101;—Chief Clerks' Offices, [151] 167
Church of England, Political Services of the, Address moved, [151] 501
†Church of England Special Services, Com. Preamble [148] 1470
Civil Bills, &c. (Ireland), Com. [151] 2270
Cornwall Submarine Mines, 2R. [151] 2078
County Courts, Returns moved for [149] 318
Divorce Act (Ireland), [149] 1925
Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Act Amendment, 2R. [150] 579; Re-com. 2001; Rep. 2194, 2195; 3R [151] 160
Ecclesiastical Commission, 2R. [150] 18; Rep. add. cl. [151] 992
Executors, Confirmation of, 2R. [151] 1152; Com, cl. 3, 1353, 1354
†Imprisonment for Debt, Returns moved for, [148] 1257, 1259
India, Government of (No. 3), Com. cl. 12, [151] 1585; cl. 34, 1686; cl. 54, 1695; 3R. cl. 55, 2008

[cont.

Cranworth, Lord—cont.
Kerry County, Assistant Barrister of, [150] 1591, 2098
Land, Sale and Transfer of (Ireland), Com. [151] 1778
†Land, Transfer of, 1R. [148] 807; 2R. [149] 559, 571; 3R. [150] 418, 425
Libel, 2R. [149] 979
Marriage Law Amendment, 2R. [151] 1981
Metropolis Local Management, 2R. [151] 2161
Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Res. [150] 629
Probate, New Court of, [149] 947
Probates and Letters of Administration Act Amendment, 2R. [150] 579
†Property, Law of, Amendment, 1R. [148] 968; 2R. [149] 239
School Trustees, 2R. [151] 1666
Settled Estates Act, [150] 1022
Tenants for Life Trustees, 2R. [149] 559
Transfer of Estates Simplification, Com. [149] 237; Rep. 851, 854
Transfer of Real Estate, Bill withdrawn [151] 265
Trustees Relief, Com. cl. 3, [149] 231
Victoria Station and Pimlico Railway, Motion for Counsel, [151] 693
Yarmouth, Great—Magistrates, [149] 455

Craufurd, Mr. E. H. J., Ayr, &c.
"Cagliari," Case of the, [150] 287, 428, 429
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Com. cl. 1, [151] 1497, 1498; Consid. 1967; add. cl. 2023, 2025; cl. 1, 2029, 2030, 2065
County Franchise (Scotland) Lease, [150] 213
County Voters (Scotland), Registration of, 2R. [149] 2007
East India Loan, Consid. add. cl. [149] 150
France, Relations with—The Earl of Malmesbury's Despatch, [149] 325, 326
Lands, Valuation of, (Scotland), Act Amendment, 2R. [149] 667
Legitimacy Declaration, Com. cl. 9, Adj. moved, [151] 1541, 1543
Marriage Law Amendment, Com. cl. 1, [151] 681
Medical Practitioners, Com. [150] 1421
Members' Freedom from Arrest, 2R. [151] 690
Supply—Printing, &c.; Houses of Parliament, [150] 1265;—General Register House, (Edinburgh), Report, Amend. [151] 1636
Under Secretary of State for Scotland, Res. [150] 2133
Universities (Scotland) Com. cl. 15, [151] 745

Crawford, Mr. R. W., London
Bothnia, Gulf of, Destruction of Timber in the, [151] 1184, 1371;—Claims of British Merchants, Commission moved for, 1844, 1856, 1862
British Bank, The Royal, Return moved for, [149] 397
Consolidated Fund (Appropriation) Com. [151] 1921
East India Loan, Com. [148] 1887
East India Railways, Com. moved for, [149] 1384
Income Tax Papers, Abstraction of, [148] 1733
India—Council of, [151] 1084
India, Government of (No. 1), Leave, [148] 1427
Indian Telegraphs through Austria, [148] 137; [151] 2304

[cont.

CRAWFORD, Mr. R. W.—cont.
London Corporation Regulation, Com. [151] 289
Mediterranean Telegraph, [149] 983, 984, 985; Papers moved for, [150] 21
Metropolis Local Management, Com. cl. 3, [151] 1948
Oude—The Proclamation (Colonel Franks), [150] 865

Crimean Prize Money,
c. Question (Mr. Laurie), [148] 553

Criminal Statute Law,
c. Question (Sir H. Keating), [149] 709

Criminals, Foreign,
c. Question (Lord R. Cecil), [149] 1185

CROSS, Mr. R. A., Preston
Church Rates, Com. add. cl. [150] 575
Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, [149] 1797
Lancashire and Yorkshire, &c., Railway Companies, Consid. [150] 1602, 1705
Municipal Elections, Corrupt Practices at, [151] 2124
New Trial in Criminal Cases, 2R. [151] 1055
Poor Law Amendment, Com. cl. 2, [149] 2002, 2003; Consid. Amend. [150] 575

CROSSLEY, Mr. F., Halifax
Bank Issues Indemnity, 2R. [148] 293
Church Rates, Com. add. cl. [150] 574
Commissioners for Exhibition (1851), 2R. [150] 2268
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Com. cl. 1, [151] 1496
Havelock, Major General, Pension to, Res. [148] 397
India, Government of, Com. moved for, [149] 1720
Joint-Stock Companies, Com. add. cl. [150] 1913
Lancashire and Yorkshire, &c., Railway Company, Consid. [150] 1603
Marriage Law Amendment, Com. [151] 670
New Caledonia (British Colombia), Government of, 2R. [151] 1120; Com. cl. 1, 1348
Roads (Scotland), Leave, [149] 159
Supply—Theological Professors, Belfast, Amend. [151] 1240;—Nonconforming, &c., Ministers (Ireland), 1279
Transport Department, [149] 847

Crown Office, Chancery and Queen's Bench—Supply,
c. [150] 1471

Cruelty to Animals Act Amendment Bill,
c. 1R.* [149] 322;
2R. 1556; Amend. (Mr. Walpole), ib.

CUBITT, Mr. Alderman W., Andover
Battersea Park, [151] 878
London Corporation Regulation, Leave, [148] 742; [151] 607
Metropolis Local Management, 2R. [151] 1723; Com. cl. 2, 1946; Consid. cl. 13, Amend. 2052
Thames, State of the, [151] 29

Customs Acts,
c. Com. Res. (Mr. G. A. Hamilton), [149] 443

Customs Department—Supply,
c. [149] 226, 227; [151] 1280;—Superannuations, 1281

Customs Duties Bill,
c. 1R.* [149] 573; 2R.* 811; 3R.* 982
l. 1R.* [149] 1097; 2R.* 1169; 3R.* 1350
Royal Assent, [150] 403

Customs Duties (No. 2) Bill,
c. 1R.* [149] 1424; 2R.* 1653; 3R.* 1871
l. 1R.* [149] 1921; 2R.* [150] 147; 3R.* 323
Royal Assent, 403

DALGLISH, Mr. R., Glasgow
Naples, British Consul at, [151] 1500
Universities (Scotland), Com. cl. 19, [151] 1749

DAMER, Captain L. S. D., Portarlington,
Tenants' Compensation (Ireland), 2R. [150] 1819

Danubian Principalities,
c. Question (Mr. Gladstone), [149] 1583; Address moved (Mr. Gladstone), [150] 44, [A. 114, N. 292, M. 178] 106; Question (Mr. White), [151] 881

DEASY, Mr. Serjt. R., Cork Co.
Belfast, Roman Catholic Magistrates in, [150] 523
Budget, The—Financial Statement, [149] 1297
Business of the House, [151] 603, 1002
"Cagliari," Case of the, [150] 2112
Chancery Amendment, Leave, [149] 1165
Cooper v. Slade, Case of, Explanation, [150] 276
Danubian Principalities, Address moved, [150] 71
Dublin and London, Communication between, [149] 1170
Excise Duties, 2R. [149] 1743
Galway Freemen Disfranchisement, Com. [149] 1414; [151] 598; cl. 1, 602
India—Chaplains in, [151] 880
Land, Sale and Transfer of (Ireland), Leave, [150] 41; Com. 2104; cl. 3, 2110; cl. 12, [151] 62; cl. 38, 64; cl. 41, 65; cl. 51, 153, 373, 471; add. cl. 973
Military Academy—Competitive Examinations, Address moved, [149] 1734
Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Res. [150] 686
Peace Preservation (Ireland) Act Amendment, 2R. [150] 2087
Police Force (Ireland), Com. [151] 1142, 1143, 1144
Reformatory Schools (Ireland), Leave, [149] 1401, 1405; 2R. [150] 520; Com. cl. 3, 1068; cl. 7, 1069
Rewards to Members, Res. [151] 195
Roman Catholic Chaplains, [150] 2150
Supply—Public Education (Ireland) [151] 1219
Tenants' Compensation (Ireland), 2R. Adj. moved for, [149] 1097; [150] 1802
Townsend, Mr., Case of, [150] 2104
Voters' Travelling Expenses, Papers moved for, [150] 216

Debtors and Creditors Bill,
c. 1R.* [151] 1481

Decimal Coinage,
c. Question (Mr. Bland), [149] 1494

DEEDES, Mr. W., Kent, E.
Corrupt Practices Prevention, cl. 1, [151] Com. 1593; cl. 2, 1603
Durham, Church Patronage in the See of, [150] 1855, 1856
Female Children, Protection of, 2R. [151] 686
Supply —Ecclesiastical Commissioners, [151] 1400

DENISON, Rt. Hon. J. E., see SPEAKER, The,

DENISON, Mr. E. B., Yorkshire, W. R.
Marriage Law Amendment, Com. [151] 669

DENMAN, Lord
Oaths, [150] 2218
Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Res. [149] 583
Property Qualification, 3R. Amend. [151] 2095

Denmark and the Duchies,
c. Question (Mr. Wise), [149] 1799

DENT, Mr. J. D., Scarborough
Conspiracy to Murder, Leave, [148] 1023

DERBY, Earl of (†First Lord of the Treasury)
Address in Answer to the Speech, [148] 24, 39, 63, 65, 77; Explanation, 314, 521, 526
Affairs, Public, State of, [148] 686, 705
†Aliens, Law relating to, [149] 71
†Atlantic Telegraph Company, 3R. Amend. [151] 1967, 1968, 2077
Bank Issues Indemnity, 2R. [148] 447
†Bankruptcy, District Courts of, Abolition (No. 2), 1R. [149] 169
†Barrack Accommodation, Returns moved for, [149] 805
†Beer, Sale of, [151] 2242
†Belfast, Riots in, [150] 1592
†Business of the House, [149] 447; [151] 1659
†"Cagliari," Case of the, [149] 310, 312, 1953
†Campbell's, Sir Colin, Peerage, [151] 912
†Chancellor of the Exchequer's Speech at Slough, [150] 1194, 1286, 1293, 1303
†Chelsea Bridge Act Amendment, 2R. [151] 1908
Church of England Special Services, 2R. [148] 858; Com. cl. 3, 1468
†Church Rates Abolition, 2R. Amend. [151] 824, 1350
†Competitive Examination for the Civil Service, [150] 1693
†Corrupt Practices Prevention, 2R. [151] 2164
†Dublin, Affray at, [149] 171
East India Company's Petition, [148] 1161
†Ecclesiastical Commission, 1R. [149] 1109; 2R. [150] 1, 10; Rep. [151] 988; add. cl. 991, 992; 3R. 1154
†Education (Ireland)—The National System, [149] 402

[cont.

DERBY, Earl of—cont.
†Endowed Schools (Ireland), [149] 2109
†Excise Duties, 3R. [150] 329
†Forms of Prayer—State Services, Address moved, [151] 1664
Havelock, Sir H., Pension to, Address moved, [148] 317, 320
Hearsey, Major General, [148] 229, 234, 236
India—Arms and Press Acts, Papers moved for, [148] 267;—Mutiny in, 450;—Vote of Thanks to the Civil Service, Army, and Navy, 827;—Defence of Arrah, Explanation, 1249
†India, Government of (No. 3), 1R. [151] 1146; 2R. 1447, 1481; Com. cl. 7, 1564, 1567, 1578; cl. 8, 1579; cl. 9, 1580; cl. 10, ib.; cl. 11, 1581; cl. 12, 1583; cl. 22, Amend. 1586; cl. 27, 1587; cl. 29, ib.; cl. 32, Amend. 1588; cl. 33, 1589; cl. 34, 1682, 1685, 1687, 1688; cl. 36, 1690; cl. 41, 1691; cl. 52, 1692; cl. 53, Amend. 1693; cl. 54. 1694, 1696; add. cl. ib., 1697, 1699; Rep. 1783; cl. 66, Amend. 1784, 1907; 3R. cl. 29, Amend. 2008; cl. 55, 2009; add. cl. ib.; That the Bill do pass, 2012; Commons, Reasons, 2250
†India, State of, [149] 706, 708;—Governor General of, 1267; Papers moved for [150] 1512
†Jews, 1R. [150] 1600; Com. 921, 926, 1074; 3R. 1260, 1264
†Joint-Stock Banking Companies, 2R. [151] 1352
†Kingston, Earl of, Question [150] 1597
†Land, Sale and Transfer of (Ireland), Com. cl. 89, [151] 1781
†Libel, 2R. [149] 980
†Liturgy, Revision of the, Commission moved for, [150] 173
†Local Government, 3R. add. cl. [151] 215, 2154
†Lucknow, Fall of, [149] 961
†Magistracy, The Irish, [149] 164
†Medals for the Army in India, [151] 911
†Metropolis Local Management, 2R. [151] 2154
†Ministerial Statement, [149] 22, 54
†Negro Regiments for India, [149] 459, 558
†Oaths, 2R. 1479; Com. cl. 5, [149] 1786; cl. 6, 1796; Report, [150] 1156, 1169, 1175; [151] 729; Consid. 1243, 1245, 1247, 1254; Reasons 4, Amend. 1255
†Oaths, Substitution, 1R. [150] 1600; 2R. [151] 693
†Organs, Barrel, Suppression, 2R. [149] 1930
†Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Papers moved for, [150] 232, 233, 325, 405, 413, 414, 415, 418; Res. 583, 645; Observations, 919, 920;—King of, [151] 1551
Parliamentary Reform, [148] 1120
†Passengers, Chinese, Act Amendment, 3R. [151] 994
†Patriotic Fund, Correspondence moved for, [149] 1258
†Poisons, Sale of, [149] 320, 1169; 2R. [150] 1507; Consid. [151] 913
Princess Royal, Marriage of the, Address moved, [148] 754
†Property, Law of, Amendment, 2R. [149] 453
†Property Qualification, 2R. [150] 1838, 1839; Com. 1918
†Queen's College (Cork), Notice of Motion withdrawn, [151] 2271

[cont.

DERBY, Earl of—cont.
†Reformatory Schools (Ireland), 2R. [151] 2005
Religious Worship Act Amendment, 2R. [148] 334, 347
†St. Paul's Churchyard, [151] 2283, 2285
†School Trustees, 2R. [151] 1667
Slave Trade, Alleged Revival of the, [148] 518
†Spiritual Destitution, Com. moved for, [149] 1561, 1566
†Telegraphic Communication with Europe and America, Correspondence moved for, [149] 1578, 1580, 1582
†Tenant Right (Ireland), [151] 913
†Transfer of Estates Simplification, [149] 855
†Universities (Scotland), [149] 850; 2R. [151] 1366; Com. cl. 1, 1675
†Wellington Monument, The, [151] 793

Derby Day, Adjournment over the,
c. Motion (Captain Vivian), [150] 865

DE ROS, Lord
Barrack Accommodation, Returns moved for, [149] 809
Oaths, Report, [150] 1185
Thames, State of the, [151] 393

DESART, Earl of
Oaths, Consideration of Report deferred, [151] 263

Designs, Registration of—Supply,
c. [151] 1420

DE VERE, Mr. J. E., Limerick Co.
Clerks of Petty Sessions (Ireland), 2R. [150] 2278
Dublin, Affray at, [149] 437
Incumbered Estates Court (Ireland), [149] 437
Judgments (Ireland) Act Amendment, Com. cl. 1, [151] 1961
Land, Sale and Transfer of (Ireland), [150] 43
Marriage Law Amendment, Com. [151] 669; cl. 4, 684
New Trial in Criminal Cases, 2R. [151] 1058
Reformatory Schools (Ireland), Com. cl. 7, [151] 1068
Roads (Scotland), Commission moved for, [151] 1162

Dhar, Principality of,
c. Question (Mr. J. B. Smith), [149] 574; [150] 1919

DILLWYN, Mr. L. L., Swansea
Aggravated Assaults, [151] 2036
Chelsea Bridge Act Amendment, 2R. [151] 791
Church Rates Abolition, Com. cl. 1, [149] 1463
Envelopes and Writing Paper, Drawback on, [150] 1610
Franchise Prisons, Leave, [149] 1650
Jews, 2R. [151] 1631
Kurrachee, Suppression of the Mutiny at, [150] 924
Oaths, Leave, [148] 479, 494; Com. Adj. moved [149] 299; That Baron de Rothschild, be a Member of the Committee, 349; Res. Amend. [150] 727
Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Res. Amend. [150] 727, 864; [cont.

DILLWYN, Mr. L. L.—cont.
1033; — Creditors of the State of, [151] 1930
Supply — Department of Science and Art, Amend. [151] 1201; —Patent Law, Fees, &c. 1416

Diplomatic Salaries and Pensions,
c. Res. (Mr. Wise), [149] 1496, [A. 114, N. 142, M. 28] 1525

DISRAELI, Rt. Hon. B., Buckinghamshire—[See also Chancellor of the Exchequer]
Address in Answer to the Speech, [148] 105
Ali Moorad's Claim—Mr. Butt, Com. moved for, [148] 860
Bank Acts, [148] 458; Com. moved for, Amend. 604, 663, 670
Bank Issues Indemnity, Leave, [148] 214
Conspiracy to Murder, Leave, [148] 1053; 2R. 1830
East India Loan, Leave, [148] 791
India, Government of, (No. 1), Leave, [148] 696
India—Transport of Troops to, Com. moved for, [148] 717, 718, 721, 725;—Vote of Thanks to the Army, &c., 865, 871; Previous Question moved, 890, 901, 916, 930
Princess Royal's Marriage, Address moved, [148] 761

DIVETT, Mr. E., Exeter
Australian Postal Service, [150] 2016
Excise, Salaries in, [148] 1167
Marriage Law Amendment, Leave, [149] 607
Rewards to Members, Res. [151] 183

Divorce Act,
c. Question (Mr. Lygon), [148] 1261

Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Act Amendment Bill,
l. 1R.* [150] 227;
2R. 579;
Re-com. 2000;
Report, Amend. (Lord Redesdale), 2194;
3R. [151] 157
c. 1R.* [151] 265;
Question (Mr. Hadfield), 1785, 1931;
2R. 2056; 3R.* 2105
l. Commons Amends. [151] 2302
Royal Assent, 2369

Divorce, Court of,
c. Question (Mr. Ayrton), [149] 1492

DOBBS, Mr. W. C., Carrickfergus
Conspiracy to Murder (Ireland), Leave, [150] 882
Endowed Schools (Ireland), Res. [151] 635
Land, Sale and Transfer of (Ireland), Leave, [150] 42; Com. cl. 3, [151] 58; cl. 33, Amend. 63; cl. 51, 371; cl. 87, 970
Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Res. [149] 751

Dockyard Officers,
c. Question (Sir J. Elphinstone), [149] 813; (Mr. Wilson) [151] 1085

Dodson, Mr. J. G., Sussex, E.
Budget, The—Financial Statement, [149] 1306, 1327
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Consid. cl. 1, [151] 2059
Harbours of Refuge, [151] 1746; Commission moved for, [151] 2145
Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Res. [149] 745

Donegal, Destitution in,
c. Com. moved for (Mr. Bagwell), [149] 1525, [A. 147, N. 111, M. 36] 1543

Donoughmore, Earl of, (Paymaster of the Forces and Vice President of the Board of Trade)
"Candace," Wreck of the, [151] 2104
Civil Bills, &c. (Ireland), Com. Amend. [151] 2270
Commissioners for Exhibition (1851) [151] 1075
Copyright, Law of, Com. moved for [151] 2093
Divorce and Matrimonial Causes, Recom. [150] 2002
Excise Duties, 3R. [150] 328
India, Telegraphic Communication with, [151] 2290
Joint-Stock Companies Act Amendment, 2R. [151] 916
Kerry County, Assistant Barrister of, [150] 1587, 2096
Land, Sale and Transfer of (Ireland), Com. cl. 68, [151] 1781
Land, Transfer of, 2R. [149] 567; 3R. [150] 421
Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Res. [150] 633
Passing Tolls—Shipping Dues, [149] 789
Private Bills, Com. moved for, [151] 6
Victoria Station and Pimlico Railway, Motion for Counsel, [151] 586, 589, 693; Standing Order dispensed with, 797

Drafts on Bankers Law Amendment Bill
c. 1R.* [150] 1303; 2R.* 1849; Consid. [151] 2052; 3R. Amend. (Mr. Nicoll), 2076; Amend. withdrawn, 2077
l. 1R.* [151] 2077; 2R. 2161; 3R.* 2243
Royal Assent, 2369

Drainage, Main, of London—Supply,
c. Amend. (Mr. Cox), [151] 1426; Amend. withdrawn, 1429

Drainage of the Metropolis,
c. Question (Mr. Laurie), [148] 545; (Mr. Adderley), 552; (Mr. C. S. Butler), [150] 333; —see Metropolis Local Management Act Amendment Bill—Sewage—Thames, State of the Drummond, Mr. H., Surrey, W.

Agricultural Statistics, 2R. [149] 1893
Church Rates Abolition, 2R. [148] 1568; 3R. Adj. moved, [150] 1402, 1403
Commissioners for Exhibition (1851), 2R. [150] 2263; Com. cl. 2, [151] 96

[cont.

Drummond, Mr. H.—cont.
Donegal, Destitution in, Com. moved for, [149] 1541
Government, Policy of the, [149] 218
India, Government of, Com. Res. 3, [150] 1648
India—Transport of Troops to, Com. moved for, [148] 720;—Vote of Thanks to the Army, &c., 925; Amended Res. [149] 253
Jews, 2R. [151] 1628
Joint-Stock Banking Companies, Leave, [148] 1181, 1184; 2R. [150] 536
Lunatics under the Court of Chancery, Com. moved for, [151] 219
Marriage Law Amendment, 2R. [150] 132
Navy Estimates, [149] 918
Oaths, Consid. [149] 508; Lords' Amends., That Baron de Rothschild be a Member of the Committee, [150] 438
Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Res. [150] 1029
Paper Duty, Res. [151] 132
Property Qualification, Com. [150] 1426; 3R. 1507
Slave Trade—Right of Search, Res. [151] 1344
Suez, Isthmus of, Canal, Res. [150] 1398
Western Bank of Scotland, [149] 1216, 1219

Dublin—Affray at,
l. Observations (Earl of Roden), [149] 170
c. Question (Mr. Grogan), [149] 172; (The O'Donoghoe), 436; (Mr. De Vere), 437; (Mr. Vance), 574; Report moved for (Mr. Hatchell), 669; Adj. moved (Mr. Spooner), 689; Motion withdrawn, 702

Dublin and London, Communication between,
l. Question (Viscount Dungannon), [148] 969; [149] 1098
c. Question (Mr. Serjeant Deasy), [149] 1171; (Mr. H. Herbert), [150] 921

Dublin Metropolitan Police,
c. Com. moved for (Mr. Grogan), [148] 1473, [A. 115, N. 200, M. 95] 1477; Question (Mr. Grogan), [149] 574; (Mr. Esmonde), [150] 21

Dublin Port Dues,
c. Com. moved for (Mr. Vance), [149] 1356

Du Cane, Mr. C., Essex, N.
Agricultural Statistics, 2R. [149] 1882
County Franchise, 2R. Previous Question moved, [150] 1860

Duff, Mr. M. G., Elgin, &c.
Austria and the Porte, [151] 607
Belgrade, Outrage at—Consul Fonblanque, [151] 394
Danubian Principalities, Address moved, [150] 83
Harbours of Refuge, Com. [148] 1360; [151] 1748; Commission moved for, 2148
India, Government of (No. 1), Leave, [148] 1381
Passport System in France, Correspondence moved for, [149] 601
Supply—Harbours of Refuge, [150] 1123;—British Museum, 1573;—Board of Fisheries (Scotland), [151] 1418
Universities (Scotland), 2R. [150] 1902; Com. cl. 1, [151] 403

DUKE, Sir J., London
Joint-Stock Banking Companies, 2R. [149] 1919

DUNBAR, Sir W., Wigton, &c.
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Com. cl. 1, [151] 1602
Joint-Stock Banking Companies, 2R. [150] 537
Metropolis Local Management Com. [151] 1928
Sheriffs (Scotland), [151] 2190
Supply—County Courts, [150] 1486;—Nonconforming, &c., Ministers (Ireland), [151] 1280;—General Register House (Edinburgh), 1637
Universities (Scotland), 2R. [150] 1892; Com. cl. 1, [151] 397; cl. 13, 735; Consid. add. cl. 949

DUNCAN, Viscount, Forfarshire
Edinburgh Annuity Tax, 2R. [150] 2188
Health, Public, Com. cl. 4, [150] 2281, 2284
Lands, Valuation of (Scotland), Act Amendment 2R. Amend. [149] 659
Ordnance Survey Commission, [150] 335
Police Courts (Metropolis), [150] 1487
Roads (Scotland), Leave, [149] 159
Sheriffs Courts (Scotland), [150] 1611
Slave Trade—Right of Search, [151] 1084
Supply—Prosecutions, [150] 1468;—County Courts. Amend. 1475, 1477, 1479, 1484, 1486
Under Secretary of State for Scotland, Res. [150] 2140
Universities (Scotland), 2R. [150] 1900
Weedon Establishment, Commission moved for, [150] 1801

DUNCOMBE, Hon. Rear Adm. A., Yorkshire E. Riding
Navy Estimates, [149] 1339, 1646
Navy, Manning the, Com. moved for, Amend. [150] 894, 1612, 1613

DUNCOMBE, Mr. T. S., Finsbury
Ali Moorad's Claim—Mr. Butt, Com. moved for, [148] 1860
Breach of Privilege—Washington Wilks, [150] 1065
Church Rates, [148] 677
Conspiracy to Murder, Leave, [148] 979
Corrupt Practices Prevention, [148] 677; Consid. add. cl. [151] 2025; cl. 1, 2031, 2057; 3R. 2119
Health, Public, Lords' Amends., Amend. [151] 2275
Jenner, Dr., Statue of, [150] 354
Jews, 3R. [151] 1893
Local Government, Com. cl. 66, Amend. [151] 1076
Medical Practitioners, Com. [150] 1418; Amend. [151] 994; cl. 3, Amend. 996, 997
Medical Profession and Medical Corporations, 2R. [150] 1421
Metropolis Local Management, Consid. cl. 1, [151] 2052
Naples, Relations with, [151] 2375
National Gallery—Opening on Saturdays, [151] 1867, 2373
Oaths, Com. [149] 297, 298, 302, 304; Consid. 517; Lords' Amends. [150] 347; That

[cont.

DUNCOMBE, Mr. T. S.—cont.
Baron de Rothschild be a Member of the Committee, 348, 353; Lords' Amends., Amend. [151] 1903, 1904
Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Res. [150] 1030
Parliamentary Reform, [149] 1174
Patent Law Amendment, 2R. [150] 516, 517, 519
Poor Law (Metropolis), 2R. [150] 514
Rothschild, Baron de, Res. [148] 976, 977, 978
Sculpture in the Public Parks, [149] 174
Supply — General Board of Health, Amend. [151] 1281, 1282
Thames, State of the, Res. [151] 1168
Tower Hamlets Militia, [151] 1699

DUNDAS, Mr. G., Linlithgow
County Voters (Scotland), Registration of, 2R. Amend. [149] 2005, 2008; Com. Amend. [150] 2190
Lands, Valuation of, (Scotland) Act Amendment, 2R. [149] 660
Supply—General Register House, Edinburgh, [150] 1496, 1498

DUNGANNON, Viscount
Belfast, Riots in, [150] 1591, 1595
Camberwell, Vicarage of—Law of Sequestration, [151] 8
Church of England, Political Services of the, Address moved [151] 501
Church of England Special Services, 2R. [148] 856, 857; Com. 1461; cl. 1, 1463; 3R. [149] 457; [151] 2096
Dublin and Holyhead, Communication between, [148] 969; [149] 1098, 1099
Forms of Prayer — State Services, Address moved, [151] 1663
Glebe Houses, Dilapidations in, [151] 1148, 1150
India, Transport of Troops to, Correspondence moved for, [148] 448, 1719
Jews, 2R. [151] 725; 3R. 1258
Kingston, Earl of—Questions, [150] 1599
Marriage Law Amendment, 2R. [151] 1979
Oaths, Com. cl. 5, [149] 1789; [150] 2220
Organs, Barrel, Suppression of, [149] 1352; 2R. 1929
Paris, English Church in, [150] 247
Reformatory Schools (Ireland), 2R. [151] 2007
Religious Worship Act Amendment, [148] 135
Spiritual Destitution, Com. moved for, [149] 1569

DUNKELLIN, Lord, Galway
Galway Freemen Disfranchisement, Com. cl. 1, [151] 601
India, Government of, Com. Res. 3, [150] 1680
India, Government of (No. 3), Com. cl. 7, [151] 468
Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Res. [150] 801
Supply—Queen's Colleges (Ireland), [151] 1237

DUNLOP, Mr. A. M., Greenock
Clyde Navigation, Consid. [151] 506, 666, 667
India, Government of, Com. Res. 3, [150] 1989; Res. 6, 2249
India, Government of (No. 3), Consid. add. cl. [151] 1030
Land, Titles to (Scotland), [149] 575

[cont.

DUNLOP, Mr. A. M.—cont.
Land, Transfer of (Scotland), [148] 1733
Lands, Valuation of (Scotland) Act Amendment, 2R. [149] 652, 668
Limerick City, New Writ moved, [150] 336
Marriage Law Amendment, Com. [151] 668, 670; cl. 4, Amend. 683
Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Res. [150] 1018, 1034
Sasines, Registrar of (Scotland), [148] 554
Spirituous Liquors, Sale of (Scotland) Act, [151] 1189
Supply—County Courts, [150] 1479;—General Register House, Edinburgh, 1496
Under Secretary of State for Scotland, Res. [150] 2146
Universities (Scotland), 2R. [150] 1894; Com. cl. 2, [151] 413; cl. 4, Amend. 414, 507, 509, 512, 514; cl. 7, Amend. 515; cl. 10, 517; cl. 13, 732, 736; cl. 15, 743, 744; Consid. add. cl. 950, 951, 954, 955; cl. 7, 958; cl. 14, 960; 3R. 1050; Lords' Amends. Amend. 2128, 2136

DURHAM, Bishop of Ecclesiastical Commission Report, [151] 988

Durham County Palatine Jurisdiction Bill
c. 1R.* [149] 1583;
2R. [150] 221;
Com. 2279; 3R.* [151] 83
l. 1R.* [151] 154; 2R.* 691; 3R.* 975;
Royal Assent, 1967

Durham, Patronage of the See of,
l. Question (Lord Ravensworth), [150] 1269
c. Question (Lord A. Vane-Tempest), [150] 1855

DUTTON, Hon. R. H. Hampshire, S.
Government Property—Exemption from Rates, Com. moved for, [150] 1798

EAST, Sir J. B., Winchester
Cruelty to Animals, 2R. [149] 1557

East India Company's Petition,
l. Question (Earl of Granville), [148] 808; (Earl Grey), 1121
c. (Mr. T. Baring), [148] 970

East India Loan Bill,
c. Leave, [148] 780; 1R. 803;
2R. 933
Com. 1870;
cl. 1, Amend. (Mr. Lindsay), 1891; Amend. neg. 1892
Consid. [149] 15, 72, 141; add. cl. (Sir H. Willoughby), 148;
3R. 176
l. 1R.* [149] 163;
2R. 239;
3R. 404
Royal Assent, 445

East Indies—see India

EBRINGTON, Viscount, Marylebone
Army Estimates, [150] 394
Army, Sanitary Condition of the, Res. [150] 473, 495;—Kitchens for the, 921
Health, Public, Com. cl. 4, [150] 2282
Metropolis Local Management, 2R. [151] 1740; Com. 1925; cl. 1, 1943; cl. 2, 1945; 3R. 2075
Private Bills, Res. [150] 470
Thames, State of the, Res. [151] 578

EBURY, Lord
Church of England, Political Services of the, Address moved [151] 487
Corrupt Practices Prevention, 2R. [151] 2167; Com. cl. 1, Amend. 2245
Forms of Prayer—State Services, Address moved, [151] 1663
*Liturgy, Revision of the, Commission moved for, [150] 148, 177
Medical Practitioners, Com. [151] 1783
Property Qualification, 2R. [150] 1837
Thames, State of the, [151] 392

Ecclesiastical Commission,
c. Question (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen), [148] 137

Ecclesiastical Commission Bill
l. 1R. [149] 1108;
2R. [150] 1;
Rep. [151] 975; Amend. (Lord Ravensworth), 987, [Contents 12, Not-Contents 38, M. 26] 991;
add. cl. (Bishop of Oxford), 991; cl. withdrawn, 992;
3R. Amend. (Lord St. Leonards), 1153; Amend. withdrawn, 1154
c. 1R.* [151] 1266; 2R.* 1785;
Bill put off, 2127

Ecclesiastical Commissioners—Supply,
c. [151] 1399, [A. 67, N. 61, M. 6] 1402

Ecclesiastical Corporations Aggregate (Estates) Bill
l. 1R.* [149] 1252; 2R.* [150] 1

Ecclesiastical Corporations Leasing Bill,
c. 1R.* [150] 108; 2R.* 673; 3R.* 1447
l. 1R.* [150] 1507; 2R.* [151] 1146; 3R.* 1447
Royal Assent, 1967

Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction Continuance Bill.
c. 1R.* [151] 1266; 2R.* 1369; 3R.* 1590
l. 1R.* [151] 1655; 2R.* 1773; 3R.* 1906
Royal Assent, 1967

Ecclesiastical Residences (Ireland) Bill,
c. 1R.* [148] 1083;
2R. 1552

Edinburgh, &c., Annuity Tax,
c. Leave, [149] 444; 1R.* 460;
2R. [150] 2157; Amend. (Mr. Blackburn), 2176; [o. q. A. 129, N. 130, M. 1] 2189

Education (England),
c. Address moved (Sir John Pakington), [148] 1184; Amend. (Mr. Hadfield), 1210; Amend. withdrawn, 1248, [A. 110, N. 49, M. 61] ib.; Her Majesty Answer, 1372; Papers moved for (Mr. Cowper), [151] 2278

Education, Charitable Grants for,
l. Observations (Earl of Powis), [149] 809

Education Regulations (Army) India,
c. Observations (Mr. Fagan), [149] 424

Education—Supply,
c. [151] 135; Amend. (Mr. Black), 150; Amend. withdrawn, 152

Education (Ireland)—The National System,
l. Question (Marquess of Clanricarde), [149] 401

Educational Estimates,
c. Question (Mr. M. Gibson), [150] 1197

EDWARDS, Major H., Beverley
Justice, Administration of, Com. moved for, [149] 1813
Ladies' Gallery, The, [150] 1920; [151] 1611, 1612
Property Qualification, 2R. [150] 225
Supply—New Houses of Parliament, [150] 1203

EGERTON, Sir P. de M. G., Cheshire, S.
Supply—British Museum, [150] 1573

EGERTON, Mr. E. C, Macclesfield
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Com. add. cl. [151] 1604

EGERTON, Mr. W. T., Cheshire, N.
Commissioners for Exhibition, (1851), Com. cl. 1, [151] 87
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Com. cl. 1, [151] 1498
India, Government of (No. 3), Com. cl. 14, [151] 867
New Trial in Criminal Cases, 2R. [151] 1064
Private Bills, Res. [150] 471

EGLINTON, Earl of
Address in Answer to the Speech, [148] 80
Bank Issues Indemnity, 1R. [148] 410

ELCHO, Lord, Haddingtonshire
Agricultural Statistics, 2R. [149] 1918
Ali Moorad's Claim—Mr. Butt, Com. moved for, [148] 1864
Army Estimates, [150] 382, 385, 386, 388
Army Regulations, [151] 2360
Bath, Order of the, [151] 2360
Cantillon, Legacy to—Will of Napoleon I. [148] 1275
Commissioners for Exhibition (1851), 2R. [150] 2265; Consid., [151] 315
Conspiracy to Murder, Leave, [148] 955

ELCHO, Lord—cont.
County Franchise (Scotland), Leave, [150] 214
County Voters (Scotland), Registration of, 2R. [149] 2006
Green Park, Improvements in the, [149] 1186
India, British Troops in, [151] 1190
Jenner, Dr., Statue of, [150] 275
Lands, Valuation of, (Scotland) Act Amendment, 2R. [149] 661
Local Government, 2R. [149] 2097
Marble Arch, The, [149] 1266
Medical Practitioners, Leave, [149] 651; Com. [150] 1419; Lords' Amends. [151] 2278
Navy Estimates [149] 1340, 1346
Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Res [150] 821
Pictures, National Collection of, [149] 985
Roads (Scotland), Leave, [149] 156; 2R. 1920, 1921
Roads (Scotland), Commission moved for, [151] 1155
Scotch Universities, [148] 1472
Supply—British Museum, [150] 1572, 1583;—Department of Science and Art, [151] 1175, 1178, 1202;—National Gallery, Report, 1380; Amend. 1385
Thames, State of the, [151] 39
Universities (Scotland), Leave, [149] 1549; 2R. [150] 1909; Com. cl. 1, [151] 406, 412; cl. 10, 520; cl. 14, 737; cl. 15, 742; 3R. 1050; Lords' Amends. 2133
Wellington Monument, Res. [151] 2232, 2305

Election Committees Scrutiny Bill,
c. 1R.* [150] 426;
2R. [151] 245; Amend. (Mr. Warren), 248, [o. q. A. 87, N. 125, M. 38] 251

Election Petitions,
c. Question (Mr. Steuart), [148] 459

Elections, Corrupt Practices at,
c. Question (Mr. H. Berkeley), [148] 1262;—See Corrupt Practices Prevention Act Continuance Bill.

ELLENBOROUGH, Earl of (†President of the Board of Control)
Address in Answer to the Speech, [148] 61, 65, 69, 70
†Annexation of Native States, [150] 327
†Canning's, Lord, Proclamation—Confiscation of Land in Oude, [150] 147, 148; Papers moved for, 228, 229, 230, 231, 240, 323, 324, 325, 407; Res. 600, 919, 920
†Cawnpore Massacre, The [149] 2097, 2098
Competitive Examination for the Civil Service, [150] 1697
†East India Company's Petition, [148] 1150
East India Loan, 2R. [149] 239; 3R. 414, 419
Hearsey, Major General, [148] 235
India—Arms and Press Acts, Papers moved for, [148] 237, 251, 252, 255, 267, 268;—Punishment of Mutineers, 1360;—Education, Papers moved for, 1723
†India—Vote of Thanks to the Civil Service, &c. Amend. Res. [149] 243;—State of, 703, 704;—Government of, 1351;—Report moved for, 1962, 1977; Papers moved for, [151] 4 M

ELLENBOROUGH, Earl of—cont.
2151;—Public Accounts in, [149] 2009;—Christianity in, 2117
India, Government of (No. 3), 2R. [151] 1471; Com. cl. 8, 1579; cl. 9, Amend. 1580; cl. 11, Amend. ib.; cl. 12, 1582, 1584; cl. 15, 1586; cl. 22, ib.; cl. 27, 1587; cl. 32, 1588; cl. 33, 1589; cl. 34, 1679, 1687, 1688; cl. 41, 1691; cl. 52, Amend. ib., 1692; cl. 54, 1694, 1695; add. cl. 1698; Rep. Amend. 1783, 1784; 3R. cl. 29, 2008; That the Bill do pass, 2016; Commons' Reasons, 2263
Meerut, Mutiny at, Explanation, [148] 131
Militia, Embodied, Returns moved for, [148] 1592
†Negro Regiment for India, [149] 556, 558
Obscene Books, Sale of, Prevention, Return moved for, [148] 227
†Oude, Kingdom of, [149] 1923
Religious Worship Act Amendment, [148] 133, 135
Resignation of, [150] 409, 414, 415

ELLESMERE, Earl of,
Oaths, Report, [150] 1170

ELLICE, Rt. Hon. E., Coventry
Green Park, Improvements in the, [149] 1191
Incumbered Estates Court (Ireland), [149] 442
India, Government of, (No. 2) [149] 866
India, Government of, Com. Res. 2, [149] 2203; [150] 301, 313, 317; Res. 3, (4), 319, 1956, 1982; Res. 6, 2251
Military Organization, [151] 570
New Caledonia, Government of, 2R. [151] 1113
Supply—New Public Offices (Belfast), [151] 1424
Universities (Scotland), Com. cl. 1, [151] 408
Western Bank of Scotland, [149] 1200, 1204

ELLICE, Mr. E., St. Andrews
County Franchise (Scotland), Leave, [150] 208
Marriage Law Amendment, Com. cl. 2, [151] 683
Roads, &c., (Scotland), 2R. [149] 1920
Supply—Commissioners of Lunacy (Scotland), [150] 1263
Under Secretary of State for Scotland, Res. [150] 2130
Universities, (Scotland), 2R. [150] 1902; Com. cl. 7, 1515; cl. 13, 730, 733; cl. 14, 738; cl. 15, 747; Consid. cl. 7, 958; cl. 14, 959, 961; cl. 19, 965

ELLIOT, Hon. J. E., Roxburghshire
Breach of Privilege—Washington Wilks, [150] 1324, 1405
India—Government of, (No. 1), Leave, [148] 1455
India, Government of, (No. 2), Leave, [149] 833
India, Government of, (No. 3) Com. cl. 9, [151] 774; cl. 12, 785; add. cl. 939, 940
India—Vote of Thanks to the Civil Service, &c., Amended Res. [149] 258
Joint-Stock Banking Companies, Leave, [148] 1182
Mutiny, 2R. [149] 268

Elliot, Mr., Absconding of—see Wedon, Establishment at,

Ellis, Mr., Murder of—The Cormacks,
c. Question (Mr. Brady) [150] 1311; (The O'Donoghoe) [151] 16, 1194, 1785

ELPHINSTONE, Sir J. D. H., Portsmouth
Civil Service Superannuation Commissioners, [150] 922
Dockyards, &c., Officers in the, [149] 813
Government Property—Exemption from Rates, Com. moved for, [150] 1797
Harbours of Refuge, [151] 1747; Commission moved for, 2150
Havelock's, Sir H., Pension, [148] 572
India, Colonisation of, Com. moved for, [149] 281
India, Government of, (No. 1), Leave, [148] 1328
India, Government of, (No. 3), Com. cl. 12, [151] 789; cl. 13, 864
India—Transport of Troops to, Com. moved for, [148] 735;—Reinforcements for [151] 2037
Jeddah, Outrage at, [151] 1931
Lands, Valuation of, (Scotland) Act Amendment 2R. [149] 667
Malacca, Straits of, Correspondence moved for, [149] 993
Navy Estimates, [149] 127, 131, 938, 1235, 1247, 1344, 1636, 1639
Oude—The Proclamation, [150] 863
Suez, Isthmus of, Canal, Res. [150] 1400
Universities (Scotland), Com. cl. 1, [151] 408

ELTON, Sir A. H., Bath
Ballot, Leave, [150] 1752
Church Rates Abolition, 2R. [148] 1566; Com. cl. 1, Amend. [149] 1455, 1464; add. cl. [150] 571, 572, 575
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Com. cl. 1, [151] 1594
Health, Public, Act Amendment, Leave, [148] 502
Health, Public, Com. cl. 4, [150] 2282
Lunatics under the Court of Chancery, Com. moved for, [151] 215
Local Government, 2R. [149] 2096
Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Res. [150] 974

Embassies and Missions Abroad—Supply,
c. Amend. (Mr. Wise), [151] 1270, [A. 55, N. 85, M. 30] 1274; 2nd. Amend. [A. 69, N. 81, M. 12] 1275

Embassy Houses abroad—Supply,
c. [150] 1120;—at Paris, [151] 1438, [A. 113, N. 51, M. 62] 1441

Emblements, &c. (Ireland) Bill,
c. 1R.* [151] 994

Emigration Board—Supply,
c. [151] 1270

Endowed Schools (Ireland),
l. Observations (Earl of Cork) [149] 2104
c. Question (Mr. Greer), [148] 137; (Mr. Grogan), [149] 460; Return moved for (Mr. Black), 782; Question (Mr. Bagwell), [150] 428; Res. (Mr. Kirk), [151] 624; Motion withdrawn, 636

Endowed Schools Law Amendment Bill,
c. 1R.* [151] 994

Enfield Rifle, The,
c. Question (Gen. Codrington), [149] 1797; (Col. Williams), [150] 2111; (Col. Sykes), [151] 605

ENNIS, Mr. J., Athlone
Land, Sale and Transfer of (Ireland), Com. cl. 88, Amend. [151] 972

Envelopes and Writing Paper, Drawback on,
c. Question (Mr. Dillwyn), [150] 1610

Epping Forest, Encroachments on,
c. Question (Mr. Hanbury), [151] 1613

Equitable Councils of Conciliation Bill,
c. 1R.* [151] 2302

ESMONDE, Mr. J., Waterford Co.
Consular Service, Com. moved for, [149] 553
Dublin Police Force, [150] 21
Excise Duties, 2R. [149] 1745
India, Colonisation of, Nomination of Com. [149] 553
Land, Sale and Transfer of (Ireland) Com. cl. 87, [151] 970
Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Res. [149] 741

ESTCOURT, Rt. Hon. T. H. S., (†Chief Commissioner of the Poor Law), Wiltshire, N.
Ali Moorad's Claim—Mr. Butt, Com. moved for, [148] 1864
†Ballot, Leave, [150] 1748
†Friendly Societies, [151] 1182
†Health, Public, Com. cl. 4, [150] 2281
†Insurance and Assurance Institutions, 2R. Amend. [150] 2192; [151] 1066
†Lancashire and Yorkshire, &c. Railway Companies, Consid. [150] 1605, 1705
†Patent Law Amendment, 2R. [150] 520
†Poor Law Amendment, Com. cl. 2, [149] 2001, 2002, 2003; Consid. [150] 575
†Poor Law Medical Officers, [151] 1503
†Poor Law (Metropolis), 2R. Amend. [150] 503, 512
†Poor Law System of Medical Relief, [150] 1854
†Poor Rates (Metropolis), Leave, [149] 635
†Poor, Relief of the, [150] 1499
†Poor Removal, Com. moved for, [150] 1914, 1915
†Poor Removal Law Amendment, [151] 1183; Bill withdrawn, 1431
†Supply—County Courts, [150] 1480
†Wight, Isle of—Poor Law in, [149] 2014
†Workhouses, Metropolitan, Com. moved for [150] 107
†Working Classes, Condition of the, Com. moved for, [149] 343

Estimates, The,
c. Observations (Captain Vivian), [149] 1602

EVANS, Lieut. Gen. Sir De L., Westminster
Army Estimates, [149] 817, 818
Bank Acts Committee, Nomination of Com. [148] 966, 967
Bray's Traction Engine, [151] 1285, 2305
Cape of Good Hope Garrison, [149] 711;—German Corps at, [151] 10
Captains in the Army, Address moved, [150] 1100
Estimates, The, [149] 1612, 1621
Howden, Lord, Recall of, [149] 1331
India, Government of (No. 3), Com. cl. 32, [151] 900; Lords' Amend. cl. 34, Amend. 2202, 2334
India—Transport of Troops, Com. moved for, [148] 715, 717, 718, 720, 721, 723, 733; [150] 2113; [151] 1872, 1876, 2041
Indian Army, Vote of Thanks to, [148] 140, 920; Amended Res. [149] 255; Future Control of, [151] 870
London Corporation, Leave, [148] 744
London Corporation, Reform of the, [148] 552
Mauritius, Troops for the, [151] 1182
Metropolis Local Management, Com. [151] 1926
Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Res. [150] 1029
Supply—Embassies and Missions abroad, [151] 1273

EVANS, Mr. T. W., Derbyshire, S.
"Cagliari," Case of the, [149] 1988
Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Res. [149] 760
New Trial in Criminal Cases, 2R. [151] 1057
Supply—Non-conforming, &c., Ministers (Ireland), [151] 1280

Evidence, Law of, Amendment Bill,
l. 1R.* [149] 305

Evidence on Oath (Private Bill Committees) Bill,
c. 1R.* [151] 1481

EWART, Mr. J. C., Liverpool
Consular Service, Com. moved for, [149] 553
Joint-Stock Banks, [148] 369, 375
Joint-Stock Banking Companies, Leave, [148] 1184; 2R. [150] 553
Lighthouses, &c., Address moved, [149] 1141
Navy Estimates, [149] 1247
Stamp Duty on Drafts, 2R. [149] 2175; Com. cl. 2, [150] 289
Suez, Isthmus of, Canal, Res. [150] 1384, 1385

EWART, Mr. W., Dumfries, &c.
Business of the House, [149] 79, 176
"Cagliari," Capture of the, [149] 95
Commissioners for Exhibition (1851), 2R. [150] 2266
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Com. cl. 1, [151] 1600
Exchequer Bonds, 2R. [149] 2170
Funded Debt, Com. [151] 550
India, Colonisation of, Com. moved for, [149] 269, 279, 292, 553, 555
India, Government of, Com. moved for, [149] 1694
India, Government of (No. 3), Com. cl. 11, [151] 781

EWART, Mr. W.—cont.
India, Reinforcements for, [151] 2032
Justice, Department of, [148] 1168, 1734; [149] 815; [151] 1184
Kensington Gardens, [149] 983
Land, Titles to (Scotland), [151] 1505
Mutiny, 2R. [149] 267
New Trial in Criminal Cases, 2R. [151] 1059
Private Bills, Res. [149] 471
Supply—Lord Advocate, &c. (Scotland), [150] 1491;—Education, [151] 140;—Department of Science and Art, 1202;—National Gallery, Report, 1385;—Gallery of Portraits, 1423
Thibet, [149] 1180
Under Secretary of State (Scotland), Res. [150] 2125
York, Deanery of, [150] 1522

EWING, Mr. H. E. C., Paisley
Universities (Scotland), Lords' Amends. [151] 2132
Western Bank of Scotland, [149] 1219

EXCHEQUER, CHANCELLOR OF THE — See CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER

Exchequer Bills—Supply,
c. [149] 1227

Exchequer Bills (£20,911,500) Bill,
c. 1R.* [149] 1424; 2R.* 1486; 3R.* 1653
l. 1R.* [149] 1749; 2R.* 1921; 3R.* 2097
Royal Assent, [150] 403

Exchequer Bonds—Supply,
c. [149] 1338

Exchequer Bonds (£2,000,000) Bill,
c. 1R.* [149] 1583;
2R. 2120; 3R.* [150] 108
l. 1R.* [150] 147; 2R.* 227; 3R.* 323
Royal Assent, 403

Exchequer, Comptroller General of—Supply,
c. [150] 1131

Excise Duties Bill,
c. 1R.* [149] 1424;
2R. 1743; Amend. (Mr. P. O'Brien), 1745, [o. q. A. 227, N. 35, M. 192] 1748;
3R. 2010
l. 1R.* [149] 2097; 2R.* [150] 147;
3R. 327
Royal Assent, 403

Excise, Salaries in the,
c. Question (Mr. Divett), [148] 1167

Executors, Confirmation of, Bill,
c. 1R.* [149] 2118; 2R.* [150] 1022; 3R.* [151] 503
l. 1R.* [151] 586;
2R. 1152;
Com. cl. 3, 1353;
3R.* 1447
Royal Assent, 1967

EXETER, Marquess of (Lord Steward)
Church of England, Political Services of the, Her Majesty's Answer to Address, [151] 691

EXETER, Bishop of
Church of England Special Services, 2R. [148] 857
Marriage Law Amendment, 2R. [151] 1994, 1995
Spiritual Destitution, Com. moved for, [149] 1558

Factories Bill,
c. 1R.* [151] 1785

Factories, Inspectors of—Supply,
c. [150] 1250

FAGAN, Mr. W. T., Cork City
Ali Moorad's Claim—Mr. Butt, Com. moved for, Amend. [148] 1859, 1865, 1867
Budget, The—Financial Statement, [149] 1301
Education Regulations (Army) India, [149] 424
India, Government of (No. 3), Com. add. cl. [151] 941, 945
Navy Estimates, [149] 1645
Queen's Colleges (Ireland), [151] 930
Supply—Department of Science and Art, [151] 1180
Trinity College (Dublin), [151] 753, 754

FALKLAND, Viscount
India—Vote of Thanks to the Civil Service, Army and Navy, [148] 851

Falkland Islands—Supply,
c. [151] 1268

False Pretences, Law of, Amendment Bill
l. 1R.* [150] 1829; 2R.* 2088; 3R.* [151] 1
c. 1R.* [151] 1266; 2R.* 1599; 3R.* 1785
l. Royal Assent, [151] 1967

FARQUHAR, Sir W. M. T., Hertford
Havelock, Major General, Pension to, Rep. [148] 415
Inglis, Major General, [151] 2355
Local Government, 2R. [149] 2097; Com. cl. 9, Amend. [151] 171
Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, [150] 528
Property Qualification, Com. [350] 1430

Female Children, Protection of, Bill,
l. 1R.* [150] 1;
2R. 249; 3R.* 919
c. 1R.* 2157;
2R. [151] 686

FENWICK, Mr. H., Sunderland
Harbours of Refuge, [148] 359
Stade Dues, The, [148] 468

Fernando Po, Religious Bigotry in,
c. Question (Mr. Stapleton), [151] 2273

Finance,
c. Question (Sir H. Willoughby), [148] 424

Financial Statement—The Budget,
c. Res. (Chancellor of the Exchequer), [149] 1267

FINLAY, Mr. A. S., Argyleshire
Joint-Stock Banking Companies, 2R. [150] 536; Com. cl. 3, 1910
Lands, Valuation of (Scotland) Act Amendment, 2R. [149] 660
Roads (Scotland), Commission moved for [151] 1162
Universities (Scotland), Com. cl. 13, [151] 733
Western Bank of Scotland, [149] 1217

Finsbury Park,
c. Question (Mr. Cox), [149] 1186

Fire Insurance,
c. Question (Mr. Hadfield), [151] 1398

Firework Manufactories,
c. Question (Mr. Bowyer), [151] 1499; Mr. Laurie), [151] 1933

Fisheries,
c. Papers moved for (Sir G. Pechell), [150] 215

FITZGERALD, Rt. Hon. J. D. (†Attorney General for Ireland), Ennis
Belfast, Riots at, [150] 1334
British Bank, The Royal, Return moved for, [149] 398
Browne, Colonel and Mr. O'Ferrall, [151] 1608
Cashel Election—Petition [149] 161, 247
Chancery Amendment, Leave, [149] 1166
Civil Bills, &c. (Ireland) Act Amendment, 2R. [151] 1547; Com. cl. 2, 1770, 1772; 3R. 2047
Clerks of Petty Sessions (Ireland), Com. [149] 1169
Commerce, Tribunals of, Com. moved for, [149] 1154
Conway and Ryan, Fathers, Prosecution of, [149] 1591
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Com. cl. 1, [151] 1488; Consid. add. cl. 2028
Dublin, Affray at, Report moved for, [149] 680, 682, 685, 697
Galway Freemen Disfranchisement, Leave, [149] 391; Com. 1416; [151] 594; cl. 1, 1599
Hudson's Bay Company, Res. [151] 1841
†Incumbered Estates (Ireland), [148] 1262; [149] 438, 442
Insurance and Assurance, 2R. [151] 1067
Judgments (Ireland) Act Amendment, Com. cl. 1, [151] 1960, 1961
Juries (Ireland) 2R. [149] 2008
Land, Sale and Transfer of (Ireland), Leave, [150] 38; 2R. 1060; Com. Amend. [150] 1538, 1569, 2106
Legitimacy Declaration, Com. cl. 1, [151] 1541
Lunacy Commission (Ireland) [151] 2036
Moore's, Mr. Cecil, Appointment, [150] 1920; Res. [151] 636, 661, 665

[cont.

FITZGERALD, Rt. Hon. J. D.—cont.
New Trial in Criminal Cases, 2R. [151] 1052; Com. 1062
Oaths, Consid. [149] 475; Lords' Amends. [151] 1905
Police Force (Ireland), Leave [150] 2155; Com. [151] 1135, 1144, 1773
†Probate Court (Ireland), [148] 459
Reformatory Schools (Ireland), Com. cl. 7, [151] 1432, 1433; cl. 17, 1434; Consid. cl. 3, 1550
Rewards to Members, Res. [149] 1026
Sale and Transfer of Land (Ireland), Com. cl. 87, [151] 968, 970; cl. 88, 972
Secretary, The Irish, Office of the, [150] 1463
Supply — Insolvent Debtors, [150] 1473;—County Courts, 1480
Tenants' Compensation (Ireland), 2R. [149] 1081, 1083
Townsend, Mr., Case of, [150] 2103
†Transfer of Land (Ireland) [148] 550
Voters' Travelling Expenses, Papers moved for, [150] 219
Western Bank of Scotland, [149] 1206

FITZGERALD, Mr. W. R. S. (†Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs), Horsham
†Belgrade, Outrage at—Consul Fonblanque, [150] 1947; [151] 394
†Brazil—Messrs. Swann and Smallpage, [150] 1851
†"Cagliari," Case of the, [149] 100, 1988; [150] 106, 283, 285, 428, 1947, 2112
†Cairo, Police Ordinance at, [151] 1083
†Canton, Executions at, [149] 2013
†Chancellor of the Exchequer's Speech at Slough, [150] 1247
†China, Relations with, [149] 1265;—Atrocities in, [150] 1611;—Expedition to, [151] 11
†Consular Service, Com. moved for, [149] 550
†Danubian Principalities, Address moved, [150] 66, 73
†Denmark and the Duchies, [149] 1799
†Diplomatic Salaries and Pensions, Res. [149] 1508
†Fernando Po, Religious Bigotry in, [151] 2273
†Guano, Peruvian, [151] 874, 1501
Havelock's, Sir H., Pension, [148] 560
†Howard, Mr., his Departure from Florence, [150] 1731, 1732, 1849
†Howden, Lord, Recall of, [149] 1334
†Jeddah, Massacre at, [151] 1285, 1932
†Mobile, Consulship at, [150] 1465
†Naples, British Consul at, [151] 1500
†Passport System in France, Correspondence moved for, [149] 692, 1184
†Persia—Herat, [150] 1850
†Slave Trade — French "Free Emigration" Scheme, [150] 1854;—Right of Search, Res. [151] 1301, 2035
†Stade Dues, Address moved, [149] 1015
†Suez, Isthmus of, Canal, Res. [150] 1373
†Supply — Consular Establishments abroad, [151] 1270; — Embassies and Missions abroad, 1272, 1273, 1274;—Embassy House at Paris, 1439;—New Consular Office at Constantinople, 1441
†Trade Mark, Pirating of, [151] 1200
†United States, Relations with the, [150] 1312, 1532, 1947; [151] 42, 55
†Yeh, Commissioner, [150] 1533

FITZROY, Rt. Hon. H. (Chairman of Committees), Lewes
Aggravated Assaults Act, [151] 10
Ali Moorad's Claim—Mr. Butt, Com. moved for, [148] 1865
Army Estimates, [150] 1105, 1106
Austria, and the Porte, [151] 607
Battersea Park, [151] 877
Belfast (Town) Improvement, 2R. [148] 1368
Breach of Privilege—Washington Wilks, [150] 1199, 1327
Civil Bills, &c. (Ireland), Com. cl. 2, [151] 1770, 1771
Clyde Navigation, Consid. [151] 505
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Com. cl. 1, [151] 1601
Furber v. Sturmey, [151] 415
Galway Freemen Disfranchisement, Com. [149] 1422
Havelock's, Major General, Pension to, Res. [148] 392
Health, Public, Com. cl. 4, [150] 2283
India, Government of, Com. Res. 1, [149] 2066; Res. 2, 2200; Res. 3, [150] 1614, 1615, 1688, 1948, 1969; Report, 2253
India, Government of (No. 3), Com. cl. 8, [151] 772; Consid. add. cl. 1039
Lancashire and Yorkshire, &c. Railway Companies, Consid. [150] 1603, 1606
Land, Sale and Transfer of (Ireland), Com. [151] 471
Lunatic Asylum, Protracted Confinement in a, [151] 1930
Marriage Law Amendment, Com. cl. 1, [151] 678, 679
Members' Seats, Res. [149] 2001
Metropolis Local Government, Com. cl. 1, [151] 1940; cl. 9, 1952
Navy Estimates, [149] 123, 1338, 1637, 1645
Piers and Harbours, 2R. [151] 253
Stamp Duties on Drafts, Com. cl. 2, [150] 290
Supply—Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant (Ireland), [150] 1258;—Inspectors of Lunatic Asylums (Ireland), 1261;—General Register House (Edinburgh), 1497, 1499, 1502, 1534
Townsend, Mr., Case of, Papers moved for, [150] 1857, 2098, 2099
Wexford Harbour Embankment, 2R. [148] 1855

FITZWILLIAM, Hon. C. W., Malton
Hudson's Bay Company, Res. [151] 1840
New Caledonia, Government of, 2R. [151] 1120

FOLEY, Mr. H. J., Staffordshire, S.
Proctors' Compensation, [148] 1371

FORDE, Lieut.-Col. W. B., Downshire
Militia, Disembodied, [149] 1265

Foreign and other Secret Services—Supply,
c. [150] 1263

Foreign Conspirators in England,
c. Question (Mr. Warren), [148] 1262

Forest of Dean,
c. Question (Colonel Kingscote), [151] 524

FORESTER, Rt. Hon. Col. G. C. W. (Controller of the Household), Wenlock
Competitive Examination, Her Majesty's Answer to Address, [149] 2010
Turnpike Tolls (Metropolis), Her Majesty's Answer to Address, [150] 763
Weedon Establishment, Her Majesty's Answer to Address, [151] 753

Forms of Prayer—see Church of England Political Services,

FORSTER, Mr. C., Walsall
Parliament, Sittings of, [151] 1185
Poisons, Sale of, [151] 1446

FORTESCUE, Earl
Cooking Apparatus for the Army, Paper moved for, [151] 1908
Property Qualification, 2R. [150] 1829, 1841; Com. 1917; 3R. 2095

FORTESCUE, Mr. C. S., Louth Co.
Ejectments (Ireland)—Case of J. Byrne, Papers moved for, [149] 1844
Hudson's Bay Company, Res. [151] 1839
India, Government of, Com. Res. 2, [150] 315; Res. 6, 2248
India, Government of (No. 3), Com. cl. 3, Amend. [151] 448, 456, 459; cl. 8, 765; cl. 15, 869; cl. 27, 893; cl. 29, 899; Consid. cl. 10, 1040
Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Res. [149] 753
Moore's, Mr. C., Appointment, Res. [151] 661
New Zealand, [150] 362
Oaths, Consid. [149] 482, 518
Peace Preservation (Ireland) Act Amendment, 2R. [150] 2087
Prince Edward Island, [149] 1654
Slave Trade—The French "Free Emigration" Scheme, [150] 1854;—Right of Search, [151] 2033, 2034
Supply—Public Education (Ireland), [151] 1236
Tenant Right (Ireland), Com. moved for, [150] 195
Tenants' Compensation (Ireland), 2R. [150] 1815

Four Courts (Dublin) Extension Bill,
c. 1R.* [150] 2220; 2R.* [151] 503; 3R.* 930
l. 1R.* [151] 975; 2R.* 1550; 3R.* 2077
Royal Assent, 2369

FOX, Mr. W. J., Oldham
Church Rates, Com. cl. 1, [150] 565
Conspiracy to Murder, Leave, [148] 947
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Consid. cl. 1, [151] 2060
Education (England) Commission moved for, [148] 1220
Marriage Law Amendment, Leave, [149] 613
Poor Rates (Metropolis), Leave, [149] 643
Rewards to Members, Res. [149] 1032
Rothschild, Baron de, Admission of, Res. [151] 2112
Supply—Education, [151] 146;—Nonconforming, &c. Ministers (Ireland), 1279

France,
Addresses in the "Moniteur," l. Question (Lord Lyndhurst), [148] 807
Passport System in, c. Correspondence moved for, (Mr. M. Milnes), [149] 575 Relations with, l. Correspondence laid on Table, [149] 166
c. Observations (Chancellor of the Exchequer), [149] 76;—The Earl of Malmesbury's Despatch, Question (Mr. Craufurd), 325

Franchise Prisons Bill,
c. Leave, [149] 1650; 1R.* ib.; 2R.* 1653; 3R.* [150] 250
l. 1R.* [150] 323; 2R.* 1021; 3R.* 1267
Royal Assent, 1997

FRASER, Sir W. A., Barnstaple
Army—Subalterns in the, Address moved, [151] 2240;—Regulations, 2367
"Austria," The Steam Ship, Report moved for, [148] 683
Bath, Order of the, [151] 2367
Bell for the Clock Tower, [150] 276
Burlington House, [151] 1788
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Com. cl. 1, [151] 1591
Mediterranean, &c., Telegraphic Communications, Papers moved for, [150] 22
Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Res. [150] 697
Waterloo and Westminster Bridges, [149] 1109

FREESTUN, Colonel W. L., Weymouth
Army, Subalterns in the, [151] 1499; Address moved, 2238, 2241

FRENCH, Colonel F., Roscommon Co.
Belfast, Riots in, [150] 1508
Cashel Election, Petition, [149] 160, 247
Civil Bills, &c. (Ireland), Com. cl. 2, [151] 1771
Civil Service Estimates, [151] 1267
Conspiracy to Murder (Ireland), Leave, [150] 882
Conway and Ryan, Fathers, Prosecution of, [149] 1592
Corrupt Practices Prevention Act Continuance, Com. [151] 1486
Galway Freemen Disfranchisement, Leave, [149] 383; Com. 1410; Amend. 1421, 1422
India—Intelligence from, [148] 313;—Transport of Troops for, Com. moved for, 724;—Relief of Lucknow—Mr. Cavanagh, 757, 1264
Insurance and Assurance Institutions, Leave, [150] 879; 2R. 2192
Land, Sale and Transfer of (Ireland), Com. [150] 2105; cl. 3, [151] 58
Limerick City, New Writ moved, [150] 336
Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Res. [149] 722
Manchester, &c., and Great Northern Railway Companies, Consid. [150] 1195
Mayo Writ, [148] 385, 386
Metropolis Local Management, Com. [151] 1934
Militia, Disembodiment of the, [151] 11
National Defences, The [150] 1942
Secretary, The Irish, Office of the, [150] 1464
Supply—Prosecutions, [150] 1468;—New Public Offices (Belfast), [151] 1424

cont.]

FRENCH, Colonel F.—cont.
Townsend, Mr., Case of, [150] 2104
War Department, [151] 2125

Friendly Offers of Foreign Powers,
c. Question (Sir J. Pakington), [148] 465

Friendly Societies Act Amendment Bill,
c. 1R.* [150] 763; 2R.* 1601; Question (Mr. Powell), [151] 1182; 3R.* 1590
l. 1R.* [151] 1655; 2R.* 2077; 3R. 2243
Royal Assent, 2369

Friendly Societies, Registers of—Supply,
c. [150] 1263

Funded Debt Bill,
c. Leave, [150] 1507; 1R.* ib.; 2R.* [151] 9; Com. 524; Amend. (Mr. Wilson), 532; Amend. neg. 550; 3R.* 592
l. 1R.* [151] 691; 2R.* 1146; 3R.* 1349
Royal Assent, 1967

Furber v. Sturmer,
c. Question (Mr. FitzRoy), [151] 415

Furniture for Public Departments—Supply,
c. [150] 1113

GAGE, Viscount
Glebe Houses, Dilapidations in, [151] 1150
Marriage Law Amendment, 2R. [151] 1969

GALLOWAY, Earl of
Church Rates Abolition, 2R. [151] 849
Jews, 3R. Amend. [151] 1257, 1265

Galway Election,
c. Question (Mr. Kinnaird), [149] 1264

Galway Freemen Disfranchisement,
c. Petition (Mr. Roebuck), [149] 322

Galway Freemen Disfranchisement Bill,
c. Leave, [149] 378; 1R.* 396; 2R. Amend. (Mr. Roebuck), 785; Amend. withdrawn, 788; Com. 1406; Instruction (Mr. Walpole), 1410, [A. 152, N. 121, M. 31] 1421; Amend. (Colonel French), [o. q. A. 226, N. 51, M. 175] ib.; Adj. moved (Mr. B. Hope), [150] 2157; Adj. Debate, 2286; Motion withdrawn, 2288; Adj. moved (Mr. Butt), [151] 592, [A. 90, N. 107, M. 17] 599; cl. 1, Amend. (Mr. Whiteside), 599, [o. q. A. 101, N. 158, M. 57] 603

Galway Harbour and Port Act Amendment Bill,
c. 1R.* [150] 1849

Game Laws (Ireland) Bill,
c. 1R.* [150] 763

Gaols and Houses of Correction Bill,
c. 1R.* [148] 970;
2R. 1248

Gaols and Houses of Correction Act Amendment Bill,
c. 1R.* [151] 1076

Gaols and Houses of Correction (No. 2) Bill,
c. 1R.* [151] 1699

GARNETT, Mr. W. J., Lancaster
Church Rates Abolition, 2R., [148] 1580; Com. cl. 1, [150] 564
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Consid. cl. 1, [151] 2029
Metropolis Local Management, Com. cl. 1, [151] 1944
Reformatory Schools, [148] 460

Gas, Supply of,
c. Com. moved for (Mr. Byng), [150] 321

Geographical Society—Supply,
c. [151] 1268

GIBSON, Rt. Hon. T. M., Ashton-under-Lyne
Bothnia, Claims of British Merchants, Commission moved for, [151] 1856
Breach of Privilege—Washington Wilks, [150] 1198, 1199, 1313, 1319, 1327, 1404
Business of the House, [151] 1347
Business, Public, [149] 1987
Chancellor of the Exchequer's Speech at Slough, [150] 1093
Conspiracy to Murder, 2R. Amend. [148] 1745
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Com. [151] 1487
Educational Estimates, [150] 1197
India, Government of, Com. [149] 2036
India, Press of, [149] 2014
Jews, 3R. [151] 1864
Lancashire and Yorkshire, &c. Railway Companies, Consid. [150] 1705
Manchester, &c. and Great Northern Railway Companies, Consid. [150] 1607
Oaths, Consid. [149] 472
Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, [150] 530; Res. 728, 773, 1020
Paper Duty, Res. [151] 98, 131, 134
Slave Trade, The, [151] 524;—Right of Search, Res. 1294, 1309, 1314
Stade Dues, Address moved, [149] 1014
Suez, Isthmus of, Canal, Res. [150] 1367, 1377, 1447
Supply—Harbours of Refuge, [150] 1124

GILPIN, Col. R. T., Bedfordshire
Army Estimates, [150] 385, 398
Militia (Services abroad) Act Continuance, Com. cl. 1, [151] 1963

GILPIN, Mr. C., Northampton
Church Rates, Com. cl. 1, [150] 562
Conspiracy to Murder, Leave, [148] 949

[cont.

GILPIN, Mr. C.—cont.
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Consid. cl. 1, [151] 2059
Edinburgh Annuity Tax, 2R. [150] 2179
Education (England), Commission moved for, [148] 1210
Ellis, Mr., Murder of, [151] 19
Health, Public, Com. cl. 4, [150] 2282
Hudson's Bay Company, Res. [151] 1833
India, Government of (No. 2), Leave, [149] 834
India, Government of (No. 3), Lords' Amends. [151] 2323
Jews, Com. [151] 1755
Leases and Sales of Settled Estates, Com. [151] 2207
Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Res. [149] 718
Marriage Law Amendment, Leave, [149] 620
Metropolis Local Management, Consid. add. cl. [151] 2049, 2050
Municipal Elections, [151] 1000
New Trial in Criminal Cases, 2R. [151] 1060
Oaths, Consid. [149] 506; Lords' Amends. [150] 338
Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Res. [150] 978
Rewards to Members, Res. [151] 200
Slave Trade—Right of Search, Res. [151] 1341
Supply—Metropolitan Police, [150] 1488;—Education, [151] 141;—Captured Negroes, 1270;—Non-conforming, &c., Ministers (Ireland), 1278; Amend. 1280;—Patent Law, Fees, &c., 1413;—Highland Roads and Bridges, 1419
Universities (Scotland), 2R. [150] 1902; Com. cl. 7, [151] 517
Weedon Establishment, Commission moved for, [151] 583

GLADSTONE, Rt. Hon. W. E., Oxford University
Army Estimates, [149] 139
Bank Acts, Com. moved for, [148] 644
Bank Issues Indemnity, Leave, [148] 171; 2R. 274
Breach of Privilege—Washington Wilks, [150] 1322
Budget, The—Financial Statement, [149] 1312
"Cagliari," Case of the, [149] 97; [150] 284
Church Rates Abolition, Com. cl. 1, [149] 1459, 1471; add. cl. Amend. [150] 571; 3R. 1402, 1723
Civil Service Superannuation Commissioners, [150] 922
Commissioners for Exhibition (1851), Com. cl. 1, [151] 86; cl. 2, 93; Consid. 313
Conspiracy to Murder, 2R. [148] 1806
Danubian Principalities, [149] 1583; Address moved, [150] 44, 104
Divorce Act Amendment, [151] 1785
Exchequer Bonds, 2R. [149] 2133, 2147
Funded Debt, Com. [151] 539
Havelock, Major General, Pension to, Rep. [148] 413
Hudson's Bay Company, Res. [151] 1802
India Government of, Com. moved for, [149] 1680; Res. 1, 2084; Res. 2, 2094, 2195; Res. 3, Amend. [150] 1615; Res. 5, 2069, 2081; Res. 6, 2239
India, Government of (No. 3), Com. cl. 7, [151] 462; Amend. 470, 757; cl. 8, Amend. 763, 765; cl. 14, 866, 867, 868; add. cl. 945; Consid. cl. 31, 1006; add. cl. 1007, 1016, 1017

[cont.

GLADSTONE, Rt. Hon. W. E.—cont.
Marriage Law Amendment, Consid. [151] 792
Metropolis Local Management Act Amendment, Leave, [151] 1517; 2R. 1717
Navy Estimates, [149] 132
New Caledonia (British Colombia), Government of, [151] 1505, 1506; Com. cl. 1, 1762
Oaths, Consid. [149] 483
Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Res. [150] 1026, 1042, 1059
Prince Edward Island, [150] 1948
Real Property, &c.—Probate Duty, Res. [150] 869
Suez, Isthmus of, Canal, Res. [150] 1384, 1385
Supply—British Museum, [150] 1571, 1576
Thames, State of the, [151] 876; Res. 1169
Universities (Scotland), Com. cl. 15, [151] 738, 742, 745; Consid. add. cl. 961

Glebe Houses, Dilapidations in,
l. Observations (Viscount Dungannon) [151] 1148

Gloucester Gate Bridge,
c. Question (Mr. Wyld), [150] 333

GLYN, Mr. G. C., Kendal
Bank Issues Indemnity, Leave, [148] 184, 185
Bankruptcy, Law of, [149] 1353
Budget, The—Financial Statement, [149] 1308
East India Loan, Consid. [149] 20
Supply—Holyhead Harbour [150] 1126

GODERICH, Viscount, Yorkshire, W. R.
Ali Moorad's Claim—Mr. Butt, Com. moved for, [148] 1866
Army, Commissions in the, [149] 436
Beer Houses, [149] 1989
Business of the House, [151] 604
India, Government of, [149] 1584, 1585; Com. moved for, 1709; Res. 5, [150] 2052; Adj. moved, 2085
India, Government of (No. 3), Com. cl. 14, [151] 867; cl. 31, 900
India—Transport of Troops, Explanation, [151] 1867, 1878
Justice, Administration of, Com. moved for, [149] 1808
Marriage Law Amendment, Leave, [149] 622; Com. [151] 669; cl. 1, 672; cl. 2, 683
Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Res. [150] 932
Partnerships, Registration of, Leave, [149] 1550; 2R. [151] 225, 244
Slave Trade — French "Free Emigration" Scheme, [150] 1854
Staff Appointments, [149] 710

Godrevy Bay, Lighthouse at,
c. Papers moved for (Mr. A. Smith), [148] 684; Motion withdrawn, 686; Returns moved for (Mr. A. Smith), 1359; Motion withdrawn, ib.; Com. moved for (Mr. A. Smith), [149] 327; Motion neg. 339

Government, Policy of the,
c. Observations (Mr. B. Osborne), [149] 181

Government Property—Exemption from Rates,
c. Com. moved for (Sir J. Elphinstone), [150] 1797

GRAHAM, Rt. Hon. Sir J. R. G., Carlisle
Ali Moorad's Claim—Mr. Butt, Com. moved for, [148] 1867; Report, [149] 75
Church Rates, 3R. [150] 1713
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Com. cl. 1, [151] 1601
India, Government of, Com. Res. 3, [150] 1955; Res 5, 2027, 2078; Res. 6, 2232
India, Government of (No. 3), Com. cl. 3, [151] 449, 451, 457; cl. 4, 461; cl. 8, Amend. 762, 771; cl. 11, 782, 783; cl. 13, 862; cl. 15, 869; Consid. cl. 31, 1003, 1005; cl. 27, 1044; Lords' Amends. 2185; cl. 29, Amend. 2189; cl. 32, 2197; cl. 35, Amend. 2203, 2338
Mackintosh, Sir J., The late, Explanation, [149] 1170
Oaths, Lords' Amends. [151] 1904
Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Res. [150] 985, 1001, 1011
Real Property, &c.—Probate Duty, Res. [150] 878
Remuneration, Acceptance of, by Members of Parliament, [149] 573; Res. 1023
Universities (Scotland), Lords' Amends. [151] 2134

Grain, Sale of, Bill,
c. 1R.* [151] 170

Grand Juries (Ireland) Bill
c. 1R.* [148] 1260

GRANVILLE, Earl († President of the Council)
†Address in Answer to the Speech [148] 55, 61, 63, 65, 85, 314, 524, 526
†Affairs, Public, State of, [148] 698, 703
†Aliens, Law relating to, [148] 1849
†Bank Issues Indemnity, 1R. [148] 409, 410
Business, Public, [149] 3, 447; [151] 1660
"Cagliari," Case of the, [149] 309, 1255
†Calcutta Petition, Papers moved for, [148] 1259
Canning's, Lord, Proclamation—Confiscation of Land in Oude, [150] 147, 148, 177; Papers moved for, 228, 229, 230, 233, 324, 407, 414, 418; Res. 627, 661, 664, 919
Chancellor of the Exchequer's Speech at Slough, [150] 1301, 1303
†China, Troops for, Papers moved for, [148] 1259
†Church of England Special Services, Com. cl. 3, [148] 1468
Church Rates Abolition, 2R. [151] 839, 851
Competitive Examination for the Civil Service, [150] 1696
Corrupt Practices Prevention, 2R. [151] 2163; Com. cl. 1, 2249
Divorce and Matrimonial Causes, 3R. [151] 159, 162
Education, Charitable Grants for [149] 810
†East India Company's Petition, [148] 808, 1160

GRANVILLE, Earl—cont.
East India Loan, 2R. [149] 242 ; 3R. 418
Ecclesiastical Commission, 2R. [150] 17
†France, Relations with — Addresses in the "Moniteur," [148] 808
†Havelock, Sir H., Pension to, Address moved, [148] 314, 317
†Hearsey, Major General, Explanation, [148] 228, 232, 234
†India—Arms and Press Acts, Papers moved for, [148] 248, 251, 252, 255, 266 ;—Transport of Troops to, Correspondence moved for, 448, 449 ;—Mutiny in, ib., 450 ;—Defence of Arrah, 1250 ;—Punishment of Mutineers, 1362 ;—Education in, Papers moved for, 1725
India, State of, [149] 704, 707 ;—Government of, Report moved for, 1975, 1977 ; [151] 68; —Public Accounts in [149] 2009 ;—Governor General of, [150] 1267
India, Government of (No. 3), 1R. [151] 1146 ; 2R. 1462 ; Com. cl. 7, 1578; cl. 11, 1582 ; cl. 12, 1583, 1584 ; cl. 22, 1586 ; cl. 27, 1587 ; cl. 29, ib. ; cl. 32, 1588 ; cl. 34, 1685 ; cl. 36, 1691 ; cl. 54, 1695, 1696 ; 3R. cl. 55, 2009 ; That the Bill do pass, 2019 ; Commons' Reasons, 2259
Jews, 2R. [151] 714 ; 3R. 1259
Joint-Stock Banking Companies, 2R. [151] 1351
Libel, 2R. [149] 969
Liturgy, Revision of the, Commission moved for, [150] 176
Marriage Law Amendment, 2R. [151] 1991
Ministerial Statement, [149] 44
Negro Regiment for India, [149] 459
Oaths, Com. cl. 1, [149] 1756 ; cl. 5, 1790 ; Report, [150] 1174, 1119, 2219 ; [151] 155, 729 ; Consid. 1244, 1245
Organ, Barrel, Suppression, 2R. [149] 1929
†Oude, Kingdom of, [149] 1922
†Parliamentary Reform, [148] 1120
Passport System, [149] 1108
Patriotic Fund, Correspondence moved for, [149] 1258
Poisons, Sale of, 2R. [150] 1510; Consid. [151] 913
†Princess Royal, Marriage of the. Address moved, [148] 752, 755
Property Qualification, 2R. [150] 1845 ; Com. 1917
†Religious Worship Act Amendment, [148] 134
†Resignation of Ministers, [148] 1849
Search, Right of, [151] 2088
Spiritual Destitution, Com. moved for, [149] 1570
Thames, State of The, [151] 387
Universities (Scotland) Com. cl. 12, [151] 1676; add. cl. 1677
Victoria Station and Pimlico Railway, Motion for Counsel, [151] 588, 798

GRAY, Capt. W., Bolton
Militia at Aldershot, [150] 19

GREAVES, Mr. E., Warwick
Election Committees Scrutiny, 2R. [151] 251
Stamp Duty on Drafts, 2R. [149] 2172

Green Park, Improvements in the,
Question (Lord Elcho), [149] 1186 ; see St. James's Park

Greenwich Hospital, The Officers at,
c. Question (Sir G. Pechell), [149] 709 ;—Sailors and Marines at, Res. (Sir C. Napier), [151] 571 ; Res. withdrawn, 572

GREER, Mr. S. M., Londonderry Co.
Bank Acts Committee, Nomination of Com. [148] 964 ; Adj. moved, 965
Bank Issues Indemnity, Com. cl. 2, [148] 406 ; Instruction, 1544
Conspiracy to Murder, Leave, [150] 881
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Com. cl. 1, [151] 1492, 1598 ; cl. 2, 1603 ; Consid. add. cl. 2022, 2025, 2026 ; cl. 1, 2029, 2063
Endowed Schools (Ireland), [148] 137 ; Res. [151] 632
India, Chaplains in, [151] 880
Reformatory Schools (Ireland), Leave, [149] 1403
Tenant Right (Ireland), Com. moved for, [150] 181, 195

GREGORY, Mr. W. H., Galway Co.
Clerks of Petty Sessions (Ireland), 2R. [150] 2277
India, Government of, Com. moved for, Amend. [149] 1692, 1707, 1721, 2023
India, Government of (No. 3), Com. cl. 13, [151] 858
Persia—Herat, [150] 1850
Supply—British Museum, [150] 1573

GREGSON, Mr. S., Lancaster
India, Government of, Com. Res. 4, Amend. [150] 1990
India, Government of (No. 3), Com. cl. 3, [151] 458 ; cl. 11, Amend. 776 ; cl. 49, Amend. 907 ; Consid. Amend. 1002 ; add. cl. 1039 ; 3R. 1088

GREVILLE, Col. F. S., Longford Co.
Business of the House, [151] 1506
Land, Sale and Transfer of (Ireland), Com. [150] 1567 ; cl. 87, Amend. [151] 972
Police Force (Ireland), [151] 1772
Tenants' Compensation (Ireland), 2R. [150] 1828

GREY, Earl
Address in Answer to the Speech, [148] 72
Affairs, Public, State of, [148] 705
Bank Issues Indemnity 1R. [148] 410 ; 3R. 534, 535
"Cagliari," Case of the, [148] 748 ; [149] 311
Church Rates Abolition, 2R. [151] 845
Competitive Examination for the Civil Service, [150] 1697
Divorce and Matrimonial Causes, Report, [150] 2195
East India Company's Petition, [148] 809, 1121
East India Loan, 3R. [149] 419
Ecclesiastical Commission, 2R. [150] 11 ; Rep. [151] 990
India—Arms and Press Acts, Papers moved for, [148] 257 ;—State of, [149] 706, 707 ;—Government of, Report moved for, 1968 ; [151] 68
Kingston, Earl of—Questions, [150] 1597
Liturgy, Revision of the, Commission moved for, [150] 169

[cont.

GREY, Earl—cont.
Militia, Embodied, Returns moved for, [148] 1590
Militia, Organization of the, [150] 2006
Oaths, 2R. [149] 1480; Report, 1168; Adj. moved, [150] 1169; [151] 155
Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Papers moved for, [150] 243, 324, 412, 413; Res. 635
Passport System, [149] 1106, 1107
Property Qualification, 2R. [150] 1832, 1839; Com. Instruction, 1916, 1918
Royal Commission — Order of Proceedings, [151] 480
Slave Trade, Alleged Revival of the, [148] 519; [150] 2204, 2212, 2213, 2214
Telegraphic Communication with Europe and America, Correspondence moved for, [149] 1575, 1582, 1583
Thames, State of the, [151] 389
Transfer of Estates, Simplification, Rep. [149] 853
Victoria Station and Pimlico Railway, Motion for Counsel, [151] 693, 797

GREY, Rt. Hon. Sir G. (†Secretary of State for the Home Department), Morpeth
†Ali Moorad's Claim—(Mr. Butt), [148] 1731; Com. moved for, 1861, 1866
Bernard, Dr., Case of, [149] 1486
Business, Public, [149] 1987
Cashel Election, [149] 248
Chancellor of the Exchequer's Speech at Slough, [150] 1226
†Church Rates Abolition, 2R. [148] 1575; Com. [149] 1439; cl. 1, 1458, 1459, 1470
†Commercial Distress, [148] 680
†Common Law Commissioners' Report, [148] 458
†Conspiracy to Murder, Leave, [148] 994; 2R. 1767
Conway and Ryan, Fathers, Prosecution of, [149] 1591
†County Police, [148] 1740
East India Loan, Consid., [149] 21
†Ecclesiastical Residencies (Ireland) 2R. [148] 1553
†Election Petitions, [148] 459
†Foreign Conspirators in England, [148] 1263, 1264
Galway Freemen Disfranchisement, Com. [149] 1422
†India, Government of (No. 1), [148] 681;
India, Government of, Com. moved for, [149] 1705; Res. 3, [150] 1686, 1688
India, Government of (No. 3), Com. cl. 14, [151] 868
Justice, Administration of, Com. moved for, [149] 1808
Lancashire and Yorkshire, &c. Railway Companies, Consid. [150] 1606
†Licensing System, [148] 1260
†London Corporation, Reform of the, [148] 553
London Corporation Regulation, Leave, [148] 738, 743 744; 2R. 1276; Com. [151] 290
†Manchester, Chancellor of the Diocese of, [148] 1605
Marriage Law Amendment, Com. cl. 1, [151] 681
Oaths, Com. [149] 299

[cont.

GREY, Rt. Hon. Sir G.—cont.
Sasines, Register of the, Keeper of the, [150] 1518
Secretary, The Irish, Office of, [150] 1461
Supply—Board of Public Works (Ireland), [150] 1261;—Commissioners of Lunacy (Scotland), 1263;—Prosecutions, 1470;—Police, 1471

GRIFFITH, Mr. C. D., Devizes
Bishops, Pensions to Retiring, [148] 556
Business, Private—Standing Orders, Report, [151] 2170
"Cagliari," Case of the, [149] 708
Chancellor of the Exchequer's Speech at Slough, [150] 1100
Church Rates, Com. cl. 1, [150] 558
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Com. cl. 1, Amend. [151] 1487, 1495, 1496; Consid. add. cl. 2028
Galway Freemen Disfranchisement, Com. [151] 598
Havelock's, Lady, and Sir H. Havelock's Annuities, Com. Res. [148] 776, 780; 2R. [148] 513, 681
India, Government of (No. 3), Consid. add. cl. [151] 1031; Lords' Amend. 2347
Jews, 3R. [151] 1901
Land, Sale and Transfer of (Ireland), Com. cl. 87, [151] 970; Consid. Amend. 1144
"Leviathan," The, and the Atlantic Telegraph Cable, [151] 1181
Metropolis Local Management, Com. cl. 1, [151] 1944; cl. 12, Amend. 1954; add. cl. 1959; Consid. cl. 1, 2051
Oaths, Leave, [148] 490
Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Res. [150] 1030
Private Bills, Res. [150] 470
Property Qualification, 2R. 225; Com. [150] 1429
St. James's Park, [151] 2126
Suez, Isthmus of, Canal, [149] 847; Res. Amend. [150] 1367
Supply—Sheriffs, &c., [150] 1471;—Metropolitan Police, 1488, 1489;—Miscellaneous Allowances, [151] 1276;—Nelson Column, 1425
Thames, State of the, [150] 1063, 1534
United States, Difference with the, [150] 1249
Walewski's Count, Letter, and the "Moniteur" [148] 1470

GROGAN, Mr. E., Dublin City
Army Medical Department, [148] 1605
Breach of Privilege—Washington Wilks [150] 1068
Budget, The—Financial Statement, [149] 1295
Dublin, Affray at, [149] 172, 173
Dublin, Metropolitan Police, Com. moved for, [148] 1473; [149] 574
Dublin Port Dues, Com. moved for, [149] 1358, 1360
Ejectments (Ireland)—Case of J. Byrne, Papers moved for, [149] 1843
Endowed Schools (Ireland), [149] 460, 461; Res. [151] 632
Excise Duties, 2R. [149] 1746
India, Government of (No. 1), Leave, [148] 1457
India, Government of, (No. 3), Com. cl. 12, [151] 785
Land, Sale and Transfer of, (Ireland) Com. cl. 21, [151] 62; cl. 51, 372; cl. 87, 969

GROGAN, Mr. E. – cont.
Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Res. [149] 746
Medical Practitioners, Com. [150] 1420
Police Force (Ireland), Leave, [150] 2155; Com. [151] 1135
Reformatory Schools (Ireland), Com. cl. 7, Amend. [151] 1069, 1431, 1432, 1433; cl. 17, 1435; Consid. cl. 3, Amend. 1550
Stamp Duties on Drafts, Com. cl. 2, [150] 290
Supply—Department of Science and Art, [151] 1204 —Public Education (Ireland), 1236
Valuation (Ireland), Com. moved for, [150] 911, 913
Wexford Harbour Embankment, 2R. [148] 1855

Guano, Supply of,
c. Question, (Mr. Caird), [148] 271; [151] 873, 1501;—From the Kooria Mooria Islands, Question (Mr. Scott), 931

Guards, Mortality in the,
c. Question (Mr. Laurie), [148] 1169; (Captain Annesley), 1261; Report moved for, (Captain Annesley), 1545; Amend. (Mr. S. Herbert), 1548

GURNEY, Mr. J. H., King's Lynn
Joint-Stock Banking Companies, 2R. [150] 543
Partnerships, Registration of, 2R. [151] 243
Slave Trade — Right of Search, Res. [151] 1315
Stamp Duties on Drafts, Com. cl. 1, Amend. [150] 288; add. cl. 291

HADDINGTON, Earl of Universities (Scotland), Com. cl. 12, [151] 1677; Commons' Reasons, 2244

HADDO, Lord, Aberdeenshire
Suez, Isthmus of, Canal, Res. [150] 1370
Supply—Royal Hibernian Academy, Amend. [151] 1238
Universities (Scotland), Com. cl. 1, [151] 405; Consid. cl. 16, 962

HADFIELD, Mr. G., Sheffield
Admiralty Court, The [148] 558
Conspiracy to Murder, Leave, [148] 941
Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Act Amendment, [151] 1785, 1931; 2R. 2056
Education (England), Commission moved for, Amend. [148] 1209, 1248
Fire Insurances, [151] 1398
Insurance and Assurance, 2R. [151] 1067
Jersey, Laws of, [150] 1308
Justice, Administration of, Com. moved for, [149] 1804, 1807
Legitimacy Declaration, Com. [151] 1145
Manchester, Chancellor of the Diocese of, [148] 1604
Medical Practitioners; Com. [151] 996; cl. 45, Amend. 999; Consid. Amend. 1145
Mortmain, Law of, [150] 1801
Probate and Letters of Administration Act Amendment, [151] 1785, 1931; 2R. 2055; Com. 2070; cl. 5, Amend. 2072
Probate Court, The, [150] 258

[cont.

HADFIELD, Mr. G.—cont.
Proctors' Claims for Compensation, [149] 1173; [151] 1077, 1079
Real Property, &c.—Probate Duty, Res. [150] 869
Rothschild, Baron de, Admission of, Res. [151] 2109
Septennial Act, Leave, [149] 1369, 1375
Supply—Insolvent Debtors' Court, [150] 1472; —Court of Probate, &c. 1473, 1474, 1475; —Police Courts (Metropolis), Amend. 1487, 1488;—Metropolitan Police, 1490;—Ecclesiastical Commissioners, [151] 1400
Trustees Relief, [151] 1284
Turkey, Commercial Relations with, [150] 179
Universities (Scotland), Com. cl. 19, [151] 752

Hainault Allotment,
c. Res. (Mr. Caird), [151] 608; Motion withdrawn, 624; Explanation (Mr. Caird), 872

HALL, Rt. Hon. Sir B. (†Chief Commissioner of Works), Marylebone
†Bell, The Westminster, [148] 456
Chelsea Bridge Act Amendment, 2R. [150] 1992
†Drainage of the Metropolis, [148] 546, 549, 552
Green Park, Improvements in the, [149] 1190
India, Government of (No. 2), [149] 874, 877
London Corporation Regulation, Com. [151] 300, 301
London Tramway, 2R. Amend. [149] 175
Metropolis Local Management Act Amendment, Leave, [151] 1525; 2R. 1726; Com. cl. 1, 1930, 1940; Amend. 1944; cl. 2, 1946; cl. 5, 1950; cl. 12, Amend. 1953; cl. 14, 1954; cl. 17, 1955; cl. 26, 1957; add. cl. 1959; Consid. add. cl. 2049.
†Offices, New Government, [148] 1165
Poor Law (Metropolis), 2R. [150] 511
Supply—New Houses of Parliament, [150] 1119; —Main Drainage of London, [151] 1427
†Thames, State of the, [148] 461; [151] 37, 438
Wellington Monument, Res. [151] 2234

HAMILTON, Rt. Hon. Lord C. (†Treasurer of the Household), Tyrone
Chelsea New Bridge, Leave, [148] 1848
†Church of England, Political Services of the, Her Majesty's Answer to Address, [151] 1604
India—Vote of Thanks to the Army, &c. [148] 923
†Navy, Manning the, Her Majesty's Answer to Address, [150] 1061

HAMILTON, Mr. G. A. (Secretary to the Treasury), Dublin University
Army Accounts, Auditing of the, [150] 178
Army, Commissions in the, [149] 222
Army Estimates, [149] 225, 817
Attorney General, The, v. The Prince of Wales, Papers moved for, [149] 2000
Australian Postal Service, [150] 2015, 2016
British Bank, The Royal, Return moved for, [149] 397
Business of the House, [149] 72; [151] 2047
Business, Public, [150] 1438
Chesney's, General, Work, [151] 2374
Civil Service Estimates, [151] 1267

[cont.

HAMILTON, G. A.—cont.
Civil Service Superannuation Commissioners, [150] 922, 923
Consolidated Fund (Appropriation), Com. [151] 1920; cl. 25, 1923
Cornwall, Duchy of, [151] 881
Customs Acts, Com. Res. [149] 443
Dublin and London, Communication between, [149] 1171; [150] 921
Durham County Jurisdiction, 2R. [150] 221; Com. 2272
East India Loan, Consid. [149] 15, 20, 72
Envelopes and Writing Paper, Drawback on, [150] 1610
Epping Forest, Encroachments on, [151] 1613
Exchequer Bonds, 2R. [149] 2166
Fire Insurance, [151] 1398
Forest of Dean, [151] 524
Galway Freemen Disfranchisement, Com. [150] 2287
Hainault Allotment, Res. [151] 618, 621, 873
Harbours of Refuge, Commission moved for, [151] 2148
India, Telegraph to, [151] 2304
Insurance and Assurance Institutions, 2R. [150] 2288
Land, Sale and Transfer of (Ireland), Com. [150] 2106: cl. 12, Amend. [151] 61, 62; cl. 87, 968; cl. 88, 972, 973; add. cl. 974; Consid. 1145
Mediterranean, &c., Telegraphic Communications, Papers moved for, [150] 24
Metropolis Local Management, Com. cl. 9, [151] 1952, cl. 12, 1954; cl. 17, 1955
Oaths, Com. [149] 305
Probate and Letters of Administration, Com. cl. 5, [151] 2071
Probate District Maps, Papers moved for, [149] 162
Returns, Delayed, [151] 2275
St. James's Park, [151] 2126
Stamp Duties on Drafts, Com. cl. 1, [150] 289; cl. 2, 290; Preamble, 292
Stamped Letter Paper, [151] 2042
Supply — Customs Department, [149] 227; Rep. 261;—Public Buildings, [150] 1111; —Furniture for Public Departments, 1113, 1114, 1115;— Royal Parks, 1116;—Harbours of Refuge, 1122, 1124;— Holyhead Harbour, 1126, 1127;—Kingstown Harbour, 1128;—Secretary of State for Foreign Department, 1129;—Poor Law Board, 1134;—Queen's, &c. Remembrancer (Scotland), 1251; —Officers of Lord Lieutenant (Ireland), 1252; —Secretary to Lord Lieutenant (Ireland), 1257;—Inspectors of Lunatic Asylums (Ireland), 1260; — Board of Public Works (Ireland), 1261; — Commissioners of Lunacy (Scotland), 1263; — Printing, &c. Houses of Parliament, 1264, 1265, 1266; —Law Charges, 1466;—Prosecutions, ib., 1467, 1468, 1469, 1470, 1583; — Admiralty Court, 1472;— Court of Probate, &c. 1473; — County Courts, 1475, 1477, 1484;—Police Courts (Metropolis), 1487; —General Registry House, Edinburgh, 1501; Report, 1585; [151] 1637;— Department of Science Act, 1178; — Embassies and Missions abroad, 1271, 1272, 1274;—Superannuations, 1275; — Polish Refugees, 1275; — Miscellaneous Allowances — Irish Hospitals, 1276;—General Board of Health, 1281;—Incumbered Estates Court (Ireland), [cont.

HAMILTON, Mr. G. A.—cont.
1402; — Board of Fisheries (Scotland), 1417;—Highland Roads and Bridges, 1419: —Slave Bounties, ib., 1437;—Publication of Ancient Laws, &c. (Ireland), 1419;—Boundary Survey (Ireland);—New Public Offices (Belfast), 1423;—Four Courts Extension (Dublin), 1425; — Main Drainage of London, 1429;—Embassy House at Paris, 1438;—Sir H. Havelock's Statue, 1442;—Major General Chesney, ib.;—Civil Contingencies, 1445, 1446;— Wellington Monument, 1483
Universities (Scotland), Com. cl. 19, [151] 747, 748
War Department, Account of the, [151] 2359

HAMILTON, Mr. J. H., Dublin Co.
Harbours of Refuge, Commission moved for, [151] 2150

HANBURY, Mr. R., Middlesex
Epping Forest, Encroachments on, [151] 1613
Newfoundland Fisheries, [150] 673
Smithfield Market, [148] 552

HANKEY, Mr. T., Peterborough
Bell for the Clock Tower, [150] 274
Copyhold Acts, [150] 1517
Drafts on Bankers Consid. [151] 2052; 3R. 2076
Incumbered Estates (West Indies), Consid. [151] 2055
India, Government of, (No. 3), 3R. [151] 1086
Joint-Stock Banks, Amend. [148] 384
Joint-Stock Banking Companies, Leave, [148] 1180; Com. add. cl. [150] 1912
Richard Cœur de Lion, Statue of, [150] 274
Supply—New Houses of Parliament, [150] 1118;—Embassy Houses Abroad, 1120;— Prosecutions, 1469
West Indies, Removal of Troops from, [151] 2126

HANMER, Sir J., Flint, &c.
Manchester, &c., and Great Northern Railway Companies, Consid. [150] 1195, 1608

Harbours of Refuge,
c. Question (Mr. Fenwick), [148] 359; Com. 1359; Question (Mr. Macartney), [150] 923; (Mr. Lindsay) [151] 1182; Observations (Mr. Wilson), 1745;—Address moved, (Mr. Wilson), 2139; Amend. (Mr. M'Cann), 2146; Amend. withdrawn, 2151; Her Majesty's Answer, 2377

Harbours of Refuge—Supply,
c. [150] 1120; Amend. (Mr. Baxter), 1124; Amend. withdrawn, 1126

HARDINGE, Viscount, (Under Secretary for War)
Cooking Apparatus for the Army, Address moved, [151] 1908
Hundredth Regiment, The, [151] 1349
Johnstone, Colonel, Case of, [150] 1587
Militia, Organization of the, [150] 2005
Negro Regiment for India, [149] 459
Presbyterian Chaplains in the Army, [149] 1350

HARDWICKE, Earl of (†Lord Privy Seal)
Address in Answer to the Speech, [148] 70, 71
Affairs, Public, State of, [148] 713
"Austria," The—Conveyance of Troops, Paper moved for, [148] 348
†Corrupt Practices Prevention, [151] 2163; Com. cl. 1, 2247
†Ecclesiastical Commission, 3R. [151] 1154
†Health, Public, 2R. [151] 1866
Hearsey, Major General, [148] 234
India, Conveyance of Troops to, [148] 1721; State of, [149] 708
†India, Government of (No. 3), Com. cl. 12, [151] 1584; cl. 34, 1686
†Kerry County, Assistant Barrister of, [150] 1590
Militia, Embodied, Returns moved for, [148] 1589
†Oaths, [150] 2219; Com. moved for, [151] 155; Report Consid. 1253
†Patriotic Fund, [149] 788, 789
†Poisons, Sale of, Consid. [151] 913
†Slave Trade, The, [150] 2215, 2217
†Thames, State of the, [151] 386, 473
†United States, Relations with the, [150] 1704
†Victoria Station, Pimlico Railway, Motion for Counsel, [151] 587

HARDY, Mr. G. (†Under Secretary for the Home Department), Leominster
†Barber's, Mr., Petition, Nomination of Com. [151] 154; That Viscount Goderich be Discharged Attendance, 974
†British Bank, Royal, [150] 1517
†Cemeteries, Metropolitan, [150] 250
†Churches, Metropolitan, Sanitary State of the, [150] 1925
†Copyhold Acts, [150] 1517
†Criminals, Foreign, [149] 1186
Education (England), Commission moved for, [148] 1199, 1205
†Franchise Prisons, Leave, [149] 1650
Licensing System, [148] 1260
†Loan Societies, Com. [149] 1251
†Magisterial Appointments, [150] 271; Return moved for, 322
Marriage Law Amendment, Com. cl. 4, [151] 684
†Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Res. [150] 786
†Supply—Police Courts (Metropolis), [150] 1487

HARRINGTON, Earl of
Jews, 3R. Amend. [151] 1260, 1264
St. Paul's Churchyard, [151] 2283

HARTINGTON, Marquess of, Lancashire, N.
Lancaster, Duchy of—Mining Operations, Com. moved for, [150] 452

Haslar Slip,
c. Question (Mr. Bentinck), [149] 1722;—see Navy Estimates

HASSARD, Mr. M. D., Waterford City
Endowed Schools (Ireland), Res. [151] 635
Joint-Stock Companies, Com. cl. 3, Amend. [150] 1911
Oaths, 2R. [148] 1086; Considered, [149] 482

[cont.

HASSARD, Mr. M. D.—cont.
Tenants' Compensation (Ireland), 2R. [149] 1089
Waterford, Harbour at, [150] 859

HATCHELL, Mr. J., Wexford Co.
Dublin, Affray at, Report moved for, [149] 669, 670, 702
Harbours of Refuge, Commission moved for, [151] 2149
Medical Practitioners, Leave, [149] 652; Com. cl. 3, [151] 997
Official Debtors (Ireland), [149] 1583
Probate Court (Ireland), [148] 459
Reformatory Schools (Ireland), 2R. [150] 523

Havelock, Sir H., Provision for,
l. Message from the Queen, [148] 237; Address moved (Earl Granville), 314; Report, 410
c. Message from the Queen, [148] 273; Res. (Viscount Palmerston), 386; Report, 410

Havelock's, Sir H., Annuity Bill,
c. Leave, 1R.* [148] 410, 419;
2R. 502;
Statement (Viscount Palmerston), 559;
Com. deferred, 579;
Observations (Mr. Griffith), 681

Havelock's, Lady, and Sir H. Havelock's Annuities Bill,
c. Com. Res. (Chancellor of the Exchequer), [148] 771;
1R.* 860;
2R. 1081; 3R.* 1165
l. 1R.* [148] 1249;
2R. 1729;
3R. 1854
Royal Assent, [149] 445

Havelock's, Sir H., Statue—Supply,
c. [151] 1442

HAYES, Sir E. S., Donegal Co.
Donegal, Destitution in, Com. moved for, [149] 1527

HEADLAM, Mr. T. E., Newcastle-upon-Tyne
Bankruptcy and Insolvency Laws Consolidation, Leave, [151] 223
Bankruptcy Law, [148] 550
Business of the House, [150] 1200
"Cagliari," Case of the, [149] 90, 858, 1172, 1173, 1593; [150] 286, 1195
Chancery Amendment, Leave, [149] 1164
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Consid. cl. 1, [151] 2057
Joint-Stock Banks, [148] 359, 384
Joint-Stock Banking Companies, Leave, [148] 1169, 1184; 2R. [149] 1919, 1920; [150] 556; Com. 1503, 1505, 1506; cl. 2, 1910; cl. 3, 1911; add. cl. 1912; 3R. [151] 224
Marriage Law Amendment, Com. cl. 2, [151] 682; cl. 4, 684; add. cl. 685
Medical Practitioners, Com. [150] 1409, 1417; [151] 995; cl. 15, Amend. 998; cl. 26, Amend. 999

[cont.

HEADLAM, Mr. T. E.—cont.
Metropolis Local Management, 2R. [151] 1707; Com. 1926; cl. 1, Amend. 1929, 1935, 1940; cl. 11, Amend. 1952
National Defences, The, [150] 1941
Oaths, Lords' Amends. That Baron de Rothschild be a Member of the Committee, [150] 435
Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, [150] 427
Private Bills, Res. [150] 470
Real Property Commissioners, [149] 1264

Health, General Board of—Medical Staff,
c. Question (Mr. Palk), [150] 1197

Health, General Board of—Supply,
c. Amend. (Mr. T. Duncombe), [151] 1281; Amendment and Motion withdrawn, 1282, 1444

Health, General Board of (Skipton, &c.) Bill,
c. 1R.* [148] 1854; 2R.* [149] 4

Health, General Board of (Skipton, &c.), (No. 2) Bill,
c. 1R.* [149] 172; 2R.* 246; 3R.* 460
l. 1R.* [149] 445; 2R.* 556; 3R.* 788
Royal Assent, [150] 403

Health, Public, Act Amendment (1848) Bill,
c. Leave, [148] 499; 1R.* 502; 2R. deferred, 744, 1457; [149] 444; Question (Mr. Repton), [149] 463

Health, Public, Act Amendment (No. 2) Bill,
c. Leave, [149] 1554; 1R.* 1556

Health, Public, Bill,
c. 1R.* [150] 763; 2R.* 1194; Com. 2279; cl. 4, 2281 [r. p. A. 32, N. 140, M. 108] 2283; Consid. add. cl. (Mr. Adderley), [151] 1655; 3R.* 1669
l. 1R.* [151] 1773; 2R. 1866; 3R.* 2077
c. Lords' Amends. [151] 2275; Amend. (Mr. T. Duncombe), 2276; Amend. withdrawn, 2277
l. Royal Assent, [151] 2369

Hearsey, Major General,
l. Explanation (Earl Granville), [148] 228

HEATHCOTE, Sir W., Oxford University
Church Rates, Com. add. cl. [150] 572
Joint-Stock Banking Companies, Com. [150] 1505
Probate Acts, Compensation under the, [149] 815

HEATHCOTE, Hon. G. H., Rutland
Medical Profession and Medical Corporations, 2R. [150] 1421

Heirs (Scotland) Bill,
c. 1R.* [148] 715

Heligoland—Supply,
c. [151] 1268

HENCHY, Mr. D. O., Kildare Co.
Tenants' Compensation (Ireland), 2R. [150] 1827

HENLEY, Rt. Hon. J. W. (†President of the Board of Trade), Oxfordshire
†Agricultural Statistics, Leave, [149] 162; 2R. 1907
†Agricultural Statistics (Scotland), [149] 463, 784
Ali Moorad's Claim—Mr. Butt, Com. moved for, [148] 1866
Bank Acts Committee, Nomination of Com. [148] 965
Bank Issues Indemnity, Leave, [148] 188, 199, 202; Explanation, 559
†British Bank, The Royal, Return moved for, [149] 398
†"Candace," Loss of the, [151] 83
†Church Rates Abolition, Com. cl. 1, [149] 1463, 1465, 1470; add. cl. [150] 573
Conspiracy to Murder, 2R. [148] 1800
†Corrupt Practices Prevention, Com. cl. 1, [151] 1493
†County Franchise, 2R. [150] 1879
†Dublin Port Dues, Com. moved for, [149] 1358
East India Loan, Leave, [148] 794
Education (England), Commission moved for, [148] 1232, 1248
†Fisheries, Paper moved for, [150] 216
†Galway Freemen Disfranchisement, Com. [149] 1422
†Godrevy Lighthouse, Com. moved for, [149] 330
Health, Public, Act Amendment, 2R. [148] 1458
India—Vote of Thanks to the Army, &c. [148] 928
†Insurance and Assurance Institutions, 2R. [150] 2192
†Joint-Stock Banking Companies, Com. [150] 1505; cl. 2, 1910; cl. 3, 1911
†Lancashire and Yorkshire, &c. Railway Companies, Consid. [150] 1604, 1605, 1705
†Lighthouses, &c., Address moved, [149] 1121, 1127; [151] 756
†Manchester, &c. and Great Northern Railway Companies, Consid. Amend. [150] 1194, 1609
†Marriage Law Amendment, Com. [150] 1689; cl. 1, [151] 678; cl. 2, 682, 683; add. cl. 684, 686; Consid. 792
†Masters and Workmen, 2R. [150] 532
†Metropolis Local Management, 2R. [151] 1732 1738; Com. cl. 1, 1930; cl. 14, 1955; cl. 26, 1956
†New Trial in Criminal Cases, 2R. [151] 1061
†Oaths, Com. [149] 298, 299; Lords' Amends. [151] 1904
†Oyster Fisheries, The, [151] 2033
†Partnerships, Registration of, Leave, [149] 1553; 2R. [151] 241, 245
†Passing Tolls, [149] 813
"Prince Albert," Iron Steam Ship, [148] 1369
†Property Qualification, Com. [150] 1430
†Railway Legislation, [150] 1516

[cont.

HARDWICKE, Earl of (†Lord Privy Seal)
Address in Answer to the Speech, [148] 70, 71
Affairs, Public, State of, [148] 713
"Austria," The—Conveyance of Troops, Paper moved for, [148] 348
†Corrupt Practices Prevention, [151] 2163; Com. cl. 1, 2247
†Ecclesiastical Commission, 3R. [151] 1154
†Health, Public, 2R. [151] 1866
Hearsey, Major General, [148] 234
India, Conveyance of Troops to, [148] 1721; State of, [149] 708
†India, Government of (No. 3), Com. cl. 12, [151] 1584; cl. 34, 1686
†Kerry County, Assistant Barrister of, [150] 1590
Militia, Embodied, Returns moved for, [148] 1589
†Oaths, [150] 2219; Com. moved for, [151] 155; Report Consid. 1253
†Patriotic Fund, [149] 788, 789
†Poisons, Sale of, Consid. [151] 913
†Slave Trade, The, [150] 2215, 2217
†Thames, State of the, [151] 386, 473
†United States, Relations with the, [150] 1704
†Victoria Station, Pimlico Railway, Motion for Counsel, [151] 587

HARDY, Mr. G. (†Under Secretary for the Home Department), Leominster
†Barber's, Mr., Petition, Nomination of Com. [151] 154; That Viscount Goderich be Discharged Attendance, 974
†British Bank, Royal, [150] 1517
†Cemeteries, Metropolitan, [150] 250
†Churches, Metropolitan, Sanitary State of the, [150] 1925
†Copyhold Acts, [150] 1517
†Criminals, Foreign, [149] 1186
Education (England), Commission moved for, [148] 1199, 1205
†Franchise Prisons, Leave, [149] 1650
Licensing System, [148] 1260
†Loan Societies, Com. [149] 1251
†Magisterial Appointments, [150] 271; Return moved for, 322
Marriage Law Amendment, Com. cl. 4, [151] 684
†Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Res. [150] 786
†Supply—Police Courts (Metropolis), [150] 1487

HARRINGTON, Earl of
Jews, 3R. Amend. [151] 1260, 1264
St. Paul's Churchyard, [151] 2283

HARTINGTON, Marquess of, Lancashire, N.
Lancaster, Duchy of—Mining Operations, Com. moved for, [150] 452

Haslar Slip,
c. Question (Mr. Bentinck), [149] 1722;—see Navy Estimates

HASSARD, Mr. M. D., Waterford City
Endowed Schools (Ireland), Res. [151] 635
Joint-Stock Companies, Com. cl. 3, Amend. [150] 1911
Oaths, 2R. [148] 1086; Considered, [149] 482

[cont.

HASSARD, Mr. M. D.—cont.
Tenants' Compensation (Ireland), 2R. [149] 1089
Waterford, Harbour at, [150] 859

HATCHELL, Mr. J., Wexford Co.
Dublin, Affray at, Report moved for, [149] 669, 670, 702
Harbours of Refuge, Commission moved for, [151] 2149
Medical Practitioners, Leave, [149] 652; Com. cl. 3, [151] 997
Official Debtors (Ireland), [149] 1583
Probate Court (Ireland), [148] 459
Reformatory Schools (Ireland), 2R. [150] 523

Havelock, Sir H., Provision for,
l. Message from the Queen, [148] 237; Address moved (Earl Granville), 314; Report, 410
c. Message from the Queen, [148] 273; Res. (Viscount Palmerston), 386; Report, 410

Havelock's, Sir H., Annuity Bill,
c. Leave, 1R.* [148] 410, 419;
2R. 502;
Statement (Viscount Palmerston), 559;
Com. deferred, 579;
Observations (Mr. Griffith), 681

Havelock's, Lady, and Sir H. Havelock's Annuities Bill,
c. Com. Res. (Chancellor of the Exchequer), [148] 771;
1R.* 860;
2R. 1081; 3R.* 1165
l. 1R.* [148] 1249;
2R. 1729;
3R. 1854
Royal Assent, [149] 445

Havelock's, Sir H., Statue—Supply,
c. [151] 1442

HAYES, Sir E. S., Donegal Co.
Donegal, Destitution in, Com. moved for, [149] 1527

HEADLAM, Mr. T. E., Newcastle-upon-Tyne
Bankruptcy and Insolvency Laws Consolidation, Leave, [151] 223
Bankruptcy Law, [148] 550
Business of the House, [150] 1200
"Cagliari," Case of the, [149] 90, 858, 1172, 1173, 1593; [150] 286, 1195
Chancery Amendment, Leave, [149] 1164
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Consid. cl. 1, [151] 2057
Joint-Stock Banks, [148] 359, 384
Joint-Stock Banking Companies, Leave, [148] 1169, 1184; 2R. [149] 1919, 1920; [150] 556; Com. 1503, 1505, 1506; cl. 2, 1910; cl. 3, 1911; add. cl. 1912; 3R. [151] 224
Marriage Law Amendment, Com. cl. 2, [151] 682; cl. 4, 684; add. cl. 685
Medical Practitioners, Com. [150] 1409, 1417; [151] 995; cl. 15, Amend. 998; cl. 26, Amend. 999

[cont.

HEADLAM, Mr. T. E.—cont.
Metropolis Local Management, 2R. [151] 1707; Com. 1926; cl. 1, Amend. 1929, 1935, 1940; cl. 11, Amend. 1952
National Defences, The, [150] 1941
Oaths, Lords' Amends. That Baron de Rothschild be a Member of the Committee, [150] 435
Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, [150] 427
Private Bills, Res. [150] 470
Real Property Commissioners, [149] 1264

Health, General Board of—Medical Staff,
c. Question (Mr. Palk), [150] 1197

Health, General Board of—Supply,
c. Amend. (Mr. T. Duncombe), [151] 1281; Amendment and Motion withdrawn, 1282, 1444

Health, General Board of (Skipton, &c.) Bill,
c. 1R.* [148] 1854; 2R.* [149] 4

Health, General Board of (Skipton, &c.), (No. 2) Bill,
c. 1R.* [149] 172; 2R.* 246; 3R.* 460
l. 1R.* [149] 445; 2R.* 556; 3R.* 788
Royal Assent, [150] 403

Health, Public, Act Amendment (1848) Bill,
c. Leave, [148] 499; 1R.* 502; 2R. deferred, 744, 1457; [149] 444; Question (Mr. Repton), [149] 463

Health, Public, Act Amendment (No. 2) Bill,
c. Leave, [149] 1554; 1R.* 1556

Health, Public, Bill,
c. 1R.* [150] 763; 2R.* 1194; Com. 2279; cl. 4, 2281 [r. p. A. 32, N. 140, M. 108] 2283; Consid. add. cl. (Mr. Adderley), [151] 1655; 3R.* 1669
l. 1R.* [151] 1773; 2R. 1866; 3R.* 2077
c. Lords' Amends. [151] 2275; Amend. (Mr. T. Duncombe), 2276; Amend. withdrawn, 2277
l. Royal Assent, [151] 2369

Hearsey, Major General,
l. Explanation (Earl Granville), [148] 228

HEATHCOTE, Sir W., Oxford University
Church Rates, Com. add. cl. [150] 572
Joint-Stock Banking Companies, Com. [150] 1505
Probate Acts, Compensation under the, [149] 815

HEATHCOTE, Hon. G. H., Rutland
Medical Profession and Medical Corporations, 2R. [150] 1421

Heirs (Scotland) Bill,
c. 1R.* [148] 715

Heligoland—Supply,
c. [151] 1268

HENCHY, Mr. D. O., Kildare Co.
Tenants' Compensation (Ireland), 2R. [150] 1827

HENLEY, Rt. Hon. J. W. (†President of the Board of Trade), Oxfordshire
†Agricultural Statistics, Leave, [149] 162; 2R. 1907
†Agricultural Statistics (Scotland), [149] 463, 784
Ali Moorad's Claim—Mr. Butt, Com. moved for, [148] 1866
Bank Acts Committee, Nomination of Com. [148] 965
Bank Issues Indemnity, Leave, [148] 188, 199, 202; Explanation, 559
†British Bank, The Royal, Return moved for, [149] 398
†"Candace," Loss of the, [151] 83
†Church Rates Abolition, Com. cl. 1, [149] 1463, 1465, 1470; add. cl. [150] 573
Conspiracy to Murder, 2R. [148] 1800
†Corrupt Practices Prevention, Com. cl. 1, [151] 1493
†County Franchise, 2R. [150] 1879
†Dublin Port Dues, Com. moved for, [149] 1358
East India Loan, Leave, [148] 794
Education (England), Commission moved for, [148] 1232, 1248
†Fisheries, Paper moved for, [150] 216
†Galway Freemen Disfranchisement, Com. [149] 1422
†Godrevy Lighthouse, Com. moved for, [149] 330
Health, Public, Act Amendment, 2R. [148] 1458
India—Vote of Thanks to the Army, &c. [148] 928
†Insurance and Assurance Institutions, 2R. [150] 2192
†Joint-Stock Banking Companies, Com. [150] 1505; cl. 2, 1910; cl. 3, 1911
†Lancashire and Yorkshire, &c. Railway Companies, Consid. [150] 1604, 1605, 1705
†Lighthouses, &c., Address moved, [149] 1121, 1127; [151] 756
†Manchester, &c. and Great Northern Railway Companies, Consid. Amend. [150] 1194, 1609
†Marriage Law Amendment, Com. [150] 1689; cl. 1, [151] 678; cl. 2, 682, 683; add. cl. 684, 686; Consid. 792
†Masters and Workmen, 2R. [150] 532
†Metropolis Local Management, 2R. [151] 1732 1738; Com. cl. 1, 1930; cl. 14, 1955; cl. 26, 1956
†New Trial in Criminal Cases, 2R. [151] 1061
†Oaths, Com. [149] 298, 299; Lords' Amends. [151] 1904
†Oyster Fisheries, The, [151] 2033
†Partnerships, Registration of, Leave, [149] 1553; 2R. [151] 241, 245
†Passing Tolls, [149] 813
"Prince Albert," Iron Steam Ship, [148] 1369
†Property Qualification, Com. [150] 1430
†Railway Legislation, [150] 1516

[cont.

HENLEY, Rt. Hon. J. W.—cont.
†Real Property, &c.—Probate Duty, Res. [150] 877
†Stade Dues, Address moved, [149] 1008, 1019, 1496, 1801
Supply, Res. [148] 1083;—†Lighthouses Abroad, [151] 1420
†"Varna," Loss of the, [151] 1370
†Weights and Measures, 2R. [150] 917
†Wight, Isle of, Pilots, Return moved for, [149] 1838
†Winding-up Acts, [150] 1518

HERBERT, Rt. Hon. H. A., (†Secretary for Ireland), Kerry Co.
†Belfast Riots, [148] 1870
Dublin and London, Communication between, [150] 921
†Dublin Metropolitan Police, Com. moved for, [148] 1475
†Endowed Schools, (Ireland), [148] 137
†Galway Election [148] 1372
Galway Freemen Disfranchisement, Com. [151] 598
†Grand Jury Laws, (Ireland), [148] 758
†Lunatic Asylums, (Ireland) [148] 1473
†Markets and Fairs, (Ireland) [148] 469
†Medical Charities (Ireland), Bill withdrawn, [148] 780
†Queen's Colleges, (Ireland), [148] 556
†Reformatory Schools, (Ireland), [148] 271
Roads, (Scotland), Commission moved for, [151] 1161
Supply—Public Education (Ireland) [151] 1230
†Weights and Measures (Ireland), [148] 758

HERBERT, Rt. Hon. S., Wiltshire, S.
Ali Moorad's Claim—Mr. Butt, Com. moved for, [148] 1866
Army Estimates, [150] 396
Army, Sanitary Condition of the, [150] 489;—Warrant of, 1854, [151] 755
Chelsea Bridge Act Amendment, 2R. [150] 1994
Commissioners for Exhibition (1851), Com. cl. 1, [151] 88, 90; Consid. 314
Conspiracy to Murder, Leave, [148] 1063
Guards, Mortality in the, Report moved for, [148] 1546; Amend. 1548
India, Government of, Res. 5, [150] 2043
India—Vote of Thanks to the Army, &c. [148] 915, 916;—Medical Aid in, [151] 1001
Military Academy—Competitive Examinations, Address moved for, [149] 1736
Military Organization, Res. [150] 1348
Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Res. [150] 1020

Herring Fisheries (Scotland) Bill,
c. 1R.* [151] 265; 2R.* 503; 3R.* 857
l. 1R.* [151] 910; 2R.* 1967; 3R.* 2151
Royal Assent, 2369

Highways, Management of,
c. Question (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen), [148] 137; [149] 2015

Hodge, Mr., Case of,
c. Question (Mr. Horsman), [149] 249

HODGSON, Mr. W. N., Carlisle
Jews, 3R. Adj. moved, [151] 1864

HOLLAND, Mr. E., Evesham
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Consid. cl. 1, [151] 2065

Holyhead Harbour—Supply,
c. [150] 1126

Hong-Kong—Supply,
c. [151] 1269

Hop Duty,
c. Observations (Sir J. Shelley), [151] 1163

HOPE, Mr. A. J. BERESFORD, Maidstone
Ballot, Leave, [150] 1757
Barracks, Model, and Public Offices, Papers moved for, [149] 781
Church Rates Abolition, 2R. [148] 1579; Com. cl. 1, [150] 559
Commissioners for Exhibition (1851), 2R. [150] 2267; Com. cl. 1, [151] 91; Consid. 315
Conspiracy to Murder, Leave, [148] 1010
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Com. cl. 1, [151] 1495
Education (England), Commission moved for, [148] 1212
Galway Freemen Disfranchisement, Leave, [149] 387; Com. Adj. moved, [150] 2157; [151] 595
Hop Duty, [151] 1164
Jews, 3R. [151] 1864
Marriage Law Amendment, Leave, [149] 615; 2R. Amend. [150] 108, 133, 135; Com. 1689; [151] 669; cl. 1, 671, 678, 682; cl. 2, Amend. 683; add. cl. 685; 3R. Amend. 909
Medical Practitioners, Com. add. cl. [151] 1000
New Caledonia, Government of, Com. cl. 1, [151] 1347
Oaths, Consid. [149] 488
Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Res. [150] 814
Supply—Office of Works, [150] 1131, 1132;—New Houses of Parliament, 1203;—Department of Science and Art, [151] 1172
Tower, Norman Chapel in the, [151] 1184
Wellington Monument, Res. [151] 2217

HOPWOOD, Mr. J. T., Clitheroe
Charity Commissioners, [148] 1605
Jews, 3R. [151] 1890
Lancashire and Yorkshire, &c. Railway Companies, Consid. [150] 1605

HORSFALL, Mr. T. B., Liverpool
Bank Acts, Com. moved for, [148] 656
China, Expedition to, [151] 11
Colonial and English Law, Assimilation of, [149] 422
Commerce, Tribunals of, Com. moved for, [149] 1160
Judkins, Capt.—Slave Trade, [150] 1532, 1945
Partnerships, Registration of, 2R., [151] 244
Supply—Police Courts (Metropolis), [150] 1487
Weights and Measures, 2R. Amend. [150] 913

HORSMAN, Rt. Hon. E., Stroud
Alien Act, The, [148] 768
Breach of Privilege—Washington Wilks, [150] 1327
"Cagliari," Capture of the, [149] 95
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Com. cl. 1, [151] 1595
Danubian Principalities, [151] 882
Diplomatic Salaries and Pensions, Res. [149] 1516
Edinburgh Annuity Tax, 2R. [150] 2188
Estimates, The, [149] 1607, 1610
Government, Policy of the [149] 204, 222
Hodge, Mr., Case of, [149] 249, 250
India—Ex-King of Delhi, [148] 557;—Transport of Troops to, Com. moved for, 718
India, Government of (No. 2), Leave, [149] 841, 875, 1348
India, Government of, Com. moved for, [149] 1710; Res. 1, 2072
Irish Secretary, Office of, Explanation, [150] 1450, 1455, 1465
Land, Sale and Transfer of (Ireland), Leave, [150] 42; Com. cl. 3, 2110
Malacca, Straits of, Correspondence moved for, [149] 992
Military Organization, Res. [150] 1344
Navy Estimates, [149] 943, 1639, 1642
Oaths, Consid. [149] 478
Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Res. [150] 1039;—Pacification of, [150] 1853
Property Qualification, Com. [150] 576
Supply—Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant (Ireland), [150] 1259;—Board of Public Works (Ireland), 1261;—General Register House, Edinburgh, 1497, 1500;—Public Education (Ireland), [151] 1234

HOTHAM, Lord, Yorkshire E. Riding
Army Estimates, [150] 1107, 1110
Lucknow, Defence of, [148] 1265
Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Res. [150] 1046
Probate and Letters of Administration, 2R. [151] 2055; Com. Amend. 2067
Rewards to Members, Res. [149] 1021, 1029, 1030; [151] 176, 207, 208
Rothschild, Baron de, Admission of, Res. [151] 2109
Stade Dues, Address moved, [149] 1017
York, Deanery of, [150] 1522

Hounslow, Review Ground at,
c. Question (Mr. Byng), [151] 1933

Howard, Mr., his Departure from Florence,
c. Question (Mr. Wise), [150] 1731; (Mr. Bowyer) 1849

Howden, Lord, Recall of,
c. Observations (Sir De L. Evans), [149] 1331

HUDSON, Mr. G., Sunderland
"Austria," The Steam Ship, Report moved for [148] 684
Bank Acts, Com. [148] 670
Bank Issues Indemnity, 3R. [148] 437
Finance, [148] 425
India, Government of (No. 3), Com. cl. 8, [151] 773; cl. 14, 869
Metropolis Local Management, Com. cl. 1, [151] 1943
Supply—Embassy House at Paris, [151] 1441

Hudson's Bay Company—Mr. Bannatyne,
c. Question (Viscount Bury), [148] 1266; Explanation (Mr. Labouchere), 1368; Question (Viscount Bury), [149] 1494; (Mr. Roebuck), [151] 1086, 1504; Res. Mr. Roebuck), 1788; Motion withdrawn, 1844;—see British Columbia, Government of, Bill

HUME, Mr. W. W. F., Wicklow Co.
Church Rates, 3R. Adj. moved, [150] 1403
Grand Jury Laws (Ireland), [148] 758
Parliament, New Houses of, Decay of the Stone, [151] 1931
Presbyterian and Roman Catholic Chaplains for the Army, [150] 2014
Property Qualification, Com. Adj. moved, [150] 578
Weights and Measures (Ireland), [148] 758

HUNT, Mr. G. W., Northamptonshire, N.
Ballot, Leave, [150] 1748
Conspiracy to Murder, Leave, [148] 1020
James, Mr. Edwin, [149] 2011
Members Freedom from Arrest, 2R. [151] 687, 690
Property Qualification, Com. cl. 1 [150] 1437

HUTT, Mr. W., Gateshead
Business, Public, [151] 1002
"Cagliari," Case of the, [150] 220
Church Leases, [149] 812
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Com. cl. 2, [151] 1604
Slave Trade, The, [151] 524, 1084, 1085, 1086; Res. 1286, 1344, 1607
Stade Dues, Address moved, [149] 1012, 1018, 1495, 1801

Imprisonment for Debt,
l. Returns moved for (Lord Brougham), [148] 1250

Imprisonment for Debt Abolition Bill,
l. 1R. [148] 755;
2R. postponed, [149] 572

Inclosure and Drainage Acts—Supply,
c. [150] 1262

Inclosure of Land Bill,
c. 1R.* [151] 1266; 2R.* 1369; 3R.* 1699
l. 1R.* [151] 1773,; 2R.* 1865; 3R.* 2077
Royal Assent, 2369

Income Tax Papers, Abstraction of,
c. Question (Mr. Crawford), [148] 1733

Incumbered Estates Court (Ireland),
c. Question (Mr. Cogan), [149] 174; (Mr. De Vere) 437

Incumbered Estates (West Indies) Act Amendment Bill,
l. 1R.* [151] 910; 2R.* 1146; 3R.* 1447
c. 1R.* [151] 1590; 2R.* 1699; Consid. 2055; 3R.* 2067
l. Royal Assent, [151] 2369

Indemnity Bill,
c. 1R.* [151] 1266; 2R.* 1369; 3R. 1596
l. 1R.* [151] 1655; 2R.* 1773; 3R.* 1906 Royal Assent, 1967

India,
Accounts, Public, l. Question (Earl Granville), [149] 2009
Annexation of Native States, l. Motion postponed (Earl of Albemarle), [150] 326
Army and Press Acts, l. Papers moved for (Earl of Ellenborough), [148] 237
c. Question (Mr. M. Gibson), [149] 2014
Army in, c. Question (Mr. Macartney), [149] 1653; Sir De L. Evans), [151] 870; (Lord Elcho), 1190;—Clothing for the, Question (Mr. Alcock), 756
Army Patronage, c. Question (Sir J. Pakington), [148] 420
Bengal Officers in the Civil Service, c. Question (Mr. Palk), [148] 1370
British Settlers in, c. Question (Mr. Blackburn) [151] 1187
Cadetships, c. Returns moved for (Col. Sykes), [148] 803
Calcutta Memorial, l. Papers moved for (Lord Wensleydale), [148] 1259
c. Question (Mr. Wise), [148] 681
Canning's, Lord, Proclamation—Confiscation of Land in Oude, l. Question, (Earl Granville), [150] 147, 177, 1267; Papers moved for (Earl of Ellenborough), 228; Notice (Earl of Shaftesbury), 323; Explanation (Marquess of Lansdowne), 404;
Res. (Earl of Shaftesbury), [150] 570; Previous Question moved (Lord Chancellor), 629, [Contents 158, Not-Contents 167, M. 9] 670; Observations (Earl of Derby), 919
c. Question (Mr. Bright), [150] 180; Notice (Mr. Cardwell,) 332; (Lord A. Vane-Tempest), 426; Question (Mr. Newdegate), 525; (Sir D. Norreys), 860; (Mr. Crawford), 865; Explanation (Viscount Palmerston), 925; Question (Mr. Wilson), 1921;
Res. (Mr. Cardwell), [150] 674; Amend. (Mr. Dillwyn), 728; Adj. moved (Mr. Roebuck), 761; Adj. Debate, 764, 931, 1024, 1026; Amend. and Motion withdrawn, 1060
Cavalry Reinforcements, c. Question (Captain Vivian), [148] 861
Cawnpore Massacre, The, l. Question (Earl of Shaftesbury), [149] 2097
Chaplains in, c. Question (Mr. Serjeant Deasy), [151] 880
Christianity in, l. Petition (Earl of Shaftesbury, [149] 2116
Clive Fund, The, c. Question (Sir J. Pakington), [148] 420, 462 Colonisation of, l. Message to Commons for a Paper, [Earl of Albemarle), [151] 376
c. Com. moved for, (Mr. W. Ewart), [149] 269; Nomination of Com. 553
Council of, c. Question (Mr. Crawford), [151] 1084
Delhi, Ex-King of, c. Question (Mr. Horsman), [148] 557

[cont.

India—cont.
Dhar, Principality of, c. Question (Mr. J. B. Smith), [149] 574; [150] 1919
East India Company's Petition, l. Question, (Earl Granville), [148] 808; (Earl Grey), 1121; (Earl of Shaftesbury), [151] 1447
c. Notice (Mr. T. Baring), [148] 970
Education in, l. Papers moved for (Earl of Ellenborough), [148] 1723
Education Regulations (Army), c. Observations (Mr. Fagan), [149] 424
Ellenborough, Earl of, Resignation of, l. [150] 404
c. Question (Lord A. Vane-Tempest) [150] 524
Government of, l. Question (Lord Monteagle), [149] 1350; (Earl of Albemarle), 1651; Report moved for (Duke of Argyll), 1955; Question (Marquess Lansdowne), [151] 1; Reply (Earl of Malmesbury), 66; Papers moved for (Earl of Ellenborough), 2151
c. Question (Mr. Wyld), [148] 681; Notice (Chancellor of the Exchequer), [149] 464;—see India, Government of, Bills
Governor General of, l. Question (Earl Granville), [150] 1267; Papers moved for (Marquess of Breadalbane), 1511; Motion withdrawn, 1516
Gwalior, Capture of, c. [151] 1933
Hindoo Shrines, c. Returns moved for (Sir H. Verney), [148] 805
Intelligence from, c. Question (Colonel French), [148] 313; (Sir J. Shelley), [150] 928
Kurrachee Suppression of the Mutiny at, c. Question (Mr. Dillwyn), [150] 924
Lawrence, Sir John, c. Question (Mr. Kinnaird, [151] 2125
Lucknow, Fall of, l. Observations (Earl of Derby), [149] 961;
Relief of—Mr. Cavanah, c. Question (Colonel French), [148] 757, 1264; (Lord Hotham), 1265;— Observations (Chancellor of the Exchequer), [149] 1019;—Property taken in, Question (Mr. Laurie) [150] 333;—Rewards to the Garrison, Question (Mr. Kinnaird), [151] 754
Medals for the Army, l. Question (Duke of Newcastle), [151] 911
c. Question (Mr. Kinnaird), [149] 423, 712, 1989
Medical Aid in, c. Question (Mr. S. Herbert), [151] 1001
Meerut, Mutiny at, l. Explanation (Earl of Ellenborough), [148] 131; Observations (Viscount) Melville), 449 Mutineers, Punishment of, l. Question (Earl of Ellenborough), [148] 1360
c Question (Mr. A. Mills), [148] 551;—Amnesty to, Question (Mr. Buxton), [151] 1786
Mutiny in, c. Papers moved for (Mr. Rich), [149] 346
Officers, Distinctions conferred upon, c. Question (Colonel North), [148] 138
Oude, Policy in, l. Petition (Earl of Albemarle), [149] 1921
Oude, Annexation of, c. Papers moved for (Mr. Baillie), [148] 1477; Question (Sir E. Perry), [149] 1587
Overland Route, The, c. Question (Mr. Nicoll), [151] 1700
Press of, c. Question (Mr. M. Gibson), [149] 2014
Private Correspondence, c. Notice (Mr. Lygon),

[cont.

India—cont.
[150] 674; Question (Mr. Lygon), 764; Explanation, (Viscount Palmerston), 925
Prize Money for the Army before Delhi, c. Question (Mr. Laurie), [148] 553; (Mr. Kinnaird), [149] 324
Property destroyed in, c. Question (Mr. Blackburn), [148] 555
Public Works, c. Question (Mr. Cheetham), [149] 712
Railways, c. Com. moved for, (Mr. Liddell), [149] 1376
Reinforcements for the Army, c. Question (Mr. Wyld), [150] 524; (Mr. W. Ewart), [151] 2032; Observations (Sir J. Elphinstone), 2037; (Viscount Palmerston), 2043
Roads and Canals, c. Question (Mr. Cheetham), [151] 1370
Salkeld, Lieutenant, c. Question (Mr. K. Seymer) [151] 755
Sepoys, The Mutinous, c. Observations (Mr. Rich) [149] 1593
State of, l. Question (Lord Monteagle), [149] 703; (Earl Granville), 704
c. Question (Mr. V. Smith), [151] 2038
Surat—The Nawab's Debts, c. Question (Mr. Collier), [151] 40
Telegraphic Communication, l. Question (Lord Wodehouse) [151] 2289;
Through Austria, c. Question (Mr. Crawford), [148] 137;—From India, Question (Mr. Lygon), 461; (Mr. Warren), 557; (Mr. Brady), [151] 1283; (Mr. Wilson), 2304
Troops, Transport of, to, l. Correspondence moved for (Viscount Dungannon), [148] 448; Motion withdrawn, 449; Observations (Viscount Dungannon), 1719
c. Question (Mr. W. Vansittart), [148] 355; (Sir J. Pakington), 461; (Mr. Adderley), 462; Com. moved for (Sir De L. Evans), 715; Amend. (Mr. Roebuck), 719; Amend. withdrawn, 720; Orig. Motion withdrawn, 724; Com. moved for (Sir De L. Evans), 724; Amend. (Lord J. Russell), 725, [o. q. A. 147, N. 78, M. 69] 738; Question (Mr. Nicoll), [150] 2113; Explanation (Viscount Goderich), [151] 1867 Vote of Thanks to the Civil Service, Army and Navy, l. Res. (Lord Panmure), [148] 1809; Amended Res. (Earl of Ellenborough), [149] 243;—Acknowledgment of, [150] 2193; [151] 2152;—The Defence of Arrah, Explanation (Earl of Derby), [148] 1249
c. Question (Sir De L. Evans), [148] 140; Res. (Viscount Palmerston), 865; Previous Question moved (Mr. Disraeli), 890; Previous Question withdrawn, 931; Amended Res. (Chancellor of the Exchequer), [149] 250; —Acknowledgment of, [151] 2272

See

Bombay, Chief Justice of, Bill
East India Loan Bills
India, Government of, Bills
Oude

India, Government of, (No. 1) Bill.
c. Leave, [148] 1276; Amend. (Mr. T. Baring), 1304; Adj. Debate, 1372; Adj. moved, (Col. Sykes), [A. 280, N. 32, M. 248] 1457; Notice (Viscount Palmerston), 1551, 1607, [o. q. A. 318, N. 173, M. 145] 1715; 1R.* 1718;
[cont.

India—cont.
Postponement of, 2R. [149] 156;
Bill withdrawn, [151] 1241

India, Government of, (No. 2) Bill,
c. Leave, [149] 818; 1R.* 846;
Observations (Lord J. Russell), [149] 858;
2R. deferred, 1348;
Question (Viscount Goderich), 1584

India, Government of,
c. Com. moved for (Chancellor of the Exchequer), [149] 1654; Amend. (Mr. Gregory), 1692; Amend. withdrawn, 1721, 2016; Amend. (Lord H. Vane), 2023, [o. q. A. 447, N. 57, M. 390] 2046;
Res. 1 (Chancellor of the Exchequer), [149] 2047;
Res. 2, 2093, 2177; Amend. (Mr. Ayrton), 2183 [151] [o. q. A. 351, N. 100, M. 251] 2200; [150] 292; Amend. (Mr. Rich), 295; Amend withdrawn, 317;
Res. 3 (4), 318, 1613; Amend. (Mr. Gladstone) 1633, [o. q. A. 265, N. 116, M. 149] 1666; Amend. (Mr. Roebuck), 1673; Amend. neg. 1678; Amend. (Mr. Lindsay), 1679; Amend. neg. 1681; Amend. (Lord J. Russell), ib. 1948; Amend. (Lord Stanley) 1969, [o. q. A. 176, N. 243, M. 67] 1988;
Res. 4 (5), 1989; Amend. (Mr. Gregson) 1990;
Res. 5 (6), 2018; Amend. (Lord J. Russell), 2026, [o. q. A. 250, N. 185, M. 65] 2081; Adj. moved (Viscount Goderich), [r. p. A. 155, N. 239, M. 84] 2085;
Res. 6 (7), 2221; Motion withdrawn, 2251;
Report, 2253

India, Government of (No. 3), Bill,
150] c. 1R.* 2254
151] 2R. 315;
· Com. 447;
· cl. 3, 448; Amend. (Mr. C. Fortescue), 449, [A. 77, N. 221, M. 144] 461;
· cl. 4, 461;
· cl. 7, Amend. (Viscount Palmerston), 462, [o. q. A. 227, N. 165, M. 62] 466; 2nd Amend. 468, [A. 147, N. 240, M. 93] 470; Amend. (Mr. Gladstone), ib., 757; Amend. neg. 761
· cl. 8, Amend. (Mr. Vernon Smith), [o q. A. 146, N. 71, M. 75] 762; Amend. (Sir J. Graham), ib.; Amend. neg. 763; Amend. (Mr. Gladstone), 764; Amend. neg. 773; Amend. (Lord Stanley), ib.;
· cl. 9, Amend. (Lord A. Vane-Tempest), 774; Amend. neg. 775;
· cl. 10, Amend. (Lord Stanley), 775;
· cl. 11, Amend. (Mr. Gregson), 776, [o. q. A. 154, N. 118, M. 36] 782; Amend. (Solicitor General), 783;
· cl. 12, 784; Amend. (Mr. Liddell), 785, [o. q. A. 245, N. 121, M. 124] 790;
· cl. 13, 857; Amend. (Mr. Collins), 858, [o. q. A. 224, N. 57, M. 167] 865;
· cl. 14, 865; Amend (Mr. Rich), 866; Amend. neg. 867, [A. 199, N. 101, M. 98] 869;
· cl. 15, Amend. (Lord Stanley), 869;
· cl. 19; cl. 20, 883;
· cl. 21; cl. 22; cl. 23, 886;
· cl. 27, 887, [A. 119, N. 95, M. 24] 897;
· cl. 29, Amend. (Sir E. Perry), 897; Amend. withdrawn, 899;

India, Government of Bill—cont.
151] cl. 31 ; cl. 32, 900 ;
· cl. 36, 901 ;
· cl. 37, 902 ;
· cl. 38, Amend. (Mr. Willoughby), 902; Amend. withdrawn, 903 ;
· cl. 43 ; cl. 47 ; cl. 48, 906 ;
· cl. 49 ; cl. 53 ; cl. 60, 907 ;
· add. cl. (Chancellor of the Exchequer), 908 ;
· cl. 33, 931 ;
· cl. 34, 932 ;
· cl. 35, 935, [A. 165, N. 91, M. 74] 939 ;
· add cl. (Mr. Elliot) ; cl. neg. 940 ;
· add. cl. (Mr. Campbell), 490 ; cl. neg. 941
· add. cl. (Mr. Fagan), 941 ; cl. withdrawn, 945;
· Considered, Amend. (Mr. Gregson), 1002 ; Motion neg., 1003 ;
· cl. 31, Amend. (Lord Stanley), 1003 ;
· add. cl. (Mr. Gladstone), 1007 ; Amend. (Solicitor General), 1016, [A. 152. N. 46, M. 106] 1017 ;
· add. cl. (Viscount Palmerston) 1017, [A. 115, N. 149, M. 34] 1035 ;
· add. cl. (Mr. D. Seymour), 1035; cl. withdrawn, 1036 ; 2nd add. cl. ib. ; cl. withdrawn, 1039 ;
· cl. 10. Amend. (Sir E. Perry), 1039; Motion neg. 1040 ;
· cl. 27, Amend. (Lord J. Russell), 1040, [o. q. A. 176, N. 149, M. 27] 1050 ;
· cl. 33, Amend. (Mr. T. Baring), 1050 ; Amend. withdrawn, ib. ;
· 3R. 1086 ;
151] l. 1R. 1146 ;
· 2R. 1447 ;
· Com. cl. 7, 1561 ; Amend. (Marquess of Clanricarde), 1578 ; Amend. neg. 1579 ;
· cl. 8, 1579 ;
· cl. 9 ; Amend. (Earl of Ellenborough), 1580 ;
· cl. 10, 1580 ;
· cl. 11, Amend. (Earl of Ellenborough), 1581 ; Amend. neg. 1582 ;
· cl. 12, Amend. (Earl of Shaftesbury), 1582 ; Amend. neg. 1583 ; Amend. (Earl of Albemarle), ib., [Contents 35, Not-Contents 50, M. 15] 1585 ;
· cl. 14 ; cl. 15 ; 1586 ;
· cl. 22, Amend. (Earl of Derby), 1586 ;
· cl. 27 ; cl. 29 ; cl. 30, 1587 ;
· cl. 32, Amend. (Earl of Derby), 1588 ;
· cl. 33, Amend. (Bishop of Oxford), 1589 ; Amend. neg. 1590 ;
· cl. 34, 1679, [Contents 41, Not-Contents 34, M. 7] 1689 ;
· cl. 36, 1689 ;
· cl. 41, 1691 ;
· cl. 52, Amend. (Earl of Ellenborough), 1691 ;
· cl. 53, Amend. (Earl of Derby), 1693 ; Amend. (Earl of Shaftesbury), ib. Amend. neg. 1694 ;
· cl. 54, 1694, Amend. (Earl Granville), 1696 ;
· add. cl. (Earl of Derby), 1696, [Contents 52, Not-Contents 36, M. 16] 1698 ;
· Rep. Amend. (Earl of Ellenborough), 1783 ;
· cl. 66, Amend. (Earl of Derby), 1784 ;
· Observations (Duke of Newcastle), 1906 ;
· 3R. Amend. (Lord Wrottesley), 2007 ; Amend. neg. 2008 ;
· cl. 29, Amend. (Earl of Derby), 2008 ;
· add. cl. (Earl of Derby), 2009 ;
· That the Bill do pass, 2010 ;
· Bill passed, 2020 ;
· Protest, 2020

[cont.

India, Government of, Bill—cont.
151] c. Lords' Amends. 2171 ; Amend. (Col. Sykes), 2177 ; Amend. withdrawn, 2185 ;
· cl. 27, Amend. (Lord J. Russell), 2185 ; Amend. neg. 2189, [m. q. A. 38, N. 106, M. 68] ib.;
· cl. 29, Amend. (Sir J. Graham), 2189 ;
· cl. 31, 2192 ;
· cl. 32, Amend. (Lord J. Russell), 2193, [o. q. A. 60, N. 73, M. 13] 2202 ;
· cl. 34, Amend. (Sir De L. Evans), 2202
· cl. 35, Amend. (Sir J. Graham), 2203, [o. q. A. 95, N. 28, M. 67] 2205
· l. Commons' Reasons, 2250, 2301
· c. Lords' Amends. 2306, [A. 98, N. 53, M. 45] 2347
· l. Royal Assent, 2369

INGESTRE, Viscount, Stafford
Barracks, Infantry and Cavalry, [148] 1370
Lancaster, Duchy of—Mining Operations, Com. moved for, [150] 453
Westminster, Palace of, [149] 1798

INGHAM, Mr. R., South Shields
Assessed and Income Taxes, Res. [151] 212
Ecclesiastical Commission, Bill put off, [151] 2127
Harbours of Refuge, [151] 1747 ; Commission moved for, 2147
Masters and Workmen, Leave, [149] 1815 ; 2R. [150] 533
Private Bills, Res. [150] 469
Rewards to Members, [151] 2352
Stanhope and Wolsingham Rectories, Com. [150] 2285
United States, Difference with the, [150] 1250

INGLIS, Rt. Hon. J.,—see Advocate, The Lord

Inglis, Major General,
c. Question (Colonel North), [151] 2352; Reply (Lord Stanley), 2368

INGRAM, Mr. H., Boston
Bank Issues Indemnity, 2R. [148] 313
Budget, The—Financial Statement, [149] 1309
Chelsea Bridge Act Amendment, Recom. Amend. [151] 1863
Collectors of the Revenue, Return moved for, [151] 2281
Drafts on Bankers, Consid. [151] 2054
Havelock's, Lady and Sir H. Havelock's Annuities, Com. Res. [148] 779
Paper Duty, Res. [151] 110
Supply—Education, [151] 150

Inland Revenue Department—Supply,
c. [150] 227 ; [151] 1280

Insolvent Debtors Court—Supply,
c. [150] 1472

Insurance and Assurance Institutions Bill,
c. Leave, [150] 879 ; 1R.* 1404 ;
2R. 2191 ; Amend. (Mr. H. B. Sheridan), 2192 ; Amend. (Mr. Sotheron Estcourt) ib. ; Adj. Debate, 2288; [151] 1064; Amend, (Mr. Sotheron Escourt), 1066

Insurance, Fire,
c. Question (Mr. Hadfield), [151] 1398

International Patent Right Bill,
c. 1R.* [151] 2020; 2R.* 2105; 3R.* 2168
l. 1R.* [151] 2241

Ireland,
Assistant Barristers, c. Question (Mr. Butt) [151] 56
Banks, l. Return moved for, (Lord Monteagle), [148] 452
Bar, Admission to the, c. Question (Mr. Mc Mahon) [149] 1988
Belfast Corporation, c. Question (Mr. Macartney), [151] 84, 1001
Belfast, Franchise at, c. Question (Mr. Mc Mahon), [149] 1988
Belfast, Riots in, l. Question (Viscount Dungannon), [150] 1591
c. Question (Captain Archdall), [148] 1869; (Mr. J. D. FitzGerald), [150] 1534
Belfast, Roman Catholic Magistrates in, Question (Mr. Deasy), [150] 523
Belvoir, Agricultural Model School at, c. Question (Mr. Calcutt), [150] 332
Browne, Colonel, and Mr. O'Ferrall, c. Question (Mr. Cogan), [151] 1607;—see Police Force Ireland Bill
Business, Irish, c. Question (Mr. Bagwell) [151] 880
Cashel Election, c. Petition (Sir F. Baring), [149] 159; Motion (Mr. Walpole), 246
Charitable Bequests Act, c. Question (Mr. Lefroy), [151] 1000
Conspiracy to Murder, c. Leave, [150] 879; Motion withdrawn, 883
Divorce Act, l. Question (Lord Lyndhurst), [149] 1923
Donegal, Destitution in, c. Com. moved for, (Mr. Bagwell), [149] 1525, [A. 147, N. 111, M. 36] 1543
Dublin, Affray at, l. Observations (Earl of Roden), [149] 170
c. Question (Mr. Grogan), [149] 172; (The O'Donoghoe), 436; (Mr. De Vere), 437; (Mr. Vance), 574; Report moved for (Mr. Hatchell), 669; Adj. moved (Mr. Spooner), 689; Motion withdrawn, 702
Dublin and London, Communication between, l. Question (Viscount Dungannon), [148] 969; [149] 1098
c. Question (Mr. H. Herbert), [150] 921; (Mr. Deasy), [149] 1170
Dublin Metropolitan Police, c. Com. moved for (Mr. Grogan), [148] 1473, [A. 105, N. 200, M. 95] 1477; Question (Mr. Grogan), [149] 574; (Mr. Esmonde), [150] 21
Dublin Port Dues, c. Com. moved for, (Mr. Vance), [149] 1356
Education—The National System, l. Question (Marquess of Clanricarde), [149] 401
Ejectments—Case of John Byrne, c. Papers moved for (Mr. P. O'Brien), [149] 1842; Motion withdrawn, 1844
Ellis, Mr., Murder of — The Cormacks, c. Question (Mr. Brady), [150] 1311; (The O'Donoghoe), [151] 16, 1194, 1785
Endowed Schools, l. Observations (Earl of Cork), [149] 2104
c. Question (Mr. Greer), [148] 137; (Mr. Grogan) [149] 460; Return moved for, (Mr. Black), 782; Question (Mr. Bagwell), [150 428; Res. (Mr. Kirk), [151] 624; Motion withdrawn, 636
Fairs and Markets, c. Question (Mr. Macartney), [149] 423
Galway Election, c. Question (Mr. Collins), [148] 1371; (Mr. Kinnaird), [149] 1264
Galway Freemen Disfranchisement, c. Petition (Mr. Roebuck), [149] 322 — see Galway Freemen Disfranchisement Bill
Grand Jury Laws, c. Question (Mr. Hume), [148] 758; (Mr. Macartney), [149] 423
Incumbered Estates Court, c. Question (Mr. Bagwell), [148] 1262; (Mr. Cogan), [149] 174; (Mr. De Vere), 437
Kerry, Assistant Barrister of the County of, l. Motion (Earl of Donoughmore), [150] 1587, 2096
Land, Transfer of, c. Question (Mr. Vance), [148] 550; (Mr. S. B. Miller), [149] 2015;—see Land, Sale and Transfer of (Ireland) Bill
Landed Estates Court, c. Question (Sir E. Perry), [150] 2252
Landlord and Tenant, c. Question (Mr. P. O'Brien), [151] 421; Reply (Chancellor of the Exchequer), 442;—see Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Bill
Limerick City Election, c. Report, [150] 332; New Writ moved (Colonel French), 336; Motion withdrawn, ib.
Lord Lieutenant of, c. Res. (Mr. Roebuck), [149] 712; Previous Question moved (Mr. S. B. Miller), 722, [A. 116, N. 243, M. 127] 772
Lunatic Asylums, c. Question (Mr. Bland) [148] 1473: Commission, Question (Mr. Macartney), [150] 1919; (Mr. J. D. FitzGerald), [151] 2036
Magistracy, The, l. Question (Marquess of Londonderry), [149] 164 Markets and Fairs, c. Question (Lord F. Conyngham), [148] 469;—see Markets and Fairs (Ireland) Bill.
Maynooth College, c. Com. moved for (Mr. Spooner), [149] 1990, [A. 155, N. 210, M. 55] 1999
Mayo Priests, Prosecution of the, c. Question (Lord J. Browne), [149] 1589; [150] 1850
Mayo Writ, c. Motion (Colonel French), [148] 385
Moore's, Mr. Cecil, Appointment — Orange Lodges, c. Question (Mr. J. D. FitzGerald), [150] 1920; Res. (Mr. J. D. FitzGerald), [151] 636; Motion neg. 665
Mortgages, Judgments on, c. Question (Mr. S. B. Miller), [151] 311
National School Books, c. Question (Mr. Black), [148] 1732
Official Debtors, c. Question (Mr. Hatchell), [149] 1583
Orange Society, Dublin, c. Explanation (Mr. B. Osborne), [149] 464
Probate Court, c. Question (Mr. Hatchell), [148] 459
Queen's College, Cork, l. Notice of Motion withdrawn (Earl of St. Germans), [151] 2271
Queen's Colleges, c. Question (Mr. Beamish), [148] 556; (Mr. Fagan), [151] 930;—see Supply
Reformatory Schools, c. Question (Mr. Bagwell), [148] 271;—see Reformatory Schools (Ireland) Bill

[cont.

[cont.

Ireland—cont.
Registration of Births, &c., c. Question (Mr. Brady), [150] 1610
Secretary, The Irish, Office of, c. Explanation (Mr. Horsman), [150] 1450
Supply—Public Works, [150] 1128;—Kingstown Harbour, 1128;—Officers of Lord Lieutenant, 1252; Amend. (Mr. Wise), 1253; Amend. withdrawn, 1254; 2nd Amend., [A. 42, N. 88, M. 46] 1254;—Secretary to Lord Lieutenant, Amend. (Mr. Baxter), ib., [A. 55, N. 151, M. 96] 1259; Amend. (Mr. W. Williams), [A. 68, N. 148, M. 80] ib.;—Paymaster of Civil Services;—Inspectors of Lunatic Asylums, 1259;—Board of Public Works, 1261;—General Register Office, Dublin, 1262;—Admiralty Court, Dublin, 1472;—Courts of Law, 1502, 1503;—Public Education, [151] 1204;—Commissioners of Education;—Queen's University;—Queen's Colleges, 1237;—Royal Irish Academy;—Royal Hibernian Academy Amend. (Lord Haddo), 1238, [A. 24, N. 128, M. 104] 1240;—Theological Professors, Belfast, Amend. (Mr. Crossley), 1240, [A. 34, N. 122, M. 88] 1241;—Infirmaries and Hospitals, 1276, 1277;—Nonconforming, &c., Ministers, 1277; Amend. (Mr. Baxter), 1278, [A. 55, N. 165, M. 110] 1280; Amend. (Mr. Gilpin), [A. 69, N. 147, M. 78] ib.;—Incumbered Estates Court, 1402;—Publication of Ancient Laws, &c. 1419;—Process Servers, 1420;—Boundary Survey, [A. 118, N. 91, M. 27] 1423;—Agricultural and Emigration Statistics, ib.;—New Public Offices, Belfast, ib.;—Four Courts Extension, Dublin;—National Gallery, Dublin;—Royal Dublin Society, 1425 Tenant Right, l. Question (Marquess of Clanricarde), [151] 913
c. Com. moved for, (Mr. Greer), [150] 181, [A. 43, N. 232, M. 189] 195
Trinity College, Dublin, Question (Mr. Fagan), [151] 753
Tuam, Romish Procession in, c. Question (Sir W. Verner), [150] 2018
Vaccination, c. Question (Mr. Monsell), [150] 287;—see Vaccination (Ireland) Bill Valuation, c. Com. moved for (Mr. Grogan), [150] 911; Motion withdrawn, 913
Waterford, Harbour at, c. Question (Mr. Hassard), [150] 859
Weights and Measures, c. Question (Mr. Hume), [148] 758

See
Administration of Justice (Dublin) Bill
Churches, &c. (Ireland) Bill
Civil Bills, &c. (Ireland) Act Amendment Bill
Clerks of Petty Sessions (Ireland) Bill
Ecclesiastical Residences (Ireland) Bill
Emblements, &c. (Ireland) Bill
Four Courts (Dublin) Extension Bill
Galway Freemen Disfranchisement Bill
Galway Harbour and Port Act Amendment Bill
Game Laws (Ireland) Bill
Grand Juries (Ireland) Bill
Judgments (Ireland) Act Amendment Bill
Juries (Ireland) Bill
Land, Sale and Transfer of (Ireland), Bill
Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Bill
Leasing Powers (Ireland) Bill
Markets and Fairs (Ireland) Bill

[cont.

Ireland—cont.
Medical Charities (Ireland) Bill
Navigation Advances (Ireland) Bill
Nisi Prius Court (Ireland) Bill
Peace Preservation (Ireland) Act Continuance Bill
Police Force (Ireland), Bill
Prescription (Ireland) Bill
Railways Act (Ireland) Continuance Bill
Rateable Property (Ireland) Bill
Reformatory Schools (Ireland) Bill
Tenants' Compensation (Ireland) Bill
Vaccination (Ireland) Bill
Wexford Harbour Embankment Bill
Wine, &c. (Ireland), Bill

Italian National League,
c. Question (Mr. Bowyer), [149] 462

JACKSON, Mr. W., Newcastle-under-Lyme
Chelsea Bridge Act Amendment, 2R. [150] 1996
Health, Public, Com. cl. 4, [150] 2281, 2284, 2285
Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Res. [150] 1040
Supply—British Museum, [150] 1582
Weedon Establishment, Commission moved for, [150] 1800; [151] 585
Westminster Bridge, [151] 1267

James, Mr. Edwin,
c. Question (Mr. Hunt), [149] 2011

Jeddah, Massacre at,
l. Question (Lord Stratford de Redcliffe), [151] 1655
c. Question (Mr. Liddell), [151] 1285; (Sir J. Elphinstone), 1931

Jenner, Dr., Statue of,
c. Question (Lord A. Vane-Tempest, [150] 274; (Mr. T. Duncombe), 354

Jersey, Laws of,
c. Question (Mr. Hadfield), [150] 1308

JERVOISE, Sir J. C. Hampshire, S.
Marriage Law Amendment, Com. [151] 670

Jews' Bill,
l. 1R. [150] 1600;
Notice (Earl of Clancarty), 1998;
[151] 2R. Deferred, 154;
2R. 702; Amend. (Lord Clancarty), 713, [o. q. Contents 143, Not-Contents 97, M. 46] 726;
Com. 916, 1070;
add. cl. (Duke of Marlborough) 1074;
3R. 1257; Amend. (Earl of Galloway), [o. q. Contents 33, Not-Contents 12, M. 21] 1258;
Amend. (Lord Redesdale), 1259; Amend. withdrawn, 1260;
Amend. (Earl of Harrington), 1264; Amend. withdrawn, 1265;
Protest, 1265
[151] c. 1R.* 1369;
Observations (Lord J. Russell), 1371;
2R. 1614; Amend. (Mr. Newdegate), 1620, [o. q. A. 156, N. 65, M. 91] 1634;
Com. 1754, [A. 144, N. 40, M. 104] 1759;

[cont.

Jews' Bill—cont.
151] cl. 1, 1759; Proviso (Mr. Spooner), 1761; Proviso neg. 1762;
3R. Adj. moved (Mr. Newdegate), 1863, [A. 38, N. 86, M. 48] 1864; Adj. moved. (Colonel North), [A. 22, N. 99, M. 77] ib., 1879; Amend. (Mr. Warren), 1890, [o. q. A. 129, N. 55, M. 77] 1902
l. Royal Assent, [151] 1967

JOHNSTONE, Hon. H. B., Canterbury,
Dumfriesshire Militia, [149] 1225
Estimates, The, [149] 1615
Magisterial Appointments, [150] 267, 270
Military Organization, Res. [150] 1346

JOHNSTONE, Mr. J. J. H., Dumfriesshire
County Voters, Registration of (Scotland), Com. [150] 2191
Western Bank of Scotland, [149] 1214, 1219

Johnstone, Colonel, Case of,
l. Question (Lord Panmure), [150] 1586

Joint-Stock Banks—Unlimited Liability,
c. Motion (Mr. Headlam), [148] 359; Amend. (Mr. Hankey), 384; Motion neg. 385, [A. 47, N. 111, M. 71] ib.

Joint-Stock Banking Companies Bill,
c. Leave, [148] 1169; 1R.* 1367;
2R. deferred, [149] 1919;
2R. [150] 534; Amend. (Mr. Black), 536; Amend. neg. 557;
Com. Adj. moved (Mr. Buchanan), 1503, [A. 77, N. 140, M. 63] 1504; Amend. (Mr. Wilson). ib.; Adj. moved (Mr. Warren), 1505; Motion withdrawn, 1506;
cl. 2, 1910;
cl. 3, Amend. (Mr. Wilson), ib.; Amend. withdrawn, 1911;
add. cl. (Mr. Weguelin), 1912, [A. 40, N. 128, M. 88] 1913; 3R. [151] 224; Amend. (Mr. Cowan), [o. q. A. 60, N. 13, M. 47] 225
l. 1R.* [151] 255;
2R. 1351; 3R.* 2151
Royal Assent, 2369

Joint-Stock Companies Act Amendment Bill,
c. 1R.* [150] 1601; 2R.* 2014;
Com. cl. 7, 2271;
cl. 19, 2273; cl. 20, 2274;
cl. 21, 2276; cl. struck out, ib.;
3R.* [151] 83
l. 1R.* [151] 154;
2R. 916; 3R.* 1243
Royal Assent, 1967

Joint-Stock Companies, Registration of—Supply
c. [151] 1420

JOLLIFFE, Sir W. G. H., (Secretary to the Treasury), Petersfield
Business, Public [149] 4, 71, 72, 175, 176
East India Loan, Consid. [149] 74

Judgments (Ireland) Act Amendment Bill,
c. 1R.* [151] 730;
2R. [A. 89, N. 34, M. 55] 974;
Com. cl. 1, Proviso (Mr. Whiteside), 1959; Proviso withdrawn, 1961;
3R.* 2105
l. 1R.* [151] 2077; 2R.* 2151; 3R.* 2282
Royal Assent, 2369

Judkins, Capt. Case of—see United States, Difference with the,

"Juno," H. M. Ship,
c. Question (Mr. Warren) [148] 269

Juries (Ireland) Bill,
c. 1R.* [149] 982;
2R. 2008; House counted out, 2009

Juries (Ireland) (No. 2) Bill,
c. 1R.* [150] 2014;
2R. 2285

Justice, Department of,
c. Question (Mr. Warren), [148] 553; (Mr. W. Ewart), 1168, 1734; [149] 815; [151] 1184

Kafirs, The Starving,
c. Question (Mr. Bagwell), [148] 554;—see Cape of Good Hope

KEATING, Sir H. S., Reading, (†SOLICITOR GENERAL, The)
†Conspiracy to Murder, Leave, [148] 1049
Criminal Statute Law, [149] 709

KELLY, Sir F., Suffolk, E.—See also, ATTORNEY GENERAL, The
Civil Service Superannuation, [148] 1264
Land, Transfer of, [148] 758

KENDALL, Mr. N., Cornwall, E.
Cornwall Submarine Mines, Com. [151] 1654
Metropolis Local Management Act Amendment, Leave, [151] 1524; 2R. 1730
Thames, State of the, [151] 431

Kensington Gardens,
c. Question (Mr. W. Ewart) [149] 983

KER, Mr. R., Downpatrick
Attorney General, the late, and the Law Lords, [149] 14
Howden, Lord, Recall of, [149] 1338
Passport System in France, Correspondence moved for, [149] 596

Kerry, Assistant Barrister, of the County of,
l. Motion (Earl of Donoughmore), [150] 1587

KING, Hon. P. J. L., Surrey, E.
Circassia—Treaty of Paris, [148] 1739
County Franchise, Leave, [149] 1816, 1836; 2R. [150] 1857
Joint-Stock Banks, [148] 376

[cont.

KING, Hon. P. J. L.—cont.
Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Res. [150] 865, 1037
Parliamentary Reform, [149] 1180
Property Qualification, Leave, [149] 1543; 2R. [150] 222; Com. 577, 578; cl. 1, 1431; 3R. 1506
Real Property, &c.—Probate Duty, Res. [150] 878
Supply—Embassies and Missions abroad, [151] 1272;—National Gallery, Report, 1383;—Temporary Commissions, Amend. 1402

KINGLAKE, Mr. Serj. J. A., Rochester
Bernard, Dr., Case of, [149] 1491
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Com. cl. 1, [151] 1489

KINGLAKE, Mr. A. W., Bridgwater,
"Cagliari," Capture of the, [149] 82, 463, 1495; [150] 106, 220, 277
Chancellor of the Exchequer's Speech at Slough, [150] 1246
China, Negotiations with, [150] 1448
Conspiracy to Murder, Leave, Amend. [148] 939, 1078

KINGSCOTE, Col. R. N. F., Gloucestershire, W.
Army Medical Officers, [150] 334
Forest of Dean, [151] 524

KINGSTON, Earl of Questions, Postponement of, moved, [150] 1596, 1598

Kingston, Earl of, Notice of Questions by the,
l. Observations (Earl of St. Germans), [150] 438; Postponement of moved, (Earl of Kingston), 1596; Motion, Lord Lyndhurst), 1600

KINNAIRD, Hon. A. F., Perth
Army Estimates, [150] 386
"Cagliari," Case of the, [150] 428
Charitable Trusts Act Continuance, [151] 1437; Com. Adj. moved, 1549
Commissioners for Exhibition (1851), 2R. [150] 2261; Com. cl. 1, [151] 90; Consid. 314
Delhi, Medals for the Capture of, [149] 423
Diplomatic Salaries and Pensions, Res. [149] 1508, 1523
Galway Election, [149] 1264
Havelock, Sir H., Pension to, Rep. [148] 412
Havelock's Lady, and Sir H. Havelock's Annuities, Com. Res. [148] 775
Hudson's Bay Company, Res. [151] 1838
India, Government of, (No. 3), Consid. add. cl. [151] 1028; Lords' Amends. 2321
India—Vote of Thanks to the Army, &c., [148] 922;—Colonisation of, Com. moved for, [149] 285;—Medals for the Army in, 423, 712, 1989
Joint-Stock Companies, Com. cl. 3, [150] 1911
Lawrence, Sir John, [151] 2125
Lucknow, Rewards to the Garrison of, [151] 754
Marriage Law Amendment, Com. [150] 1689
Medical Practitioners [148] 550
Mutiny, 2R. [149] 266

[cont.

KINNAIRD, Hon. A. F.—cont.
Navy Estimates, [149] 945
Oude, Annexation of, Papers moved for, [148] 1536
Prize Money, Indian, [149] 324
Stamp Duties on Drafts, Com. Preamble, [150] 291, 292
Supply—Police Courts (Metropolis), [150] 1487;—General Register House, Edinburgh, 1499;—British Museum, 1582;—Royal Hibernian Academy, [151] 1239; Lighthouses Abroad, 1420
Universities (Scotland), Consid. cl. 14, [151] 959

KIRK, Mr. W., Newry
Bank Issues Indemnity, 2R. [148] 303; 3R. 443
Endowed Schools (Ireland), [149] 461; Res. [151] 624, 635
Excise Duties, 2R. [149] 1747
Masters and Workmen, 2R. [150] 534
Navy Estimates, [149] 1640
Stamp Duties on Drafts, Com. cl. 2, [150] 289
Tenants' Compensation (Ireland), 2R. [150] 1815
Weights and Measures, 2R. [150] 916

KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN, Mr. E. H., Sandwich
Breach of Privilege—Mr. Washington Wilks, [150] 1024, 1318
Church Rates Abolition, Com. [149] 1428
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Com. cl. 1, [151] 1497, 1590; Consid. add. cl. 2023; cl. 1, 2029, 2065
Ecclesiastical Commission, [148] 137
Galway Freemen Disfranchisement, 2R. [149] 786
Highways, Management of, [148] 137; [149] 2015
Leases and Sales of Settled Estates, Com. [151] 2208
Marriage Law Amendment, Consid. [151] 792
Metropolis Local Management, Com. cl. 1, [151] 1943
Oaths, Com. [149] 304; Consid. 515, 516
Supply—Ecclesiastical Commissioners, Amend. [151] 1399, 1401

KNIGHT, Mr. F. W., (Secretary Poor Law Commissioners), Worcestershire, W.
Hop Duty, [151] 1164

KNIGHTLEY, Mr. R., Northamptonshire, S.
Corrupt Practices Prevention, 3R. [151] 2120, 2121
County Franchise, Leave, [149] 1833
Jews, Com. [151] 1754
Oaths, Lords' Amends. [151] 1905
Property Qualification, Com. [150] 577, 1429

KNOX, Lt.-Col. B. W., Marlow
Army, Commissions in the, [149] 431;—Sanitary State of the, Res. [150] 494;—Promotions in the, [151] 2043
Army Estimates, [150] 371, 385, 388; [151] 1482
Estimates, The, [149] 1609
India—Telegram from, [148] 557

[cont.

KNOX, LT. COL., Mr. R.—cont.
Mortality in the Guards, Report moved for, [148] 1550
Recruiting System, [150] 367

Kroomen, Enlistment of,
l. Question (Lord Brougham), [149] 458; Observations (Earl of Ellenborough), 556
c. Question (Mr. G. Vansittart), [149] 815;—see Negro Regiment for India

Kurrachee, Suppression of the Mutiny at,
c. Question (Mr. Dillwyn), [150] 924

LABOUCHERE, Rt. Hon. H., (†Secretary of State for the Colonies), Taunton
Bills, Withdrawal of, [151] 1749
Business of the House, [151] 604
Church Rates, Com. add. cl. [150] 573
Commissioners for Exhibition (1851), Com. cl. 1, [151] 91: Consid. 313
Cornwall Submarine Mines, Com. [151] 1654
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Com. cl. 1, [151] 1592
County Franchise, Leave, [149] 1828
†Guano, Supply of, [148] 271
†Hudson's Bay Company—Mr. Bannatyne, [148] 1267;—Explanation, 1368;—Res. [151] 1809
India, Government of, Com. Res. [149] 2092
†India—Troops for, [148] 463;—Vote of Thanks to the Army, &c. 890
†Kafirs, The Starving, [148] 554
London Corporation Regulation, Com. [151] 309, 606, 756
†Malta, Foreigners at, [148] 1868
Masters and Workmen, 2R. [150] 532
Militia, The, [149] 2011
†Moreton Bay, [148] 550
New Caledonia, Government of, 2R. [151] 1107, 1507; Com. cl. 1, 1764; cl. 3, 1768
New Trial in Criminal Cases, Com. [151] 1064
New Zealand, [150] 360
Oaths, Lords' Amends. [151] 1905
Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Res. [150] 982, 1025
Rewards to Members, Res. [151] 191
Supply—West India Islands Relief Commission, [150] 1262;—Public Education (Ireland), [151] 1226;—Ecclesiastical Commissioners, 1401;—Improvement of the Kafirs, 1421

Labuan—Supply,
[151] 1268

Ladies' Gallery, The,
c. Question (Major Edwards), [150] 1920; [151] 1611

Lancashire and Yorkshire, &c. Railway Companies' Bill,
c. 1R.* [148] 757; 2R.* 1083;
Consid. Amend. (Mr. Macaulay), [150] 601; Amend. withdrawn, 1606, 17051

Lancaster, Duchy of—Mining Operations,
c. Com. moved for (Mr. J. L. Ricardo), [150] 443, [A. 63, N. 128, M. 65] 455

Land, Sale and Transfer of (Ireland) Bill,
c. Leave, [150] 24; 1R.* 44;
2R. 1060;
Com. 1538; Amend. (Mr. J. D. FitzGerald), 1546; Amend. withdrawn, 1569, 2104;
cl. 3, Amend. (Sir E. Perry), 2107; Amend. (Mr. Whiteside), [151] 57; 151] cl. 4, Amend. (Mr. Malins), 59; Amend. withdrawn, 60; Amend. (Sir D. Norreys), [A. 27, N. 114, M. 87] 61;
· cl. 12, 61;
· cl. 19; cl. 21, 62;
· cl. 33, Amend. (Mr. Dobbs), [o. q. A. 35, N. 140, M. 105] 63;
· cl. 34; cl. 38, 63;
· cl. 40, 64;
· cl. 41; cl. 47, 65;
· cl. 51, 153, 371, [A. 131, N. 8, M. 123] 371, 471;
· cl. 87, Amend. (Mr. Vance), 968, [o. q. A. 117, N. 104, M. 13] 972; Proviso, (Colonel Greville), ib.;
· cl. 88, Amend. (Mr. Ennis), 972;
· add. cl. (Mr. Serjeant Deasy), 973; cl. neg. 974;
· Consid. Amend. (Mr. Griffith), 1144, [o. q. A. 66, N. 54, M. 12] 1145;
· 3R.* 1155
151] l. 1R.* 1243; 2R.* 1447;
· Com. 1773;
· cl. 51, [Contents 29, Not-Contents 10, M. 19] 1781:
· cl. 68; cl. 89, ib.;
· 3R.* 1967
· Royal Assent, 2369

Land, Titles to (Scotland) Bill,
c. 1R.* [150] 920; 2R.* 1601; 3R.* [151] 1076
l. 1R.* [151] 1146; 2R.* 1550; 3R.* 1967; Royal Assent, 2369

Land, Transfer of,
c. Question (Sir F. Kelly), [148] 758

Land, Transfer of, Bill,
l. 1R. [148] 807;
2R. [149] 559;
3R. [150] 418; Amend. (Lord St. Leonards), 421, [o. q. Contents 13, Not-Contents 12, M. 1] 426
c. 1R.* [150] 1516;
2R. 2285

Land Transport Corps,
c. Com. moved for, (Lord A. Vane-Tempest), [149] 1621; Motion withdrawn, 1627; Question (Lord A. Vane-Tempest), [151] 2126

Lands, Inclosure of, Bill,
c. 1R.* [151] 1266; 2R.* 1369; 3R.* 1699
l. 1R.* [151] 1773; 2R.* 1865; 3R.* 2077, Royal Assent, 2369

Lands Valuation of, (Scotland) Act Amendment Bill,
c. 1R.* [148] 717;
2R. [149] 652; Amend. (Visct. Duncan), 660

Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Bill,
c. 1R. [151] 994

LANSDOWNE, Marquess of Canning's, Lord, Proclamation—Confiscation of Land in Oude, [150] 325, 326; Explanation, 404, 405
India, Government of, [151] 1, 66
India—Governor General, Papers moved for, [150] 1515
Oaths, Report Consid. [151] 1250
Wellington Monument, The, [151] 796

Lasso, Use of the, by the Cavalry,
c. Question (Captain Vivian) [150] 1061

LAURIE, Mr. J., Barnstaple
Army, Mortality in the, [148] 1169;—Sanitary State of the, [149] 108;—Commissions in the, 1264
Bands, Regimental, [149] 857
Churches, Metropolitan, Sanitary State of the, [150] 1924
Crimean Prize Money, [148] 553
Drainage of the Metropolis, [148] 545
Firework Manufactories, [151] 1933
Indian Prize Money, [148] 553
Lucknow, Property taken in, [150] 333
Medjidi, Order of the, [148] 975
Reporting the Debates, [149] 813
Yeh, Commissioner, [150] 1532

Law Charges—Supply,
c. [150] 1466

Law Reform,
c. Question (Mr. Cox) [148] 359;—Notice (Attorney General), [150] 924

Lawrence, Sir John,
c. Question (Mr. Kinnaird), [151] 2125

Leases and Sales of Settled Estates Act Amendment Bill,
c. 1R.* [150] 1705;
Bill withdrawn, [151] 1436

Leases and Sales of Settled Estates Act Amendment (1856) Bill,
l. 1R.* [151] 154; 2R.* 586; 3R.* 1349
c. 1R.* [151] 2067; 2R.* 2105;
Com. 2206; 3R.* 2208
l. Royal Assent, [151] 2369

Leasing Powers (Ireland) Bill,
c. 1R.* [151] 994

LEFROY, Mr. A., Dublin University
Charitable Bequests Act, [151] 1000
Donegal, Destitution in, Com. moved for, [149] 1535
Endowed Schools (Ireland), Res. [151] 633
Jews, 3R. [151] 1900
Legitimacy Declaration, Com. cl. 1, [151] 1541
Medical Practitioners, Com. [150] 1420; cl. 3, [151] 998

[cont.

LEFROY, Mr. A.—cont.
Military Academy—Competitive Examinations, Address moved, [149] 1729
Reformatory Schools (Ireland), 2R. [150] 523
Supply—Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant (Ireland), [150] 1257;—Public Education (Ireland), [151] 1222, 1234

Legal Reforms — Grand and Common Juries,
l. Notice (Lord Campbell), [151] 2282

LEGH, Mr. G. CORNWALL, Cheshire, N.
Bounty to Militia Regiments, [150] 1855

Legitimacy Declaration Bill,
c. Leave, [150] 2156; 1R.* 2157; 2R.* [151] 266;
Com. 1145;
cl. 1, 1540;
cl. 8, [A. 137, N. 31, M. 106] 1541;
cl. 9, Adj. moved (Mr. Crawford), [o. q. A. 14, N. 148, M. 134] 1542, cl. withdrawn, 1543;
3R.* 1699
l. 1R.* [151] 1773;
2R. 1865; 3R.* 2151
Royal Assent, 2369

Letters of Credit Bill,
c. 1R.* [151] 225

"Leviathan," The, and the Atlantic Telegraph Cable,
c. Question (Mr. Griffith), [151] 1181

LEWIS, Rt. Hon. Sir G. C., (†CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER), Radnor
Agricultural Statistics, 2R. [149] 1888, 1904
Army Estimates, [149] 224, 225; [150] 1109
Ballot, Leave, [150] 1761
†Bank Acts, [148] 458; Com. moved for, 580, 663; Instruction, 669, 670; Nomination of Com. 964, 965, 967, 1083
†Bank Issues Indemnity, Leave, [148] 145, 185, 198, 202, 225; 2R. 306, 309, 310; Com. cl. 2, 404; 3R. 444; That the Bill do pass, 446
Budget—The—Financial Statement, [149] 1297
Business, Public, [150] 1438
Chancellor of the Exchequer's Speech at Slough, [150] 1088, 1089
†Chapel in Paris for British Residents, [148] 860
†Church Rates Abolition, 2R. [148] 1580; Com. cl. 1, [149] 1467
Church Rates Amendment, [149] 1870
Churches and Churchyards, Com. moved for, [149] 1860, 1866
†Civil Service Superannuation, [148] 1264
Commissioners for Exhibition 1851, Com. cl. 2, [151] 96
Consolidated Fund Appropriation, Com. [151] 1909
†East India Loan, Leave, [148] 787; 2R. 933; Com. 1870, 1873, 1875, 1877, 1878, 1882, 1885, 1886, 1888; cl. 1, 1891, 1892; Consid. [149] 15, 20, 74; add. cl. 153, 155, 156
Exchequer Bonds, 2R. [149] 2120, 2141

[cont.

LEWIS, Rt. Hon. Sir G. C.—cont.
†Finance, [148] 427, 430
Funded Debts, Com. [151] 543
†Gaols and Houses of Correction, 2R. [148] 1248
†Havelock's, Lady, and Sir H. Havelock's Annuity, Com. Res. [148] 771, 778, 779
†India, Government of (No. 1), Leave, [148] 1330
India, Government of, Com. Res. 1, [149] 2068; Res. 2, [150] 300; Res. 3, 1643; Res. 5, 2035, 2039; Res. 6, 2250
India, Government of (No. 3), Com. cl. 3, [151] 456, 460; cl. 8, 767, 769; cl. 11, 782, 783; cl. 13, 863; cl. 15, 870; cl. 22, 886; cl. 27, 887, 889; add. cl. 1012; cl. 27, 1046
†Joint-Stock Banks, [148] 379
†Joint-Stock Banking Companies, Leave, [148] 1177; 2R. [150] 544
†Livingstone, Dr.—Central Africa, [148] 558
Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Res. [149] 735
Marriage Law Amendment, 2R. [150] 133
Metropolis Local Management, 2R. [151] 1737, 1738
Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Res. [150] 831
Paper Duty, Res. [151] 131
†Proctors' Compensation, [148] 1371
Property Qualification, Com. [150] 1427
Real Property, &c.—Probate Duty, Res. [150] 876
St. John's College, Oxford, [151] 1079
†Savings Banks, [148] 460
†Smithfield Market, [148] 552
Supply, [148] 398; Res. 1083; Rep. [149] 258, 261, 1721; Public Buildings, [150] 1112;—Retired Officers of the Houses of Parliament, 1128;—Poor Law Board, 1135;—Civil Contingencies, 1138;—Queen's, &c. Rembrancer (Scotland), 1251;—Officers of Lord Lieutenant (Ireland), 1253;—Printing, &c., Houses of Parliament, 1263, 1266;—Prosecutions, 1467, 1469;—County Courts, 1476;—General Register House, Edinburgh, 1496; [150] 1499;—Patent Law Fees, &c., [151] 1414;—New Public Offices (Belfast), 1424
Thames, State of the, Res. [151] 1167
Ways and Means, [149] 264; [151] 1643
†Weights and Measures, [148] 1370

Libel Bill,
l. 1R. [148] 685;
2R. [149] 947; Amend. (Lord Wenslcydale), 969, [o. q. Contents 7, Not-Contents 35, M. 28] 982

Licensing System,
c. Question (Mr. Hardy), [148] 1260

LIDDELL, Hon. H. G., Northumberland, S.
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Com. cl. 1, [151] 1496
County Police, [148] 1740
Durham, Church Patronage in the See of, [150] 1856
East India Railways, Com. moved for, [149] 1376, 1401
Harbours of Refuge, [151] 1746
India, Government of (No. 1), Leave, [148] 1421
India, Government of, Com. Res. 3, [150] 1646; Res. 4, 1990; Res. 5, 2052

[cont.

LIDDELL, Hon. H. G.—cont.
India, Government of (No. 3), 2R. [151] 363; Com. cl. 12, Amend. 785
Jeddah, Massacre at, [151] 1285
Police Force (Ireland), Com. [151] 1143

LIFFORD, Viscount
Chancery, Court of, [149] 2098, 2104;—Chief Clerks' Offices, [151] 169

Lights on Sailing Vessels,
c. Question (Mr. Butt), [148] 685

Lighthouses, &c., c. Address moved (Lord C. Paget), [149] 1110; Motion withdrawn, 1142; Question (Lord C. Paget), [151] 756

Lighthouses Abroad—Supply,
c. [151] 1420

Limerick City Election,
c. Report, [150] 332; New Writ moved (Colonel French), 336; Motion withdrawn, ib.

LINCOLN, Bishop of
Church Discipline—Law of Sequestration, [151] 591
Marriage Law Amendment, 2R. [151] 1997

LINDSAY, Mr. W. S., Tynemouth
"Abeona," The, [149] 1193
Agricultural Statistics, 2R. [149] 1896
Assessed and Income Taxes, Res. [151] 209, 213
Barber's, W. H., Com. That Viscount Goderich be discharged attendance, [151] 974
East India Loan, Com. cl. 1, Amend. [148] 1891
Godrevy Lighthouse, Com. moved for, [149] 337
Hainault Allotment, Res. [151] 618
Harbours of Refuge, [151] 1182; Commission moved for, 2143
India, Government of, Com. Res. 1, [149] 2071; Res. 3, Amend. [150] 1678
India, Government of (No. 3), Com. cl. 8, [151] 774; cl. 11, 776, 782
Lighthouses, &c., Address moved, [149] 1121, 1126
National Defences, The, [150] 1936
Navy Estimates, [149] 126, 131, 1341
Navy, Manning the, Com. moved for, [150] 895
Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Res. [150] 720
Piers and Harbours, 2R. [151] 252
Transport Department, [149] 846
United States, Differences with the, [150] 1248, 1312

Liturgy, Revision of the,
l. Commission moved for (Lord Ebury), [150] 148; Motion withdrawn, 177

Livingstone, Dr.—Central Africa,
c. Statement (Chancellor of the Exchequer), [148] 558

LLANDAFF, Bishop of
Church of England Special Services, 2R. [148] 860; Com. cl. 2, Amend. 1463, 1469

Loan Societies Bill,
c. 1R.* [149] 811; 2R.* 857; Com. 1251; 3R.* 1264
l. 1R.* [149] 1350; 2R.* [150] 403; 3R.* 761
Royal Assent, 1021

Local Government Bill,
c. 1R.* [149] 1583;
Question (Mr. Palk), 2015;
2R. 2095;
Com. cl. 9, [151] 170; Amend. (Sir W. Farquhar), 171; Amend withdrawn, 172;
cl. 10, Amend. (Mr. Cowper) 172; Amend. neg. 173;
cl. 20, 173;
cl. 66, 1076; Amend. (Mr. T. Duncombe), [A. 30, N. 148, M. 118] 1077; 3R.* 1431
l. 1R.* [151] 1447; 2R.* 1655;
3R. add. cl. (Earl of Carnarvon), 2152, 2242
Royal Assent, 2369

LOCKE, Mr. John, Southwark
Chelsea Bridge Act Amendment, 2R. [150] 1994; Com. cl. 3, [151] 1650
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Com. cl. 1, [151] 1601; Consid. add. cl. 2022; cl. 1, 2029
County Franchise, Leave, [149] 1831
Drafts on Bankers Law Amendment, 3R. [151] 2076
Election Committees Scrutiny, 2R. [151] 248
Government Property—Exemption from Rates, Com. moved for, [150] 1798
Health, Public, Act Amendment, 2R. [148] 1458
Hop Duty, [151] 1164
Magisterial Appointments [150] 260; Return moved for, 322
Metropolis Local Management Act Amendment, Leave, [151] 1522; 2R. 1739; Com. 1928; cl. 14, 1955
Navy, Manning the, Com. moved for, [150] 894
New Trial in Criminal Cases, 2R. [151] 1055
Oaths, Com. [149] 305
Poor Law (Metropolis) 2R. [150] 511, 512
Poor Rates (Metropolis), Leave, [149] 628
Poor, Relief of the, [151] 1499
Supply—British Museum, [150] 1575;—Nonconformist, &c., Ministers (Ireland), [151] 1278
Thames, State of the, Res. [151] 577
Weights and Measures, Leave, [149] 1839, 1841; 2R. [150] 918; [151] 2274, 2373

LOCKE, Mr. Joseph, Honiton
Commissioners for Exhibition (1851), 2R. [150] 2263; Com. cl. 2, [151] 96
Health, Public, Com. cl. 4, [150] 2281
Metropolis Local Management, 2R. [151] 1731
Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Res. [150] 1034

LOCKHART, Mr. A. E., Selkirkshire
Supply—General Register House, Edinburgh, [150] 1499

LONDON, Bishop of
Church of England, Political Services of the, Address moved, [151] 488
Church of England Special Services, 2R. [148] 856, 857; [151] 2095, 2097

[cont.

LONDON, Bishop of—cont.
Church Rates Abolition, 2R. [151] 842
Convocation at York, Papers moved for, [151] 1560
Ecclesiastical Commission, Rep. add. cl. [151] 992; 3R. 1154
Forms of Prayer—State Services, Address moved, [151] 1664
Glebe Houses, Dilapidations in, [151] 1149
India, Government of (No. 3), Com. cl. 33, [151] 1589; That the Bill do pass, 2017
Paris, English Church in, [150] 249
Religious Worship Act Amendment, 2R. [148] 340, 342
Spiritual Destitution, Com. moved for, [149] 1570
Universities (Scotland), 2R. [151] 1365; Com. cl. 15, 1678

London Corporation, Reform of the,
c. Question (Sir De L. Evans), [148] 552; (Mr. Brady), [149] 248; (Mr. Labouchere), [151] 606, 756

London Corporation Regulation Bill,
c. Leave, [148] 738; 1R.* 744;
2R. 1276;
Nomination of Select Com. [149] 399;
Motion for Counsel (Mr. Baines), 1748; Com. [151] 266; Amend. (Mr. Rolt), 289

London Tramway Bill,
c. 1R.* [148] 1083;
2R. Amend. (Sir B. Hall), [149] 175

LONDONDERRY, Marquess of,
Magistracy, The Irish, [149] 164
Oaths, Com. cl. 5, [149] 1792
Presbyterian Chaplains in the Army, [149] 1350

Lord Lieutenant of Ireland,
c. Res. (Mr. Roebuck), [149] 712: Previous Question moved (Mr. S. B. Miller), 722, [A. 116, N. 243, M. 127] 772

LOVAINE, Lord (Lord of the Admiralty), Northumberland, N.
Church Rates Abolition, Com. cl. 1, [149], 1458
Galway Freemen Disfranchisement, Leave, [149] 383; 2R. 786; Com. [149] 1414; [150] 2287
Navy Estimates, [149] 1637
Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Res. [150] 807
Piers and Harbours, 2R. [151] 252
Supply—Public Education (Ireland), [151] 1219
Weedon Establishment, Commission moved for, [151] 254

LOWE, Right Hon. R. (†Paymaster of the Forces, and Vice President of the Board of Trade), Kidderminster,
Accommodation Bills, [151] 417
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Com. cl. 1, [151] 1494, 1592
Dublin Port Dues, Com. moved for, [149] 1362
†Godrevy Bay, Lighthouse at, Papers moved

[cont.

Lowe, Rt. Hon. R.—cont.
for, [148] 685, 1359; Com. moved for, [149] 337
Hudson's Bay Company, Res. [151] 1826, 1843
†India, Government of, (No. 1), Leave, [148] 1407
India, Government of, Com. Res. 3, [150] 1655
India, Government of, (No. 3), Com. cl. 7, [151] 465 ; cl. 13, 859, 864; add. cl. 908 ; cl. 35, 937, 938
Joint-Stock Companies, Com. add. cl. [150] 1913
Kroomen, Enlistment of, [149] 816
Lighthouses, &c., Address moved, [149] 1130
London Corporation Regulation, Com. [151] 303
Metropolis Local Management, 2R. [151] 1703, 1736
Negroes, Enlistment of, Papers moved for, [149] 1041, 1046
New Caledonia, Government of, 2R. [151] 1117; Consid. 1429, 1505
New Trial in Criminal Cases, 2R. [151] 1058
Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Res. [150] 711
†"Prince Albert," Iron Steam Ship, [148] 1369
Supply—Education, [151] 148

Lucan, Earl of Jews, 1R. [150] 1600, 1998 ; [151] 155 ; 2R. 702 ; Com. 930
Oaths, Report, Amend. [150] 1139, 1176; [151] 155

Lunacy Commission (Ireland),
c. Question (Mr. J. D. FitzGerald), [151] 2036

Lunacy, Commissioners in—Supply,
c. [150] 1262

Lunatic Asylum, Protracted Confinement in a,
c. Question (Mr. FitzRoy), [151] 1930

Lunatics, Pauper, Bill,
c. 1R.* [151] 503

Lunatics (Scotland) Act Amendment Bill,
c. 1R.* [151] 857 ; 2R.* 930 ; 3R.* 1076
l. 1R.* [151] 1146 ; 2R.* 1655 ; 3R.* 2151
Royal Assent, 2369

Lunatics under the Court of Chancery,
c. Com. moved for (Mr. Tite), [151] 214; Motion withdrawn, 220

Lyall, Mr. G., Whitehaven
India, Government of (No. 3), Com. cl. 22, [151] 886

Lygon, Hon. F., Tewkesbury
Church Rates Abolition, Com. cl. 1, Adj. moved, [149] 1472
Church Rates Amendment, [149] 1870, 1871 ; [150] 221
Churches and Churchyards, Com. moved for, [149] 1859

[cont.

Lygon, Hon. F.—cont.
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Consid. cl. 1, [151] 2057
Divorce Act, The, [148] 1261
India, Telegrams from, [148] 461
Joint-Stock Banking Companies, Com. [150] 1505
Marriage Law Amendment, Leave, [149] 621 ; Com. [150] 1689 ; Amend. [151] 667 ; cl. 1, Amend. 670, 677, 679 ; cl. 2, Adj. moved 682, 683
Oaths, That Baron de Rothschild be a Member of the Committee, [150] 351
Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, [150] 674, 764; Res. 1030
Sandhurst and Woolwich, [149] 2118
Supply—Printing, &c., Houses of Parliament, [150] 1267 ;—Civil Contingencies, [151] 1446

Lyndhurst, Lord
Aliens, Law Relating to, [148] 1848, 1853 ;—Case of Azzopardi, Explanation, [149] 1
"Cagliari," Case of the, [149] 305, 309
Copyright, Law of, [151] 2090
Divorce Act (Ireland), [149] 1923
France, Relations with—Address in the "Moniteur," [148] 807, 808
Jews, Com. [151] 928, 1070, 1073 ; 3R. 1260
Kingston, Earl of, Questions, [150] 1600
Legitimacy Declaration, 2R. [151] 1865
Libel, 2R. [149] 961, 965
Marriage Law Amendment, 2R. [151] 1974
Oaths, 2R. [149] 1477; Com. cl. 1, 1754; cl. 5, 1761, 1768 ; Report, 1171 ; Amend. [150] 1177, 1191, 1192, 1193 ; Com moved for, [151] 154
Oaths Substitution, 1R. [150] 1600 ; [151] 154 ; 2R. 697 ; Bill postponed, 930
Organs, Barrel, Suppression, 2R. [149] 1926
Probate, New Court of, [149] 946
Search, Right of, [151] 2078
Settled Estates Act, [150] 1021

Lyttelton, Lord
Competitive Examination for the Civil Service, [150] 1691
Militia, Organization of the, [150] 2011

Lytton, Rt. Hon. Sir E. G. Bulwer (†Secretary of State for the Colonies), Hertfordshire
†Australian Postal Service, [151] 174
†Cape of Good Hope, [151] 1504
†Guano from the Kooria Mooria Islands, [151] 931
†Hudson's Bay Company, Res. [151] 1814
India, Government of (No. 1), Leave, [148] 1676
†New Caledonia, Government of, 2R. [151] 1096; Com. cl. 1, 1347, 1348, 1505, 1507, 1767
†Portendic and Albreda Convention, 2R. [151] 153
†Prince Edward Island, [150] 1948

M'Carthy, Mr. A., Cork Co.
Excise Duties, 2R. [149] 1742
Navy Estimates, [149] 1642
Valuation (Ireland), Com. moved for, [150] 913
Wellington Monument, Res. [151] 2237

MACARTNEY, Mr. G., Antrim Co.
Army Accounts, Auditing of, [150] 178
Australian Mail Packet Service, [148] 1083, 1084
Belfast Corporation, [151] 84, 1001
Cape of Good Hope Mails, [150] 429
Donegal, Destitution in, Com. moved for, [149] 1528
Dublin, Affray at, Report moved for, [149] 689
Fairs and Markets (Ireland), [149] 423
Grand Juries (Ireland), [149] 423
Harbours of Refuge, [150] 923
India, Army in, [149] 1653
Lunatic Asylums Commission (Ireland), [150] 1919
Supply—Printing, &c., Houses of Parliament, [150] 1266;—County Courts, 1476, 1477;—General Register House, Edinburgh, 1498;—Department of Science and Art, [151] 1202
Tenant Right (Ireland), Com. moved for, [150] 194
War Department, Accounts of the, [151] 2357

MACAULAY, Mr. K., Cambridge
India, Government of (No. 3), Consid. add. cl. [151] 1026
Lancashire and Yorkshire, &c., Railway Companies, Consid. Amend. [150] 1601
Oaths, Lords' Amends. That Baron de Rothschild be a Member of the Committee, [150] 436

M'CANN, Mr. J., Drogheda
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Com. cl. 1, [151] 1598; Consid. add. cl. 2022; cl. 1, 2029, 2060
Excise Duties, 2R. [149] 1747
Galway Freemen Disfranchisement, Com. Adj. moved, [150] 2287
Harbours of Refuge, [151] 1747; Commission moved for, Amend. 2147
Land, Sale and Transfer of (Ireland), Com. cl. 3, [150] 2111; cl. 51, [151] 373
Police Force (Ireland), Com. [151] 1144
Valuation (Ireland), Com. moved for, [150] 913
Weights and Measures, Leave, [149] 1840; 2R. [150] 916

MACEVOY, Mr. E., Meath Co.
Donegal, Destitution in, Com. moved for, [149] 1543
Excise Duties, 2R. [149] 1747
Land, Sale and Transfer of, (Ireland), Com. cl. 3, [150] 2111

MACKIE, Mr. J., Kirkcudbrightshire
Lands, Valuation of, (Scotland) Act Amendment, 2R. [149] 660

MACKINNON, Mr. W. A., Rye
Bayswater and South Kensington, [149] 2013
Masters and Workmen, Leave, [149] 1814; 2R. [150] 532, 534
Militia, The, [149] 460
Passing Tolls, [149] 813

Mackintosh, Sir J., The Late,
c. Explanation (Sir J. Graham), [149] 1170

MACMAHON, Mr. P., Wexford Co.
Bar, Admission to the, (Ireland), [149] 1988
Belfast, Franchise of, [149] 1988
Belfast Town Improvement, 2R. Amend. [148] 1367, 1368
Budget, The—Financial Statement, [149] 1304
Chancery Amendment, Leave, [149] 1166
Commerce, Tribunals of, Com. moved for, [149] 1156
Conspiracy to Murder, 2R. [148] 1775
Donegal, Destitution in, Com. moved for, [149] 1527, 1540
Ejectments (Ireland)—Case of J. Byrne, Papers moved for, [149] 1843
Election Committees Scrutiny, 2R. [151] 251
Ellis, Mr. Murder of,—The Cormacks, [151] 1195
Justice, Administration of, Com. moved for, [149] 1802, 1813
Land, Sale and Transfer of, (Ireland), Com. cl. 51, [151] 153
Local Government, Com. cl. 20, Amend. [151] 173
London Corporation, Leave, [148] 743
New Trial in Criminal Cases, 2R. [151] 1051, 1057, 1061; Com. 1062, 1063, 1064
Oaths, 2R. [148] 1090
Piers and Harbours, 2R. [151] 252
Secretary, The Irish, Office of, [150] 1457
Supply—Poor Law Board, Amend. [150] 1133; 1134, 1137;—Secretary to Lord Lieutenant (Ireland), 1257;—Board of Public Works (Ireland), 1261;—Lord Advocate, &c. (Scotland), 1491, 1493;—Temporary Commissions, [151] 1409
Thames, State of the, Res. [151] 1169
Wexford Harbour Embankment, 2R. Amend. [148] 1854, 1855

Magisterial Appointments,
c. Observations (Mr. John Locke), [150] 260; Return moved for, 322

Magnetic Observations Abroad—Supply,
c. [151] 1268

MAGUIRE, Mr. J. F., Dungarvan
Civil Bills, &c. (Ireland), Com. cl. 2, [151] 1771
Donegal, Destitution in, Com. moved for, [149] 1536
Education Regulations (Army) India, [149] 427
Ellis, Mr., Murder of—The Cormacks, [151] 1196
Galway Freemen Disfranchisement, [149] 323; Leave, 384; Com. 1415; [150] 2287; [151] 601, 603
Landlord and Tenant (Ireland), [151] 442, 447
Navy Estimates, [149] 1645
Oaths, 2R. [148] 1115; Consid. [149] 528
Police Force (Ireland), 2R. [151] 1143, 1549
Reformatory Schools (Ireland), Com. cl. 7, [151] 1432; cl. 17, 1434
Stamped Letter Paper, [151] 2042
Supply—Public Education (Ireland), [151] 1207, 1219, 1222
Tenants' Compensation (Ireland), 2R. [149] 1046, 1074, 1095; [150] 1807, 1828

MAINWARING, Mr. T., Denbigh
Ballot, Leave, [150] 1736

Malacca, Straits of,
c. Correspondence moved for (Viscount Bury), [149] 986

MALINS, Mr. R., Wallingford
Bank Acts, Com. moved for, [148] 646, 654, 663
Bank Issues Indemnity, 2R. [148] 291 ; Com. cl. 2, Amend. 398, 409
Bothnia—Claims of British Merchants, Commission moved for, [151] 1861
Budget, The—Financial Statement, [149] 1304
Chancery Amendment, Leave, [149] 1165
Church Rates Abolition, Com. cl. 1, [149] 1472
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Consid. cl. 1, [151] 2058
Drafts on Bankers, [151] 2053
Insurance and Assurance Institutions, 2R. [150] 2192
Jews, 2R. [151] 1634
Joint-Stock Banks, [148] 382
Joint-Stock Banking Companies, Leave, [148] 1182 ; 2R. [150] 548 ; Com. 1503
Joint-Stock Companies Acts Amendment, Com. cl. 20, [150] 2274
Judgments (Ireland) Act Amendment, Com. cl. 1, [151] 1961
Ladies' Gallery, [151] 1612
Land, Sale and Transfer of (Ireland,) Leave, [150] 42 ; Com. 1561, 2105 ; cl. 3, 2110 ; [151] 58 ; cl. 4, Amend. 59, 60 ; cl. 38, 64 ; cl. 41, 65 ; cl. 51, 372
Leases and Sales of Settled Estates, Com. [151] 2208
Marriage Law Amendment, Leave, [149] 611 ; 2R. [150] 143
Oaths, Lords' Amends. [150] 348 ; That Baron de Rothschild be a Member of the Committee, 438
Probate Court, The, [150] 259
Probates and Letters of Administration, 2R. [151] 2055
Property, Law of, Amendment, Consid. [151] 2138
Property Qualification, Com. [150] 578
Rewards to Members, Res. [151] 198, 206
Stamp Duties on Drafts, Com. cl. 2, [150] 290
Supply—Temporary Commissions, [151] 1411
Wills, &c., of British Subjects abroad, 2R. [150] 2276

MALMESBURY, Earl of (†Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs)
Affairs, Public, State of, [148] 701
†"Cagliari," Case of the, [149] 306, 703, 1253, 1255, 1935 ; [150] 1022, 1849, 1915, 1916
†Canning's, Lord, Proclamation—Confiscation of Land in Oude, [150] 325
†Chancellor of the Exchequer's Speech at Slough, [150] 1280, 1304, 1305
†Church of England, Political Services of the, Address moved, [151] 502
†Coolies, Exportation of, from Hong Kong, Correspondence moved for, [151] 83
†Excise Duties, 3R. [150] 331
†France, Relations with, Correspondence laid on the Table, [149] 166
Havelock's, Lady and Sir H. Havelock's Annuities, 3R. [148] 1854
Hearsey, Major General, [148] 237
India—Arms and Press Acts. Papers moved for, [148] 261;—Administration of, [151] 380
India, Government of, [151] 2, 66

[cont.

MALMESBURY, Earl of—cont.
†India, Government of, (No. 3), Com. cl. 12, [151] 1584
†Jeddah, Massacre at, [151] 1657
†Jews, [150] 1998
†Kingston, Earl of, Notices of Questions by the, [150] 1439
†Navy, Manning the, [150] 2088
†Oaths, Report, [150] 1172, 2219 ; Com. moved for, [151] 154 ; Consideration of Report deferred, 263 ; Report Consid. 1252
†Paris, English Church in, [150] 248
†Parliament, Independence of, 2R. [151] 589, 590
†Passport System, Papers presented, [149] 1100, 1105, 1106, 1107, 1108
†"Regina Cœli," Case of the, Explanation, [151] 255, 260, 262
Resignation of Ministers, [148] 1849
†Slave Trade, [149] 22, 163, 229 ; [150] 2205, 2213, 2214, 2217, 2218 ; [151] 1147 ;—Right of Search, 2083, 2089
†Telegraphic Communication with Europe and America, Correspondence moved for, [149] 1582
†Thames, State of the, [151] 384, 393, 472, 475
†United States, Relations with the, [150] 1703
†Victoria Station and Pimlico Railway, Motion for Counsel, [151] 588, 693

Malta, Foreigners at,
c. Question (Mr. Bowyer), [148] 1868

Man, Isle of,
c. Question (Mr. Turner), [151] 1284

MANCHESTER, Bishop of
Church of England Special Services, Com. cl. 3, [148] 1469

Manchester, Chancellor of the Diocese of,
c. Question (Mr. Hadfield), [148] 1604

Manchester, &c., and Great Northern Railway Companies Bill,
c. 1R.* [148] 757 ; 2R.* 1083 ; Consid. Amend. (Mr. Henley), [150] 1194 ; Amend. withdrawn, 1195, 1606 ; Amend. (Mr. Spooner), 1607 ; Amend. withdrawn, 1609

Manchester Court of Bankruptcy, Commissioner of the,
l. Petition (Lord Stanley of Alderley), [151] 2151
c. Question (Mr. Turner), [151] 2032

MANGLES, Mr. R. D., Guildford
Army Estimates, [149] 137
East India Loan, Leave, [148] 795; Com 1870, 1890 ; cl. 1, 1891; Consid. [149] 15, 20, 72 ; add. cl. 148
East India Railways, Com. moved for, [149] 1397
India, Government of (No. 1), Leave, [148] 1353
India, Government of, (No. 2), Leave, [149] 834, 869

[cont.

MANGLES, Mr. R. D.—cont.
India, Government of, Com. moved for, [149] 1710; Res. 1, 2047; Res. 2, 2185, 2199; Res. 6, [150] 2245
India, Government of, (No. 3), Com. cl. 3, [151] 460; cl. 7, 462; cl. 14, 868; cl. 27, 888, 892, 894; cl. 29, 899; cl. 48, 906; Consid. cl. 31, 1006; add. cl. 1017; cl. 27, 1048; Lords' Amends. 2177; cl. 27, 2186
India—Vote of Thanks to the Army, &c., [148] 900, 901, 902; Amended Res. [149] 253;—Colonisation of, Com. moved for, 281, 286, 287;—Mutiny in, Papers moved for, 367
Malacca, Straits of, Correspondence moved for, [149] 994
Oude, Annexation of, Papers moved for, [148] 1516, 1526
Rewards to Members, Res. [149] 1030
Stamp Duties on Drafts, Com. cl. 2, [150] 290
Thames, State of the, [150] 2113; [151] 27, 432

MANGLES, Captain C. E., Newport, Isle of Wight
Harbours of Refuge, Commission moved for, [151] 2150

MANNERS, Rt. Hon. Lord J. J. R. (†First Commissioner of Works), Leicestershire, N.
Ali Moorad's Claim—Mr. Butt, Com. moved for, [148] 1865, 1866
Bank Acts Committee, Nomination of Com. [148] 965
†Battersea Park, [151] 879, 1396, 1503
†Bayswater and South Kensington, [149] 2013
†Bell for the Clock Tower, [150] 275
†Burlington House, [151] 1788
†Charitable Trusts Act Continuance, [151] 1437
†Chelsea Bridge [149] 811, 983, 1493; [151] 879, 1396, 1503
†Chelsea Bridge Act Amendment, 2R. [150] 1991, 1992; [151] 757, 791; Com. 1000; cl. 3, 1649, 1651; Consid. 1773; Recom. 1863
China, War in, [148] 1276
†Church Rates Abolition, Com. [149] 1441
Circassia—Treaty of Paris, [148] 1735
†Drainage, Main, Question, [150] 334
†Gloucester Gate Bridge, [150] 333
†Green Park, Improvements in the, [149] 1189
Havelock's, Sir H., Pension, [148] 574
†India, Government of, Com. Res. 3, [150] 1614
†Jenner, Dr., Statue of, [150] 276, 354
†Jews, [151] 1376, 1378
†Kensington Gardens, [149] 983
†Ladies' Gallery, The, [150] 1920
†Marble Arch, The, [149] 1266, 1494
†Metropolis Local Management Act Amendment, Leave, [151] 1528; 2R. 1713; Com. 1925; cl. 1, 1930, 1934, 1942, 1944; cl. 2, Amend. 1945, 1946; cl. 3, 1948; cl. 4, 1949; cl. 5, 1950; cl. 6, 1951; cl. 11, 1953; cl. 14, 1955; cl. 26, 1957; add. cl. 1958, 1959; Consid. add. cl. 2047, 2048; cl. 1, 2050
†Oaths, Lords' Amends. [151] 1904
†Offices, Public, [150] 21

[cont.

MANNERS, Rt. Hon. Lord J. J. R.—cont.
Oude, Annexation of, Papers moved for, [148] 1512, 1514, 1526
†Parks, The, [151] 2375
†Parliament, New Houses of—Decay of the Stone, [151] 1931
†Property Qualification, Com. cl. 1, [150] 1437
†Reporting the Debates, [149] 813
†Richard Cœur de Lion, Statue of, [150] 275
†St. James's Park, [151] 931
†Sculpture in the Public Parks, [149] 174
†Serpentine River, [151] 1397
†Supply—Public Buildings, [150] 1111;—Furniture for Public Departments, 1114;—Royal Parks, 1116;—New Houses of Parliament, 1117, 1118, 1119, 1120, 1202;—Embassy Houses abroad, 1120;—Office of Works, 1132;—General Registry House Edinburgh, 1500, 1501;—Embassy House at Paris, [151] 1439, 1440, 1441
†Thames, State of the, [150] 1063, 1534, 1921, 2113; [151] 33, 432; Res. 575, 879, 1170
†Tower, Norman Chapel in the, [151] 1185
†Waterloo and Westminster Bridges, [149] 1110
†Wellington Monument, The, [151] 16, 417; Res. 2221, 2230, 2237, 2305
†Westminster Hall, [150] 335
†Westminster, Palace of, [149] 1798

Manufacturers, Board of (Scotland)—Supply,
c. [151] 1418

Marble Arch, The,
c. Question (Lord Elcho), [149] 1266; (Sir J. Shelley), 1493

Marine Mutiny Bill,
c. 1R.* [149] 172; 2R.* 246; 3R.* 422
l. 1R.* [149] 401; 2R.* 445; 3R.* 703
Royal Assent, 788

Markets and Fairs (Ireland) Bill,
c. 1R.* [148] 860; 2R.* [150] 1194

Markets, Metropolitan,
l. Petition (Lord Berners), [150] 761

MARLBOROUGH, Duke of
Church of England, Political Services of the, Address moved, [151] 492
Church Rates Abolition, 2R. [151] 812, 1151
Ecclesiastical Commission, 1R. [149] 1108, 1109; 2R. [150] 6, 10
Forms of Prayer—State Services, Address moved, [151] 1660, 1665
India, Government of (No. 3), Com. cl. 12, [151] 1582
Jews, Com. [151] 9, 19; add. cl. 1074
Oaths, Com. cl. 5, [149] 1779; Report, [151] 729
Spiritual Destitution, Com. moved for, [149] 1568

Marriage Law Amendment Bill,
c. Leave, [149] 603, [A. 105, N. 62, M. 43] 625; 1R.* 626;
2R. 108; Amend. (Mr. B. Hope), [150] 125, [o. q. A. 174, N. 134, M. 40] 145;
Com. Adj. moved (Sir B. Bridges), 1689; Adj. Debate [151] 667; Adj. moved (Mr. Lygon), 668, [o. q. A. 99, N. 58, M. 41] 670
151] cl. 1, Amend. (Mr. Lygon), 670, [o. q. A. 129, N. 78, M. 51] 677; Amend. (Mr. Steuart), ib.; Amend. withdrawn, 679; Adj. moved (Mr. Steuart), [A. 65, N. 129, M. 64] ib.;
· cl. 2, 682;
· cl. 4, 683; Amend. (Mr. Monsell), [A. 140, N. 98, M. 42] 684;
· add. cl. (Viscount Bury), 684: Adj. moved (Solicitor General), 685 [A. 94, N. 145, M. 51] 686; cl. withdrawn, ib.;
· Consid. add. cl. (Viscount Bury), 791
· 3R. Amend. (Mr. B. Hope), [o. q. A. 100, N. 70, M. 30] 909
151] l. 1R.* 910;
· 2R. 1969; Amend. (Lord Redesdale), 1974, [o. q. Contents 22, Not-Contents 46, M. 24] 1998

Marriage with Deceased Wife's Sister,
c. Question (Mr. Schneider), [150] 20

Marriages (Moscow, Tahiti and Ningpo) Bill,
l. 1R.* [151] 691; 2R.* 910; 3R.* 1070
c. 1R.* [151] 1590; 2R.* 1699; 3R.* 1866
l. Royal Assent, [151] 1967

MARSH, Mr. H., Salisbury
Ballot, Leave, [150] 1765
India—Transport of Troops to, Com. moved for, [148] 737

MARTIN, Mr. C. W., Kent, W.
Address in Answer to the Speech, [148] 86
Ballot, Leave, [150] 1745
Hop Duty, [151] 1164
London Corporation Regulation, Com. [151] 298

MARTIN, Mr. P. W., Rochester
Government Property—Exemption from Rates, Com. moved for, [150] 1799
Navy Estimates, [149] 945, 1243

MASSEY, Mr. W. N. (†Under Secretary Home Department), Salford
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Com. cl. 1. [151] 1596
†Ecclesiastical Commission, [148] 137
†Highways, Management of, [148] 137
Supply—Metropolitan Police, [150] 1489;—Education, [151] 145

Masters and Workmen Bill,
c. Leave, [149] 1814; 1R.* 1871;
2R. [150] 531; Bill withdrawn, 534

Mauritius, Troops for the,
c. Question (Sir De L. Evans), [151] 1182

Maynooth College,
c. Com. moved for (Mr. Spooner), [149] 1930, [A. 155, N. 210, M. 55] 1999

Mayo Priests, Prosecution of,
c. Question (Lord J. Browne), [149] 1589; [150] 1850

Mayo Writ,
c. Motion (Colonel French), [148] 385

Medical Charities (Ireland) Bill,
c. 1R.* [148] 268;
Bill withdrawn, 780

Medical Charities (Ireland) Act Amendment Bill,
c. 1R.* [148] 1260

Medical Practitioners,
c. Question (Mr. Kinnaird), [148] 550

Medical Practitioners Bill,
c. Leave, [149] 648; 1R.* 652;
2R. [150] 1406;
Com. Amend. (Mr. Black), 1410; Amend. withdrawn, 1421; [151] 994; Amend. (Mr. T. Duncombe), 995, [o. q. A. 95, N. 8, M. 87] 996;
151] cl. 3, 996;
· cl. 15, Amend. (Mr. Headlam), [o. q. A. 138, N. 51, M. 87] 998;
· cl. 45, Amend. (Mr. Hadfield), 999;
· add. cl. (Mr. B. Hope) 1000;
· Consid Amend. (Mr. Hadfield), [A. 16, N. 40, M. 24] 1145;
· 3R.* 1155
151] l. 1R.* 1243; 2R.* 1550;
· Com. 1782; 3R.* 2077
· c. Lords' Amends. 2277
· l. Royal Assent, 2369

Medical Profession Bill,
c. 1R.* [149] 246;
Bill withdrawn, [150] 1421

Medical Profession and Medical Corporation Bill,
c. 1R.* [149] 1871;
2R. Deferred, [150] 1421

Mediterranean, &c., Telegraphic Communications,
c. Papers moved for (Mr. Crawford), [150] 21

Medjidi, Order of the,
c. Question (Mr. Laurie), [148] 975

MELGUND, Viscount, Clackmannan, &c.
Public Houses (Scotland), [150] 1856
Spirituous Liquors, Sale of, (Scotland) Act, [151] 1188
Supply—Education, [151] 152
Universities (Scotland), Consid. cl. 14, [151] 961

MELLOR, Mr. J., Great Yarmouth
Breach of Privilege—Washington Wilks, [150] 1068
Chancery Amendment, Leave, [149] 1167

MELLOR, Mr. J.—cont.
Church Rates, Com. cl. 1, [150] 560; add. cl. 571, 575
Galway Freemen Disfranchisement, Com. cl. 1, [151] 601
India, Government of (No. 3), Consid. add. cl. [151] 1028
Justice, Administration of, Com. moved for, [149] 1812
Land, Sale and Transfer of (Ireland), Com. cl. 3, [150] 2109
Marriage Law Amendment, Leave, [149] 619
Oaths, 2R. [148] 1111; That Baron de Rothschild be a Member of the Committee, [150] 353
Rewards to Members, Res. [149] 1021, 1030; [151] 207
Supply—Temporary Commissions, [151] 1411

MELVILLE, Viscount
Divorce and Matrimonial Causes, 3R. [151] 161
India, Government of (No. 3), That the Bill do pass, [151] 2017
India, Mutiny in, [148] 449
Jews, Com. [151] 921
Medals for the Indian Army, [151] 912
Militia, Organization of the, [150] 2014

Members Freedom from Arrest Bill,
c. 1R.* [150] 1705;
2R. [151] 687; Amend. (Mr. E. P. Bouverie), 688, [o. q. A. 129, N. 75, M. 54] 690

Members, Rewards to,
c. Question (Sir J. Trelawny), [149] 573; Res. 1019; Motion withdrawn, 1041; Res. (Lord Hotham), [151] 176; Previous Question moved (Mr. E. P. Bouverie), 189, [A. 151, N. 80, M. 71] 209; [m. q. A. 210, N. 27, M. 183] 209; Question (Mr. Schneider), 2191; Res. 2347

Members' Seats,
c. Res. (Mr. FitzRoy), [149] 2001

Merchant Service, Pensions—Supply,
c. [151] 1420

Metropolis Local Management Act Amendment Bill,
151] c. Leave, 1508; 1R.* 1540;
2R. 1701;
Com. 1924; Amend. (Mr. Butler), 1925, [o. q. A. 133, N. 11, M. 122] 1929;
cl. 1, Amend. (Mr. Headlam), 1929, 1934, [o. q. A. 81, N. 38, M. 43] 1944;
cl. 2, Amend. (Lord J. Manners), 1945; Amend. withdrawn, cl. struck out, 1948;
cl. 3, Amend. (Mr. Warren), 1948; Amend. withdrawn, 1949;
cl. 4, Amend. (Mr. Coningham), 1949; Amend. withdrawn, ib.;
cl. 5, Amend. (Mr. Roupell), 1950; Amend. withdrawn, cl. struck out, 1951;
cl. 9, Amend. (Mr. Roupell), 1951; Amend. withdrawn, ib.;
cl. 11, 1952; Amend. (Mr. Headlam), 1953; Amend. neg. ib.;
cl. 12, Amend. (Mr. Griffith), 1954; Amend. neg. ib.;
cl. 14, 1954; cl. 17, 1955;

[cont.

Metropolis Local Management Bill—cont.
151] cl. 26, Amend. (General Codrington), 1956; Amend. withdrawn, 1957;
add. cl. (Lord J. Manners), 1957; cl. withdrawn, 1958;
add. cl. (Mr. Roupell), 1958; cl. withdrawn, 1959;
add. cl. (Mr. Ayrton), 1959; cl. neg. ib.; Consid. add. cl. (Lord J. Manners), 2047; Amend. (Mr. Ayrton), 2048;
add. cl. (Mr. S. Wortley), 2048; cl. withdrawn, 2049;
cl. 1, Amend. (Mr. Puller), 2050; Amend. neg. 2052;
3R. 2074
151] l. 1R.* 2077;
2R. 2154; 3R.* 2243
Royal Assent, 2369

MILES, Mr. W., Somersetshire, E.
Agricultural Statistics, 2R. [149] 1915
Butt, Mr.—Breach of Privilege, [148] 1732
Cashel Election, [149] 248
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Com. cl. 1, [151] 1593
County Franchise, 2R. [150] 1871
County Voters, Registration of, (Scotland), Com. [150] 2191
India, Despatches from, [150] 930
Navy Estimates, [149] 1234
New Trial in Criminal Cases, 2R. Amend. [151] 1056
Property Qualification, 2R. [150] 224
Supply—Poor Law Board, [150] 1135;—Lord Advocate, &c. (Scotland), 1492;—General Register House, Edinburgh, 1498
Weights and Measures, Leave, [149] 1841

Military Academy—Competitive Examinations,
c. Address moved (Mr. Monsell), [149] 1724, [A. 217, N. 177, M. 40] 1740; Her Majesty's Answer, 2010;
Question (Mr. Lygon), 2118

Military Auditor,
c. Question (General Codrington), [148] 465

Military Education,
c. Question (Mr. Monsell), [150] 1103 — see Army

Military Organization,
c. Res. (Captain Vivian), [150] 1328, [A. 106, N. 104, M. 2] 1358; Question (Sir J. Walsh), 1447;—Observations, [151] 550;—see Army

Militia,
Aldershot, c. Question (Mr. Mackinnon), [149] 460; (Mr. Labouchere), 2011; (Captain Gray), [150] 19
Bounty to Regiments, c. Question (Mr. Cornwall Legh), 1855
Captains, c. Question (Lord Burghley), [149] 1800
Disembodied, c. Question (Colonel Forde), [149] 1265, (Captain O'Connell), 1354; (Col. French) [151] 11
Embodied, l. Returns moved for (Earl of Carnarvon), [148] 1586

Militia—cont.
Estimates, c. Question (Lord Burghley), [149] 1584—see Army Estimates
Organization of, l. Question (Duke of Buccleuch), [150] 2002
Permanent Staff of, c. Question (Colonel Smyth), [150] 1609
Tower Hamlets Militia, c. Question (Mr. T. Duncombe), [151] 1699

Militia Act Continuance Bill,
c. 1R.* [149] 172; 2R.* 245; 3R.* 422
l. 1R.* [149] 401; 2R.* 445; 3R.* 556
Royal Assent, 703

Militia Act Continuance (No. 2) Bill,
c. 1R.* [151] 1699; 2R.* 1785; 3R.* 2067
l. 1R.* [151] 2077; 2R.* 2151; 3R.* 2282
Royal Assent, 2369

Militia Ballot Suspension Bill,
c. 1R.* [151] 1076; 2R.* 1155; 3R.* 1369
l. 1R.* [151] 1447; 2R.* 1550; 3R.* 1773
Royal Assent, 1967

Militia Pay Bill,
c. 1R.* [151] 1699; 2R. 1785; 3R.* 2020
l. 1R.* [151] 2077; 2R.* 2151; 3R.* 2282
Royal Assent, 2369

Militia Service abroad Act Continuance Bill,
c. 1R.* [151] 1699; 2R.* 1785;
Com. 1962;
cl. 1, 1963;
3R.* 2067
l. 1R.* [151] 2077; 2R.* 2151; 3R.* 2282
Royal Assent, 2369

MILLER, Mr. S. B., Armagh City
Civil Bills, &c. (Ireland) Act Amendment, 2R. [151] 1548
Land Sale and Transfer of (Ireland), Com. cl. 3, [151] 58; cl. 38, 64; cl. 51, 372; cl. 87, 971
Land, Transfer of (Ireland), [149] 2015
Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Res. Previous Question moved, [149] 718
Mortgages, Judgment on (Ireland), [151] 311
Tenants' Compensation (Ireland), 2R. [150] 1808

MILLER, Mr. T. J., Colchester
Poor Law (Metropolis), 2R. [150] 514

MILLS, Mr. A., Taunton
Clyde Navigation, Consid. [151] 506
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Com. cl. 1, [151] 1594; cl. 2, Amend. 1602, 1604
Hudson's Bay Company, Res. [151] 1826
India, Government of, (No. 1), Leave, [148] 1446
India, Government of, Com. [149] 2026; Res. 3, [150] 1659
India, Government of (No. 3), Com. cl. 11, 780
India—Punishment of Mutineers, [148] 551
New Caledonia, (British Colombia), Government of, 2R. [151] 1112

[cont.

MILLS, Mr. A.—cont.
Oaths, Lords' Amend. [151] 1904
Slave Trade, [148] 555;—Right of Search, Res. [151] 1314

MILLS, Mr. T., Totness,
Marriage Law Amendment, Com. cl. 2, [151] 683

MILNES, Mr. R. M., Pontefract
"Cagliari," Capture of the, [149] 100
Conspiracy to Murder, Leave, [148] 1026
East India Loan, Consid. [149] 73
India, Government of (No. 1), Leave, [148] 1312
India, Government of, Com. Res. 2, [150] 295; Res. 3, 1640
India, Government of (No. 3), Com. cl. 13, [151] 860; cl. 34, 932
Marriage Law Amendment, 2R. [150] 141; Com. [151] 670; cl. 1, 678
Naples, British Prisoners at, [148] 140, 272, 1472
Passport System in France, Correspondence moved for, [149] 575, 602, 1181
Wellington Monument, Res. [151] 2237

Mining Operations (Duchy of Lancaster),
c. Com. moved for, (Mr. J. L. Ricardo), [150] 443, [A. 63, N. 128, M. 65] 455

Ministers, Resignation of,
l. Statement (Earl Granville), [148] 1849
c. Statement (Viscount Palmerston), [148] 1868

Ministerial Statement.
l. Observations (Earl of Derby), [149] 22

Mint—Supply,
c. [150] 1250

MINTO, Earl of.
"Cagliari," Case of the [150] 1022

Miscellaneous Allowances—Supply,
c. [151] 1276

Miscellaneous Estimates—see Civil Service Estimates

Mixed Commission—Supply,
c. [151] 1345

Mobile, Consulship at,
c. Question (Mr. Wise), [150] 1465

MOFFATT, Mr. G., Ashburton
India, Government of, (No. 3), Com. cl. 13, Amend. [151] 865; cl. 23, 887; cl. 43, Amend. 906
Land, Sale and Transfer of, (Ireland), Com. cl. 21, [151] 62
Partnerships, Registration of, 2R. [151] 232
Stamp Duties on Drafts, Com. cl. 1, Amend. [150] 288; cl. 2, 290

MONCREIFF, Right Hon. J. (†Lord Advocate) Leith,
†Conspiracy to Murder, 2R. [148] 1802
County Franchise (Scotland), Leave, [150] 202
County Voters (Scotland), Registration of, 2R. [149] 2008
†Land, Transfer of, (Scotland), [148] 1733
†Probates and Letters of Administration, [148] 1732
†Universities (Scotland), [148] 1472; Leave, [149] 1548
Western Bank of Scotland, [149] 1208

Monies, Public Committee on,
c. Question (Mr. Ridley), [149] 1353

MONSELL, Rt. Hon. W., Limerick Co.
Army Estimates, [150] 378, 384, 1106, 1109
Army, Sanitary Condition of the, Res. [150] 494
Health, Public, Com. cl. 4, [150] 2282
India, Government of, (No. 3), Com. cl. 33, [151] 931
Land, Sale and Transfer of (Ireland), Com. [150] 1566, 2105; [151] 471; cl. 87, 970
Marriage Law Amendment, Com. cl. 4, Amend. [151] 684
Military Academy—Competitive Examinations, Address moved, [149] 1724, 1730, 1739
Military Education, [150] 1103
Oaths, Com. [149] 298
Recruiting System, [150] 366, 367
Roman Catholic Charities, [150] 2292
Supply—Harbours of Refuge, [150] 1123, 1126; — Kingstown Harbour, 1128; — General Registry Office, 1262
Tenants' Compensation (Ireland), 2R. [150] 1807
Vaccination—Small Pox, [150] 287, 1196

MONTEAGLE, Lord
Address in Answer to the Speech, [148] 82
Banks (Ireland and Scotland), Return moved for, [148] 452
East India Loan, 2R. [149] 242; 3R. 404
Excise Duties, 3R. [150] 327, 330
India, Government of (No. 3), Com. cl. 7, [151] 1572; cl. 34, 1687; cl. 52, 1692
India, State of, [149] 703;—Government of, 1350;—Report moved for, 1979
Joint-Stock Banking Companies, 2R. [151] 1352
Land, Sale and Transfer of (Ireland), Com. cl. 89, [151] 1781
Reformatory Schools (Ireland), 2R. [151] 1999
Universities (Scotland), Com. cl. 1, [151] 1674

MONTGOMERY, Sir G. G., Peeblesshire
County Voters, Registration of, (Scotland), Com. [150] 2191
Under Secretary of State for Scotland, Res. [150] 2150

MONTROSE, Duke of (Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster)
Universities (Scotland), 2R. [151] 1354; Com. cl. 3, 1676; cl. 12, ib.; cl. 15, 1678; Commons' Reasons, 2244

MOORE, Mr. J. B., Maldon
Joint-Stock Companies Acts Amendment, Com. cl. 20, [150] 2275
Stade Dues, Address moved, [149] 1007
Supply—Embassy House at Paris, [151] 1440

Moore's, Mr. Cecil, Appointment—Orange Lodges,
c. Question (Mr. J. D. FitzGerald), [150] 1920; Res. (Mr. J. D. FitzGerald), [151] 636; Motion neg. 665

Moreton Bay,
c. Question (Lord A. Churchill), [148] 549

Mortmain, Law of,
c. Question (Mr. Hadfield), [150] 1801

MOWBRAY, Rt. Hon. J. R. (Judge Advocate), Durham City
Marriage Law Amendment, Com. add. cl. [151] 685
Oaths, Administration of, by Committees, 2R. [151] 2138
Proctors, Compensation to, [151] 1077, 1079

Municipal Elections, Corrupt Practices at,
c. Question (Mr. Gilpin), [151] 1000; (Mr. Cross), 2124

Municipal Franchise Bill,
l. 1R.* [150] 761; 2R.* 1829; 3R.* [151] 691
l. Royal Assent, [151] 1967

Mutiny Bill,
c. 1R.* [149] 172;
2R. 265;
Com. 400; 3R.* 465
l. 1R.* [149] 445; 2R.* 556; 3R.* 703
Royal Assent, 788

NAAS, Rt. Hon. Lord Secretary for Ireland), Cockermouth
Assistant Barristers (Ireland), [151] 56
Belfast, Franchise at, [149] 1988;—Roman Catholic Magistrates in, 524;—Riots in, [150] 1537;—Corporation, [151] 84, 1001
Belvoir, Agricultural Model School at, [150] 333
Browne, Col., and Mr. O'Ferrall, [151] 1609
Business of the House, [151] 1506
Charitable Bequests Act, [151] 1000
Clerks of Petty Sessions (Ireland), Com. [149] 1168
Clerks of Petty Sessions (Ireland) (No. 2), 2R. [150] 2277
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Consid. add. cl. [151] 2027
Donegal, Destitution in, Com. moved for [149] 1529
Dublin, Affray at, [149] 173, 437, 438, 574; Report moved for, 669, 673, 685, 699, 702
Ejectments (Ireland)—Case of J. Byrne, Papers moved for, [149] 1844
Endowed Schools (Ireland), [149] 461; [150] 428; Res. [151] 629
Excise Duties, 2R. [149] 1747
Fairs and Markets (Ireland) [149] 423

[cont.

NAAS, Rt. Hon. Lord—cont.

Grand Juries (Ireland), [149] 423
Incumbered Estates Court (Ireland) [149] 174, 438
Irish Business, [151] 881
Land, Sale and Transfer of, (Ireland), Com. [150] 2106
Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Res. [149] 728
Lunatic Asylums Commission (Ireland), [150] 1919
Peace Preservation (Ireland) Act Amendment, 2R. [150] 2087
Police Dublin, [149] 574; [150] 21
Police Force (Ireland), Leave, [150] 2151; 2R. [151] 1121, 1137, 1773
Queen's Colleges (Ireland), [151] 930
Reformatory Schools (Ireland), Leave, [149] 1403; 2R. [150] 521, 523; Com. cl. 7, Amend. [151] 1068, 1069, 1433; cl. 17, 1435
Registration of Births, &c. (Ireland), [150] 1610
Secretary, The Irish, Office of, [150] 1462
Supply—Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant (Ireland), [150] 1259;—Board of Public Works (Ireland), 1261;—General Registry Office, 1262;—Queen's University (Ireland), [151] 1237;—Queen's Colleges (Ireland), ib.;—Royal Hibernian Academy, 1238;—Irish Hospitals, 1276;—Nonconforming, &c., Ministers (Ireland), 1280
Tenant Right, (Ireland), Com. moved for, [150] 193
Tenants' Compensation (Ireland), 2R. [149] 1092, 1097
Trinity College (Dublin), [151] 753
Vaccination, [150] 288

NAPIER, Rt. Hon. J., Dublin University

Circassia—Treaty of Paris, [148] 1738
Conspiracy to Murder, Leave, [148] 1031
Ecclesiastical Residences (Ireland), 2R. [148] 1552
Oaths, 2R. [148] 1087

NAPIER, Vice Adm. Sir C., Southwark

Army Estimates, [150] 387
Bothnia—Claims of British Merchants, Commission moved for, [151] 1858
Continuance Service Men, Returns moved for, [149] 1225
Haslar Slip, [149] 1723
Havelock's, Sir H., Annuity, 2R. [148] 503
India—Transport of Troops, Com. moved for, [148] 716, 732;—Vote of Thanks to the Army, &c., 917
Metropolis Local Management, Com. [151] 1925
National Defences, The, [150] 1926
Naval Returns, [149] 1799
Navy Estimates, [149] 115, 133, 891, 901, 903, 904; Amend. 1227, 1229, 1231, 1341, 1633, 1636, 1637, 1638, 1641, 1642, 1648, 1649
Navy, Manning the, Com. moved for, [150] 886, 898, 905, 911
Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Res. [150] 857
Sailors and Marines in Greenwich Hospital, Res. [151] 571, 572
Slave Trade—Right of Search, [151] 1319

[cont.

NAPIER, Vice Adm. Sir C.—cont.

Supply—Harbours of Refuge, [150] 1122, 1124;—Slave Bounties, [151] 1419
Weedon Establishment, Commission moved for, [150] 1801; [151] 254

Naples, British Consul at,
c. Question (Mr. Dalglish), [151] 1500;—Our Relations with, Question (Mr. T. Duncombe), 2375;—see "Cagliari," Case of the, National Debt Office—Supply,

c. [150] 1262

National Defences, The,
c. Question (Sir C. Napier), [150] 1926

National Gallery—Supply,
c. [151] 1268; Report, 1380; Amend. (Lord Elcho), 1390, [o. q. A. 110, N. 128, M. 18] 1391;—Opening on Saturdays, Observations (Mr. T. Duncombe), 1867, 2373

Naval Returns,
c. Question (Sir C. Napier), [149] 1799

Navigation Advances (Ireland) Bill,
c. 1R.* [151] 666; 2R.* 857; 3R.* 1076
l. 1R.* [151] 1146; 2R.* 1447; 3R.* 1655
Royal Assent, 1967

Navy,
Admiralty, The, c. Explanation (Sir F. Baring), [149] 1423
Continuance Service Men, c. Returns moved for, (Sir C. Napier), [149] 1225; Motion withdrawn, ib.
Dockards, &c., Officers of the, c. Question (Sir J. Elphinstone), [149] 813; (Mr. Wilson), [151] 1085
Estimates, c. [149] 110, 878; Amend. (Mr. W. Williams), 882, [o. q. A. 161, N. 24, M. 137] 883; Amend. (Sir C. Napier), 1227; Motion neg. 1230, 1338, 1627; Amend (Mr. Briscoe), [A. 26, N. 224, M. 198] 1643; Adj. moved (Mr. W. Williams), 1649, [r. p. A. 36, N. 163, M. 127] 1650
Greenwich Hospital, The Officers at, c. Question (Sir G. Pechell), [149] 709;—Sailors and Marines, Res. (Sir C. Napier), [151] 571; Res. withdrawn, 572
Haslar Slip, c. Question (Mr. Bentinck), [149] 1722
"Juno," H.M. Ship, c. Question (Mr. Warren), [148] 269
Manning the, l. Question (Lord Brougham), [150] 2088
c. Com. moved for (Sir C. Napier), [150] 886; Amend. (Admiral Duncombe), 895; Commission moved for, 911; Answer to the Address, 1061; Question (Admiral Duncombe), 1612
Rifles, Breech-loading, c. Question (Mr. H. Berkeley), [150] 2253
Transport Department, c. Observations (Mr. Lindsay), [149] 846

Negro Immigration in Jamaica,
l. Explanation (Earl of Carnarvon), [149] 946

Negro Regiment for India,
l. Question (Lord Brougham), [149] 458; Observations (Earl of Ellenborough), 556
c. Question (Mr. G. Vansittart), [149] 815; Papers moved for (Mr. Lowe), 1041; Amend. (Mr. Baillie), 1044

Negroes, Captured—Supply,
c. [151] 1270

NELSON, Earl
Marriage Law Amendment, 2R. [151] 1978

Nelson Column, The,
c. Question (Admiral Walcott), [149] 1220;—Supply, [151] 1425

Netley Hospital,
c. Question (Mr. Weguelin), [149] 1174; (Mr. Tite), [151] 56

New Caledonia, Government of, Bill, (afterwards entitled British Columbia)
c. 1R.* [151] 730;
2R. 1096;
Com. cl. 1, Amend. (Mr. Christy), 1347;
Consid. 1429;
Question (Mr. Gladstone), 1505;
Re-com. cl. 1, 1762;
cl. 2; cl. 3. 1768;
3R.* 1785
l. 1R.* [151] 1865;
2R. 2097; 3R.* 2243
Royal Assent, 2369;—see Hudson's Bay Company—Oregon

NEWCASTLE, Duke of
Chelsea Bridge Act Amendment, 2R. [151] 1908
Church Rates Abolition, 2R. [151] 817
Commissioners for Exhibition (1851), 3R. [151] 1075
Cornwall Submarine Mines, 2R. [151] 2078
Corrupt Practices Prevention, 2R. [151] 2165
India, Government of (No. 3), Com. cl. 12, [151] 1582; cl. 27, 1587; cl. 34, 1686; cl. 53, 1694; Observations, 1906
Local Government, 3R. add. cl. [151] 2154
Metropolis Local Management, 2R. [151] 2158
Militia, Organization of the [150] 2012
New Caledonia, Government of, 2R. [151] 2100
Oaths, Report, [150] 1170; Consid. [151] 1254
Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Res. [150] 642
Patriotic Fund, Correspondence moved for, [149] 1258
Property Qualification, 2R. [150] 1842
School Trustees, 2R. [151] 1667
Thames, State of the, [151] 384, 474

NEWDEGATE, Mr. C. N., Warwickshire, N.
Ali Moorad's Claim—Mr. Butt, Com. moved for, [148] 1864
Army Estimates, [150] 374, 380, 383
Bank Acts, Com. [148] 672
Bank Issues Indemnity, 2R. [148] 297, 309, 310
Budget, The—Financial Statement, [149] 1316

[cont.

NEWDEGATE, Mr. C. N.—cont.
Business of the House, [149] 79
Church Rates Abolition, Com. [149] 1451, 1587; 3R. [150] 1402
Churches and Churchyards, Com. moved for, [149] 1861
Commercial Distress, [148] 679
East India Loan, Com. [148] 1889
Havelock's, Lady, and Sir H. Havelock's Annuities, Com. Res. [148] 777
India, Government of, (No. 1), Leave, [148] 1714
Jews, 2R. Amend. [151] 1614; 3R. Adj. moved, 1863, 1864, 1895
Maynooth College, Com. moved for, [149] 1998
Medals for the Army in India [151] 911
Oaths, Leave, [148] 483, 484, 497; 2R. 1098, 1099, 1100, 1101, 1103, 1104; Com. [149] 296, 299, 305; Consid. Amend. 490, 516; Explanation, 1983, 1984; Lords' Amends. [150] 338, 339; That Baron de Rothschild be a Member of the Committee, 349; Report, 530
Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, [150] 525; Res. 1058
Property Qualification, [150] 1427
Rothschild, Baron de, Res. [148] 977; Admission of, Res. [151] 2111

New England Company,
c. Question (Mr. Christy), [149] 812

Newfoundland Fisheries,
c. Question (Mr. Hanbury), [150] 673

Newhaven Harbour—Supply,
c. [151] 1443

New Trial in Criminal Cases Bill,
c. 1R.* [150] 2098;
2R. [151] 1051; Amend. (Mr. Miles) 1057, [o. q. A. 145, N. 91, M. 54], 1062;
Com. 1064

New Writs Bill,
c. 1R.* [151] 1076; 2R.* 1481; 3R.* 2105
l. 1R.* [151] 2077; 2R.* 2151; 3R.* 2243
Royal Assent, 2369

New Zealand,
Arms Act, c. Question (Lord A. Churchill), [150] 923
Diocese of, l. Question (Earl of Powis), [150] 1445
Loan Guarantee Committee, c. Question (Sir J. Trelawny), [149] 1354; Observations (Sir J. Trelawny), [150] 354
Naval Stations, c. Question (Lord A. Churchill), [148] 681

NICOLL, Mr. D., Frome
Bankruptcy and Insolvency [151] 2304
Cheques, Adhesive Stamps on, [150] 1310
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Consid. add. cl. [151] 2024
Drafts on Bankers' Law Amendment, 3R. Amend. [151] 2076
Elliot, Mr., Absconding of, [150] 1449
India, Transport of Troops to, [150] 2113

[cont.

NICOLL, Mr. D.—cont.
Overland Route, The, [151] 1700
Public Entertainment, Licensing Places of, [149] 460
Supply — Civil Contingencies, [150] 1138;—Prosecutions, 1471;—Police Courts (Metropolis), 1487;—Metropolitan Police, 1489;—Lord Advocate, &c., Scotland, 1491;—Improvement of the Kafirs, [151] 1421
Weedon Establishment, Commission moved for, [151] 254, 586

NISBET, Mr. R. P., Chippenham
India, Government of, (No. 2), Leave, [149] 883
India — Vote of Thanks to the Army, &c., Amended Res. [149] 255;—Colonisation of, Com. moved for, 276, 293

Nisi Prius Court (Ireland) Bill,
c. 1R.* [150] 1404;
2R. 2278; 3R.* [151] 265
l. 1R.* [151] 374; 2R.* 1146; 3R.* 1349
Royal Assent, 1967

NORFOLK, Duke of, (Earl Marshal)
Patriotic Fund, [149] 788, 789; Correspondence moved for, 1255, 1263

NORREYS, Sir D. J., Mallow
Army Estimates, [149] 818; [150] 372, 373, 1105, 1106, 1107
Business, Private—Standing Orders, Report, [151] 2170
Dublin, Affray at, Report moved for, [149] 696
India, Government of (No. 3), Lords' Amends. cl. 32, [151] 2197
Land, Sale and Transfer of (Ireland), Com. cl. 4, Amend. [151] 60; cl. 47, 65; cl. 87, 970
Members' Seats, Res. [149] 2001
Metropolis Local Management, Com. cl. 2, [151] 1947; cl. 17, 1955
Ordnance Survey, [151] 2367
Oude—The Proclamation, [150] 860, 861; Res. 1019, 1032;—The Landholders of, 920
Papers, Delivery of, Presented by Command, [151] 414, 415
Supply—Secretary to Lord Lieutenant (Ireland), [150] 1258;—Printing, &c., Houses of Parliament, 1266; — General Register House, Edinburgh, 1499, 1502;—Department of Science and Art, [151] 1175, 1201; Report, 1266;—Embassies and Missions Abroad, 1272;—Superannuations, 1275;—Miscellaneous Allowances—Irish Hospitals, 1276;—Improvement of the Kafirs, 1421;—Boundary Surveys (Ireland), 1423

NORRIS, Mr. J. T., Abingdon
London Corporation Regulation, Com. [151] 310
Metropolis Local Management Act Amendment, Leave, [151] 1533; Com. cl. 3, 1949; cl. 14, 1954

NORTH, Colonel J. S., Oxfordshire
Army Estimates, [150] 373, 374, 382, 389, 392, 393, 1105, 1106, 1108

[cont.

NORTH, Col. J. S.—cont.
Army—Warrant of 1854, [148] 140; [149] 1355; [151] 84, 755;—Sanitary Condition of the, Res. [150] 484
Captains in the Army, Address moved, [150] 1102
Commissions, Sale of, [151] 415
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Consid. cl. 1, [151] 2064
Estimates, The, [149] 1610
Havelock, Major General, Pension to, Rep. [148] 411, 414
Indian Officers, Distinctions conferred upon, [148] 138
Inglis, Major General, [151] 2352
Jews, 3R. Adj. moved, [151] 1864
Land Transport Corps, Com. moved for, [149] 1625
Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Res. [149] 722
Mayo Writ, [148] 385
Medical Officers, Army, [151] 1082
Military Organization, Res. [150] 1352; [151] 568
Mortality in the Guards, Report moved for, [148] 1549
Mutiny, 2R. [149] 268
Property Qualification, Com. cl. 1, [150] 1435
Recruiting System, [150] 370
Turkish Medals, [148] 358, 976

NORTH, Mr. F., Hastings
Lancashire and Yorkshire, &c., Railway Company, Consid. [150] 1602, 1605

North American, British, Expedition — Supply,
c. [151] 1444

North American Provinces, British — Supply,
c. [151] 1268

NORTHCOTE, Sir S. H., Stamford
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Consid. cl. 1, [151] 2059

Oaths Bill,
c. Leave, [148] 469; 1R.* 499;
2R. 1084;
149] Com. 294; Adj. moved (Mr. Dillwyn), 299; Motion withdrawn, 300;
· cl. 3, 305;
· Observations (Lord J. Russell), 442;
· Consid. 466; Amend. (Mr. Cogan), 468, [A. 66, N. 345, M. 279] 483;
· Amend. (Mr. Steuart), 483; Amend. withdrawn, 490;
· Amend. (Mr. Newdegate), 506, [o. q. A. 297, N. 144, M. 153] 547;
· Amend. (Mr. Wigram), 550; Amend. neg. ib.;
· 3R. 946;
· Explanation (Mr. Newdegate), 1983
149] l. 1R.* 946;
· 2R. 1447;
· Com. cl. 1, 1749; Amend. (Earl of Wicklow), 1754; Amend. neg. 1757;
· cl. 5, Amend. (Lord Chancellor), 1758, [o. q. Contents 80, Not-Contents 119, M. 39] 1794; cl. 6, 1796;
· 3R.* 2009

[cont.

Oaths Bill—cont.
150] c. Lords' Amends. [150] 336; Amend. (Lord J. Russell) 338, [A. 263, N. 150, M. 113] 347; 2nd Amend. (Lord J. Russell), 348;
· Com. appointed, That Baron de Rothschild be a Member (Mr. T. Duncombe), 349; Adj. Debate, 430, [A. 251, N. 196, M. 55] 440; Report, 529;
· Conference, 763, 859
150] l. Conference, 858; Report, 1139; Amend. (Earl of Lucan), 1142; Adj. moved (Earl Grey, 1170, [Contents 68, Not-Contents 80, M. 12] 1176; Amend. withdrawn, ib.; Amend. (Lord Lyndhurst), 1185; Question (Lord Denman), 2218;
151] Com. moved for (Earl of Malmesbury) [151] 154; Consideration of Report put off, 262, 729; Report, 1243;
· Reason 4, Amend. (Earl of Derby), [Contents 50, Not-Contents 42, M. 8] 1255
151] c. Observations (Lord J. Russell), 1371;
· Lords' Amends. 1902; Res. (Lord J. Russell), 1903; Amend. (Mr. T. Duncombe), ib.; Amend. withdrawn, 1904; Amend. (Mr. Spooner) 1905; Amend. neg. ib.;
151] l. Royal Assent, 1967

Oaths, Administration of, by Committees Bill,
l. 1R.* [151] 1655; 2R.* 1773; 3R.* 1906
c. 1R.* [151] 2067;
2R. 2138; 3R.* 2168
l. Royal Assent, [151] 2369

Oaths Substitution Bill,
l. 1R. [150] 1600;
2R. deferred, [151] 154, 693; — Bill postponed, 930

O'Brien, Mr. P., Kings Co.
"Abeona," The, [149] 1193
African Squadron—Slave Trade [151] 11
Army Estimates, [149] 138, 139
Army, Government of the, [150] 1447;—Subalterns in the, Address moved, [151] 2239
Browne, Col., and Mr. O'Ferrall, [151] 1610
Budget, The—Financial Statement, [149] 1305
Business of the House, [149] 80; [151] 1429
Cashel Election, Petition, [149] 161
Chelsea Bridge Act Amendment, 2R. [150] 1993; Com. cl. 3, [151] 1649
Civil Bills, &c. (Ireland), 2R. [151] 1548; Com. cl. 2, 1771
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Com. cl. 1, [151] 1597; Consid. add. cl. 2021, 2125, 2128
Donegal, Destitution in, Com. moved for, [149] 1528
Ejectments (Ireland)—Case of J. Byrne, Papers moved for, [149] 1842, 1844
Excise Duties, 2R. Amend. [149] 1744
Galway Freemen Disfranchisement, Com. [149] 1422; Com. 2287
Havelock's, Sir H., Annuity, 2R. [148] 508, 574, 575
Health, Public, Com. cl. 4, [150] 2282
India—Government of, Com. moved for, [149] 1717; Res. 3, [150] 1686
India, Government of (No. 3), 2R. [151] 360
India—Mutiny in, Papers moved for, [149] 375; —Colonisation of Com. [149] 554

[cont.

O'Brien, Mr. P.—cont.
Judgments (Ireland) Act Amendment, Com. cl. 1, [151] 1960
Land, Sale and Transfer of, Com. cl. 3, [151] 59; cl. 4, 60
Land Transport Corps, Com. moved for, [149] 1627
Landlord and Tenant (Ireland), [151] 421, 447
Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Res. [149] 761
Magisterial Appointments, [150] 270, 272; Return moved for, 322
Military Academy—Competitive Examinations, Address moved, [149] 1738
Navy Estimates, [149] 1628
Oude, Annexation of, Papers moved for, [148] 1543;—Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Res. [150] 1039
Peace Preservation (Ireland) Act Amendment, 2R. [150] 2087
Police Force (Ireland), 2R. Amend. [151] 1131, 1134, 1549
Private Bills, Res. [150] 472
Reformatory Schools (Ireland), Com. cl. 15, 1434; cl. 17, 1435
Rewards to Members, Res. [151] 201
Slave Trade—Right of Search, Res. [151] 1343
Supply—Department of Science and Art, [151] 1203;—Public Education (Ireland), 1232;—Irish Hospitals, 1276;—Nonconforming, &c., Ministers (Ireland), 1278;—New Public Offices (Belfast), 1423;—Four Courts Extension (Dublin), 1425;—Embassy House at Paris, 1439, 1441
Tenant Right (Ireland), Com. moved for, [150] 195
Tenants' Compensation (Ireland), 2R. [150] 1819
Western Bank of Scotland, [149] 1210
Woolwich Academy, Admission to, [150] 251
Workhouses, Metropolitan, Com. moved for, [150] 107

Obscene Books, Sale of, Prevention,
l. Return moved for, (Lord Campbell), [148] 226

O'Connell, Captain D., Tralee
Militia, Disembodied, [149] 1354
Roman Catholic Soldiers and Sailors, [149] 249; [151] 1501, 1502

O'Donoghoe, The, Tipperary Co.
Dublin, Affray at, [149] 436
Ellis, Mr., Murder of—The Cormacks, [151] 16, 23, 1194, 1785
Tenants' Compensation (Ireland), 2R. [149] 1065, 1089

Offices, New Government,
c. Question (Mr. Tite), [148] 1165; (Sir J. Shelley), [150] 21

Ogilvy, Sir J., Dundee
Agricultural Statistics (Scotland), Papers moved for, [149] 784
Supply—County Courts, [150] 1478
Under Secretary of State for Scotland, Res. [150] 2131

Orange Lodges—See Moore's, Mr. C., Appointment,

Ordnance Survey Commission,
c. Question (Viscount Duncan), [150] 335 ; (Sir D. Norreys), [151] 2367

Oregon, Gold in,
c. Question (Mr. Christy), [150] 1059

Organ, Barrel, Suppression Bill,
l. 1R.* [149] 1097 ;
Petition (Marquess of Westmeath), 1351 ; 2R. 1925 ; Amend. (Earl of Wilton), 1929

OSBORNE, Mr. R. B., Dover
"Cagliari," Capture of the, [149] 106
Civil Bills, &c. (Ireland) Act Amendment, 2R. [151] 1430, 1546 ; Com. cl. 2, 1770, 1772
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Com. cl. 1, [151] 1597 ; Amend. 1600, 1602 ; Consid. cl 1, 2062 ; That the Bill do pass, 2123
Government, Policy of the, [149] 181, 187
India, Despatches from, [150] 928;—Transport of Troops to, [151] 1873
Land, Sale and Transfer of (Ireland), Com. [150] 2105 ; cl. 3, 2111 ; cl. 41, [151] 65 ; cl. 51, 471
Navy Estimates, [149] 130
Orange Society, Dublin, Explanation, [149] 464
Supply—Inspectors of Lunatic Asylums, (Ireland), [150] 1260;—Theological Professors, Belfast, [151] 1240
Turkish Medal, [151] 1606

Oude,
Annexation of, c. Papers moved for, (Mr. Baillie), [148] 1477
Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, l. Question (Earl Granville), [150] 147, 177 ; Papers moved for (Earl of Ellenborough), 228 ; Notice (Earl of Shaftesbury), 323 ; Explanation (Marquess of Lansdowne), 404 ;
Resolution (Earl of Shaftesbury), 579 ; Previous Question moved (Lord Chancellor), 629; [Contents 158, Not-Contents 167, M. 9] 670; Observations (Earl of Derby), 919
c. Question (Mr. Bright), [150] 180 ; Notice (Mr. Cardwell), 332, 530 ; (Lord A. Vane-Tempest), 426 ; Question (Mr. Newdegate), 525 ; (Sir D. Norreys), 860 ; (Mr. Crawford), 865 ; Explanation (Viscount Palmerston), 925 ; Question (Mr. Wilson), 1921
Resolution (Mr. Cardwell), 674; Amend. (Mr. Dillwyn), 728 ; Adj. moved (Mr. Roebuck), 761 ; Adj. Debate, 764, 931, 1024, 1026 ; Amend. and Motion withdrawn, 1060 ;—see India
Creditors of the State of, c. Question (Mr. Dillwyn), [151] 1930
European Regiments in, c. Question (Mr. W. Vansittart), [150] 427
King of, l. Question (Marquess of Clanricarde), [151] 1550
c. Question (Mr. Pease), [151] 1502
Landowners of, c. Question (Sir D. Norreys), [150] 920
Pacification of, c. Question (Sir E. Perry), [150] 1852, 1947, 2017
Policy in, l. Petition (Earl of Albemarle), [149] 1921
c. Question (Sir E. Perry), [149] 1587
Royal Family, Restoration of the, l. Petition (Earl of Albemarle), [150] 858

Outlawries Bill,
c. 1R.* [148] 86

Overland Route, The,
c. Question (Mr. Nicoll) [151] 1700

OVERSTONE, Lord
Address in Answer to the Speech, [148] 75, 77
Marriage Law Amendment, 2R. [151] 1995, 1996
Metropolis Local Management, 2R. [151] 2163

OXFORD, Bishop of
Beer, Sale of, [151] 2242
Bishops' Trusts Substitution, 2R. [148] 852
Church of England, Political Services of the, Address moved, [151] 495
Church of England Special Services, Com. cl. 1, Amend [148] 1462, 1463
Church Rates Abolition, 2R. [151] 851, 852
Convocation at York, Papers moved for, [151] 1560
Coolies, Exportation of, from Hong Kong, Correspondence moved for, [151] 70, 374
Divorce and Matrimonial Causes, 3R. [151] 159, 161
Ecclesiastical Commission, 2R. [150] 14 ; Rep. add. cl. [151] 991, 992
Female Children, Protection of, 2R. [150] 249
India, Government of (No. 3), Com. cl. 33, Amend. [151] 1589, 1590 ; That the Bill do pass, 2018
Jews, 2R. [151] 721
Marriage Law Amendment, 2R. [151] 1984, 1991
Religious Worship Act Amendment, [148] 132, 133, 135
Slave Trade, The, [150] 1700 ; Petition, 2195
Spiritual Destitution, Com. moved for, [149] 1574

Oxford and Cambridge Universities, &c., Estates Bill,
c. 1R.* [150] 19 ; 2R.* 673 ; 3R.* 1516
l. 1R.* [150] 1586 ; 2R.* [151] 472 ; 3R.* 1447
Royal Assent, 1967

Oyster Fisheries, The,
c. Question (Sir G. Pechell), [151] 2032

PACKE, Mr. C. W., Leicestershire, S.
Address in Answer to the Speech, Report, [148] 144
Agricultural Statistics, Leave, [149] 162 ; 2R. Amend. 1879
Church Rates Abolition, Com. Amend. [149] 1424, 1452 ; cl. 1, 1469 ; 3R. [150] 1708
Property Qualification, Com. [150] 577
Weights and Measures, 2R. [150] 918

PAGET, Lord C. E., Sandwich
Lighthouses, &c., Address moved, [149] 1110, 1122, 1141 ; [151] 756
Navy Estimates, [149] 929, 1342, 1642
Navy, Manning the, Com. moved for, [150] 898
Slave Trade — Right of Search, Res. [151] 1332, 1334
Submarine Telegraph, The [150] 1732
Weights and Measures, 2R. [150] 915

PAKINGTON, Rt. Hon. Sir J. S., (†First Lord of the Admiralty), Droitwich

†Admiralty, The, [149] 1423
Bank Acts Committee, Nomination of, Com. Amend. [148] 966
†Barber, W. H., Case of, Com. moved for, Amend. [150] 2117
†Bothnia, Gulf of, Destruction of Timber in the, [151] 1183, 1371;—Claim of British Merchants, Commission moved for, 1853
†Business, Public, [149] 1600
†Chancellor of the Exchequer's Speech at Slough, [150] 1229
†China, Relations with, [150] 1531
Clive Fund and Army Patronage (India), [148] 420, 424, 462
†Continuance Service Men, Returns moved for, [149] 1225
†Cornwall Submarine Mines, Com. [151] 1652
Education (England). Commission moved for, [148] 1184, 1205, 1206, 1236, 1244, 1248
Friendly Offers of Foreign Powers, [148] 465
†Galway Freemen Disfranchisement, Com. [150] 2157
†Greenwich Hospital, The Officers at, [149] 709;—Sailors and Marines in, Res. [151] 572
†Harbours of Refuge, [151] 1746; Commission moved for, [151] 2142
Havelock, Sir H., Pension to, Res. [148] 390; Rep. 415, 417, 418, 569
Havelock's, Lady, and Sir H. Havelock's Annuities, Com. Res. [148] 774
†India, Government of, Com. Res. 2, [150] 300
India—Troops for [148] 355, 357, 461; Com. moved for, 717, 720, 725;—Vote of Thanks to the Army, &c., 867, 868, 894, 901, 902, 916
†Land Transport Corps, Com. moved for, [149] 1625
†Man, Isle of, [151] 1284
†National Defences, The, [150] 1942
†Navy Estimates, [149] 110, 124, 129, 130, 882, 883, 891, 903, 908, 933, 939, 943, 1229, 1232, 1236, 1239, 1240, 1242, 1245, 1339, 1346, 1348, 1628, 1629, 1631, 1638, 1639, 1640, 1642, 1644, 1646
†Navy, Manning the, Com. moved for, [150] 903, 1612, 1613
†Oaths, Lords' Amends. [150] 344, 347; That Baron de Rothschild be a Member of the Committee, 352
Oude, Annexation of, Papers moved for, [148] 1537;—†The Proclamation, [150] 862;—(Colonel Franks), 866
†Peel, Sir W., Death of, [150] 1328
†Piers and Harbours, Leave, [150] 1797
Poor Removal, Com. moved for [150] 1914
†Rewards to Members, Res [151] 189
†Rifles, Breech-loading, in the Navy, [150] 2253
†Roman Catholic Sailors, [151] 1501
†Slave Trade—Right of Search, Res. [151] 1323, 1334
†Submarine Telegraph, The, [150] 1732
†Supply—Harbours of Refuge, [150] 1125;—Prosecutions, 1470
†Transport Department, [149] 846
Turkish Medals, [148] 359
†Weedon Establishment, Commission moved for, [150] 1880

Palaces, Royal—Supply, c. [150] 1111

PALK, Mr. L., Devonshire, S.

Bengal—Officers in the Civil Service, [148] 1370
Church Rates Abolition, Com. cl. 1, [149] 1458, 1459; cl. 3, [150] 570
Commissioners for Exhibition (1851), 2R. [150] 2261
Galway Freemen Disfranchisement, Com. Adj. moved, [149] 1420
Health, Board of—Medical Staff, [150] 1197
Health, Public Act Amendment (1848), 2R. [148] 1457; [149] 444
Health, Public, Com. [150] 2279; cl. 4, 2281, 2284; Lords' Amends, [151] 2276
Local Government, [149] 2015; 2R. 2095; Com. cl. 9, [151] 171; cl. 20, Amend. 173
Oaths, Consid. [149] 473
Oude, Annexation of, Papers moved for, [148] 1542
Reformatory Schools (Ireland), Leave, [149] 1404

PALMERSTON, Rt. Hon. Viscount (†First Lord of the Treasury), Tiverton

†Address in Answer to the Speech, [148] 1027
†Ali Moorad's Claim—Mr. Butt, Com. moved for, [148] 1865
†Alien Act, The, [148] 766, 771
†Army, Mortality in the, [148] 1169
Army, Sanitary State of the, Res. [150] 487
†Ashburnham, General, [148] 862
Ballot, Leave, [150] 1771
†Bank Acts Committee, Nomination of Com. [148] 967,
†Bishops, Retiring, Pensions for, [148] 556
†Black Sea, Commerce of the, [148] 468
†Business of the House, [148] 1606; [150] 1200; [151] 1346
Business, Public, [149] 176, 1596
†"Cagliari," Capture of the, [148] 142, 272, 273, 469, 861, 1472; [149] 99, 179
†Calcutta Memorial, [148] 556
†Cantillon, Legacy to—Will of Napoleon I., [148] 1273
Chancellor of the Exchequer's Speech at Slough, [150] 1204
Chelsea Bridge Act Amendment, 2R. [150] 1995
†China, War in, [148] 1276
†Church Rates, [148] 678
†Circassia—Treaty of Paris, [148] 1735
†Conspiracy to Murder, Leave, [148] 933, 1069, 1077; 2R. 1741, 1837
Consular Service, Com. moved for, [149] 552
†Corrupt Practices Prevention, [148] 678; Consid. cl. 1, 2061, 2062
County Franchise, 2R. [150] 1875
Danubian Principalities, Address moved, [150] 84
Diplomatic Salaries and Pensions, Res. [149] 1518
Dublin Port Dues, Com. moved for, [149] 1363
†Education (England), Commission moved for [148] 1248
†Election, Corrupt Practices at, [148] 1262
Estimates, The, [149] 1613
†Friendly Offers of Foreign Powers, [148] 466
Galway Freemen Disfranchisement, Com. [149] 1418, 1421

[cont.

PALMERSTON, Viscount—cont.
†Godrevy Lighthouse, Returns moved for, [148] 1359
Government, Policy of the, [149] 218
†Havelock, Major General, Pension to, Res. [148] 387, 396, 397, 559, 579
†Health, Public, Act Amendment, 2R. [148] 1458
Howden, Lord, Recall of, [149] 1337
†India, Government of (No. 1), Leave, [148] 1276, 1457, 1551, 1709; 2R. postponed, [149] 156; Bill withdrawn, [151] 1241
India, Government of (No. 2), Leave, [149] 834, 871, 1349
India, Government of, Com. moved for, [149] 1673, 2038; Res. 2, 2193; [150] 316; Res. 3 (4), 319, 1684, 1688, 1689, 1980, 1988; Res. 5, (6), 2067; Res. 6, (7), 2225, 2238, 2250
India, Government of, (No. 3), Com. cl. 7, Amend. [151] 461, 466; cl. 11, 777; cl. 14, 868; cl. 27, 890; add. cl. 908; Consid. add. cl. 1013, 1014, 1016, 1017, 1034; cl. 27, 1049; 3R. 1089; Lords' Amends. cl. 27, 2187, 2336
†India—Intelligence from, [148] 313;—Transport of Troops to, Com. moved for, 716, 718, 721, 729; [151] 2043
†Indian Army, &c., Vote of Thanks to the, [148] 140; Res. 865, 867, 868, 890, 931; Amend. Res. [149] 255
†Indian Telegraph through Austria, [148] 138
†Justice, Minister of, [148] 1168
Lighthouses, &c., Address moved, [149] 1136
Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Res. [149] 773
Marriage Law Amendment, Consid. [151] 792
†Mayo Writ, [148] 386
Metropolis Local Management Act Amendment, Leave, [151] 1517: 2R. 1742; Consid. cl. 1, 2051
Military Organization, Res. [150] 1353
†Ministers, Resignation of, [148] 1868
Moore's, Mr. C., Appointment, Res. [150] 661
Navy Estimates, [149] 934, 945, 946, 1344, 1629
Navy, Manning the, Com. moved for, [150] 909
Negroes, Enlistment of, Papers moved for, [149] 1044
Oaths, Consid. [149] 480; That Baron de Rothschild be a Member of the Committee, [150] 352
Oude, Annexation of, Papers moved for, [148] 1477;—Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Res. [150] 761, 857, 861; Explanation, 925, 927, 929, 930, 1020, 1024, 1030, 1040
Parks, The, [151] 2374
Parliamentary Reform, [149] 1178
Passport System in France, Correspondence moved for, [149] 597
†Princess Royal's Marriage, Address moved, [148] 759, 760, 762
Rewards to Members, Res. [149] 1040
†Rothschild, Baron de, Res. [148] 976, 978
Sandhurst and Woolwich, [149] 2119
†Slave Trade, [148] 555;—Relations with the United States, [151] 52;—Right of Search, Res. 1334, 2043
†Stade Dues, The, [148] 469; Address moved, [149] 1009, 1018
Suez, Isthmus of, Canal, Res. [150] 1379
Supply—County Courts, [150] 1484:—General Register House, Edinburgh, 1502

[cont.

PALMERSTON, Viscount—cont.
Tenants' Compensation (Ireland), 2R. [149]. 1086
†Turnpikes, Metropolitan, [148] 1169
Under Secretary of State for Scotland, Res. [150] 2142
Universities (Scotland), Lords' Amends. [151] 2136
†Walewski's, Count, Letter and the "Moniteur," [148] 1470
†Windham, General, [148] 1606

PANMURE, Lord (†Secretary of State for War)
†Affairs, Public, State of, [148] 704, 705
†Army, Sanitary Condition of the, Report of Commissions, [148] 969
†"Austria," The—Conveyance of Troops, Paper moved for, [148] 351, 353
Barrack Accommodation, Return moved for, [149] 789, 808
†Canning, Viscount, and Sir Colin Campbell, [148] 672
†Havelock, Major General, Pension to, Address moved, [148] 321
†Havelock's, Lady, and Sir H. Havelock's Annuities, 2R. [148] 1729; 3R. 1854
†India—Vote of Thanks to the Civil Service, Army and Navy, [148] 809; Amended Res. [149] 245;—Conveyance of Troops to, [148] 1720, 1721, 1722
Johnstone, Col., Case of, [150] 1586
†Militia, Embodied, Returns moved for, [148] 1587, 1592
†Religious Worship Act Amendment, 2R. [148] 347

Paper Duty,
c. Res. (Mr. M. Gibson), [151] 98

Papers, Delivery of, Presented by Command,
c. Question (Sir D. Norreys), [151] 414

Paris, English Church in,
l. Question (Viscount Dungannon), [150] 247

Parks, Royal—Supply,
c. 1115; Report, [150] 1201;—Question (Viscount Palmerston), [151] 2374;—see Green Park—St. James's Park—Serpentine River—Sculpture in the Parliament, Independence of, Bill,

l. 1R.* [150] 2088;
2R. deferred, [151] 589; Order discharged, 915

Parliament, Meeting of,
l. The Queen's Speech, [148] 2; Address moved (Lord Portman), 5; Her Majesty's Answer, 227;—Explanation (Earl of Derby), 314, 521;—Prorogation, Lords' Commissioners' Speech, [151] 2369
c. Address moved (Mr. C. W. Martin), [148] 86; Report, 143; Her Majesty's Answer, 268;—Prorogation, [151] 2378

Parliament, New Houses of—Supply,
c. [150] 1117; Report, 1201;—Decay of the Stone, Question (Mr. Hume), [151] 1931

Parliament, Sittings of,
c. Observations (Mr. C. Forster), [151] 1185

Parliamentary Reform,
l. Question (Earl of Carnarvon), [148] 1119
c. Question (Mr. T. Duncombe), [149] 1174

Parochial Registration,
c. Question (Mr. Warren), [149] 462

Partnerships, Registration of, Bill,
c. Leave, [149] 1550; 1R.* 1556;
2R. [151] 225; Amend. (Mr. Collier), 232; Bill withdrawn, 245

Passenger Act, Chinese, Amendment (1855) Bill,
l. 1R.* [151] 472; 2R.* 792;
3R. 993
c. 1R.* [151] 1155

Passing Tolls—Shipping Dues,
l. Question (Lord Stanley of Alderley), [149] 789
c. Question (Mr. Mackinnon), [149] 813

Passport System,
l. Question (Earl Stanhope), [148] 745; Papers presented (Earl of Malmesbury), [149] 1100
c. Correspondence moved for (Mr. M. Milnes), [149] 575; Question, 1181

Passports, Stamp Duty on, Bill,
c. 1R.* [150] 496; 2R.* 523; 3R.* 859
l. 1R.* [150] 919; 2R.* 1507; 3R.* 1690
Royal Assent, 1997

Patent Law Amendment Bill,
c. 1R.* [149] 1424;
2R. 516; Amend. (Solicitor General), [150] 519;
Bill put off, 520

Patent Law Fees, &c.—Supply,
c. [151] 1412; Amend. (Mr. W. Williams), 1413; Amend. neg. 1415; Amend. (Mr. A. Smith), 1416; Amend. withdrawn, ib.

Patriotic Fund,
l. Question (Duke of Norfolk), [149] 788; Correspondence moved for, 1255
c. Question (Mr. Cogan), [149] 814

PATTEN, Col. J. W., Lancashire, N.
Ali Moorad's Claim—Mr. Butt, Com. moved for, [148] 1863
Breach of Privilege—Washington Wilks, [150] 1327
Business of the House, [151] 603, 604
Business, Private—Standing Orders, Report. [151] 2168, 2171
Clyde Navigation, Consid. [151] 666
Lancashire and Yorkshire, &c., Railway Company, Consid. [150] 1605
Partnerships, Registration of, 2R. [151] 244
Piers and Harbours, 2R. [151] 253
Private Bills, Res. [150] 459, 462, 472
Railway Legislation, [150] 1516 1517

PAULL, Mr, H., St. Ives,
Godrevy Lighthouse, Com. moved for, [149] 329
Piers and Harbours, Leave, [150] 1797; 2R. [151] 251, 253

Pauper Lunatics Bill,
c. 1R.* [151] 503

PAXTON, Sir J., Coventry
Army, Sanitary Condition of the, Res. [150] 485
Thames, State of the, [151] 429; Res. 574

Paymaster General—Supply,
c. [150] 1131

Peace Preservation (Ireland), Act Continuance Bill,
c. 1R.* [150] 1849;
2R. 2086; Amend. (Mr. Bagwell), 2087, [o. q. A. 168, N. 20, M. 148] 2087;
3R.* 2157
l. 1R.* [150] 2193; 2R.* [151] 1; 3R.* 104
Royal Assent, 472

PEASE, Mr. H., Durham, S.
Army, Sanitary Condition of the, Res. [150] 484
Cape of Good Hope, [151] 1504
County Franchise (Scotland), Leave, [150] 211
Marriage Law Amendment, Com. [151] 670
Oaths, Leave, [148] 487
Oude, King of, [151] 1502
Supply — Police Courts (Metropolis) [150] 1487; — Department of Science and Art, [151] 1201; — Theological Professors, Belfast, 1241
Voters' Travelling Expenses, Papers moved for, [150] 216

PECHELL, Rear Adm. Sir G. B., Brighton
Fisheries, Papers moved for, [150] 215
Greenwich Hospital, The Officers at, [149] 709; —Sailors and Marines in, Res. [151] 572
Health, Public Act Amendment, 2R. [148] 744, 1458
Local Government, 2R. [149] 2096; Com. cl. 9, [151] 172
Navy Estimates, [149] 923, 1637, 1646
Oyster Fisheries, The, [151] 2032
Slave Trade—Right of Search, Res [151] 1318
Stamp Duty on Drafts, 2R. [149] 2174
Supply—Slave Bounties, Report. [151] 1436; —Newhaven Harbour, [151] 1444

PEEL, Rt. Hon. Major General J., (†Secretary of State for War). Huntingdon
†"Abeona," The, [149] 1193
†Aldershot, Military Hospital, &c., at, [151] 2190
†Army Estimates, [149] 134, 137, 138, 139, 140, 224, 225, 817, 818, 1248, 1250, 1251, 1649; [150] 374, 379, 381, 382, 384, 386, 391, 395, 397, 399, 1105, 1106, 1109; [151] 1483
†Army Medical Officers, [150] 334; [151] 1082
†Army, Sanitary State of the, [149] 109; [150] 492; — Kitchens for the, 922; — Clothing,

[cont.

PEEL, Rt. Hon. Major Gen.—cont.
[151] 1283;—Subalterns, in the, Address moved, 2241;—Regulations, 2365
Ashburnham, General, [148] 863
†Bands, Regimental, [149] 816, 857
†Barrack Masters, [150] 1449
†Bath, Order of the, [151] 2365
†Billeting System, Com. moved for, [149] 555; [151] 1606
†Bray's Traction Engine, [151] 1285
†Brodie, Sergeant, [151] 2303
†Cape of Good Hope Garrison, [149] 711;—German Corps at, [151] 10
†Captains in the Army, Address moved, [150] 1103
†Chatham Barracks, [150] 1921
†Commissions, Sale of, [149] 223, 432, 1264; [150] 2252; [151] 415, 416
†Dumfreisshire Militia, [149] 1226
†Edinburgh Castle, [150] 860
†Elliot, Mr., Absconding of, [150] 1449
†Enfield Rifles, [149] 1798; [150] 2111; [151] 605
†Estimates, The, [149] 1607, 1617
†Highlanders, The 78th, [150] 1612
†Hounslow, Review Ground at, [151] 1933
†India, Army in, [149] 1653; [151] 1192;—Clothing for the, 756;—Medical Aid, 1001
†King, Captain, of the Depot Battalion, [150] 429
†Land Transport Corps, [151] 2127
†"Lasso," Use of the, by the Cavalry, [150] 1061
†Lucknow, Reward to the Garrison of, [151] 754
†Mauritius, Troops for the, [151] 1182
†Medals for the Army in India, [149] 424, 712
†Medical Officers, Army, [149] 983; [150] 334; [151] 1082
† Military Academy—Competitive Examinations, Address moved, [149] 1730, 1733, 1735, 1736, 1738, 1740; [150] 1105
†Military Organization, Res. [150] 1337; [151] 566
Military Warrant of 1854, [148] 139, 759; [150] 323; [151] 84, 1788, 2043
†Militia, The, [149] 460;—Disembodied, 1265; [151] 13;—Estimates, [149] 1584;—Captains in the, 1800;—at Aldershot, [150] 19;—Permanent Staff of, 1610;—Bounty to, 1855
†Militia (Service abroad) Act Continuance Com. cl. 1. [151] 1964
†Mutiny, 2R. [149] 269; Com. 400
†Netley Hospital, [149] 1174; [151] 57
†Officers' Servants, [150] 1921
†Ordnance Survey Commission, [150] 335
†Overland Route, The, [151] 1700
†Patriotic Fund, The, [149] 814
†Presbyterian and Roman Catholic Chaplains for the Army, [149] 249; [150] 2015
†Recruiting System, [150] 369
†Roman Catholic Soldiers, [151] 1502
†Salkeld, Lieut. [151] 756
†Staff Appointments, [149] 711
†Supply—Survey for the United Kingdom, [151] 1483
†Surgeons, Military, [149] 983
†Tower Hamlets Militia, [151] 1700
†Turkish Medal, The, [151] 1606
†War Department, [151] 2125
†Waterford, Harbour at [150] 859

PEEL, Right Hon. Major Gen.—cont.
†Weedon Establishment, Commission moved for, [151] 583
†Woolwich Academy, Admission to, [150] 251
†Woolwich, Gun Foundry at, [151] 1081

PEEL, Sir R., Tamworth
Conspiracy to Murder, 2R. [148] 1789
Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Res. [150] 823

Peel, Sir W., Death of,
c. Question (Admiral Walcott), [150] 1328

Peerages in Abeyance,
l. Standing Orders (Lord Redesdale), [151] 69

PENNANT, Hon. Col., E. G. D., Carnarvonshire
Army, Sanitary State of the, Res. [150] 493
Mortality in the Guards, Report moved for, [148] 1551

PERRY, Sir T. E., Devonport
East India Loan, Consid. [149] 15, 143
India, Government of (No. 1), Leave, [148] 1304, 1309
India, Government of, (No. 2), Leave, [149] 836
India, Government of, Com. Res. 3 (4), [150] 319; Res. 5, (6), 2039
India, Government of (No. 3), Com. cl. 3, [151] 452; cl. 7, 761; cl. 8, 765, 769; cl. 12, 784; cl. 13, 864, 865; cl. 14, 868; cl. 15, 869; cl. 20, 883, 884; cl. 29, Amend. 897, 898; cl. 31, 900; cl. 60, Amend. 907; add. cl. 908, 909; cl. 35, Amend. 935; Consid. cl. 31, 1004, 1005; cl. 10, Amend. 1039; 3R. 1087
Lands, Sale and Transfer of (Ireland), Leave, [150] 40; Com. 1565, 2106; cl. 3, Amend. 2107; cl. 4, [151] 60; cl. 12, 62; cl. 34, Amend. 63; cl. 38, 64; cl. 51, 471
Landed Estates Court (Ireland), [150] 2252
Navy Estimates, [149] 130
Oude—Policy in, [149] 1587;—Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Res. [150] 1046;—Pacification of, 1852, 1853, 1947, 2017
Supply—Officers of Court of Chancery (Ireland), [150] 1502

Persia—Herat,
c. Question (Mr. Gregory), [150] 1850

PHILIPPS, Mr. J. H., Haverfordwest
Bank Issues Indemnity, 2R. [148] 296; 3R. 441
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Com. cl. 2, [151] 1603
County Franchise, Leave, [149] 1830
Harbours of Refuge, Commission moved for, [151] 2149
Lighthouses, &c., Address moved, [149] 1140
Witnesses, Expenses of, [151] 1613

Pictures, National Collection of,
c. Question (Lord Elcho), [149] 985;—see Portraits, Gallery of

]cont.

Piers and Harbours Bill,
c. Leave, [150] 1797; 1R.* ib.;
2R. [151] 251, [A. 136, N. 33, M. 103] 253

Poisons, Sale of,
l. Question (Lord Talbot de Malahide), [149] 319; (Lord Campbell), 1169

Poisons, Sale of, Bill,
l. 1R.* [150] 1267;
2R. 1507;
Consid. [151] 912; 3R.* 1070
c. 1R.* [151] 1266;
2R. postponed, 1446;
Bill withdrawn, 1610

Police (Counties and Boroughs)—Supply,
c. [150] 1471

Police, County,
c. Question (Mr. Liddell), [148] 1740

Police Courts, Metropolis—Supply,
c. [150] 1486; Amend. (Mr. Hadfield), 1487; Amend. withdrawn, 1488

Police Force (Ireland) Bill,
c. Leave, [150] 2151; 1R.* 2156;
2R. [151] 1121; Amend. (Mr. P. O'Brien), 1131, [A. 125, N. 66, M. 59] 1133; Adj. Debate, 1549;
Bill withdrawn, 1772

Police, Metropolitan—Supply,
c. [150] 1488, [A. 157, N. 28, M. 129] 1491

Police (Scotland) Act Amendment Bill,
c. 1R.* [151] 857; 2R.* 930; 3R.* 1051
l. 1R. [151] 1060; 2R.* 1655; 3R.* 2077
Royal Assent, 2369

Polish Refugees, &c.—Supply,
c. [151] 1275

Poor Law Amendment Bill,
c. 1R.* [149] 1353; 2R.* 1797;
Com. cl. 1; cl. 2, 2001;
Consid. Amend. (Mr. Cross), [150] 575
3R.* 673

Poor Law Medical Officers,
c. Question (Mr. Cobbett), [151] 1503

Poor Law System of Medical Relief,
c. Question (Mr. Sclater-Booth), [150] 1854

Poor Rates,
c. Question (Mr. Wise), [148] 1471

Poor Rates (Metropolis) Bill,
c. Leave, [149] 626; 1R.* 648;
2R. [150] 496; Amend. (Mr. S. Estcourt), 510;
Bill withdrawn, 516

Poor, Relief of the,
c. Question (Mr. John Locke), [151] 1499

Poor Removal,
c. Com. moved for, (Mr. Sotheron Estcourt), [150] 1914

Poor Removal Law Amendment Bill,
c. 1R.* [150] 763;
Question (Mr. Bouverie), [151] 1183
Bill withdrawn, 1431

Portendic and Albreda Convention Bill,
c. 1R.* [151] 9;
2R. 153; 3R.* 394
l. 1R.* [151] 472; 2R.* 975; 3R.* 1146
Royal Assent, 1243

PORTMAN, Lord
Address in Answer to the Speech, [148] 5, 39
Church Rates Abolition, 2R. [151] 850, 851, 1151, 1350
Private Bills, Com. moved for, [151] 5
Thames, State of the, [151] 388

Portraits, Gallery of—Supply,
c. [151] 1422

Portugal, Mission to,
c. Question (Mr. White), [150] 20

Post Office—False Characters to Servants,
l. Question (Lord St. Leonards), [151] 910

Post Office—Supply,
c. [149] 227; [151] 1281

Post Office, New General, (Edinburgh) Bill,
c. 1R.* [150] 1516; 2R.* [151] 83; 3R.* 730
l. 1R.* [151] 691; 2R.* 1349; 3R.* 1655
Royal Assent, 1967

POWELL, Mr. F. S., Wigan
Friendly Societies, [151] 1182
Justice, Administration of, Com. moved for, [149] 1813
Lancashire and Yorkshire, &c. Railway Companies, Consid. [150] 1605, 1705
Supply—Education, [151] 148;—Department of Science and Art, 1203

POWIS, Earl of
Bankruptcy, District Courts of, 1R. [148] 1602
Church of England Special Services, Com. cl. 1, Amend. [148] 1462; cl. 3, 1469
Ecclesiastical Commission, 2R. [150] 18; Rep. add. cl. [151] 992
Education, Charitable Grants for, [149] 809
New Zealand, Diocese of, [150] 1445
Oaths, Report, [150] 1175
Sullivan, Mr., Assassination of, [148] 450
Universities (Scotland), Com. cl. 1, [151] 1673, 1674

Prescription (Ireland) Bill,
c. 1R.* [148] 1552

Prescription (Ireland), (No. 2) Bill,
c. 1R.* [150] 332 ; 2R.* 1022 ; 3R.* 1308
l. 1R.* [150] 1438 ; 2R.* [151] 1447 ; 3R.* 1665
Royal Assent, 1967

PRICE, Mr. W. P., Gloucester
Bank Acts Committee, Nomination of Com., [148] 965
Bothnia—Claims of British Merchants, Commission moved for, [151] 1862

"Prince Albert," Iron Steam Ship,
c. Question (Mr. Henley), [148] 1369

Prince Edward Island,
c. Question (Mr. C. Fortescue), [149] 1654

Prince Edward Island Loan,
c. Com. Res. (Lord Stanley), [150] 399

Prince Edward Island Loan Bill,
c. 1R.* [150] 523 ;
Question (Mr. Gladstone), 1948

Princess Royal, Marriage of the,
l. Address moved (Earl Granville), [148] 752 ; Address presented, 806 ; Her Majesty's Answer, 809
c. Address moved (Viscount Palmerston) [148] 1759 ; Address presented, 806 ; Her Majesty's Answer, 860

Printing, &c., Houses of Parliament—Supply,
c. [150] 1263

Prisons and Convict Establishments—Supply,
c. [150] 1503

Prisoners Removal Bill,
l. 1R.* [150] 2088 ; 2R.* [151] 66

Private Bills,
l. Resolution (Lord Redesdale), [149] 243;—Com. moved for (Lord Stanley of Alderley), [151] 3 ;—Standing Orders, Amends. (Lord Redesdale), 2285
c. Res. (Lord R. Cecil), [150] 455 ; Motion withdrawn, 473

Breach of Privilege,—Mr. Butt,—see Ali Moorad's Claim

Privy Council Office—Supply,
c. [150] 1129

Privy Seal, Lord—Supply,
c. [150] 1129, [A. 71, N. 31, M. 40], 1131

Probate Acts, Compensation under the,
c. Question (Sir W. Heathcote), [149] 815

Probate Court and District Registries—Supply,
c. [150] 1120

Probate, Court of, and Divorce and Matrimonial Causes—Supply,
c. [150] 1473 ; [151] 1438

Probate District Map,
c. Papers moved for (Mr. Wyld), [149] 161
Motion withdrawn, 162

Probate, New Court of,
l. Observations) Lord Lyndhurst), [149] 946
c. Observations (Mr. Warren), [150] 252

Probates and Letters of Administration Act Amendment Bill,
l. 1R.* [150] 227 ; 2R.* 579 ;
151] 3R. Amend. (Lord St. Leonards), 156, [o. q. Contents 22, Not-Contents 22] 157
· c. 1R.* [151] 265 ;
· Question (Mr. Hadfield), 1785 ;
· 2R.* 2055 ;
· Com. 2067 ; Amend. (Lord Hotham), 2068, [o. q. A. 42, N. 17, M. 25] 2071 ;
· cl. 4, Amend. (Mr. Hadfield), 2072 ; Amend. neg. 2073 ;
· cl. 8 ; cl. 24, ib. ;
· add. cl. (Mr. Warren), ib. ;
· 3R.* 2105
151] l. Royal Assent, 2369

Probates, Scotch,
c. Question (Mr. Cowan), [148] 1732 ; [149] 1493 ;

Proctors, Claims for Compensation,
c. Question (Mr. H. Foley), [148] 1371 ; (Mr. Hadfield), [149] 1173 ; [151] 1077

Property, Law of, Amendment Bill,
l. 1R. [148] 967 ;
2R. postponed, [149] 239 ; 2R. 448 ;
3R.* [150] 579
c. 1R.* [150] 1516 ; 2R.* 1849 ;
Consid. [151] 2137; Amend. (Mr. Rolt), 2138; Bill put off, ib.

Property Qualification Bill,
c. Leave, [149] 1543 ; 1R.* 1544 ;
150] 2R. 222 ;
· Com. Adj. moved (Mr. Bentinck), 576, [A. 81, N. 156, M. 75] 578; Adj. Debate, 1421; Adj. moved (Mr. Bentinck), 1425, [o. q. A. 222, N. 109, M. 113] 1431;
· l. 1, 1431 ;
· 3R. 1506
· l. 1R.* 1507 ;
· 2R. 1829 ;
· Com. Instruction (Earl Grey). 1916 ; Motion neg. 1919 ;
· 3R. 2089 ; Amend. (Lord Denman), 2095 ; Amend. withdrawn, 2096
Royal Assent, [151] 472

Prosecution—Supply,
c. [150] 1466

Protests,
India Bill, Government of, (No. 3), [151] 2020
Jews' Bill, [151] 1265

Public Buildings—Supply
c. [150] 1111

Public Entertainment, Licensing Places of,
c. Question (Mr. Nicoll), [149] 460

Public Grounds and Playgrounds Bill,
c. Leave, [150] 883; 1R.* 920; 2R.* 1404; 3R.* [151] 83
l. 1R.* [151] 154; 2R.* 691

PUGH, Mr. D., Carmarthenshire
Church Rates Abolition, Com. [149] 1434

PULLER, Mr. C. W., Hertfordshire
Budget, The—Financial Statement, [149] 1311
Church Rates Abolition, Com. cl. 4, [149] 1469
Churches and Churchyards, Com. moved for, [149] 1845, 1866
Drafts on Bankers, Consid. [151] 2054
India, Government of (No. 3), Com. cl. 3, [151] 458; cl. 12, 790
Joint-Stock Banks, [148] 384
Marriage Law Amendment, Leave, [149] 623; 2R. [150] 137
Metropolis Local Management, 2R. Amend. [151] 1741; Com. cl. 1, 1942; cl. 2, 1948; Consid. cl. 1, Amend. 2049
Oaths, Lords' Amends., That Baron de Rothschild be a Member of the Committee, [150] 439
Supply—Prosecutions, [150] 1469;—Education, [151] 144

Quarantine Arrangements—Supply,
c. [151] 1420

Queen's College (Cork),
l. Notice of Motion withdrawn (Earl of St. Germans) [151] 2271

Queen's Colleges (Ireland),
c. Question (Mr. Beamish), [148] 556; (Mr. Fagan), [151] 930

Queen's Prison—Supply,
c. [150] 1491

Queen's Speech—Opening of Parliament,
l. [148] 2; Address moved (Lord Portman), 5; Her Majesty's Answer, 227; Explanation (Earl of Derby), 314, 521
c. Address moved (Mr. C. W. Martin), [148] 86; Report, 143; Her Majesty's Answer, 268

Rag Fair on Sunday,
c. Question (Mr. K. Seymer), [151] 418

Railway and Canal Legislation,
c. Question (Colonel Wilson Patten), [150] 1516; Observations (Mr. Rich), [151] 2368

Railway Cheap Trains, &c., Bill,
c. 1R.* [151] 1076; 2R.* 1266; 3R.* 1699
l. 1R.* [151] 1773; 2R.* 1967; 3R.* 2241
Royal Assent, 2369

Railways Act (Ireland) Continuance Bill,
c. 1R.* [151] 9; 2R.* 170; 3R.* 394
l. 1R.* [151] 472; 2R.* 975; 3R.* 1146
Royal Assent, 1243

RAMSDEN, Sir J. W., (†Under-Secretary for War), Hythe,
Army Estimates, [150] 380, 387, 388, 391, 398
†Army Medical Department, [148] 1605
†Barracks, Infantry and Cavalry, [148] 1370
†Crimean Prize Money, [148] 553
†Guards, Mortality in the, [148] 1261; Report moved for, 1549
†Havelock's, Sir H., Pension, [148] 578
†India — Relief of Lucknow—Mr. Cavanagh, [148] 757;—Cavalry Reinforcements for, 861
Land Transport Corps, Com. moved for, [149] 1625
†Medjidi, Order of the, [148] 975
†Military Auditor, [148] 465
†Military Surgery (Edinburgh), Professor of, [148] 1265
†Military, Warrant of, 1854, [148] 139, 759
†Staff Officers' Servants, [148] 976
†Turkish Medals, [148] 358, 359, 976
†Wages, Rate of, [148] 1869

Rateable Property (Ireland) Bill,
c. 1R.* [151] 1076

RAVENSWORTH, Lord
Durham, Patronage of the See of, [150] 1269
Ecclesiastical Commission, 2R. [150] 18;—*Report Amend. [151] 975, 990
Property Qualification, 3R. [150] 2089
Spiritual Destitution, Com. moved for, [149] 1572
Thames, State of the, [151] 472

RAWLINSON, Sir H. C., Reigate
Constantinople and Bassorah Telegraph, Correspondence moved for, [149] 1168
India, Government of (No. 1), Leave, [148] 1431
India, Government of (No. 3), Com. cl. 3, [151] 456, 458; cl. 7, 466; cl. 38, 905; cl. 35, 936; Consid. 1003; Lords' Amends. cl. 31, 2192, 2333
India, Mutiny in, Papers moved for, [150] 376
Oude—The Proclamation, [150] 927
Supply—Major General Chesney, [151] 1443

RAYNHAM, Viscount, Tamworth
Cruelty to Animals, 2R. [149] 1556
Workhouses, Metropolitan, Com. moved for, [150] 107, 108

Real Estate, Transfer of, Bill,
l. 1R.* [149] 556;
Bill withdrawn, [151] 264

Real Property Commissioners,
c. Question (Mr. Headlam), [149] 1264

Real Property, &c.—Probate Duty,
c. Res. (Mr. W. Williams), [150] 867, [A. 68, N. 172, M. 104] 879

REBOW, Mr. J. G., Colchester
Corrupt Practices Prevention, [151] 176; Com. 1486; cl. 1, 1493
Fisheries, Paper moved for, [150] 216

Receipt Stamps,
c. Question (Sir E. Buxton), [149] 1495

Reciprocity, Treaties of—Supply,
c. [151] 1420

Records, Public—Supply,
c. [150] 1133; [151] 1425

REDESDALE, Lord
Atlantic Telegraph Company, 3R. [151] 1968
Baronies in Abeyance, [151] 2286
Business of the House, Res. [149] 1353
"Cagliari," Case of the, [149] 310
Camberwell, Vicarage of—Law of Sequestration, [151] 9
Church Discipline—Law of Sequestration, [151] 591
Church of England, Political Services of the, Address moved, [151] 503
Communication between London and Dublin, [149] 1098
Competitive Examination for the Civil Service, [150] 1700
Convocation at York, Papers moved for, [151] 1551, 1559, 1561
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Com. cl. 1, [151] 2249
Divorce and Matrimonial Causes, Recom. [150] 2000; Report, Amend. 2194, 2195; 3R. [151] 157, 161, 162
Jews, [150] 1998; 2R. [151] 719; Com. 920; 3R. Amend. 1259
Kingston, Earl of, Notices of Questions by the, [150] 1439, 1599
Land, Transfer of, 3R. [150] 424
Local Government, 3R. add. cl. [151] 2153, 2154
Marriage Law Amendment, 2R. Amend. [151] 1972
Oaths, [150] 2219
Peerages in Abeyance, Standing Orders, [151] 69
Private Bills, Res. [149] 243; Com. moved for, [151] 4; Standing Orders, Amend. 2285
Royal Commission — Order of Proceedings, [151] 480
Telegraphic Communication with Europe and America, Correspondence moved for, [149] 1581
Thames, State of the, [151] 390
Transfer of Estates Simplification, Rep. [149] 855
Victoria Station and Pimlico Railway, Motion for Counsel, [151] 587, 588, 798

Reformatory Schools,
c. Question (Mr. Bagwell), [148] 271; (Mr. Garnett), 460

Reformatory Schools (Ireland) Bill,
c. Leave, [149] 1401; 1R.* 1405;
2R. [150] 520;
151] Com. cl. 3, 1067, [A. 157, N. 41, M. 116] 1068;
· cl. 7, Amend. (Lord Naas), 1068; Amend. (Mr. Cogan), [A. 16, N. 176, M. 160] 1069; Amend. (Mr. Grogan), [A. 105, N. 42, A.63] ib.; 2nd Amend. 1431, [o. q. A. 42, N. 15, M. 27] 1433;
· cl. 15, 1434;
· cl. 17, Amend. (Mr. Blake), [o. q. A. 94, N. 1, M. 93] 1434; Amend. (Mr. Barrow), 1435;
· Consid. cl. 3, Proviso (Mr. Grogan), 1550; Proviso neg. ib.;
· 3R.* 1590;
151] l. 1R.* 1655;
· 2R. 1999; 3R.* 2243
· Royal Assent, 2369

Refuge for the Destitute—Supply,
c. [151] 1275

Refugees, Foreign, in England,
l. Correspondence laid on the Table, [149] 166

"Regina Cœli," Case of the,
l. Observations (Lord Brougham), [150] 2202; Explanation (Earl of Malmesbury), [151] 255

Registers, Non-Parochial, Bill,
c. 1R.* [150] 19; 2R.* 332;
Com. cl. 3, 576; 3R.* 763
l. 1R.* [150] 858;
2R. 1439; 3R.* 1586
Royal Assent, 1997

Registrars, Superintendent,
c. Question (Mr. Cox), [151] 871

Registry Office, General—Supply,
c. [150] 1262

Religious Worship Act Amendment Bill,
l. 1R.* [148] 1;
Question (Bishop of Oxford), 132;
2R. postponed, 237;
2R. 321; Adj. Debate, 853; Bill withdrawn, 854

Remuneration, Acceptance of, by Members of Parliament, See Members, Rewards to

Reporting the Debates,
c. Question (Mr. Laurie), [149] 813

REPTON, Mr. G. W. J., Warwick
Health, Public, Act Amendment, [149] 463

Resignation of Ministers,
l. Statement (Earl Granville), [148] 1849
c. Statement (Viscount Palmerston), [148] 1868

Retired Officers of the Houses of Parliament—Supply,
c. [150] 1128

Returns Delayed,
c. Question (Mr. Rich), [151] 2275

Returns to Secretary of State Bill,
c. 1R.* [151] 1369; 2R.* 1481; 3R.* 1785
l. 1R.* [151] 1865; 2R.* 1906; 3R.* 2151
Royal Assent, 2369

Revising Barristers (England and Wales)—Supply,
c. [151] 1420

Rewards to Members,
c. Question (Sir J. Trelawny), [149] 573; Res. 1019; Motion withdrawn, 1041; Res. (Lord Hotham), [151] 176; Previous Question moved (Mr. E. P. Bouverie), 189, [A. 151, N. 80, M. 71] 209; [m. q. A. 210, N. 27, M. 183] ib.; Question (Mr. Schneider), 2191; Res. 2347

RICARDO, Mr. J. L., Stoke-upon-Trent
Lancaster, Duchy of—Mining Operations, Com. moved for, 443, 448, 454
*Stade Dues, Address moved, [149] 996, 1018, 1019, 1802

RICH, Mr. H., Richmond
Brazil—Messrs. Swann and Smallpage, [150] 1851
Business of the House, [149] 80
Chancellor of the Exchequer's Speech at Slough, [150] 1081, 1086
Corrupt Practices Prevention, 3R. [151] 2122
Estimates, The, [149] 1611
India, Government of, Com. Res. 2, [149] 2204; Amend. [150] 292, 317; Res. 5, 2085; Res. 6, 2249
India, Government of (No. 3), Com. cl. 8, [151] 772; cl. 11, 782; cl. 14, Amend. 866, 869; Lords' Amends. cl. 27, 2186; cl. 35, 2205, 2311
India—Mutiny in, Papers moved for, [149] 346, 377
Railway and Canal Legislation, [151] 2368
Returns, Delayed, [151] 2275
Sepoys, The Mutinous, [149] 1593

Richard Cœur de Lion, Statue of,
c. Question (Mr. Hankey), [150] 274

RICHARDSON, Mr. J., Lisburn
Education (England), Commission moved for, [148] 1220
Havelock's, Sir H., Annuity, 2R. [148] 513
Navy Estimates, [149] 1347

RICHMOND, Duke of
Universities (Scotland), Com. cl. 1, [151] 1672

RIDLEY, MR. G., Newcastle-on-Tyne
Assessed and Income Taxes, Res. [151] 212
Business, Public, [149] 1987
"Cagliari," Capture of the, [148] 861; [149] 105; [150] 1947

[cont.

RIDLEY, Mr. G.—cont.
Harbours of Refuge, Commission moved for, [151] 2148
India, Government of (No. 3), Com. cl. 12, [151] 790
Lancashire and Yorkshire, &c. Railway Companies, Consid. [150] 1603
Monies, Public, Committee on, [149] 1353
Mutiny, 2R. [149] 267
Piers and Harbours, 2R. [151] 252
Supply—Harbours of Refuge, [150] 1126;—Major General Chesney, [151] 1442;—Newhaven Harbour, 1443

Rifles, Breech-loading, in the Navy,
c. Question (Mr. H. Berkeley), [150] 2253

RIPON, Bishop of
Convocation at York, Papers moved for, [151] 1557
Marriage Law Amendment, 2R. [151] 1993
Religious Worship Act Amendment, 2R. [148] 345

Roads, &c. (Scotland) Bill,
c. Leave, [149] 156; 1R.* 811; 2R. deferred, 1920

Roads, Public (Scotland),
c. Commission moved for (Lord Elcho), [151] 1155; Motion withdrawn, 1163

ROBARTES, Mr. T. J. A., Cornwall E.
Cornwall, Duchy of, [151] 1505
Cornwall Submarine Mines, Com. [151] 1654

ROBERTSON, Mr. P. F., Hastings
Canton, Executions at, [149] 2013
China, Atrocities in, [150] 1611
"Varna," Loss of the, [151] 1369

RODEN, Earl of
Dublin, Affray at, [149] 170

ROEBUCK, Mr. J. A., Sheffield
Ali Moorad's Claim—Mr. Butt, [148] 1730, 1731, 1732, 1855, 1856, 1858; Com. moved for, 1859, 1860, 1865, 1867
Alien Act, The, [148] 762, 770
Bernard, Dr., Case of, [149] 1486
Breach of Privilege—Washington Wilks, [150] 1068, 1313, 1321
Business of the House, [148] 1606; [150] 1200
"Cagliari," Capture of the, [149] 93; [150] 1196
Cantillon, Legacy to—Will of Napoleon I., [148] 1275
Church Rates Abolition, Com. cl. 1, [149] 1457; 3R. [150] 1493
Church Rates Amendment, [149] 1870
Churches and Churchyards, Com. moved for, [149] 1864
Civil Bills, &c. (Ireland), 2R. [151] 1544; Com. cl. 2, 1771
Conspiracy to Murder, Leave, [148] 957
Cornwall Submarine Mines, Com. [151] 1654

[cont.

ROEBUCK, Mr. J. A.—cont.
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Considd. [151] 1965; add. cl. 2021, 2025, 2028; cl. 1, 2029, 2030; Amend. Re-com. 2066, 2067; 3R. 2121
Danubian Principalities, Address moved, [150] 80
Donegal, Destitution in, Com. moved for, [149] 1539
Drafts on Bankers, Considd. [151] 2054
Galway Freemen Disfranchisement, [149] 322; 2R. Amend. 785; Com. 1420, 1422
Hudson's Bay Company, [148] 1267, 1369; [151] 1086, 1504; Res. 1788, 1842
India, Government of (No. 1), Leave, [148] 1373
India, Government of (No. 2), Leave, [149] 842
India, Government of, Com. Res. 2, [149] 2094, 2189; Res. 3 (4), [150] 319, 320, 1613, 1614; Amend. 1666, 1681; Res. 5, 2074
India, Government of (No. 3), 2R. [151] 367; Com. cl. 3, 451; cl. 27, 890; 3R. 1090; Lords' Amends. 2320, 2331
India—Transport of Troops to, Com. moved for, Amend. [148] 719, 720
Jews, 3R. [151] 1891
Judgments (Ireland) Act Amendment, Com. cl. 1, [151] 1961
Leases and Sales of Settled Estates, Com. [151] 2207
Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Res. [149] 712, 764, 775
Magisterial Appointments, [150] 269
Manchester, &c. and Great Northern Railway Companies, Considd. [150] 1194; Amend. 1195
Medical Practitioners, Com. [150] 1410
Metropolis Local Management Act Amendment, Leave, [151] 1516, 1540
Military Academy—Competitive Examinations, Address moved, [149] 1739
Militia (Service abroad) Act Continuance, Com. cl. 1, [151] 1964
Moore's, Mr. C., Appointment, Res. [151] 665
New Caledonia, Government of, 2R. [151] 1109; Com. cl. 1, 1347, 1348, 1766, 1768; cl. 3, 1769
New Trial in Criminal Cases, 2R. [151] 1057; Com. 1063
Oaths, 2R. [148] 1095, 1098, 1099, 1100, 1101; Considd. [149] 486, 533
Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Res. Adj. moved, [150] 761, 765
Poor Rates (Metropolis), Leave, [149] 641
Rewards to Members, Res. [151] 205
Sierra Leone, The Press in, [150] 1062
Slave Trade—Relations with the United States, [151] 48;—Right of Search, Res. 1319
Suez, Isthmus of, Canal, Res. [150] 1360, 1373, 1374, 1400
Trade Marks, Pirating of, [151] 1199
Trustees and Executors, [151] 2302
Universities (Scotland), Lords' Amends. [150] 2135
Wight, Isle of—Poor Law in, [149] 2014

ROLT, Mr. J., Gloucestershire, W.
Leases and Sales of Settled Estates, Com. [151] 2207
Legitimacy Declaration, Com. cl. 9, [151] 1542
[cont.

ROLT, Mr. J.—cont.
London Corporation Regulation, Com. Amend. [151] 266, 300
Property, Law of, Amendment, Considd. Amend. [151] 2137

Roman Catholic Charities,
c. Question (Mr. Monsell), [150] 2292

Roman Catholic Soldiers and Sailors,
c. Question (Capt. O'Connell), [149] 249; [151] 1501

ROSSE, Earl of
Kingston, Earl of—Questions, [150] 1599

ROTHSCHILD, Baron N. de, London,
Admission of, [151] 2106

Rothschild, Baron N. de,
c. Observations (Viscount Palmerston), [148] 976;—Admission of, [151] 2105; Res. (Lord J. Russell), 2106; Amend. (Mr. Warren), 2107; Amend. withdrawn, 2108; 2nd Res. 2109; Amend. (Mr. Warren), ib., [o. q. A. 69, N. 37, M. 32] 2114;—See Jews' Bill —Oaths Bill

ROUPELL, Mr. W., Lambeth
Metropolis Local Management, Com. cl. 5, Amend. [151] 1950; ci. 9, Amend. 1951; add. cl. 1958
Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Res. [150] 1020
Sewage of Towns, [148] 1372
Thames, State of the, [151] 430; Res. 572

Royal Commission—Order of Proceedings,
l. Observations (Marquess of Clanricarde), [151] 479

Royal Society—Supply,
c. [151] 1268

RUSSELL, Rt. Hon. Lord J., London
Ali Moorad's Claim—Mr. Butt, Com. moved for, [148] 1865, 1866
Army Estimates, [149] 225
Ballot, Leave, [150] 1789
Bank Acts, Com. [148] 670
Bank Issues Indemnity, Leave, [148] 203
Bankruptcy and Insolvency Laws Consolidation, Leave, [151] 220
Budget, The—Financial Statement, [149] 1321
Business of the House, [150] 1200
"Cagliari," Capture of the, [148] 273, 469; [149] 103, 709, 1800; [150] 282
Chancellor of the Exchequer's Speech at Slough, [150] 1069, 1099, 1235, 1242
China, War in, [148] 1275, 1741;—Negotiations with, 1448;—Relations with, [150] 1519
Church Rates Abolition, Com. [149] 1448; cl. 1, 1473; 3R. [150] 1402, 1720
Churches and Churchyards, Com. moved for, [149] 1862
Commerce, Tribunals of, Com. moved for, [149] 1153

RUSSELL, Rt. Hon. Lord J.—cont.
Commissioners for Exhibition (1851), 2R. [150] 2262
Conspiracy to Murder, Leave, [148] 1035, 1078
Conspiracy to Murder (Ireland), Leave, [150] 882
Corrupt Practices Prevention, 3R. [151] 2120
County Franchise, Leave, [149] 1825
Danubian Principalities, Address moved, [150] 91
Diplomatic Salaries and Pensions, Res. [149] 1524
East India Loan, Consid. [149] 21
Education (England), Commission moved for, [148] 1237
Funded Debt, Com. [151] 548
Galway Freemen Disfranchisement, 2R. [149] 787
Government, Policy of the, [149] 212
Havelock, Sir H., Pension to, [148] 564, 578
Hudson's Bay Company, Res. [151] 1821
India, Government of (No. 1), Leave, [148] 1687
India, Government of (No. 2), Leave, [149] 830, 842, 846, 858, 864, 1585
India, Government of, Com. moved for, [149] 1695, 2046; Res. 2, 2194; [150] 309; Res. 3, (4), 319, 1680; Amend. 1681, 1684, 1688, 1949, 1955, 1956, 1969, 1989; Res. 4, (5), 1990; Res. 5, (6), Amend. 2023, 2076, 2078, 2079, 2085, 2086; Res. 6, (7), 2240
India, Government of (No. 3), Com. cl. 3, [151] 460; cl. 8, 765; cl. 11, 784; cl. 12, 786, 790; cl. 13, 861; cl. 27, 895; add. cl. 940; Consid. add. cl. 1015; cl. 27, Amend. 1040; 3R. 1092; Lords' Amends. 2184; cl. 27, Amend. 2185; cl. 32, Amend. 2193
India—Transport of Troops to, Com. moved for, [148] 719; Amend. 724;—Vote of Thanks to the Army, &c., 912
Jews, Observations, [151] 1371, 1376, 1379; 2R. 1614, 1626; Com. 1759; cl. 1, 1760, 1761; 3R. 1863, 1864, 1865
Land, Sale and Transfer of (Ireland), Com. [150] 1559
London Corporation, Leave, [148] 743; 2R. 1276
Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Res. [149] 766
Military Organization, [151] 563
Moore's, Mr. C., Appointment, Res. [151] 662
New Caledonia, Government of, Com. cl. 3, [151] 1769
Oaths, Leave, [148] 469, 484, 494; 2R. 1084, 1088; Com. [149] 294, 298, 300, 305, 442; Consid. 468, 476, 477, 479, 483, 490, 541, 547, 550; 3R. 946; Lords' Amends. Amend. [150] 336, 339, 347; That Baron de Rothschild be a Member of the Committee, 351; Report, 529, 530; Conference, 764, 859; Observations, [151] 1371, 1376, 1379; Lords' Amends. Res. 1902, 1903, 1904, 1905
Oude, Annexation of, Papers moved for, [148] 1506, 1514; Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Res. [150] 752, 929, 930, 953, 1018, 1053
Paper Duty, Res. [151] 133
Parliament, Sitting of, [151] 1199
Property Qualification, Com. cl. 1, [150] 1436
Rewards to Members, Res. [151] 202, 208
Rothschild, Baron de, Admission of, Res. [151] 2106, 2108, 2113
Slave Trade—Relations with the United States [151] 51

[cont.

RUSSELL, Rt. Hon. Lord J.—cont.
Suez, Isthmus of, Canal, Res. 1, [150] 396
Supply—British Museum, [150] 1570, 1571, 1574

RUSSELL, Mr. F. C. H., Bedfordshire
Gas, Supply of, Com. moved for, [150] 321

RUTLAND, Duke of
Jews, 2R. [151] 717
Oaths, Com. cl. 5, [149] 1783; Report, [150] 1172
Property Qualification, 2R. [150] 1838

Sailors and Marines in Greenwich Hospital,
c. Res. (Sir C. Napier), [151] 571; Res. withdrawn, 572

ST. DAVIDS, Bishop of
Church of England Special Services, 2R. [148] 858
Liturgy, Revision of the, Commission moved for, [150] 165
Religious Worship Act Amendment, [148] 132; 2R. 337, 340, 345

ST. GERMANS, Earl of (†Lord Steward)
†Address in Answer to the Speech, Her Majesty's Answer, [148] 227
Civil Bills, &c., (Ireland), Com. [151] 2269
Ecclesiastical Commission, 2R. [150] 18
Endowed Schools (Ireland), [149] 2116
Kingston, Earl of, Notices of Questions by the, [150] 1438
Queen's College, Cork, Notice of Motion withdrawn, [151] 2271

St. Helena—Supply,
c. [151] 1268

St. James's Park,
c. Question (Mr. Cogan), [150] 1852; [151] 1607; (Major Sibthorp), [151] 930; (Mr. Griffith), 2126;—see Green Park

St. Johns' College, Oxford,
c. Question (Sir G. Lewis), [151] 1079

ST. LEONARDS, Lord
Aliens, Law relating to, [148] 1854
Camberwell, Vicarage of—Law of Sequestration, [151] 6
Chancery Amendment, 2R. [150] 1443; Rep. 1690
Chancery, Court of, [149] 2102;—Chief Clerk's Offices, [151] 165
Church Discipline—Law of Sequestration, [151] 590, 591
Church Rates Abolition, 2R. [151] 807; Petition, 1150
Divorce and Matrimonial Causes, 3R. [151] 160
Ecclesiastical Commission, 3R. Amend. [151] 1153, 1154
Glebe Houses, Dilapidations in, [151] 1149
Land, Sale and Transfer of, (Ireland) Com. [151] 1773

[cont.

ST. LEONARDS, Lord—cont.
Land, Transfer of, 2R. [149] 563; 3R. Amend. [150] 419, 423, 424
Ministerial Statement, [149] 68
Patriotic Fund, Correspondence moved for, [149] 1259
Post Office, False Characters to Servants, [151] 910
Probates and Letters of Administration, 3R. Amend. [151] 156
Property, Law of, Amendment, 1R. [148] 967; 2R. [149] 239, 448, 453
Transfer of Estates Simplification, Com. [149] 232, 234, 239; Rep. 851, 855
Trustees' Relief, Com. [149] 231

St. Paul's Churchyard,
l. Question (Earl of Harrington), [151] 2283

SALISBURY, Marquess of (President of the Council)
Business, Public, [149] 2
Education, Charitable Grants for, [149] 810, 811
Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, [150] 414
Thames, State of the, [151] 389

SALISBURY, Mr. E. G., Chester
Paper Duty, Res. [151] 119
Supply—Court of Probate, &c., [150] 1474;—County Courts, 1477

Salkeld, Lieutenant,
c. Question (Mr. Ker Seymer), [151] 755

SANDON, Viscount, Lichfield
New Caledonia, 2R. [151] 1117

Savings Banks,
c. Question (Mr. Collins), [148] 459

SCHNEIDER, Mr. H. W., Norwich
Breach of Privilege—The Attorney General, [151] 2191
Marriage Law Amendment, Com. [150] 1689; cl. 1, 671
Marriage with a Deceased Wife's Sister, [150] 20
Rewards to Members, Res. [151] 2347

School Trustees Bill,
l. 1R.* [151] 1447;
2R. 1665; Amend. (The Lord Chancellor), 1666

Schools, Endowed (Ireland),
l. Observations (Earl of Cork), [149] 2104
c. Question (Mr. Greer), [148] 137; (Mr. Grogan), [149] 460; Return moved for (Mr. Black), 782; Question (Mr. Bagwell) [150] 428; Res. (Mr. Kirk), [151] 624; Motion withdrawn, 636

Schools, Endowed, Law Amendment Bill,
c. 1R.* [151] 994

Schools Reformatory,
c. Question (Mr. Bagwell), [148] 271; (Mr. Garnett), 460

Schools, Reformatory (Ireland) Bill,
c. Leave, [149] 1401; 1R.* 1405;
2R. [150] 520;
151] Com. cl. 3, 1067, [A. 157, N. 41, M. 116] 1068;
· cl. 7, Amend. (Lord Naas), 1068; Amend. (Mr. Cogan), [A. 16, N. 176, M. 160] 1069; Amend. (Mr. Grogan), [A. 105, N. 42, M. 63] ib.; 2nd Amend. 1431, [o. q. A. 42, N. 15, M. 27] 1433;
· cl. 15, 1434;
· cl. 17, Amend. (Mr. Blake), [o. q. A. 94, N. 1, M. 93] 1434; Amend. (Mr. Barrow), 1435;
· Consid. cl. 3, Proviso (Mr. Grogan), 1550; Proviso neg. ib.;
· 3R.* 1590
151] l. 1R.* 1655;
· 2R. 1999; 3R.* 2243
· Royal Assent, 2369

Science and Art, Departments of,
c. Observations (Mr. Blake), [151] 1171;—Supply, 1172; Amend. (Mr. Blake), 1174; Amend. withdrawn, 1181, 1201; Report, 1266

Scotland,
Agricultural Statistics, c. Question (Sir A. Agnew), [149] 463; Papers moved for, (Mr. Caird), 783; Motion withdrawn, 785
Banks, l. Return moved for (Lord Monteagle), [148] 452
County Franchise, c. Leave, [150] 195, [A. 84, N. 103, M. 19] 215
County Voters, Registration of, c. Question (Sir E. Colebrooke), [149] 1265;—see County Voters, Registration of, (Scotland) Bill
Dumfriesshire Militia, c. Observations (Mr. B. Johnstone), [149] 1225
Edinburgh Castle, c. Question (Mr. Black), [150] 860
Land, Titles to, c. Question (Mr. Dunlop), [149] 575; (Mr. W. Ewart) [151] 1505;—see Land, Titles to (Scotland) Bill
Land, Transfer of, c. Question (Mr. Dunlop), [148] 1733
Military Surgery, Professors of, Edinburgh, c. Question (Mr. Black), [148] 1265
Probates, c. Question (Mr. Cowan), [149] 1493
Public Houses, c. Question (Mr. Cowan), [150] 1856
Roads, Public, c. Commission moved for (Lord Elcho), [151] 1155; Motion withdrawn, 1163;—see Roads, &c., (Scotland) Bill
Sasines, Registrar of, c. Question (Mr. Dunlop), [148] 554
Sheriffs, c. Question (Sir W. Dunbar), [151] 2190
Sheriff's Court, c. Question (Visct. Duncan), [150] 1611
Spirituous Liquors, Sale of, (Scotland) Act, c. Observations (Visct. Melgund), [151] 1188 Supply—Portpatrick Harbour, c. [150] 1127;—Queen's, &c. Remembrancer, 1250; Amend. (Mr. Wise), 1251, [A. 44, N. 70, M. 26] 1252;—Registrar General, Edinburgh, 1262;—Commissioners of Lunacy, 1263; Amend. (Mr. Baxter), 1263; Amend. neg. ib.;—Police, 1471;—Lord Advocate, &c., 1491;—Courts of Law, 1493, 1502;—General Register House, Edinburgh, 1494; Amend. (Mr.

[cont.

Scotland—cont.
Cowan), 1495; Observations (Sir G. Grey), 1518; (Mr. Cowan), 1533; Report, 1585; [151] 1425, 1483; Amend. (Mr. Craufurd), 1636; Amend. withdrawn, 1639;—Universities, 1237;—Board of Fisheries, 1417; Amend. (Mr. White), [A. 58, N. 119, M. 61] 1418;—Highland Roads and Bridges, ib., [A. 118, N. 73, M. 45] 1419;—Industrial Museum, (Edinburgh);—Royal Institution (Edinburgh), 1425
Under Secretary of State for, c. Res. (Mr. Baxter), [150] 2118, [A. 47, N. 174, M. 127] 2150
Universities, l. Question (Lord Campbell), [149] 850
c. Question (Lord Elcho), [148] 1472; (Colonel Sykes, [149] 857; (Mr. Cowan), [150] 335; —see Supply—Universities (Scotland) Bill
Western Bank of, c. Question (Mr. Brady), [149] 812, 1194; [150] 19
See
Clyde Navigation Bill
County Voters, Registration of, (Scotland) Bill
Edinburgh, &c., Annuity Tax Bill
Heirs (Scotland) Bill
Herring Fisheries (Scotland) Bill
Land, Titles to (Scotland), Bill
Lands, Valuation of (Scotland), Act Amendment Bill
Lunatics (Scotland) Act Amendment Bill
Police (Scotland) Act Amendment Bill
Post Office, New General, (Edinburgh) Bill
Roads, &c. (Scotland) Bill
Tay Fisheries Bill
Universities (Scotland) Bill

SCOTT, Hon. F., Berwickshire
Attorney General, The Late, and the Law Lords, [149] 10
Dumfriesshire Militia, [149] 1226
Edinburgh Annuity Tax, 2R. [150] 2179
Guano, from the Kooria Mooria Islands, [151] 931
Havelock's, Sir H., Pension, [148] 575
India, Despatches from, [150] 930
Oaths, Com. [149] 299
Poor Removal, Com. moved for, [150] 1915

SCOTT, Captain E., Maidstone
India—Mutiny in, Papers moved for, [149] 372

Sculpture in the Public Parks,
c. Question (Mr. T. Duncombe), [149] 174

Seamen, Distressed British, Abroad—Supply,
c. [151] 1420

Search, Right of—see Slave Trade, The Secretaries of State—Supply,

c. [150] 1129

Select Vestries Bill,
l. 1R.* [148] 1

Sepoys, The Mutinous,
c. Observations (Mr. Rich), [149] 1593

Septennial Act, The,
c. Leave, [149] 1364, [A. 57, N. 254, M. 197] 1376

Sequestration, Law of—see Camberwell, Vicarage of—Church Discipline

Serpentine River, The,
c. Question (Sir J. Shelley), [151] 1395

Settled Estates Act,
l. Observations (Lord Lyndhurst), [150] 1021

Sewage of Towns,
c. Question (Mr. Roupell), [148] 1372;—see Drainage—Thames, State of The

SEYMER, Mr. H. K., Dorsetshire
Agricultural Statistics, 2R. [149] 1900, 1918
Church Rates Abolition, Com. [149] 1428, 1435
Galway Freemen Disfranchisement, Leave, [149] 387; Com. [151] 597
Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Res. [150] 970
Property Qualification, Com. [150] 1425
Rag Fair on Sunday, [151] 418
Salkeld, Lieut. [151] 755

SEYMOUR, Mr. H. D. (†Secretary of the Board of Control), Poole
†East India Loan, Leave, [148] 801
India, Colonisation of, Com. moved for, [149] 287
†India, Government of (No. 1), Leave, [148] 1449
India, Government of, Com. Res. 3, [150] 1665
India, Government of (No. 3), Com. cl. 7, [151] 463; cl. 8, 773; cl. 11, 776; add. cl. 945; Consid. add. cl. 1035, 1036
†Oude, Annexation of, Papers moved for, [148] 1537;—Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Res. [150] 1037
Supply—National Gallery, Report, [151] 1384

SHAFTESBURY, Earl of
Cawnpore Massacre, The, [149] 2097, 2098
Church of England Special Services, 1R. [148] 756
East India Company, Petition, [151] 1447
India—Christianity in, [149] 2116
India, Government of (No. 3), Com. cl. 10, Amend. [151] 1580; cl. 12, Amend, 1582; cl. 53, Amend. 1693; 3R. 2008; That the Bill do pass, 2013
Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, [150] 323; Res. 579, 583
Religious Worship Act Amendment, [148] 132, 136, 237; 2R. 321, 348; Bill withdrawn, [148] 853
Slave Trade, Alleged revival of the, [148] 514

Sheep, &c., Contagious Diseases Prevention Bill,
c. 1R.* [151] 1266; 2R.* 1369; 3R * 1699
l. 1R.* [151] 1773; 2R.* 1865; 3R. 2077
Royal Assent, 2369

Sheerness, Dead Body at,
c. Question (Mr. Stapleton), [151] 1906

SHELLEY, Sir J. V., Westminster
Agricultural Statistics, 2R. [149] 1916
Bank Acts Committee, Nomination of Com. [148] 966
Chelsea Bridge Act Amendment, 2R. [150] 1993; [151] 757; Com. cl. 3, Amend. 1648, 1652; Consid. Amend. 1773
Chelsea New Bridge, Leave, [148] 1847, 1848; [149] 811, 1493
Galway Freemen Disfranchisement, Com. [150] 2157
Hainault Allotment, Res. [151] 621
Hop Duty, [151] 1163
India, Despatches from, [150] 928, 931
India, Government of, Com. Res. 4, [150] 1990
Joint-Stock Banking Companies, Leave, [148] 1184
London Corporation, Leave, [148] 744
Marble Arch, The, [149] 1493
Members' Seats, Res. [149] 2001
Metropolis Local Management Act Amendment, Leave, [151] 1534, 1537; 2R. 1736; Com. 1927; cl. 2, 1945; cl. 3, 1949; cl. 5, 1950; cl. 11, 1953; cl. 26, 1956; add. cl. 1958
Oaths, That Baron de Rothschild be a Member of the Committee, [150] 353
Offices, Public, [150] 21
Oude—The Proclamation, [150] 862
Patent Law Amendment, 2R. [150] 516, 519
Poor Removal, Com. moved for, [150] 1914
Serpentine River, The, [151] 1395
Supply — Royal Parks, [150] 1201;—British Museum, 1580;—New Public Offices (Belfast), [151] 1423
Thames, State of the, [151] 39; Res. 577, 1170
Weights and Measures, 2R. [150] 917

SHERIDAN, Mr. H. B., Dudley
Insurance and Assurance Institutions, Leave, [150] 879; 2R. Amend. 2192, 2193; [151] 1064, 1067
Joint-Stock Banking Companies, 2R. [150] 553
Metropolis Local Management, Com. [151] 1929

Sheriffs, &c.—Supply,
c. [150] 1471

SIBTHORP, Major G. T. W., Lincoln
Chelsea Bridge Act Amendment, Com. cl. 3, Amend. [151] 1651; Recom. Amend. 1863
St. James's Park, [151] 930

Sierra Leone, The Press in,
c. Question (Mr. Roebuck), [150] 1062

Sittings after Midnight,
c. Question (Mr. A. Smith), [151] 1284

SLANEY, Mr. R. A., Shrewsbury
Budget, The—Financial Statement, [149] 1316
Church Rates Abolition, 2R. [148] 1581
Commissioners for Exhibition, (1851), Com. [151] 86; cl. 2, 93; Consid. 315
Exchequer Bonds, 2R. [149] 2165

[cont.

SLANEY, Mr. R. A.—cont.
Health, Public, Act Amendment (1848), 2R. [149] 444
Incumbered Estates Court (Ireland), [149] 442
India, Government of, (No. 1), Leave, [148] 1424
India, Government of, (No. 2), Leave, [149] 842
India, Government of, (No. 3), Com. [151] 447
Joint-Stock Banking Companies, Leave, [148] 1176
Local Government, Com. cl. 9, [151] 172; cl. 10, 173
Private Bills, Res. [150] 470
Public Grounds and Playgrounds, Leave, [150] 883
Supply—Public Buildings, [150] 1113;—Furniture for Public Departments, 1114; — Royal Parks, 1116;—Harbours of Refuge, 1126;—Queen's, &c. Remembrancer (Scotland), 1252;—Education, [151] 152
Working Classes, Condition of the, Com. moved for, [149] 339, 345

Slave Bounties—Supply,
c. [151] 1419; Report, 1436

Slave Trade, The,
l. (Question (Earl of Shaftesbury), [148] 514; (Lord Brougham), [149] 21, 163; Petition, (Lord Brougham), 227; Notice of Motion (Bishop of Oxford), [150] 1700; Petition, 2195;—Case of the Regina Cœli," Explanation (Earl of Malmesbury), [151] 255; Question (Lord Truro), 1146; — Right of Search, Question (Lord Lyndhurst), 2078
c. Question (Mr. A. Mills), [148] 555;—French Free Emigration Scheme, Question, (Viscount Goderich), [150] 1853;—African Squadron, Question (Mr. P. O'Brien) [151] 11; (Mr. M. Gibson), 524; — Relations with the United States, Question (Mr. Bright), 41;—Right of Search Question (Viscount Duncan), 1084;—Res. (Mr. Hutt), 1286, [A. 24, N. 223, M. 199] 1345; Observations (Mr. Hutt), 1607; (Mr. C. Fortescue), 2033; (Viscount Palmerston), 2043

SMITH, Rt. Hon. R. V., (†President of the Board of Control), Northampton
†Bengal, Officers in the Civil Service, [148] 1371
Business, Public, [149] 1599
†Cadetships, East Indian, Returns moved for, [148] 804
†Clive Fund and Army Patronage (India), [148] 423, 424, 462
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Com. [151] 1484; cl. 1, 1492, 1498, 1599; Consid. cl. 1, 2030
†East India Loan, Leave, [148] 780, 802; 2R. 933; Com. 1871, 1887; Consid. [149] 18, 73
†Havelock, Sir H., Pension to, Rep. [148] 418, 419, 565
†Hindoo Shrines, Returns moved for, [148] 805
India, Government of (No. 2), Leave, [149] 840
India, Government of, Com. moved for, [149] 1713; Res. 2, 2188; [150] 299; Res. 3 (4), 1683, 1962; Res. 5 (6), 2058

[cont.

SMITH, Rt. Hon. R. V.—cont.

India, Government of (No. 3), 2R. [151] 360; Com. cl. 3, 454, 459; cl. 8, Amend. 761, 766, 773; cl. 12, 789; cl. 13, 859, 864; cl. 14, 868; cl. 19, 883; cl. 20, 884; cl. 27, 891; cl. 29, 898, 899; cl. 34, 933; add. cl. 940, 941; Consid. cl. 31, 1005; add. cl. 1016, 1026; Lords' Amends., 2183; cl. 27, 2186; cl. 32, 2202, 2306

†India—Troops for, [148] 355, 356, 358, 461; —Telegrams from, 461, 557;—Punishment of Mutineers, 551;—Prize Money, 553;—Property destroyed in, 555;—Ex-King of Delhi, 557;—Defence of Lucknow, 1264, 1266;—British Settlers in, [151] 1187;—State of, 2038

Jews, Com. cl. 1, [151] 1759

Militia (Service abroad) Act Continuance, Com. [151] 1962, 1963

†Oude, Annexation of, Papers moved for, [148] 1495, 1496, 1525;—Confiscation of Land in —Lord Canning's Proclamation, [150] 526, 529; Res. 708, 734, 742, 863, 865, 1037;—Landowners of, 921

Supply — Ecclesiastical Commissioners, [151] 1401

Voters' Travelling Expenses, Papers moved for, [150] 220

SMITH, Maj. Gen. Sir J. M. F., Chatham

Army Estimates, [150] 372

Army, Sanitary Condition of the, Res. [150] 481;—Subalterns in the, Address moved, adj. moved, [151] 2240;—Regulations, 2363

Bath, Order of the, [151] 2363

Corrupt Practices Prevention, Consid. add. cl. [151] 2021

Harbours of Refuge, Commission moved for, [151] 2146

Havelock's, Sir H., Annuity, 2R. [148] 511

India, Government of (No. 3), Com. cl. 34, [151] 934; cl. 35, 938; add. cl. 940; Lords' Amends. cl. 35, 2204

India—Vote of Thanks to the Army, &c. [148] 931

Metropolis Local Management, Consid. cl. 1, Amend. [151] 2050

Military Academy—Competitive Examinations, Address moved, [149] 1729

Military Organization, Res. [150] 1347; [151] 571

Navy Estimates, [149] 128, 1243, 1344, 1345, 1641

Netley Hospital, [151] 57

Recruiting System, The, [150] 368

SMITH, Mr. A., Truro

Attorney General, The, v. The Prince of Wales, Papers moved for, [149] 1999, 2000

Commissioners for Exhibition (1851), 2R. [150] 2268

Cornwall, Duchy of, [151] 881

Cornwall Submarine Mines, Leave, Amend. [151] 1242, 1243; Com. adj. moved, 1652, 1653, 1654; Amend. 1750

Corrupt Practices Prevention, 3R. [151] 2118

Durham County Palatine Jurisdiction, 2R. [150] 221; Com. 2279

Godrevy Bay, Lighthouse at, Papers moved for, [148] 684, 1359; Com. moved for, [149] 327, 839

[cont.

SMITH, Mr. A.—cont.

Harbours of Refuge, Com. [148] 1359; [151] 1746

Lighthouses, &c., Address moved, [149] 1138

Sittings after Midnight, [151] 1284

Supply—Embassies and Missions abroad, [151] 1272;—Polish Refugees, 1275;—National Gallery, Report, 1385;—Ecclesiastical Commissioners, 1401;—Patent Law Fees, &c., Amend. 1416;—Lighthouses abroad, 1420

Thames, State of the, Res. [151] 1170

Ways and Means, [151] 1644

SMITH, Mr. J. A., Chichester

Rothschild, Baron de, Admission of, Res. [151] 2106, 2109

SMITH, Mr. J. B., Stockport

Dhar, Principality of, [149] 574: [150] 1919

East India Loan, Leave, [148] 802

Edinburgh Annuity Tax, 2R. [150] 2177

India, Government of (No. 2), Leave, [149] 830

Passport System in France, Correspondence moved for, [149] 595

Smithfield Market,

c. Question (Mr. Hanbury), [148] 552

Smoke Nuisance Abatement (Metropolis) Bill,

c. 1R.* [150] 2221

SMOLLETT, Mr. A., Dumbartonshire

Lancashire and Yorkshire, &c. Railway Companies, Consid. [150] 1605

SMYTH, Colonel J. C., York City

Estimates, The, [149] 1607

Justice, Administration of, Com. moved for, [149] 1809

Militia, The, [150] 1609

SOLICITOR GENERAL, The (†Sir H. S. Keating), Reading

Conspiracy to Murder, Leave, [148] 1049

†Criminal Statute Law [149] 709

SOLICITOR GENERAL, The, (†Sir H. M. Cairns), Belfast

†Bank Acts Committee, Nomination of Com. [148] 965

†Belfast Town Improvement, 2R. [148] 1368

Bothnia—Claims of British Merchants, Commission moved for, [151] 1859

Breach of Privilege—Washington Wilks, 1068; Amend. [150] 1316

Bristol Municipal Charities, 2R. [150] 2277

Chancery Amendment, Leave, [149] 1161, 1167; 2R. 1557; Com. 2204

Commerce, Tribunals of, Com. moved for, [149] 1147

Cornwall Submarine Mines, Leave, [151] 1242; Com. 1652, 1654, 1752

Excise Duties, 2R. [149] 1745

India, Government of (No. 3), Com. cl. 3, [151] 457; cl. 8, 770, 774; cl. 11, 777; Amend. 783; cl. 12, 784; cl. 13, 864; cl. 31, 900; cl. 32, 901; cl. 37, 902; cl. 38, 905; cl. 53

[cont.

SOLICITOR GENERAL—cont.
907; Consid. add. cl. 1016, 1030; cl. 27, 1048; 3R. 1089; Lords' Amends. cl. 32, 2200
Joint Stock Companies Acts Amendment, Com. cl. 7, [150] 2271; cl. 19, 2273; cl. 10, 2275; cl. 21, 2276
Land, Sale and Transfer of (Ireland), Com. [150] 1546; cl. 3, [151] 59; cl. 34, 63; cl. 41, 65; cl. 51, 372; cl. 88, 973
Lunatics under the Court of Chancery, Com. moved for, [151] 216
Marriage Law Amendment, Com. cl. 1, [151] 673; cl. 4, 684; add. cl. 685, 686; Consid. 792
New Caledonia, (British Colombia) Government of, Com. cl. 1, [151] 1348; cl. 2, 1768; cl. 3, 1769
Oaths, Lords' Amends., That Baron de Rothschild be a Member of the Committee, [150] 430
*Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Res. [150] 693, 741
Patent Law Amendment, 2R. Amend. [150] 516, 517
Rewards to Members, Res. [151] 192
Supply—County Courts, [150] 1481, 1483;—Theological Professors, Belfast, [151] 1240;—Nonconforming, &c., Ministers (Ireland), 1278, 1280;—Patent Law Fees, &c., 1414, 1415, 1416
Townsend, Mr., Case of, [150] 2102
Trustees and Executors, [151] 2302
Wills, &c., of British Subjects Abroad, 2R. [150] 2276

SOMERSET, Duke of
Barrack Accommodation, Returns moved for, [149] 803
Church Rates Abolition, 2R. [151] 799, 855
Corrupt Practices Prevention, 2R. [151] 2167
India, Government of (No. 3), Com. cl. 7, [151] 1569, 1579; cl. 12, 1585; cl. 34, 1685; cl. 41, 1691
Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Res. [150] 619
School Trustees, 2R. [151] 1676

SOMERVILLE, Rt. Hon. Sir W. M., Canterbury
Civil Bills, &c. (Ireland), Com. cl. 2, [151] 1772
Magisterial Appointments, [150] 273

SONDES, Lord
Yarmouth, Great—Magistrates, [149] 453, 457

SPAIGHT, Mr. J., Limerick City
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Com. cl. 1, [151] 1495, 1598
Land, Sale and Transfer of (Ireland), Com. cl. 51, [151] 373; cl. 87, 971
Reformatory Schools (Ireland), Com. cl. 7, [151] 1433; cl. 17, 1434, 1435

SPEAKER, The (Rt. Hon. J. E. Denison), Nottinghamshire, N.
Ali Moorad's Claim—Mr. Butt, [148] 1732, 1859, 1865, 1867
Ashburnham, General, [148] 863
Attorney General, The late, and the Law Lords, [149] 10, 14

SPEAKER, The—cont.
Battersea Park, [151] 877
Breach of Privilege—Washington Wilks, [150] 1065, 1066
"Cagliari," Case of the, [149] 179
Cantillon, Legacy to—Will of Napoleon I., [148] 1274, 1275
Captains in the Army, Address moved, [150] 1102
Cashel Election, [149] 246
Cornwall Submarine Mines, Leave, [151] 1242, 1243; Com. 1654
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Consid. [151] 1966; add. cl. 2028
Dublin, Affray at, [149] 173
East India Loan, 3R. [149] 176
France, Relations with—The Earl of Malmesbury's Despatch, [149] 325
Galway Freemen Disfranchisement, Com. [149] 1418
Government, Policy of the, [149] 187
Hainault Forest, [151] 872
Havelock, Major General, Pension to, Rep. [148] 417, 419, 564, 572, 574
India, Government of (No. 3), Consid. add. cl. [151] 1036, 1039
India, Transport of Troops to, Com. moved for, [148] 719, 724;—Vote of Thanks to the Army, &c., 865, 867, 868;—Acknowledgment of, [151] 2272;—Despatches from, [150] 928
Joint-Stock Banking Companies, Com. [150] 1504, 1505
Ladies' Gallery, [151] 1612
Land, Sale and Transfer of (Ireland), Com. [150] 2107
Landlord and Tenant (Ireland), [151] 447
Medical Practitioners, Com. [150] 1410
Metropolis Local Management Act Amendment, Leave, [151] 1517, 1519; Com. 1934
Oaths, 2R. [148] 1103; Com. 298; Consid. [149] 516, 1984; Conference, [150] 763
Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, [150] 525, 863
Police Force (Ireland), Com. [151] 1143
Rothschild, Baron de, Admission of, [151] 2106
Thames, State of the, Res. [151] 1168
Townsend, Mr., Case of, [150] 2104
Valuation (Ireland), Com. moved for, [150] 912
Weedon Establishment, Commission moved for, [151] 579

Spiritual Destitution in England and Wales,
l. Com. moved for (Bishop of Exeter), [149] 1558

SPOONER, Mr. R., Warwickshire, N.
Bank Acts, Explanation, [148] 674
Bank Issues Indemnity, Leave, [148] 179; 2R. 312; Com. cl. 2, 406
Charitable Trusts Act Continuance, [151] 1437; Com. 1549
Chelsea Bridge Act Amendment, 2R. Adj. moved, [150] 1995
Church Rates Abolition, Com. cl. 1, [149] 1465, 1469
Commissioners for Exhibition (1851), 2R. [150] 2260; Com. cl. 1, [151] 87, 91; cl. 2, 93, 94
Conspiracy to Murder, 2R. [148] 1783
Convict Children, [151] 1610

SPOONER, Mr. R.—cont.
Dublin, Affray at, Report moved for, Adj. moved, [149] 688, 702
Gaols and Houses of Correction, 2R. [148] 1248
Health, Public, Com. cl. 4, [150] 2283
India, Government of (No. 3), Lords' Amends. [151] 2318, 2322
Insurance and Assurance Institutions, 2R. [150] 2192
Jews, 2R. [151] 1620; Com 1758; cl. 1, Proviso, 1761; 3R. 1864, 1892
Joint-Stock Banking Companies, 2R. [150] 554
Manchester, &c. and Great Northern Railway Companies, Consid. [150] 1195; Amend. 1606, 1609
Maynooth College, Com. moved for, [149] 1990, 1999
New Trial in Criminal Cases, 2R. [151] 1062
Oaths, 2R. [148] 1112, 1114; Consid. [149] 506; Lords' Amends. Amend. [151] 1903, 1904
Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Res. [150] 1037
Partnerships, Registration of, 2R. [151] 240
Poor Law Amendment, Com. cl. 2, [149] 2002, 2003
Rothschild, Baron de, Admission of, Res. [151] 2111
Supply — Royal Parks, [150] 1116;—New Houses of Parliament, 1118;—Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant (Ireland), 1259;—Royal Hibernian Academy, [151] 1239

Stade Dues, The,
c. Question (Mr. Fenwick), [148] 468; Address moved, (Mr. J. L. Ricardo), [149], 996; Motion withdrawn, 1019; Question (Mr. Hutt), 1495, 1801

Stamp Duties on Passports Bill,
c. 1R.* [150] 496; 2R.* 523; 3R.* 859
l. 1R.* 919; 2R.* 1507; 3R.* 1690
Royal Assent, 1997

Stamp Duty on Drafts Bill,
c. 1R.* [149] 1653;
2R. 2171;
Com. cl. 1, [150] 288;
cl. 2, 289; Preamble, 291;
3R.* 426
1R.* [150] 579; 2R.* 858; 3R.* 919
Royal Assent, 1021;—
See Cheques, Adhesive Stamps on—Drafts on Bankers Law Amendment Bill

Stamped Letter Paper,
c. Observations (Mr. Maguire), [151] 2042

Standing Orders—Private Business,
c. Report (Col. W. Patten) [151] 2168

STANHOPE, Earl
Church of England, Political Services of the, Address moved, [151] 475, 481
East India Company's Petition, [148] 1159
Forms of Prayer — State Services, Address moved, [151] 1662
Kingston, Earl of, Notices of Questions by the, [150] 1439, 1596
Oaths, Report, [150] 1112, 1168

[cont.

STANHOPE, Earl—cont.
Passport System, [148] 745
Property Qualification, Com. [150] 1917
Royal Commission—Order of Proceedings, [151] 480, 503
Universities (Scotland), 2R. [151] 1361; Com. cl. 1, 1671, 1674

STANHOPE, Mr. J. B., Lincolnshire, N.
Agricultural Statistics, 2R. [149] 1916
Chelsea Bridge Act Amendment, Com. cl. 3, [151] 1649; Amend. 1650
County Franchise, Leave, [149] 1836
Dublin, Affray at, Report moved for, [149] 696
Oaths, Leave, [148] 489

Stanhope and Wolsingham Rectories Bill,
c. 1R.* [150] 332; 2R.* 763; Com. 2285

STANLEY, Rt. Hon. Lord, (†Secretary for the Colonies; afterwards, ‡President of the Board of Control), King's Lynn
‡Bray's Traction Engine, [151] 2305
‡Cambridge University Commission, Chairmanship of, [151] 1371
Church Rates Abolition, 2R. [148] 1570
†Colonial and English Law, Assimilation of, [149] 422
‡Dhar, Annexation of, [150] 1919
Education (England), Commission moved for, [148] 1198
†Hudson's Bay Company, [149] 1494
‡India, British Settlers in, [151] 1193
‡India, Chaplains in, [151] 880
‡India, Council of, [151] 1084
†India, Government of, Com. [149] 2041; Res. 2, 2183; [150] 297; Res. 3, (4), 1633, 1673, 1679, 1681, 1682, 1956; Amend. 1969, 1988; Res. 4, (5), 1989, 1990; Res. 5, (6), 2018, 2039, 2065; Res. 6, (7), 2221, 2243, 2251
‡India, Government of (No. 3), 2R. [151] 315, 366; Com. cl. 3, 452, 455; cl. 7, 464, 759; cl. 8, 761, 763, 764, 765, 767, 769; Amend. 773, 774; cl. 10, Amend. 775; cl. 11, 776, 784; cl. 12, 790; cl. 13, 858, 859, 864, 865; cl. 14, 866, 867; cl. 15, Amend. 869; cl. 19, 883, 884; cl. 20, 885; cl. 23, 887; cl. 27, 894; cl. 29, 898, 899; cl. 31, 900; cl. 43, 906; cl. 49, 907; cl. 33, 932; cl. 34, 934, 935; cl. 35, ib., 937; add. cl. 939, 940, 943; Consid. cl. 31, Amend. 1003, 1005, 1006; add. cl. 1011, 1020, 1036; cl. 10, 1040; cl. 33, 1050; Lords' Amends. cl. 27, 2185; cl. 29, 2189; cl. 31, 2192; cl. 32, 2194; cl. 34, 2202; cl. 35, 2204, 2311, 2344, 2347
‡India, Reinforcements for, [151] 2032
‡India, Revolt in—Amnesty, [151] 1786
‡India—Roads and Canals, [151] 1370
‡India, State of, [151] 2040
‡Indian Army, [151] 870, 1194
‡Inglis, Major General, [151] 2368
‡Lawrence, Sir John, [151] 2125
†Marriage with a deceased Wife's Sister, [150] 20
†New England Company, [149] 812
†Newfoundland Fisheries, [150] 673
†New Zealand, [149] 1355; [150] 357, 923
†Ninety-second Regiment in Bombay, [151] 1081
†North Australian Expedition, [149] 1584
‡Ordnance Survey, [151 2367

[cont.

STANLEY, Rt. Hon. Lord—cont.
†Oregon, Gold in, [150] 1059
†Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Res. [150] 743, 1922
‡Oude, Pacification of, [150] 1852, 1853, 2017; —King of, [151] 1502;—Creditors of the State of, 1930
†Prince Edward Island, [149] 1654
†Prince Edward Island Loan, Com. Res. [150] 399
†Private Bills, Res. [150] 465
†Sierra Leone, The Press in, [150] 1062
‡Supply — Falkland Islands — Labuan [151] 1268;—Hong Kong, 1269;—Improvement of the Kafirs, 1421
‡Surat—The Nawab's Debt, [151] 41

STANLEY of Alderley, Lord (†President of the Board of Trade)
†Address in Answer to the Speech, [148] 85
Atlantic Telegraph Company, 3R. [151] 1968
†Bank Issues Indemnity, 2R. [148] 447; 3R. 526, 535
†Banks (Ireland and Scotland), Return moved for [148] 456
†Bankruptcy, District Court of, 1R. [148] 1603
"Candace," Wreck of the, [151] 2103, 2105
Chancellor of the Exchequer's Speech at Slough, [150] 1305, 1307
Church Rates Abolition, 2R. [151] 854
Civil Bills, &c. (Ireland), Com. [151] 2270
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Com. cl. 1, [151] 2248
Excise Duties, 3R. [150] 330
India, Government of (No. 3), Com. cl. 12, [151] 1585
India, Telegraphic Communication with, [151] 2292
Joint-Stock Banking Companies, 2R. [151] 1353
Manchester, Court of Bankruptcy, [151] 215
Oaths, Com. cl. 5, [149] 1785, 1786; [150] 2219, 2220; Report, Consid. [151] 1253
Passing Tolls—Shipping Dues, [149] 789
Private Bills, Com. moved for, [151] 3;—Standing Orders, 2285
School Trustees, 2R. [151] 1665, 1667
Slave Trade, The, [150] 2218
Telegraphic Communication with Europe and America, Correspondence moved for, [149] 1579, 1581, 1582
Thames, State of the, [151] 393
Victoria Station and Pimlico Railway, Motion for Counsel, [151] 587, 588, 589, 693

STANLEY, Hon. W. O., Beaumaris
Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Res. [150] 1032
Thames, State of the, [151] 421

STAPLETON, Mr. J., Berwick-on-Tweed
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Com. cl. 1, [151] 1496; Consid. 1966; cl. 1, 2029; 3R. 2123
Fernando Po, Religious Bigotry in, [151] 2273
India, Government of (No. 3), Lords' Amends. [151] 2311
Reformatory Schools (Ireland), 2R. [150] 523; Com. cl. 17, [151] 1435
Sheerness, Dead Body at, [151] 1906

STEPHENSON, Mr. R., Whitby
Metropolis Local Management Act Amendment, Leave, [151] 1535; 2R. 1734, 1739; Com. cl. 1, 1936, 1938, 1939
Suez, Isthmus of, Canal, Res. [150] 1371

STEUART, Mr. A., Cambridge
Budget, The—Financial Statement, [149] 1311
Cashel Election, [149] 248
Church Rates Abolition, Com. [149] 1455
Church Rates Amendment, [149] 1870
County Franchise (Scotland), Leave, [150] 214
County Voters, Registration of, (Scotland), Com. [150] 2191
Election Committees Scrutiny, 2R. [151] 249
Election Petitions, [148] 450
Galway Freemen Disfranchisement, Com. cl. 1, [151] 600
Marriage Law Amendment, Com. [151] 670; cl. 1, Amend. 677; Adj. moved, 679; cl. 2, 683
Navy Estimates, [149] 132
Oaths, Leave, [148] 498; Com. [149] 300; Consid. 482; Amend. 483, 490
Roads, &c. (Scotland), 2R. [149] 1921
Universities (Scotland), 2R. [149] 1889; Com. cl. 1, [151] 412

STEWART, Sir M. S., Renfrewshire
Lands, Valuation of, (Scotland) Act Amendment, 2R. [149] 661
Roads, &c. (Scotland), 2R. [149] 1920
Western Bank of Scotland, [149] 1218

Stipendiary Magistrates, &c., Bill,
c. 1R.* [150] 2220; 2R.* [151] 83; 3R.* 994
l. 1R.* [151] 1069; 2R.* 1550; 3R.* 1906
Royal Assent, 2369

STIRLING, Mr. W., Perthshire
Cantillon, Legacy to—Will of Napoleon I., [148] 1269, 1273, 1274, 1275
Under Secretary of State for Scotland, Res. [150] 2127
Universities (Scotland), 2R. [150] 1896; Com. cl. 1, [151] 411; cl. 10, 418; cl. 13, 736; Consid. cl. 7, 958
Wellington Monument, The, [151] 14; Res. 2231

STRATFORD DE REDCLIFFE, Viscount
India, Government of, (No. 3), Com. cl. 7, [151] 1576
India, Telegraphic Communication with, [151] 2291
Jeddah, Massacre at, [151] 1655
Oaths, Com. cl. 5 [149] 1781

STUART, Lord P. J. H. C., Ayrshire
India—Vote of Thanks to the Army, &c., [148] 913

STUART, Colonel J. F. C. D., Cardiff
British Bank Directors, [148] 759

Submarine Telegraph, The,
c. Question (Lord C. Paget), [150] 1732

SPOONER, Mr. R.—cont.
Dublin, Affray at, Report moved for, Adj. moved, [149] 688, 702
Gaols and Houses of Correction, 2R. [148] 1248
Health, Public, Com. cl. 4, [150] 2283
India, Government of (No. 3), Lords' Amends. [151] 2318, 2322
Insurance and Assurance Institutions, 2R. [150] 2192
Jews, 2R. [151] 1620; Com 1758; cl. 1, Proviso, 1761; 3R. 1864, 1892
Joint-Stock Banking Companies, 2R. [150] 554
Manchester, &c. and Great Northern Railway Companies, Consid. [150] 1195; Amend. 1606, 1609
Maynooth College, Com. moved for, [149] 1990, 1999
New Trial in Criminal Cases, 2R. [151] 1062
Oaths, 2R. [148] 1112, 1114; Consid. [149] 506; Lords' Amends. Amend. [151] 1903, 1904
Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Res. [150] 1037
Partnerships, Registration of, 2R. [151] 240
Poor Law Amendment, Com. cl. 2, [149] 2002, 2003
Rothschild, Baron de, Admission of, Res. [151] 2111
Supply — Royal Parks, [150] 1116;—New Houses of Parliament, 1118;—Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant (Ireland), 1259;—Royal Hibernian Academy, [151] 1239

Stade Dues, The,
c. Question (Mr. Fenwick), [148] 468; Address moved, (Mr. J. L. Ricardo), [149], 996; Motion withdrawn, 1019; Question (Mr. Hutt), 1495, 1801

Stamp Duties on Passports Bill,
c. 1R.* [150] 496; 2R.* 523; 3R.* 859
l. 1R.* 919; 2R.* 1507; 3R.* 1690
Royal Assent, 1997

Stamp Duty on Drafts Bill,
c. 1R.* [149] 1653;
2R. 2171;
Com. cl. 1, [150] 288;
cl. 2, 289; Preamble, 291;
3R.* 426
1R.* [150] 579; 2R.* 858; 3R.* 919
Royal Assent, 1021;—
See Cheques, Adhesive Stamps on—Drafts on Bankers Law Amendment Bill

Stamped Letter Paper,
c. Observations (Mr. Maguire), [151] 2042

Standing Orders—Private Business,
c. Report (Col. W. Patten) [151] 2168

STANHOPE, Earl
Church of England, Political Services of the, Address moved, [151] 475, 481
East India Company's Petition, [148] 1159
Forms of Prayer — State Services, Address moved, [151] 1662
Kingston, Earl of, Notices of Questions by the, [150] 1439, 1596
Oaths, Report, [150] 1112, 1168

[cont.

STANHOPE, Earl—cont.
Passport System, [148] 745
Property Qualification, Com. [150] 1917
Royal Commission—Order of Proceedings, [151] 480, 503
Universities (Scotland), 2R. [151] 1361; Com. cl. 1, 1671, 1674

STANHOPE, Mr. J. B., Lincolnshire, N.
Agricultural Statistics, 2R. [149] 1916
Chelsea Bridge Act Amendment, Com. cl. 3, [151] 1649; Amend. 1650
County Franchise, Leave, [149] 1836
Dublin, Affray at, Report moved for, [149] 696
Oaths, Leave, [148] 489

Stanhope and Wolsingham Rectories Bill,
c. 1R.* [150] 332; 2R.* 763; Com. 2285

STANLEY, Rt. Hon. Lord, (†Secretary for the Colonies; afterwards, ‡President of the Board of Control), King's Lynn
‡Bray's Traction Engine, [151] 2305
‡Cambridge University Commission, Chairmanship of, [151] 1371
Church Rates Abolition, 2R. [148] 1570
†Colonial and English Law, Assimilation of, [149] 422
‡Dhar, Annexation of, [150] 1919
‡Education (England), Commission moved for, [148] 1198
†Hudson's Bay Company, [149] 1494
‡India, British Settlers in, [151] 1193
‡India, Chaplains in, [151] 880
‡India, Council of, [151] 1084
†India, Government of, Com. [149] 2041; Res. 2, 2183; [150] 297; Res. 3, (4), 1633, 1673, 1679, 1681, 1682, 1956; Amend. 1969, 1988; Res. 4, (5), 1989, 1990; Res. 5, (6), 2018, 2039, 2065; Res. 6, (7), 2221, 2243, 2251
‡India, Government of (No. 3), 2R. [151] 315, 366; Com. cl. 3, 452, 455; cl. 7, 464, 759; cl. 8, 761, 763, 764, 765, 767, 769; Amend. 773, 774; cl. 10, Amend. 775; cl. 11, 776, 784; cl. 12, 790; cl. 13, 858, 859, 864, 865; cl. 14, 866, 867; cl. 15, Amend. 869; cl. 19, 883, 884; cl. 20, 885; cl. 23, 887; cl. 27, 894; cl. 29, 898, 899; cl. 31, 900; cl. 43, 906; cl. 49, 907; cl. 33, 932; cl. 34, 934, 935; cl. 35, ib., 937; add. cl. 939, 940, 943; Consid. cl. 31, Amend. 1003, 1005, 1006; add. cl. 1011, 1020, 1036; cl. 10, 1040; cl. 33, 1050; Lords' Amends. cl. 27, 2185; cl. 29, 2189; cl. 31, 2192; cl. 32, 2194; cl. 34, 2202; cl. 35, 2204, 2311, 2344, 2347
‡India, Reinforcements for, [151] 2032
‡India, Revolt in—Amnesty, [151] 1786
‡India—Roads and Canals, [151] 1370
‡India, State of, [151] 2040
‡Indian Army, [151] 870, 1194
‡Inglis, Major General, [151] 2368
‡Lawrence, Sir John, [151] 2125
†Marriage with a deceased Wife's Sister, [150] 20
†New England Company, [149] 812
†Newfoundland Fisheries, [150] 673
†New Zealand, [149] 1355; [150] 357, 923
†Ninety-second Regiment in Bombay, [151] 1081
†North Australian Expedition, [149] 1584
‡Ordnance Survey, [151 2367

[cont.

STANLEY, Rt. Hon. Lord—cont.
†Oregon, Gold in, [150] 1059
†Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Res. [150] 743, 1922
‡Oude, Pacification of, [150] 1852, 1853, 2017; —King of, [151] 1502;—Creditors of the State of, 1930
†Prince Edward Island, [149] 1654
†Prince Edward Island Loan, Com. Res. [150] 399
†Private Bills, Res. [150] 465
†Sierra Leone, The Press in, [150] 1062
‡Supply — Falkland Islands — Labuan [151] 1268;—Hong Kong, 1269;—Improvement of the Kafirs, 1421
‡Surat—The Nawab's Debt, [151] 41

STANLEY of Alderley, Lord (†President of the Board of Trade)
†Address in Answer to the Speech, [148] 85
Atlantic Telegraph Company, 3R. [151] 1968
†Bank Issues Indemnity, 2R. [148] 447; 3R. 526, 535
†Banks (Ireland and Scotland), Return moved for [148] 456
†Bankruptcy, District Court of, 1R. [148] 1603
"Candace," Wreck of the, [151] 2103, 2105
Chancellor of the Exchequer's Speech at Slough, [150] 1305, 1307
Church Rates Abolition, 2R. [151] 854
Civil Bills, &c. (Ireland), Com. [151] 2270
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Com. cl. 1, [151] 2248
Excise Duties, 3R. [150] 330
India, Government of (No. 3), Com. cl. 12, [151] 1585
India, Telegraphic Communication with, [151] 2292
Joint-Stock Banking Companies, 2R. [151] 1353
Manchester, Court of Bankruptcy, [151] 215
Oaths, Com. cl. 5, [149] 1785, 1786; [150] 2219, 2220; Report, Consid. [151] 1253
Passing Tolls—Shipping Dues, [149] 789
Private Bills, Com. moved for, [151] 3;—Standing Orders, 2285
School Trustees, 2R. [151] 1665, 1667
Slave Trade, The, [150] 2218
Telegraphic Communication with Europe and America, Correspondence moved for, [149] 1579, 1581, 1582
Thames, State of the, [151] 393
Victoria Station and Pimlico Railway, Motion for Counsel, [151] 587, 588, 589, 693

STANLEY, Hon. W. O., Beaumaris
Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Res. [150] 1032
Thames, State of the, [151] 421

STAPLETON, Mr. J., Berwick-on-Tweed
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Com. cl. 1, [151] 1496; Consid. 1966; cl. 1, 2029; 3R. 2123
Fernando Po, Religious Bigotry in, [151] 2273
India, Government of (No. 3), Lords' Amends. [151] 2311
Reformatory Schools (Ireland), 2R. [150] 523; Com. cl. 17, [151] 1435
Sheerness, Dead Body at, [151] 1906

STEPHENSON, Mr. R., Whitby
Metropolis Local Management Act Amendment, Leave, [151] 1535; 2R. 1734, 1739; Com. cl. 1, 1936, 1938, 1939
Suez, Isthmus of, Canal, Res. [150] 1371

STEUART, Mr. A., Cambridge
Budget, The—Financial Statement, [149] 1311
Cashel Election, [149] 248
Church Rates Abolition, Com. [149] 1455
Church Rates Amendment, [149] 1870
County Franchise (Scotland), Leave, [150] 214
County Voters, Registration of, (Scotland), Com. [150] 2191
Election Committees Scrutiny, 2R. [151] 249
Election Petitions, [148] 450
Galway Freemen Disfranchisement, Com. cl. 1, [151] 600
Marriage Law Amendment, Com. [151] 670; cl. 1, Amend. 677; Adj. moved, 679; cl. 2, 683
Navy Estimates, [149] 132
Oaths, Leave, [148] 498; Com. [149] 300; Consid. 482; Amend. 483, 490
Roads, &c. (Scotland), 2R. [149] 1921
Universities (Scotland), 2R. [149] 1889; Com. cl. 1, [151] 412

STEWART, Sir M. S., Renfrewshire
Lands, Valuation of, (Scotland) Act Amendment, 2R. [149] 661
Roads, &c. (Scotland), 2R. [149] 1920
Western Bank of Scotland, [149] 1218

Stipendiary Magistrates, &c., Bill,
c. 1R.* [150] 2220; 2R.* [151] 83; 3R.* 994
l. 1R.* [151] 1069; 2R.* 1550; 3R.* 1906
Royal Assent, 2369

STIRLING, Mr. W., Perthshire
Cantillon, Legacy to—Will of Napoleon I., [148] 1269, 1273, 1274, 1275
Under Secretary of State for Scotland, Res. [150] 2127
Universities (Scotland), 2R. [150] 1896; Com. cl. 1, [151] 411; cl. 10, 418; cl. 13, 736; Consid. cl. 7, 958
Wellington Monument, The, [151] 14; Res. 2231

STRATFORD DE REDCLIFFE, Viscount
India, Government of, (No. 3), Com. cl. 7, [151] 1576
India, Telegraphic Communication with, [151] 2291
Jeddah, Massacre at, [151] 1655
Oaths, Com. cl. 5 [149] 1781

STUART, Lord P. J. H. C., Ayrshire
India—Vote of Thanks to the Army, &c., [148] 913

STUART, Colonel J. F. C. D., Cardiff
British Bank Directors, [148] 759

Submarine Telegraph, The,
c. Question (Lord C. Paget), [150] 1732

Suez, Isthmus of, Canal,
c. Question (Mr. Griffith), [149] 847
Resolution (Mr. Roebuck), [150] 1360; Amend. (Mr. Griffith), 1369; Amend. neg. 1401, [m. q. A. 62, N. 290, M. 228] ib.; Question (Mr. M. Gibson), 1447

Sullivan, Mr. M., Kilkenny
Clerks of Petty Sessions (Ireland), 2R. [150] 2277

Sullivan, Mr., Assassination of,
l. Question (Earl of Powis), [148] 450

Superannuation Law Amendment Bill,
c. 1R.* [151] 730;
Notice (Mr. Wilson), [151] 1181

Superannuations—Supply,
c. [149] 227; [151] 1275

Supply,
c. Com. [148] 274, 398, 420; Res. (Chancellor of the Exchequer), 1083; Rep. [149] 258, 1721
Academy, Royal Hibernian, Amend. (Lord Haddo), [151] 1238, [A. 24, N. 128, M. 104] 1240
Academy, Royal Irish, [151] 1238
Advocate, Lord, and Solicitor General (Scotland), [150] 1491
Africa, Western Coast of, [151] 1268
Agricultural and Emigration Statistics (Ireland), [151] 1423
Army Estimates, [149] 134, 224, 817, 1248; [150] 371; Amend. (Major Wortley), 398; Amend. neg. 399, 1105; [151] 1481
Audit, Commissioners of, [150] 1262
Belfast, New Public Offices, [151] 1423
Bermudas, [151] 1268
Boundary Survey (Ireland), [A. 118, N. 91, M. 27] [151] 1423
British Museum, Salaries and Expenses of, [150] 1570;—New Buildings, &c., 1583
Burial Grounds, Inspection of, [151] 1420
Cambridge University, Professors of, [151] 1420
Captured Negroes, &c., [151] 1270
Charitable Allowances, [151] 1277
Charity Commission, [151] 1402
Chesney, Major General, [151] 1442
Cholera (West Indies), [151] 1423
Civil Contingencies, [150] 1138; [151] 1444; Amend. (Mr. W. Williams), 1445; Amend. neg. 1446
Civil Service Commission, [150] 1131
Colleges, Queen's (Ireland), [151] 1237
Commissions, Temporary, [151] 1402; Amend. (Mr. L. King), 1404, [A. 52, N. 85, M. 33] 1412
Constabulary Police (Aldershot and Shorncliffe), [151] 1420
Consular Establishments Abroad, [151] 1270
Consular Office at Constantinople, New, [151] 1441
Convict Establishments, [150] 1503
Copyhold, Inclosure, and Tithe Commission, [150] 1262
Corn Returns, Inspectors of, [151] 1420
County Courts, Amend. (Viscount Duncan), [150] 1475; Amend. neg. 1486 County Gaols, [150] 1503

[cont.

Supply—cont.
Courts of Law (Ireland,) [150] 1502, 1503
Courts of Law (Scotland,) [150] 1493, 1502
Crown Office, Chancery, and Queen's Bench, [150] 1471
Customs Department, [149] 227; [151] 1280;—Superannuations, 1281
Designs, Registration of, [151] 1420
Drainage, Main, London, Amend. (Mr. Cox), [151] 1426; Amend. withdrawn, 1429
Ecclesiastical Commission, [151] 1399, [A. 67, N. 61, M. 6] 1402
Education, [151] 135; Amend. (Mr. Black), 150*; Amend. withdrawn, 152
Education, Public (Ireland), [151] 1204, 1237
Embassies and Missions Abroad, [151] 1270; Amend. (Mr. Wise), [A. 55, N. 85, M. 30] 1274; 2nd Amend. [A. 69, N. 81, M. 12] 1275
Embassy Houses Abroad, [150] 1120;—at Paris, [151] 1438, [A. 113, N. 51, M. 62] 1441
Emigration Board, [151] 1270
Exchequer Bills, [149] 1227
Exchequer Bonds, [149] 1338
Exchequer, Comptroller General of the, [150] 1131
Factories, Inspectors of, [150] 1250
Falkland Islands, [151] 1268
Fisheries, Board of, (Scotland), [151] 1417; Amend. (Mr. White), [A. 58, N. 119, M. 61] 1418
Foreign and Secret Services, [150] 1263
Four Courts Extension (Dublin), [151] 1425
Friendly Societies, Registrars of, [150] 1263
Furniture for Public Departments, [150] 1113
Geographical Society, [151] 1268
Harbours of Refuge, [150] 1120; Amend. (Mr. Baxter), 1124; Amend. withdrawn, 1126
Havelock's, Sir H., Statue, [151] 1442
Health, Board of, Amend. (Mr. T. Duncombe) [151] 1281; Amend. and Motion withdrawn, 1282, 1444
Heligoland, [151] 1268
Highland Roads and Bridges, [151] 1418, [A. 118, N. 73, M. 45] 1419
Holyhead Harbour, [150] 1126
Hong Kong, [151] 1269
Inclosure and Drainage Acts, [150] 1262
Incumbered Estates Commission (Ireland) [151] 1402
Indian Department in Canada, [151] 1268
Industrial Museum (Edinburgh), [151] 1425
Infirmaries and Hospitals (Ireland), [151] 1276
Inland Revenue Department, [149] 227; [151] 1280
Insolvent Debtors' Court, [150] 1472
Joint-Stock Companies, Registration of, [151] 1420
Kafirs, Improvement of the, [151] 1420; [A. 177, N. 30, M. 147] 1422
Kingstown Harbour, [150] 1128
Labuan, [151] 1268
Law Charges, [150] 1466
Laws and Institutes, Ancient, (Ireland), Publication of, [151] 1419
Lighthouses abroad, [151] 1420
Lord Lieutenant (Ireland), Officers of the, [150] 1252; Amend. (Mr. Wise), 1253; Amend. withdrawn, 1254; 2nd Amend. [A. 42, N. 88, M. 46] ib.

[cont

Supply—cont.

Lord Lieutenant (Ireland), Secretary to the, Amend. (Mr. Baxter), [150] 1254, [A. 55, N. 151, M. 96] 1259; Amend. (Mr. W. Williams), [A. 68, N. 148, M. 80] ib.
Lunacy, Commissioners in, [150] 1262; Amend. (Mr. Baxter), 1263; Amend. neg., ib.
Lunatic Asylums, Inspectors of, (Ireland), [150] 1259
Magnetic Observations abroad, [151] 1268
Manufacturers, Board of (Scotland), [151] 1418
Merchant Service, Pensions, [151] 1420
Mint, The, [150] 1250
Miscellaneous Allowances, [151] 1276
Mixed Commissions, [151] 1345
National Debt Office, [150] 1262
National Gallery, [151] 1268; Report, 1380; Amend. (Lord Elcho), 1390, [o. q. A. 110, N. 128, M. 18] 1391
National Gallery (Dublin), [151] 1425
Navy Estimates, [149] 110, 878; Amend. (Mr. W. Williams), 882, [o. q. A. 161, N. 24, M. 137] 883, 1227; Amend. (Sir C. Napier), 1229; Motion neg. 1230, 1338, 1627; Amend. (Mr. Briscoe), [A. 26, N. 224, M. 198] 1643; Adj. moved (Mr. W. Williams), 1649, [r. p. A. 36, N. 163, M. 127] 1650
Nelson Column, [151] 1425
Newhaven Harbour, [151] 1443
Nonconforming, &c., Ministers (Ireland), [151] 1277; Amend. (Mr. Baxter), 1278, [A. 55, N. 165, M. 110] 1280; Amend. (Mr. Gilpin), [A. 69, N. 147, M. 78] 1280
North American (British) Expedition, [151] 1444
North American Provinces, [151] 1268
Orange River Territory, [151] 1420
Palaces, Royal, [150] 1111
Parks, Royal, [150] 1115; Report, 1201
Parliament, New Houses of, [150] 1117; Report, 1201
Patent Law Amendment Fees, &c., [151] 1412; Amend. (Mr. W. Williams), 1413; Amend. neg. 1415; Amend. (Mr. A. Smith), 1416; Amend. withdrawn, ib.
Paymaster Civil Service (Ireland), [150] 1259
Paymaster General, [150] 1131
Police (Counties and Boroughs and Police in Scotland), [150] 1471
Police Courts (Metropolis), [150] 1486; Amend. (Mr. Hadfield), 1487; Amend. withdrawn, 1488
Police, Metropolitan, [150] 1488, [A. 157, N. 28, M. 129] 1491
Polish Refugees, [151] 1275
Poor Law Board, Amend. (Mr. M'Mahon), [150] 1133; Amend. withdrawn, 1134; 2nd. Amend.. [A. 10, N. 80, M. 70] 1137
Port Patrick Harbour, [150] 1127
Portraits, Gallery of, [151] 1422
Postage of Letters, [150] 1267
Post Office, [149] 227; [151] 1281
Printing, Houses of Parliament, [150] 1263
Privy Council Office, [150] 1129
Privy Seal, Lord, [150] 1129, [A. 71, N. 31, M. 40] 1131
Probate Court and District Registries, [150] 1120
Probate, Court of, and Divorce and Matrimonial Causes, [150] 1473; [151] 1438

[cont.

Supply—cont.

Process Servers (Ireland), [151] 1420
Prosecutions, [150] 1466; Report, 1583
Public Buildings, [150] 1111
Public Works (Ireland), [150] 1128
Quarantine Arrangements, [151] 1420
Queen's College (Ireland), [151] 1237
Queen's Prison, [150] 1491
Queen's, &c. Remembrancer (Scotland), [150] 1250; Amend. (Mr. Wise), 1251, [A. 44, N. 70, M. 26] 1252
Queen's University (Ireland), [151] 1237
Reciprocity, Treaties of, [151] 1420
Records, Public [150] 1133; [151] 1425
Refuge for the Destitute, [151] 1275
Register House, General, Edinburgh, [150] 1494; Amend. (Mr. Cowan), 1495; Observations (Sir G. Grey), 1518; (Mr. Cowan), 1553; Report, 1585; [151] 1425, 1483; Amend. (Mr. Crawford), 1636; Amend withdrawn, 1639
Register Office, (Dublin), [150] 1262
Registrar General, Edinburgh, [150] 1262
Registrar of Admiralty, and Admiralty Court, Dublin, [150] 1472
Registry General Office, [150] 1262
Retired Officers of the Houses of Parliament, [150] 1128
Revising Barristers, England and Wales, [151] 1420
Roads, South Wales, Superintendent of County, [150] 1263
Royal Dublin Society, [151] 1425
Royal Institution (Edinburgh) [151] 1425
Royal Society, [151] 1268
Science and Art, Department of, [151] 1172; Amend. (Mr. Blake), 1174; Amend. withdrawn, 1181, 1201; Report, 1266
Seamen, Distressed British abroad [151] 1420
Secretaries of State, [150] 1129
Sheriffs, &c., [150] 1471
Slave Bounties, [151] 1419; Report, 1436
Superannuations, [149] 227; [151] 1275, 1281
Survey of the United Kingdom, [151] 1483
Theological Professors (Belfast), Amend. (Mr. Crossley), [151] 1240, [A. 34, N. 122, M. 88] 1241
Toulonese and Corsican Emigrants, [151] 1275
Transportation, [150] 1503
Treasury, [150] 1129
Treasury Chest, [151] 1422
Universities, Scottish, [151] 1237
University of London, [151] 1237
University, Queen's (Ireland), [151] 1237
Vaccine Establishment, National, [151] 1275
War Office, Addition to, [150] 1120
Wellington Monument, [151] 1483
West India Colonies and Mauritius, [151] 1268
West India Islands Relief Commission, [150] 1262
West Indies, &c., [151] 1268
Western Australia, [151] 1270
Westminster, New Bridge at, [151] 1437
Windsor Castle [151] 1438
Woods, Office of, [150] 1133
Works, Office of, [150] 1131
Works, Public, (Ireland), [150] 1261
Works, Public Loan, Commission, [150] 1262

Surat—The Nawab's Debts, c. Question (Mr Collier), [151] 40

Survey for the United Kingdom—Supply, c. [151] 1483

SYKES, Colonel W. H., Aberdeen City
Army Estimates, [146] 137
"Austria," The Steam Ship, Report moved for, [148] 682
Cadetships, East Indian, Return moved for, [148] 803, 804
Commerce, Tribunals of, Com. moved for, [149] 1156
County Franchise (Scotland), Leave, [150] 211
County Voters, Registration of, (Scotland), Leave, [149] 1405
East India Loan, Leave, [148] 799; Consid. 16; add. cl. [149] 154
Enfield Rifle, The, [151] 605
Havelock's, Sir H., Pension, [148] 571
India, Government of (No. 1), Leave, Adj. moved, [148] 1457, 1607
India, Government of (No. 2), Leave, [149] 838
India, Government of, Com. moved for, 1687; Res. 1, 2079; Res. 2, [149] 2200; Res. 3, (4), [150] 1660; Adj. moved, 1681, 1688; 5, (6), 20, 62; Res. 6, (7), 2248, 2251
India, Government of (No. 3), 2R. [151] 365, 366; Com. cl. 3, 451, 457; cl. 8, 772; cl. 13, 860; cl. 19, 883; cl. 20, 886; cl. 27, 891; cl. 48, 906; cl. 34, 933, 934; cl. 35, 939; Lords' Amends. Amend. 2171; cl. 27, 2186; cl. 35, 2205, 2323, 2338
India—Vote of Thanks to the Army, &c., [148] 905; Amended Res. [149] 257;—Colonisation of, Com. moved for, 280;—Mutiny in, Papers moved for, 374
Lands, Valuation of, (Scotland), Act Amendment, 2R. [149] 667
Metropolis Local Management Act Amendment, Leave, [151] 1536
Mutiny, 3R. [149] 465
Oude, Annexation of, Papers moved for, [148] 1534; Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Res. [150] 728, 1033
Stamp Duty on Drafts, 2R. [149] 2175; Com. cl. 2, [150] 291
Supply—Furniture for Public Departments, [150] 1114, 1115;—Royal Parks, 1117;—New Houses of Parliament, 1119;—Harbours of Refuge, 1124;—Embassies and Missions abroad, [151] 1272
Universities (Scotland), [149] 857; Leave, 1548; 2R. [150] 1886; Com. cl. 1, Amend. [151] 395, 412; cl. 4, 414, 510; cl. 10, 520; cl. 13, 731; cl. 14, 738; cl. 15, Amend. 746, 747; Consid. Amend. 945; cl. 16, 962; 3R. 1050

TALBOT DE MALAHIDE, Lord
Poisons, Sale of, [149] 319; Consid. [151] 913

Tay Fisheries Bill,
c. 1R.* [148] 757

TAYLOR, Colonel T. E., Dublin Co.
Mortality in the Guards, Report moved for, [148] 1646

Telegraph through Austria,
c. Question (Mr. Crawford), [148] 137;—The Mediterranean, Question (Mr. Crawford), [cont.

Telegraph—cont.
[149] 983;—Constantinople and Bassorah, Correspondence moved for, (Sir H. Rawlinson), 1168;—Submarine, Question (Lord C. Paget), [150] 1732;—To India, Question (Mr. Brady), [151] 1283

Telegraphic Communication with Europe and America,
l. Correspondence moved for, (Earl Grey), [149] 1575;—see Atlantic Telegraph Company's Bill—"Leviathan," The TEMPEST, Lord A. F. VANE, Durham, N.

Army Promotion—Warrant of 1854, [151] 754, 1788
Coal Trade, The, [148] 1869
Durham, Church Patronage in the See of, [150] 1855, 1856
Ellenborough, Lord, Resignation of, [150] 524
Galway Freemen Disfranchisement, 2R. [149] 786
Harbours of Refuge, Commission moved for, [151] 2144
India, Government of, Com. Res. 3, [150] 1688; Res. 6, 2250, 2251
India, Government of (No. 3), Com. cl. 3, [151] 460; cl. 9, Amend. 774; cl. 10, 775
India, Transport of Troops to, Com. moved for, [148] 737
Jenner, Dr., Statue of, [150] 274
Land Transport Corps, Com. moved for, [149] 1621, 1627; [151] 2126
Military Academy—Competitive Examinations, Address moved, [149] 1738
Military Organization, Res. [150] 1341
Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, [150] 426; Res. 723, 862, 863

Tenant Right (Ireland),
l. Question (Marquess of Clanricarde), [151] 913
c. Com. moved for, (Mr. Greer), [150] 181, [A. 43, N. 232, M. 189] 195

Tenants' Compensation (Ireland) Bill,
c. 1R.* [148] 1470;
2R. 1046; Amend. (Sir J. Walsh), 1081; Adj. moved (Mr. Deasy), [149] 1097; Adj. Debate, [150] 1802, [o. q. A. 65, N. 200, M. 135] 1828

Tenants for Life, Trustees, &c., Bill,
l. 1R.* [149] 163;
2R. 559

Thames, State of the,
l. Question (Duke of Buccleuch), [151] 380; Observations (Lord Ravensworth), 472
c. Question (Mr. Adderley), [148] 161; (Mr. Griffith), [150] 1063, 1534; (Mr. Brady), 1921; (Mr. Mangles), 2113; [151] 27; (Mr. O. Stanley), 421; Res. (Mr. Roupell), 572; Res. withdrawn, 574; Question (Mr. H. Berkeley), 874; Res. (Mr. Cox), 1165; Motion neg. 1171

THESIGER, Sir F., Stamford
Oaths, Leave, [148] 473, 489; 2R. 1084;—see also CHANCELLOR, the LORD (LORD CHELMSFORD)]

Thibet,
c. Question (Mr. W. Ewart), [149] 1180

THOMPSON, Major Gen. T. P., Bradford
Ballot, Leave, [150] 1756
Church Rates Abolition, 2R. [148] 1599
Churches and Churchyards, Com. moved for, [149] 1857
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Com. cl. 1, [151] 1594 ; Consid. cl. 1, 2031
Galway Freemen Disfranchisement, Com. [151] 598
India, Government of (No. 3), Lords' Amends. [151] 2184
India—Votes of Thanks to the Army, &c. [148] 929;—Mutiny in, Papers moved for, [149] 356
Marriage Law Amendment, Com. cl. 1, [151] 676, 677
Negroes, Enlistment of, Papers moved for, [149] 1045
Oude, Annexation of, Papers moved for, [148] 1539, 1543
Slave Trade — Right of Search, Res. [151] 1343
Thames, State of the, Res. [151] 1166

TITE, Mr. W., Bath
Army Estimates, [150] 395, 397
Bank Acts Committee, Nomination of Com., [148] 965
Lunatics under the Court of Chancery, Com. moved for, [151] 214, 220
Metropolis Local Management Act Amendment, Leave, [151] 1533 ; Com. cl. 1, 1942 ; cl. 4, 1949 ; cl. 17, 1955
Netley Hospital [149] 1174 ; [151] 56
Offices, New Government, [148] 1165
Supply — Furniture for Public Departments [150] 1113, 1114;—New Houses of Parliament, 1118 ; — Office of Works, 1132 ;—General Register House, Edinburgh, 1497 ;—British Museum, 1574
Thames, State of the, [151] 426 ; Res. 575

Toulonese and Corsican Emigrants—Supply,
c. [151] 1275

Tower Hamlets Militia,
c. Question (Mr. T. Duncombe), [151] 1699

Tower, Norman Chapel in the,
c. Question (Mr. B. Hope), [151] 1184

TOWNSEND, Mr. J., Greenwich
Explanation, [150] 2099
India—Vote of Thanks to the Army, &c. [148] 930
Navy Estimates, [149] 123, 128
Poor Rates (Metropolis), Leave, [149] 646

Townsend, Mr., Case of,
c. Papers moved for (Mr. FitzRoy), [150], 1857 ; Motion, 2098

Trade Marks, Printing of,
c. Question (Mr. Roebuck), [151] 1199

Transfer of Estates Simplification Bill,
l. 1R.* [148] 447 ; 2R.* 967 ; Com. [149] 232 ; Report, 850

Transfer of Real Estate Bill,
l. 1R.* [149] 556 ; Bill withdrawn, [151] 264

Transport Department,
c. Observations (Mr. Lindsay), [149] 846

Transportation—Supply,
c. [150] 1503

Treasure Trove Bill,
l. 1R.* [151] 910

Treasury—Supply,
c. [150] 1129

Treasury Chest—Supply,
c. [151] 1422

TRELAWNY, Sir J. S., Tavistock
Army Estimates, [149] 135, 225 ; [150] 373, 387
Bank Issues Indemnity, Com. cl. 2, [148] 403
Church Rates Abolition, [148] 678 ; 2R. 1553, 1569, 1582 ; Com. [149] 1424 ; cl. 1, 1457, 1458, 1466, 1472, 1586, 1800 ; [150] 557 ; cl. 3, 570 ; add. cl. 571, 572 ; 3R. 1402, 1706 ;—Observations, [151] 1187
Church Rates Amendment, [149] 1870
Churches and Churchyards, Com. moved for, [149] 1858
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Consid. cl. 1, [151] 2029 ; That the Bill do pass, 2124
New Zealand, [149] 1354 ; [150] 354, 362
Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, [150] 427
Remuneration, Acceptance of, by Members of Parliament, [149] 573 ; Res. 1019, 1040
Supply—Metropolitan Police, [150] 1490 ;—British Museum, 1571, 1572, 1574 ;—Register House, Edinburgh, Adj. moved, 1585, 1586 ;—Board of Fisheries (Scotland), [151] 1417 ;—Improvement of the Kafirs, Amend. 1420

Trinity College, (Dublin),
c. Question (Mr. Fagan), [151] 753

TROLLOPE, Right Hon. Sir J., Lincolnshire, S.
Assessed and Income Taxes, Res. [151] 211
Hainault Allotment, Res. [151] 622
New Trial in Criminal Cases, 2R. [151] 1060

TRURO, Lord
Bankruptcy and Insolvency, [151] 1070
Slave Trade, [151] 1146

Trustees and Executors,
c. Question (Mr. Roebuck), [151] 2302

Trustees, Mortgagees, &c., Bill,
l. 3R.* [150] 761
c. 1R.* [150] 2098

Trustees Relief Bill,
l. 1R.* [148] 447; 2R.* 967;
Com. cl. 3, [149] 231; cl. struck out, 232;
3R.* 445
c. 1R.* [149] 652; 2R.* 857;
Question (Mr. Hadfield), [151] 1284

Tuam—Romish Processions in,
c. Question (Sir W. Verner), [150] 2018

Turin, British Envoy at,
c. Question (Mr. Wise), [149] 985

Turkey, Commercial Relations with,
c. Question (Mr. Hadfield), [150] 179

Turkish Medals for the Army, &c.
c. Question (Colonel North), [148] 358, 976; (Mr. B. Osborne), [151] 1606

TURNER, Mr. J. A., Manchester
Agricultural Statistics, 2R. [149] 1895
India, Colonisation of, Com. moved for, [149] 291
Man, Isle of, [151] 1284
Manchester Court of Bankruptcy, Commissioner of the, [151] 2032
Masters and Workmen, 2R. [150] 533
Partnerships, Registration of, Leave, [149] 1553
Stamp Duty on Drafts, 2R. [149] 2174
Western Bank of Scotland) [149] 1219

Turnpike Acts Continuance Bill,
c. 1R.* [151] 1369; 2R.* 1481; 3R.* 1699
l. 1R.* [151] 1773; 2R.* 1865; 3R.* 2077
Royal Assent, 2369

Turnpike Road Offences Bill,
l. 1R.* [149] 305

Turnpike System, Abolition of the,
c. Question (Mr. Western), [149] 324

Turnpike Tolls (Metropolis),
c. Commission moved for (Mr. Byng), [150] 495; Answer to Address, 763

Turnpike Trusts Arrangements Bill,
c. 1R.* [151] 1266; 2R.* 1369; 3R.* 1590
l. 1R.* [151] 1655; 2R.* 1773; 3R.* 1906
Royal Assent, 2369

Turnpikes, Metropolitan,
c. Question (Mr. Byng), [148] 1169

United States, Differences with the—Captain Judkins,
l. Question (Earl of Clarendon), [150] 1701
c. Question (Mr. Lindsay), [150] 1248, 1312, (Mr. Horsfall), 1532, 1945, — see Slave Trade

Universities (Scotland) Bill,
c. Leave, [149] 1544; 1R* 1550;
2R. [150] 1881; Amend. (Mr. Black), 1884;
Amend. withdrawn, 1910;
151] Com. cl. 1, 395; Amend. (Col. Sykes), 397, [o. q. A. 125, N. 90, M. 35] 412;
· cl. 2, Amend. (Mr. E. P. Bouverie), 413;
· cl. 3, 413;
· cl. 4, Amend. (Mr. Blackburn), 414; Amend. withdrawn, ib.; Amend. (Mr. Dunlop), 507, [o. q. A. 85, N. 22, M. 63], 510; Amend. (Mr. Cowan), ib.; Amend. neg. 511; Amend. (Mr. Black), [A. 22, N. 78, M. 56] ib.; Proviso (Mr. Blackburn), ib.; Amend. neg. 512; Amend. (Mr. Dunlop), ib.; Amend. (Mr. E. P. Bouverie), 513; Amend. neg. 515;
. cl. 7, Amend. (Mr. Dunlop), 515; Amend. (Mr. Blackburn), ib., [A. 38, N. 90, M. 61] 517;
. cl. 10, Amend. (Mr. Black), 517; Amend. withdrawn, 519; Amend. (Mr. Walpole), [A. 118, N. 35, M. 83] 520;
. cl. 13, 520; Amend. (Mr. E. P. Bouverie), 521, 730; Amend. withdrawn, 735; Amend. (Sir W. Dunbar), ib.;
. cl. 14, 737;
. cl. 15, Amend. (Mr. E. P. Bouverie), 738; Amend. withdrawn, 743; 2nd. Amend. ib.; Amend. neg. 746; Amend. (Col. Sykes), ib.; Amend. neg. 747;
. cl. 19, 747; Amend. (Mr. Baxter), 748, [A. 94, N. 102, M. 8] 752; [m. q. A. 125, N. 76, M. 49] ib.;
· Consid. Amend. (Col. Sykes), 945; Amend. neg. 949;
. add. cl. (Sir W. Dunbar), 949; cl. neg. 951;
. add. cl. (Mr. Dunlop), 951, [A. 82, N. 58, M. 24] 955; 2nd. add. cl. ib.;
. cl. 7, Amend. (Mr. Buchanan), 957; Amend. neg. 958;
. cl. 14, Amend. (Mr. Caird), 958; Amend. (Mr. Black), 961; Amend. neg. ib.;
. add. cl. (Mr. Gladstone), 961;
. cl. 16, Amend. (Col. Sykes), 962, [A. 47, N. 142, M. 95] 963;
. cl. 19, Amend. (Mr. Baxter), 963, [A. 102, N. 118, M. 16] 968;
· 3R. 1050
151] l. 1R. 1076;
· 2R. 1354;
· Com. cl. 1, 1667; Amend. (Earl of Airlie), 1671; Amend. neg. 1676;
· cl. 3, Amend. (Lord Belhaven), 1676;
· cl. 12, Amend. (Earl Granville), 1677; Amend. neg. 1678;
· cl. 15, 1678;
· cl. 21, Proviso, (The Lord Chancellor), 1679;
· 3R.* 1906
151] c. Lords' Amends. 2128; Amend. (Mr. Dunlop), 2131, 2nd. Amend. 2136
151] l. Commons' Reasons, 2243
· Royal Assent, 2369

University of London—Supply,
c. [151] 1237

Vacating of Seats,
c. Leave, [A. 91, N. 108, M. 17] [148] 1544

Vaccination—Small Pox,
c. Question (Mr. Monsell), [150] 287, 1196

Vaccine Establishment—Supply,
c. [151] 1275

Vaccination (Ireland) Bill,
c. 1R.* [150] 1308; 2R.* 1601; 3R.* [151] 1699
l. 1R.* [151] 1773; 2R.* 1865; 3R.* 2077
Royal Assent, 2369

VANCE, Mr. J., Dublin City
Bank Issues Indemnity, 3R. [148] 434
Canada, Mercantile Law in, [149] 2118
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Com. cl. 1, [151] 1591
Dublin, Affray at, [149] 574; Report moved for, 694
Dublin Metropolitan Police, Com. moved for, [148] 1477
Dublin Port Dues, Com. moved for, [149] 1356, 1364
Incumbered Estates Court (Ireland), [149] 439
India, Government of, (No. 2), Leave, [149] 838
Lancashire and Yorkshire, &c. Railway Companies, Consid. [150] 1705
Land, Sale and Transfer of, (Ireland), Com. cl. 38; [151] 64; cl. 87, Amend. 968, 971; Consid. 1145
Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Res. [149] 756
Police Force (Ireland), Leave, [150] 2156; Com. [151] 1133, 1144
Reformatory Schools (Ireland), Com. cl. 3, [151] 1067, 1068; cl. 7, 1433
Secretary, The Irish, Office of the, [150] 1464
Supply — Royal Hibernian Academy, [151] 1239; — Four Courts Extension (Dublin), 1425

VANE, Lord H. G., Durham, S.
Church Rates Abolition, Com. [149] 1446
Conspiracy to Murder, 2R. [148] 1786
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Com. [151] 1486; cl. 1, 1495, 1592; That the Bill do pass, 2124
Harbours of Refuge—Commission moved for, [151] 2149
India, Government of, Com. Amend. [149] 2016
India—Vote of Thanks to the Army, &c., [148] 924
Oaths, That Baron de Rothschild be a Member of the Committee, [150] 353
Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Res. [150] 1038
Supply—Newhaven Harbour, [151] 1444

VANSITTART, Mr. G. H. Berkshire
India, Government of (No. 3), Consid. add. cl. [151] 1031
Kroomen, Enlistment of, [149] 815
Military Academy—Competitive Examinations, Address moved, [149] 1738

VANSITTART, Mr. W., Windsor
Cambridge University Commission, Chairmanship of the, [151] 1370
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Consid. add. cl. [151] 1966, 2024

VANSITTART, Mr. W.—cont.
India, Government of (No. 1), Leave, [148] 1316
India, Government of (No. 3), Com. cl. 8, [151] 767; Consid. add. cl. 1038
India—Troops for, [148] 355; Com. moved for, 736;—Vote of Thanks to the Army, &c., 929;—Mutiny in, Papers moved for, [149] 359;—Despatches from, [150] 929
Oude, European Regiments in, [150] 427

"Varna,' Loss of the,
c. Question (Mr. Robertson), [151] 1369

VERNER, Sir W., Armagh Co.
Tuam, Romish Processions in, [150] 2018

VERNEY, Sir H., Buckingham
Aldershot, Military Hospital, &c. at, [151] 2190
Army Estimates, [150] 393, 397
Army, Sanitary Condition of the, Res. [150] 485
Green Park, Improvements in the, [149] 1192
Havelock, Sir H., Annuity to, 2R. [148] 509
Hindoo Shrines, Returns moved for, [148] 805
India, Government of (No. 2), Leave, [149] 845
India, Government of, Com. moved for, [149] 1691; Res. 2, 2188; [150] 314; Res. 6, 2249
India—Honorary Distinctions for Service in, [149] 1990

Victoria Station and Pimlico Railway Bill,
l. That Counsel be heard against the Bill (Earl of Donoughmore), [151] 586; Adj. Debate, 691; Order discharged, 693; Standing Order dispensed with, [Contents 63, Not-Contents 48, M. 15] 798

VIVIAN, Hon. Captain, J. C. W., Bodmin
"Abeona," The, [149] 1193
Army—Clothing for the, [151] 1283
Army Estimates, [149] 1250, 1251
Commissions, Sale of, [151] 416
Derby Day, Adjournment over the, [150] 865
Estimates, The, [149] 1602
India—Cavalry Reinforcement, for [148] 861;—Vote of Thanks to the Army, &c., Amended Res. [149] 277
"Lasso," Use of the, by the Cavalry, [150] 1061
Military Academy—Competitive Examinations, Address moved, [149] 1740
Military Organization, Res. [150] 1328, 1341, 1358; [151] 550, 568
Navy Estimates, [149] 1346
Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Res. [150] 969, 1038

VIVIAN, Mr. H. H., Glamorganshire
Woolwich, Gun Foundry at, [151] 1080

Voter's Travelling Expenses,
c. Papers moved for (Mr. Pease), [150] 216

Wages, Rate of.
c. Question (General Codrington) [148] 1869

WALCOTT, Rear Adm. J, E., Christchurch
Harbours of Refuge, Commission moved for, [151] 2149
Havelock, Major General, Provision for, [148] 393
India—Vote of Thanks to the Army, [148] 911
Jews, 3R. [151] 1901
Navy Estimates, [149] 120, 128, 927, 1231, 1232, 1628, 1630, 1647, 1648
Navy, Manning the, Com. moved for, [150] 896
Nelson Monument, The, [149] 1220
Peel, Sir W., Death of, [150] 1328
Piers and Harbours, 2R. [151] 253

WALDRON, Mr. L., Tipperary Co.
Tenants' Compensation (Ireland), 2R. [150] 1809

Walewski's Count, Letter and the "Moniteur,"
c. Question (Mr. Griffith), [148] 1470

WALPOLE, Rt. Hon. S. H. (†Secretary of State for the Home Department, Cambridge University
†Aggravated Assaults Act, [151] 10
Ali Moorad's Claim—Mr. Butt, [148] 1731; Com. moved for, 1866, 1867
†Allowances to Witnesses at Sessions, &c. [151] 311
†Ascension Day, [150] 496
†Ballot, Leave, [150] 1785
†Barber's, W. H., Com. That Viscount Goderich be discharged attendance, [151] 975
†Beer Houses, [149] 1989
†Bernard, Dr., Case of, [149] 1491
†Bishops, Retirement of, [151] 606
†Breach of Privilege—Washington Wilks, [150] 1405
†British Bank, The Royal, Return moved for, [149] 397; [150] 1404
†Business of the House, [149] 79; Res. 1986, 1987; [151] 604, 605
†"Cagliari," Case of the, [150] 283
†Cashel Election—Petition, [149] 161, 246, 248
†Charitable Trusts Acts Continuance, Com. [151] 1549
†Church Leases, [149] 812
†Church Rates Abolition, 3R. [150] 1719
†Church Rates Amendment, [149] 1871
†Church Services, Address moved [151] 1393
†Churches and Churchyards, Com. moved for, [149] 1863
†Circuits, Redistribution of, [149] 814
†Civil Bills, &c., (Ireland), 2R. [151] 1430, 1431, 1544; Com. cl. 2, 1771
†Confessional in Belgravia, [151] 27
Conspiracy to Murder, 2R. [148] 1761, 1789
†Convict Children, [151] 1610
†Corrupt Practices Prevention, [149] 1797; [151] 176; Com. 1484, 1487; cl. 1, 1490, 1496; Amend. 1497, 1498, 1595, 1599; Proviso, 1600; cl. 2, 1604; Consid. 1965, 1966; add. cl. 1967, 2021, 2024, 2025; cl. 1, 2030, 2065, 2066, 2067; 3R. 2122, 2123
†Cruelty to Animals, 2R. Amend. [149] 1556
†Divorce Acts, [151] 1931
†East, Events in the, [151] 1933
†East India Loan, Com. [151] 1874, 1877
†Ecclesiastical Commission, Bill put off, [151] 2127
†Election Committees Scrutiny, 2R. [151] 249

[cont.

WALPOLE, Rt. Hon. S. H.—cont.
†Endowed Schools (Ireland), [149] 461; Papers moved for, 782
†Firework Explosion, The, [151] 1499, 1933
†Furber v. Sturmey, [151] 415
†Galway Freemen Disfranchisement, Leave, [149] 393; 2R. 785; Com. Instruction 1406, 1413, 1422: [151] 593; cl. 1, 600
†Gas, Supply of, Com. moved for, [150] 321
†Government Property—Exemption from Rates, Com. moved for, [150] 1799
†Harbours of Refuge—Her Majesty's Reply to Address, [151] 2377
†Health, Public, Act Amendment (1848), 2R. [149] 444
†Health, Public, Com. cl. 4, [150] 2284; Consid. add. cl. [151] 1655; Lords' Amends. 2277
†Highways, [149] 2015
†Incumbered Estates Court (Ireland), [149] 440
†India, Colonisation of, Com. moved for, [149] 292
†India, Government of (No. 2), [149] 867
†India, Government of, Com. moved for, [149] 1707; Res. 4, (5), [150] 318, 320; Res. 6, (7), 2229
†India, Government of (No. 3), Lords' Amends. cl. 32, [151] 2199
India—Vote of Thanks to the Army, &c., [148] 908
†Italian National League, [149] 462
†James, Mr. Edwin, [149] 2011
†Jersey, Laws of, [150] 1308
†Jews, 2R. [151] 1631; 3R. 1864
†Joint-Stock Banking Companies, 2R. [149] 1920; Com. [150] 1504
†Justice, Administration of, Com. moved for, [149] 1805
†Lancaster, Duchy of—Mining Operations, Com. moved for, [150] 451
†Land, Sale and Transfer of (Ireland), Leave, [150] 43; Com. [151] 471; cl. 87, 971; cl. 88, 973
†Land, Titles to (Scotland), [151] 1505
†Land, Transfer of, 2R. [150] 2286
†Local Government, 2R. [149] 2096; Com. cl. 66, [151] 1077
†London Corporation Reform, [149] 249; [151] 607
†London Corporation Regulation, Nomination of Com. [149] 399; Motion for Counsel, 1748; Com. [151] 298, 305
†Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Res. [149] 769
†Lunacy Commission (Ireland), [151] 2037
†Lunatic Asylum, Protracted Confinement in a, [151] 1930
†Magisterial Appointments, [150] 263; Return moved for, 322
†Marriage Law Amendment, Com. cl. 1, [151] 671; cl. 2, 683
†Masters and Workmen, Leave, [149] 1815; 2R. [150] 531
†Maynooth College, Com. moved for, [149] 1999
†Medical Practitioners, Leave, [149] 651; Com. [150] 1410, 1411, 1417; [151] 996; cl. 3, 998; cl. 15, ib.; cl. 45, 999
†Medical Profession and Medical Corporation, 2R. [150] 1421
†Metropolis Local Management Act Amendment, Leave, [151] 1518; Com. 1928
†Military Academy—Competitive Examinations, Address moved, [149] 1739

[cont.

WALPOLE, Rt. Hon. S. H.—cont.
†Militia, The, [149] 2011
†Municipal Elections, [151] 1000, 2124
†New Caledonia, (British Colombia), Government of, Consid. [151] 1430
†New Trial in Criminal Cases, 2R. [151] 1052; Com. 1063
Oaths, 2R. [148] 1091, 1096; Com. [149] 298; Consid. 468, 490, 519, 534, 546; That Baron de Rothschild be a Member of the Committee [150] 350; Lords' Amends. [151] 1904
†Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Res. [150] 776
†Papers, Delivery of, Presented by Command, [151] 415
†Parochial Registration, [149] 462
†Piers and Harbours, 2R. [151] 253
†Poisons, Sale of, [151] 1446, 1610
†Police Force (Ireland), 2R. [151] 1549
†Probate Court, The, [150] 259; [151] 1931
†Probates and Letters of Administration, Com. [151] 2071; cl. 5, 2072
†Property Qualification, 2R. [150] 226; Com. cl. 1, 1432, 1435
†Public Entertainment, Licensing Places of, [149] 460
†Public Grounds and Playgrounds, Leave, [150] 886
†Real Property Commissioners, [149] 1264
†Reformatory Schools (Ireland), Com. cl. 15, [151] 1434
†Registers, Non-Parochial, Com. cl. 3, [150] 576
†Registrars, Superintendent, [151] 871
†Rewards to Members, Res. [149] 1035
†Roads (Scotland), Leave, [149] 159
†Roads (Scotland), Commission moved for, [151] 1160
†Rothschild, Baron de, Admission of, Res. [151] 2107, 2110
†St. James's Park, [150] 1852
†St. John's College, Oxford, [151] 1080
†Septennial Act, Leave, [149] 1369
†Sheerness, Dead Body at, [151] 1906
†Sheriffs (Scotland), [151] 2190
†Stanhope and Wolsingham Rectories, Com. [150] 2285
†Supply—Printing, &c., Houses of Parliament, [150] 1266;—Prosecutions, 1470;—Sheriffs, &c., 1472;—Insolvent Debtors' Court, 1472, 1473;—Courts of Probate, &c., 1474;—County Courts, 1478;—Metropolitan Police, 1489, 1490;—General Registry House, Edinburgh, 1501, 1534; Public Education (Ireland), [151] 1228, 1230;—General Board of Health, 1282;—Ecclesiastical Commissioners, 1399;—Patent Law Fees, &c., 1413
†Turnpike System, Abolition of the, [149] 324
†United States, Difference with the, [150] 1249
†Universities (Scotland), Com. cl. 2, [151] 413; cl. 7, 517; cl. 10; Amend. 519; cl. 15, 738, 745; Lords' Amends. 2134, 2137
†Voters' Travelling Expenses, Papers moved for, [150] 218
†Weedon Establishment, Commission moved for, [150] 1799; [150] 254
†Weights and Measures, [151] 2274, 2373
†Wills, Calendars of, [151] 1082

WALSH, Sir J. B., Radnorshire
Army, Government of the, [150] 1447
Conspiracy to Murder, Leave, [148] 952, 961
India, Government of, Leave, [148] 1440
Justice, Administration of, Com. moved for, [149] 1813
Real Property, &c.—Probate Duty, Res. [150] 872
Tenants' Compensation (Ireland), 2R. Amend. [149] 1068, 1074, 1083, 1089

WALTER, Mr. J., Nottingham
Oaths, Leave, [148] 491
Passport System in France, Correspondence moved for, [149] 586

War Department,
c. Question (Colonel French), [151] 2125;—Accounts of the, Observation (Mr. Macartney), 2357

War Office, Addition to—Supply,
c. [150] 1120

WARRE, Mr. J. A., Ripon
Budget, The—Financial Statement, [149] 1303
Navy Estimates, [149] 1343
Navy, Manning the, Com. moved for, [150] 910
Slave Trade—Relations with the United States, [151] 55

WARREN, Mr. S., Midhurst
Ashburnham, General, [148] 862
Attorney General, The late, and the Law Lords, [149] 13, 14
Barrack Masters, [150] 1449
Breach of Privilege—Washington Wilks, [150] 1067, 1068
Chancery Amendment, Com. [149] 2204, 2205
Circuits, Redistribution of, [149] 814
Common Law Commissioners' Report, [148] 458
Conspiracy to Murder, Leave, [148] 981, 999
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Consid. add. cl [151] 2022; cl. 1, 2031, 2066
Election Committees, Scrutiny, 2R. Amend. [151] 245
Foreign Conspirators in England, [148] 1262, 1264
Galway Freemen Disfranchisement, Com. [151] 597
India, Government of (No. 3), Com. cl. 11, [151] 783; Lords' Amends. 2181
India, Telegrams from, [148] 557
Jews, 3R. [151] 1864; Amend. 1879
Joint-Stock Banking Companies, Com. [150] 1505
"Juno," H. M. Ship, [148] 269
Justice, Department of, [148] 553, 1168
London Corporation Regulation, Com. [151] 302, 303, 305
Marriage Law Amendment, Com. cl. 1, [151] 679; cl. 2, 682
Metropolis Local Management, Com. cl. 3, Amend. [151] 1948; 3R. 2075
Oaths, Com. [149] 300; Lords' Amends. [150] 345; That Baron de Rothschild be a Member of the Committee, 352;—Lords' Amends. 1904

WARREN, Mr. S.—cont.
Parochial Registration, [149] 462
Partnerships, Registration of, 2R. [151] 234
Probate Court, The [150] 252
Probates and Letters of Administration, 2R. [151] 2055; Com. 2068, 2070; add. cl. 2073
Rewards to Members, [151] 2349
Rothschild, Baron de, Admission of, Res. Amend. [151] 2106, 2108, 2109
Supply—Court of Probate, [150] 1474
Thames, State of the [151] 31
Universities (Scotland), 2R. [150] 1898

Waterloo and Westminster Bridges,
c. Question, (Sir W. Fraser), [149] 1109

Ways and Means,
c. Com. Res. [149] 263;—The Budget, Res. (Chancellor of the Exchequer), 1267, 1601; Rep. 1722: Res. (Chancellor of the Exchequer) [150] 399; Observations (Sir F. Baring), [151] 1639; Res. (Chancellor of the Exchequer) 1647

Weedon Establishment—Mr. Elliot,
c. Question (Mr. Nicoll), [150] 1449;—Commission moved for (Colonel Boldero), 1799; Adj. moved (Chancellor of the Exchequer), 1801; Adj. Debate, [151] 254; Order discharged, ib.; Commission moved for (Colonel Boldero), 578; Her Majesty's Answer, 753; —Sergeant Brodie, Question (Mr. Coningham), 2303

WEGUELIN, Mr. T. M., Southampton
Bank Acts, Com. moved for, [148] 659
Bothnia—Claims of British Merchants, Commission moved for, [151] 1858
Joint-Stock Banks, [148] 376
Joint-Stock Banking Companies, Com. add. cl. [150] 1911
Navy Estimates, [149] 1248
Netley Hospital, [149] 1174
Partnerships, Registration of, 2R. [151] 238

Weights and Measures,
c. Question (Mr. Child), [148] 1370; (Mr. John Locke), [151] 2274, 2373

Weights and Measures Bill,
c. Leave, [149] 1839; 1R.* 1841; 2R. [150] 913; Amend. (Mr. Horsfall), 914, [o. q. A. 84, N. 92, M. 8] 918

WELLINGTON, Duke of
Wellington Monument, The, [151] 793

Wellington Monument, The,
l. Question (Duke of Wellington), [151] 793
c. Question (Mr. Stirling), [151] 14; (Mr. Cowper), 417; (Mr. S. Wortley), 2043; Res. 2208, [A. 26, N. 44, M. 18] 2238; Question (Lord Elcho), 2305;—Supply, 1483

WENSLEYDALE, Lord
Aliens, Law relating to, [148] 1853
Bankruptcy, District Courts of, 1R. [148] 1603
"Cagliari," Case of the, [149] 308, 310, 1252, 1255, 1948
Calcutta Petition, Papers moved for, [148] 1259
China, Troops for, Papers moved for, [148] 1259
Church of England Special Services, Com. cl. 1, [148] 1462
Church Rates Abolition, 2R. [151] 821
Imprisonment for Debt, [148] 1259
Joint-Stock Banking Companies, 2R. [151] 1252
Land, Transfer of, 2R. [149] 567; 3R. [150] 421
Libel, 3R. Amend. [149] 968
Transfer of Estates Simplification, Com. [149] 234; Rep. 851

WESTERN, Mr. T. S., Maldon
Magisterial Appointments, [150] 271
Turnpike System, Abolition of the, [149] 324

Western Australia—Supply,
c. [151] 1270

Western Bank of Scotland,
c. Question (Mr. Brady), [149] 812, 1194

WESTHEAD, Mr. J. P. B., York
Army, Subalterns in the, Address moved, [151] 2240
Local Government, Com. cl. 10, [151] 173

West India Islands Relief Commission—Supply,
c. [150] 1262

West Indies and other Colonies—Supply,
c. [151] 1268

West Indies, Imported Labourers in the,
l. Question (Lord Brougham), [149] 445;—see Slave Trade, The

West Indies, Removal of Troops from,
c. Question (Mr. Hankey), [151] 2126

WESTMEATH, Marquess of,
Organs, Street, [149] 1351, 1353; Suppression of, 2R. 1925, 1930

Westminster Bridge,
c. Question (Sir W. Fraser), [149] 1109; (Mr. Jackson), [151] 1267;—Supply, 1437

Westminster Hall,
c. Question (Sir A. Agnew), [150] 335

Westminster, Palace of,
c. Question (Viscount Ingestre), [149] 1987—see Parliament, New Houses of

Wexford Harbour Embankment Bill,
c. 1R.* [148] 757;
2R. Amend. (Mr. M'Mahon), 1854; Amend. withdrawn, 1855

WHITBREAD, Mr. S., Bedford
Conspiracy to Murder, Leave, [148] 1021
Marriage Law Amendment, Leave, [149] 619
Oaths, Lords' Amends. That Baron de Rothschild be a Member of the Committee, [150] 433

WHITE, Mr. James, Plymouth
Budget, The—Financial Statement, [149] 1323
China, Relations with, [149] 1265 ;—Military Operations in, [151] 2378
Consular Service, Com. moved for, [149] 553
Cornwall Submarine Mines, Com. [151] 1751
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Com. cl. 1, [151] 1599 ; add. cl. 2027
Danubian Principalities, [151] 881
Diplomatic Salaries and Pensions, Res. [149] 1515
East India Loan, Consid. [149] 74 ; add. cl. 151
Havelock, Major General, Pension to, Res. [148] 395, 397
India, Government of, (No. 2), Leave, [149] 835
India, Government of, Com. Res. 2, [149] 2198
India, Government of, (No. 3), Com. cl. 13, [151] 861 ; Lords' Amends. 2338
Lighthouses, &c., Address moved, [149] 1138
Magisterial Appointments, Return moved for, [150] 322
Navy Estimates, [149] 130
New Caledonia, Government of, 2R. [151] 1119
Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Res. [150] 1039
Portugal, Mission to, [150] 20
Private Bills, Res. [150] 462
Supply—Poor Law Board, [150] 1134;—General Registry House, Edinburgh, 1497;—Board of Fisheries (Scotland), Amend. [151] 1417; —Board of Manufacturers (Scotland), 1418 ; —Embassy House at Paris, 1438 ;—Major General Chesney, 1442 1443, 2374

WHITESIDE, Rt. Hon. J. (†Attorney General for Ireland), Enniskillen
†Agricultural Statistics, 2R. [149] 1917
†Attorney General, The Late, and the Law Lords, [149] 14
†Bar in Ireland, Admission to the, [149] 1988
†Browne, Col. and Mr. O'Ferrall, [151] 1607
†Budget, The—Financial Statement, [149] 1301
†Chancellor of the Exchequer's Speech at Slough, [150] 1096, 1242
†Civil Bills, &c. (Ireland) Act Amendment, 2R. [151] 1430, 1546; Com. cl. 2, 1770, 1772
†Conspiracy to Murder (Ireland), Leave, [150] 881
†Corrupt Practices Prevention, Com. cl. 1, [151] 1494 ; 3R. 2119
†County Franchise (Scotland), Leave, [150] 212
†Donegal, Destitution in, Com. moved for, [149] 1538
†Dublin, Affray at, Report moved for, [149] 677, 682, 690
†Ellis, Mr., Murder of—The Cormacks, [150] 1311 ; [151] 20, 1195, 1196, 1785
†Galway Election, [149] 1264
†Galway Freemen Disfranchisement, Com. [149] 1419 ; [151] 597 ; cl. 1, Amend. 599, 601
India, Government of (No. 1), Leave, [148] 1385, 1648

[cont.

WHITESIDE, Rt. Hon. J.—cont.
†India, Government of (No. 3), 2R. [151] 353 ; Com. cl. 60, 908 ; Consid. add. cl. 1027
†Judgments (Ireland) Act Amendment, 2R. [151] 974 ; Com. cl. 1, Proviso, 1959, 1960, 1961
†Juries (Ireland), 2R. [150] 2285
†Land, Sale and Transfer of (Ireland), Leave, [150] 24, 44 ; 2R. 1060 ; Com. 1538, 1544, 1567, 2105, 2107 ; cl. 3, 2111 ; Amend. [151] 57, 58 ; cl. 4, 60 ; cl. 12, 62 ; cl. 34, 63 ; cl. 38, 63, 64 ; cl. 41, 65 ; cl. 51, 153, 471 ; cl. 87, 969 ; Amend. 972 ; cl. 88, 973 ; Consid. 1145
†Land, Transfer of (Ireland), [149] 2016
†Landed Estates Court (Ireland), [150] 2252
†Legitimacy Declaration, Com. cl. 1, [151] 1540
†Magisterial Appointments, [150] 272
†Mayo Priests, Prosecution of the, [149] 1590; [150] 1850
†Moore's, Mr. Cecil, Appointment, [150] 1920 ; Res. [151] 648
†Mortgages, Judgments on, (Ireland), [151] 311
†Nisi Prius Court (Ireland), 2R. [150] 2278
†Oaths, Considered, [149] 489
†Official Debtors (Ireland), [149] 1583
†Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Res. [150] 840
†Police Force (Ireland), Leave, [150] 2155 ; Com. [151] 1139, 1142, 1143
†Rewards to Members, Res. [151] 186
†Supply—Secretary to Lord Lieutenant (Ireland), [150] 1254 ;—Inspectors of Lunatic Asylums (Ireland), 1260 ;—Public Education (Ireland, [151] 1233 ; —Temporary Commissions, 1412 ;—New Public Offices (Belfast), 1424 ;—Major General Chesney, 1443
†Tenants' Compensation (Ireland), 2R. [150] 1820
†Tuam, Romish Processions in, [150] 2018

WICKHAM, Mr. H. W., Bradford
Lancashire and Yorkshire, &c., Railway Companies, Consid. [150] 1606

WICKLOW, Earl of
Church of England Special Services, Com. [148] 1459 ; cl. 1, 1463 ; Preamble, 1469; [151] 2093, 2097
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Com. cl. 1, [151] 2248
Divorce Act (Ireland), [149] 1924
Divorce and Matrimonial Causes, Re-com , [150] 2000 ; Report, 2194; 3R. [151] 161
India, Government of, Com. moved for, [149] 1718
Jews, Com. [151] 1072
Kerry County, Assistant Barrister of, [150] 2097
Kingston, Earl of, Notices of Questions by the, [150] 1599
Land, Sale and Transfer of (Ireland), Com. [151] 1780
Oaths, 2R. [149] 1484 ; Com. cl. 1, Amend. 1749, 1757
Patriotic Fund, Correspondence moved for, [149] 1258
Property Qualification, 3R. [150] 2093
Victoria Station, and Pimlico Railway, Motion for Counsel, [151] 588, 798

Wight, Isle of—Pilots,
c. Return moved for (Mr. Clifford), [149] 1837; —Poor Law in the, Question (Mr. Roebuck), 2014

WIGRAM, Mr. L. T., Cambridge University
Church Rates Abolition, Com. cl. 1, [149] 1458, 1466, 1472
Churches and Churchyards, Com. moved for, [149] 1851, 1866
Oaths, Considered, [149] 481, 490, 540; Amend. 550

Wilks, Washington—see Breach of Privilege

Wills, Calendar of,
c. Question (Mr. Adams), [151] 1082

Wills, &c., of British Subjects abroad Bill,
c. 1R.* [150] 1849; 2R. 2276; 3R.* [151] 994
l. 1R.* [151] 1069

WILLIAMS, Lieut. General Sir F. W., Calne
Military Academy—Competitive Examinations, Address moved, [149] 1729, 1733

WILLIAMS, Lieut. Col. T. P., Gt. Marlow
Enfield Musket, [150] 21

WILLIAMS, Mr. M., Cornwall, W.
Supply—Theological Professors, Belfast, [151] 1240

WILLIAMS, Mr. W., Lambeth
Army, Commissions in the, [149] 222
Army Estimates, [149] 135, 138; [150] 371, 374, 380, 384, 387, 388, 1107, 1110; [151] 1482
Army, Sanitary Condition of the, Res. [150] 483
Assessed and Income Taxes, Res. [151] 211
Battersea Park, [151] 1398
Budget, The—Financial Statement, [149] 1319
Business, Public, [149] 1987
Chelsea Bridge Act Amendment, Com. cl. 3, [151] 1650
Commissioners for Exhibition (1851), Com. cl. 1, [151] 92
Consolidated Fund (Appropriation), Com. [151] 1922; cl. 25, 1923
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Consid. add. cl. [151] 2025
East India Loan, Com. [148] 1887
Finance, [148] 430
Funded Debt, Com. [151] 538
Galway Freemen Disfranchisement, Com. cl. 1, [151] 600
Havelock's, Sir H., Annuity, 2R. [148] 502
Havelock's, Lady, and Sir H. Havelock's Annuities, Com. Res. [148] 777
Health, Public, Lords' Amends. [151] 2277
India, Government of (No. 3), Com. cl. 13, [151] 861

[cont.

WILLIAMS, Mr. W.—cont.
Land, Sale and Transfer of (Ireland), Com. cl. 12, [151] 62; cl. 87, 970
London Corporation Regulation, Leave, [148] 743; Com. [151] 294
Medical Practitioners, Com. cl. 3, [151] 997
Metropolis Local Management, Com. cl. 9, [151] 1952; cl. 14, 1954, 1955; cl. 26, 1957; add. cl. 1959
Navy Estimates, [149] 110, 117, 125; Amend. 878, 945, 1244, 1347, 1644, 1647; Adj. moved, 1649
Nelson Monument, The, [149] 1223
New Zealand, [150] 362
Poor Rates (Metropolis), Leave, [149] 634
Real Property, &c.—Probate Duty, Res. [150] 867, 878
Stamp Duty on Drafts, 2R. [149] 2174; Com. Preamble, [150] 291
Supply—Customs Department, [149] 226;—Public Buildings, [150] 1111, 1112;—Furniture for Public Departments, 1113;—Royal Parks, 1115;—New Houses of Parliament, 1118;—Holyhead Harbour, 1127;—Portpatrick Harbour, 1127;—Retired Officers of the Houses of Parliament, 1129;—Office of Works 1132;—Poor Law Board, 1134;—Queen's, &c Remembrancer (Scotland), 1251;—Officers of Lord Lieutenant (Ireland), 1262;—Secretary to Lord Lieutenant (Ireland), 1255; Amend. 1259; — Board of Public Works (Ireland), 1261;—West India Island Relief Commission, 1262;—Law Charges, 1466;—Prosecutions, 1467;—Admiralty Court, 1472; — Insolvent Debtors' Court, ib., 1473;—County Courts, 1483; — Police Courts (Metropolis), 1487, 1488;—Lord Advocate, &c., (Scotland), 1491; — Department of Science and Art, [151] 1181, 1201, 1204;—Public Education (Ireland), 1237;—Theological Professors (Belfast), Adj. moved, 1240;—Falkland Islands;—Labuan, 1268;—— Hong Kong; — Consular Establishments Abroad, 1270; — Embassies and Missions Abroad, 1271;—Superannuations, 1275; —Miscellaneous Allowances;—Irish Hospitals, 1276;—Nonconforming, &c. Ministers (Ireland), 1280; — General Board of Health, 1281; — Incumbered Estates Court (Ireland), 1402;—Patent Law Fees, &c., Amend. 1413, 1414, 1415; — Board of Manufacturers (Scotland), 1418;—Embassy House at Paris, 1440; — New Consular Office at Constantinople, 1441;—Major General Chesney, 1443;—Civil Contingencies, Amend. 1445, 1446;—Survey of the United Kingdom, 1483
Under Secretary of State for Scotland, Res. [150] 2134
Ways and Means, [151] 1645

WILLOUGHBY, Sir H. P., Evesham
Ali Moorad's Claim—Mr. Butt, Com. moved for, [148] 1867
Army Estimates, [150] 383, 392
Bank Acts, Com. [148] 670
Bank Issues Indemnity, 2R. [148] 276; 3R. 431
Bills, Withdrawal of, [151] 1749
Budget, The—Financial Statement, [149] 1296 1330
Business Public, [149] 71, 72, 1601

[cont.

WILLOUGHBY, Sir H. P.—cont.

Chelsea Bridge Act Amendment, [150] 1995
Church Rates Abolition, Com. cl. 1, [149] 1457; 1466
Commissioners for Exhibition (1851), Com. cl. 1, Amend. [151] 85, 86; cl. 2, 96; Consid. 313
Consolidated Fund (£10,000,000), 3R. [149] 465
Consolidated Fund (Appropriation), 2R. [151] 1862; Com 1921; cl. 25, Amend. 1922, 1924
East India Loan, Leave, [148] 800; 2R. 933; Com. 1872, 1877, 1878; Consid. [149] 73; add. cl. 148, 156
Exchequer Bonds, 2R. [149] 2164
Finance [148] 424, 428
Funded Debt, Com. [151] 547
Hainault Allotment, Res. [151] 623
Havelock, Major General, Pension to, Rep. [148] 417, 419
Health, Public, Act Amendment, 2R. [148] 744
India, Government of, Com. Res. 2, [149] 2192; Res. 3, [150] 1681, 1982, 2252
India, Government of (No. 3), Com. cl. 3, [151] 448, 459; cl. 8, 772; cl. 9, 775; cl. 11, 783; cl. 36, 902; cl. 38, 905; add. cl. 945
India—Transport of Troops to, Com. moved for, [148] 720;—Despatches from, [150] 929
Land Transport Corps, Com. moved for, [149] 1627
Loan Societies, Com. [149] 1251
Metropolis Local Management, 2R. [151] 1700
Navy Estimates, [149] 123, 124, 125, 1345, 1628
New Zealand, [150] 362
Property Qualification, Com. [150] 578
Real Property, &c.—Probate Duty, Res. [150] 872
Supply—Rep. [149] 261;—Poor Law Board, [150] 1137;—Civil Contingencies, 1138;—New Houses of Parliament, 1201;—Prosecutions, 1467
Ways and Means, [149] 263, 264

WILLOUGHBY, Mr. J. P., Leominster

India, Government of, (No. 1), Leave, [148] 1649
India, Government of, Com. Res. 5, [150] 2045
India, Government of, (No. 3), Com. cl. 19, [151] 883; cl. 23, 887; cl. 29, 898; cl. 37, Amend. 902; cl. 38, Amend. ib.; cl. 53, Amend. 907
India—Vote of Thanks to the Army, &c., [148] 918

WILSON, Mr. J., (†Secretary to the Treasury), Devonport

Agricultural Statistics, 2R. [149] 1918
†Australian Mail Packet Service, [148] 1084
Barber's, W. H., Committee, That Viscount Goderich be discharged attendance, [151] 975
British Bank, The Royal, Returns moved for, [149] 398
Budget, The—Financial Statement, [149] 1302
Business of the House, [151] 1346, 1506, 1605
Canning's, Lord, Proclamation, [150] 1921
Cape of Good Hope Mails, [150] 429
Chesney's, General, Work, [151] 2374
Civil Bills, &c. (Ireland), Act Amendment, 2R. [151] 1548

WILSON, Mr. J.—cont.

Civil Service Estimates, [151] 1267
Civil Service Superannuation, [151] 1498
Commissioners for Exhibition (1851), 2R. [150] 2267; Com. cl. 1, [151] 86, 87, 88; Amend. 91; cl. 2, 97; Consid. Amend. 312
Consolidated Fund (Appropriation), Com. [151] 1918; cl. 25, 1924
Dockyard Officers, Superannuation of, [151] 1085
Exchequer Bonds, 2R. [149] 2159
†Excise, Salaries in the, [148] 1167
Funded Debt, Com. Amend. [151] 525
Hainault Allotment, Res. [151] 622, 623
†Harbours of Refuge, [148] 359; Com. 1359, 1360; [150] 923; [151] 1182, 1745, 1747; Commission moved for, 2139, 2150
†Income Tax Papers, Abstraction of, [148] 1734
India, Government of (No. 3), Com. cl. 29, [151] 899; cl. 38, 905; cl. 47, 906; Consid add. cl. 1016, 1031; Lords' Amends. cl. 27, 2187; cl. 32, 2200
†Indian Officers, Distinction conferred upon, [148] 138
Insurance and Assurance Institutions, 2R. [150] 2192
†Irish National School Books, [148] 1733
Jews, Com. cl. 1 [151] 1760
Joint-Stock Banking Companies, Com. Amend. [150] 1504, 1506; cl. 3, Amend. 1910, 1911, 1913
Joint-Stock Companies Act Amendment, Com. cl. 7, [150] 2271
Land, Sale and Transfer of, (Ireland), Com. cl. 87, [151] 971; cl. 88, 973; Consid. 1145
Metropolis Local Management Act Amendment, Leave, [151] 1516, 1517, 1519, 1532
Navy Estimates, [149] 124, 1246
Police Force (Ireland), Com. [151] 1143
Registers, Non-Parochial, Com. cl. 3, [150] 576
†Sasines, Register of (Scotland), [148] 555
Stamp Duties on Drafts, Com. cl. 2, [150] 290
Superannuation Law Amendment, [151] 1181
Supply—Customs Department, [149] 226, 227;—Harbours of Refuge, [150] 1121;—Holyhead Harbour, 1127;—Office of Works, 1131;—Poor Law Board, 1136;—Queen's, &c. Remembrancer (Scotland), 1251;—West India Islands Relief Commission, 1262;—Printing, &c., Houses of Parliament, 1266;—Prosecutions, 1466, 1467, 1468, 1470, 1585;—Insolvent Debtors' Court, 1472;—Court of Probate, &c., 1474;—County Courts, 1476, 1477, 1483, 1486;—Metropolitan Police, 1490;—General Register House, Edinburgh, 1494, 1495, 1497, 1498, 1499; Report, [151] 1637;—Department of Science and Art, 1177, 1178, 1202;—Hong Kong, 1269;—Embassies and Missions abroad; 1273;—General Board of Health, 1282;—National Gallery, Report, 1391;—Ecclesiastical Commissioners, 1400;—Board of Fisheries (Scotland), 1418;—Board of Manufacturers (Scotland), 1418;—Wellington Monument, 1483
Telegraph, Mediterranean, [149] 984; to India, [151] 2304
United States, Differences with the, [150] 1532

WILTON, Earl of

Organ, Barrel, Suppression, 2R. [149] 1926; Amend. 1929

[cont.

Windham, General,
l. Explanation (Duke of Cambridge), [148] 1364, 1458
c. Question (General Codrington), [148] 1606

Winding-up Acts,
c. Question (Mr. Bright), [150] 1517

Windsor Castle—Supply,
c. [151] 1438

WINGFIELD, Mr. R. B., Essex, S.
Metropolis Local Management, Com. cl. 2, [151] 1945

WISE, Mr. J. A., Stafford
Army Estimates, [149] 817
Black Sea, Commerce of the, [148] 468
Cairo, Police Ordinance at, [151] 1083
Calcutta Memorial, [148] 555
Chapel in Paris for British Residents, [148] 860
Civil Service Estimates, [151] 1266
Consular Service, Com. moved for, [149] 553
Denmark and the Duchies, [149] 1799
Diplomatic Salaries and Pensions, Res. [149] 1496
Howard, Mr., his Departure from Florence, [150] 1731
India, Government of, (No. 2), Leave, [149] 838
India, Troops for, [148] 358
Lancaster, Duchy of—Mining Operations, Com. moved for, [150] 454
Mobile, Consulship at, [150] 1465
Poor Rates, [148] 1471
Supply—Public Buildings, [150] 1111;—Furniture for Public Departments, 1113;—New Houses of Parliament, 1119;—Retired Officers of the Houses of Parliament, 1128;—Lord Privy Seal, 1129;—Queen's, &c. Remembrancer (Scotland), Amend. 1251;—Officers of Lord Lieutenant (Ireland), Amend. 1253, 1254;—Secretary to Lord Lieutenant (Ireland), 1255;—County Courts, 1486;—Embassies and Missions abroad, Amend. [151] 1270; 1273; 2nd Amend. 1274
Turin, British Envoy at, [149] 985

Witnesses, Expenses of,
c. Question (Mr. Philipps), [151] 1613

WODEHOUSE, Lord
Church Rates Abolition, 2R. [151] 811
Competitive Examination for the Civil Service, [150] 1699
India, Government of (No. 3), Com. cl. 7, [151] 1574; cl. 54, 1695
India, Telegraphic Communication with, [151] 2289
Marriage Law Amendment, 2R. [151] 1983
New Caledonia, Government of, 2R. [151] 2013
Slave Trade, The, [150] 2210

WOOD, Rt. Hon. Sir C. (†First Lord of the Admiralty), Halifax
†Australia and New Zealand—Naval Stations, [148] 681
†Australian Postal Service, [148] 580

[cont.

WOOD, Rt. Hon. Sir C.—cont.
†"Austria," The, Steam Ship, Report moved for, [148] 684
†Bank Acts, Com. [148] 671
†Bank Issues Indemnity, Com. cl. 2, [148] 408
†China, War in, [148] 1276
†Coal Trade, The, [148] 1869
Hasla: Slip, [149] 1722
†India, Government of (No. 1), Leave, [148] 1636, 1648
India, Government of (No. 2), [149] 864, 868
India, Government of, Com. Res. 2, [149] 2198; Res. 3, (4), [150] 1687, 1975; Res. 5, (6), 2079
India, Government of (No. 3), Com. cl. 3, [151] 456, 457
†"Juno," H. M. Ship [148] 269
†Lights on Sailing Vessels, [148] 685
National Defences, The, [150] 1940, 1941
Navy Estimates, [149] 119, 123, 125, 904, 908, 942, 946, 1232, 1233, 1235, 1238, 1239, 1241, 1242, 1248, 1347, 1634, 1640, 1642, 1644, 1645, 1648
Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Res. [150] 773, 862

Woods, Office of—Supply
c. [150] 1133

Woolwich Academy, Admission to
c. Question (Mr. P. O'Brien), [150] 251—see Army

Woolwich, Gun Foundry at,
c. Question (Mr. H. Vivian), [151] 1080

Workhouses, Metropolitan
c. Com. moved for (Viscount Raynham), [150] 107; Motion neg. 108

Working Classes, Condition of the,
c. Com. moved for (Mr. Slaney), [149] 339; Motion withdrawn, 346

Works, Office of,—Supply
c. [150] 1131

Works, Public, Loan Commission—Supply
c [150] 1262

WORTLEY, Rt. Hon. J. A. S., Buteshire
Barber's, Mr., Petition, Nomination of Com. [151] 154
Bishops, Retirement of, [151] 606
Business of the House, [151] 605
Corrupt Practices Prevention, Com. cl. 2, [151] 1603
Drafts on Bankers' Law Amendment, 3R. [151] 2077
India, Government of (No. 3), Com. cl. 7, [151] 469; cl. 38, 905
Jews, Com. cl. 1, [151] 1762
Legitimacy Declaration, Com. cl. 9, [151] 1543
London Corporation Regulation, Com. [151] 295, 300, 607
Metropolis Local Management, 2R. [151] 1710; Com. 1928; cl. 1, 1929; cl. 5, 1950; Consid. add. cl. 2048, 2049; 3R. 2074
New Trial in Criminal Cases. Com. [151] 1062
Probate and Letters of Administration, Com. cl 5, [151] 2072

[cont.

WORTLEY, Rt. Hon. J. A. S.—cont.
Supply—Main Drainage of London, [151] 1428
Thames, State of the, [151] 37
Universities (Scotland), Com. cl. 13, [151] 137
Wellington Testimonial, The, [151] 2043; Res. 2208, 2220, 2225, 2237

WORTLEY, Major A. H. P., Honiton
Army Estimates, [150] 386; Amend. 398
Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Res. [150] 1035, 1036
Recruiting System, [150] 368

WRIGHTSON, Mr. W. B., Northallerton
Vacating of Seats, Leave, [148] 1544

WROTTESLEY, Lord
Government of India, (No. 3), 3R. Amend. [151] 2007

WYLD, Mr. J., Bodmin
Conspiracy to Murder, Leave, [148] 1077
Cornwall Submarine Mines, Com. [151] 1753
Gloucester Gate Bridge, [150] 333
Godrevy Lighthouse, Com. moved for, [149] 333
Hudson's Bay Company, Res. [151] 1840
India, Government of, (No. 1), [148] 681; Leave, 1448
India, Government of, Com. Res. 5, [149] 2084
India — Reinforcements for the Army, [150] 524
Judgments (Ireland) Act Amendment, Com. cl. 1, [151] 1960
London Corporation Regulation, Motion for Counsel, [149] 1748

[cont.

WYLD, Mr. J.—cont.
New Caledonia, Government of, 2R. [151] 1112
Oude, Confiscation of Land in—Lord Canning's Proclamation, Res. [150] 1035
Probate Districts Map, Papers moved for, [149] 161, 162
Telegraph, Mediterranean, [149] 985

WYNDHAM, Gen. H., Cumberland, W.
Army—Warrant of 1854, [149] 323; [151] 84

WYNFORD, Lord
Cornwall Submarine Mines, 2R. [151] 2078
Health, Public, 2R. [151] 1866
Thames, State of the, [151] 393

Yarmouth, Great, Magistrates,
l. Petition (Lord Sondes), [149] 453

York, Convocation at,
l. Papers moved for (Lord Redesdale), [151] 1551; Motion withdrawn, 1561

York, Deanery of,
c. Question (Mr. W. Ewart) [150] 1522

YOUNG, Mr. A. W., Great Yarmouth
Australian Mail Service, [148] 353
Harbours of Refuge, Commission moved for, [151] 2147
Manchester, &c. and Great Northern Railway Companies, Consid. [150] 1609
Metropolis Local Management, Com. cl. 1, [151] 1944

ERRATA.

VOLUME CL.

Page 2065, line 29, for "5,000 or 6,000," read "50,000 or 60,000."

VOL. CLI.—P. 505, line 14, for "Mr. A. Miles," read "Mr. A. Mills."
" " 755, " 3 from bottom, for "Mr. Ker Seymour," read "Mr. Ker Seymer."
" " 757, " 11, for "Sir John Manners," read "Lord John Manners."
" " 1863, " 25, for "Mr. Ingham," read "Mr. Ingram."
" " 2217, last line, read "Friend dealt with that Report, as if it"—

LONDON:
CORNELIUS BUCK, PRINTER,
23, PATERNOSTER ROW.

22 FEB 1970